"October 6th, 1776.

"DEAR SIR: I promised your good lady, when I left Halifax, to write you from this part of the world. The first opportunity I omitted, it being a man-of-war, and his lordship, our admiral, is very private in the destination of his ships. Now to tell you how we got to New York. The first battle we fought was on Long Island. Much to the credit of our army, there were killed and taken prisoners on that day, 3,000 men; the rest, in a dark night, decamped to New York, where soon after, they were drove away in like manner, like cowards—for they have never made a stand before our troops yet. They are now at King's bridge, where we expect the general will attack them, every day, every thing being prepared, and a number of transports, with troops, and three men-of-war, which most people expect are going to Albany—which I believe is pretty true, for they lay half way up the North river already. We have numbers of the rebels come in every day, who say one and all are quite sick of the lay, except the d—d Connecticut and New England people, which keep the rest quite under command. God send them a little courage, that they may stand once, to get a few thousand of them slain, that we may have a new race of men.

"Our admiral and general agree very well, which makes every manœuvre go on with spirit and pleasure, and the navy do their part. All, except the army and navy, have taken up their winter quarters in New York, where a few nights ago, they had near been burnt in their beds, by some premeditated villains who were left in New York for that purpose. They set fire to it in different places, and burnt a quarter of the town before we could stop it. I believe most of these villains were taken—many of them in the very act, whom the mad soldiers threw into the flames. Two, your friend, captain Wallace, hung in the street, on a sign post; the rest were carried to prison, where they will be hung or burnt, I believe, in a day or two. Now, I think it's most time to inquire about your family. I hope they are all well. Have you plenty of fresh grub, as the sailors say? I assure you till within these few days we have been very short—one fresh dinner in a week, and I thought myself very well off. But now we have a good prospect of being well supplied all winter, if the d—d Hessians don't get into town, for they rob and plunder without distinction, wherever they go. To-night is Sunday night; I wish I could spend it with you—I think I could make myself very happy; but as the distance is so great, must content myself with drinking all your healths in some porter. I have some very good, I assure you. I wish you were here to partake of it. Poor Jack, we have not been able to hear of yet, but soon expect an exchange of sailors, when we hope to have him in the list. I believe I shall tire you with my details, so will wind up till the next opportunity. My best compliments to your good lady and all the family—hope they are well. Arch and I meet every day. I remain your sincere friend and humble servant,

JOS. ROYAL LORING."

"P. S. The bearer of this is a clever fellow—the captain of my old ship—who will tell you all about it. If he returns I shall expect a few lines by him."

JEWISH FUNERALS.

I cannot say that my friends the Israelites are so free from verbosity as the Moors in their sepulchral inscriptions; yet still I am glad that the conquerors have spared them. Farther west from Bab-el-Oued than the demolished Moorish tombs, and happily out of the line of the great road, lies the Jewish cemetery. It has neither flowers nor trees; but it is, to my taste, a picturesque and interesting place. It contains, I should think, though I cannot say I have reckoned them, hundreds of graves, covered with slabs of pure white marble, with the Hebrew characters beautifully engraved and colored black, and here and there surrounded by sculptured hands, denoting the tombs of rabbis. I need not apologise to you for my interest in the Hebrews; the very characters of their language beget reverence in my heart. Most ancient and ill used people! It is some comfort to see their ashes undisurbed in a country where they have suffered so much. I often visit this cemetery by clear moonlight, when the many tombs contrast their foreground splendidly with the blue amphitheatre of hills above, and here, as if the ground inspired my memory, I can vividly recollect the brightest passages of that prophet poet Isaiah, who painted futurity like the present scene.

[Letters from the South by Campbell.

Since returning to England, I applied to Mr. Harwitz, professor of Hebrew in the London university, to translate the epitaphs which I brought home, and he very kindly took the trouble to do so. He tells me that the style is modern, or corrupted Hebrew, which has its difficulties to the best Hebrew scholar.

1. Epitaph on a female.

Call forth the lamenting women to prepare a mourning, and to weep over the graceful and lovely lady who was smitten with the plague in the day of anger, and descended into the lonely grave through the wrath (of God). She buried her husband after the death of her husband. She was of fair form and stature—agreeable in her deeds to those who knew her. Hannah her name was called, the consort of the rabbi Joseph, of the family Rubeis. In the month of Sivan, in the year of the creation 5517, her blameless soul ascended to the highest heaven.

II. On a young man.

(This is) the tombstone of a lovely, upright and worthy young man—Joseph, the Levite, of blessed memory, who was slain for no crime, but in consequence of false imputations raised against him and his seven companions, who were killed with him the same day, on account of an unjust sentence that was pronounced against them by their enemies concerning. May God, in his mercy, avenge them and the innocent blood which was shed in the land.

Be amazed, ye heavens, at this! How have the righteous thus ceased, and to come to an untimely end! Woe to the eyes that have seen this, and woe to the ears that hear this! On the fourth day of Tammuz, in the year of the world 5500, their souls went into the Upper Paradise, where they will find rest.

United States bank stock. At Philadelphia, 124 7-8 @123 1/4—at New York, 125 1/4 @123 1/2.

"Measures not men" Fifty tailors have just arrived at New York from Liverpool, in the ship Star.

A tie. The new board of assistants made thirty-four ballots yesterday for president, without effecting a choice. They then adjourned till Thursday.

In the board of aldermen the number of ballots was thirty-nine, without effecting a choice, the strength of parties being exactly equal. The candidates were Benson (W.) and Varian (J.) The board then adjourned till Thursday. [N. Y. Jour. of Com.

A panic! A report prevailed at Nashville that the public deposits, or a part of them, were to be removed from the Union bank. That is—that the bank would be required to pay a certain portion of the debts which it owed! This seems to have caused much alarm; and the Nashville Union of April 28, an entire "government paper," thus notices the report:

We only await the reception of a document, which we expect to receive to-day, in order to lay before our readers, an authoritative refutation of the insidious and mischievous statements and misrepresentations which have been made by the Banner, Franklin Review and other papers of kindred opposition politics, in relation to the alleged removal of a portion of the government deposits from the Union bank of this city. Suffice it to say, until our next, that no part of the deposits have been removed—that the amount within a few days has been greatly increased—and that, in all probability—unless it becomes imperiously necessary for the public service—no part of the deposits will be called for by the treasury department during the season.

Again! The Globe, which speaks only the views of the ruling party, yesterday issued the following order to the deposit banks—those of New York in particular—

"The present state of the currency imposes upon the leading deposit banks the obligation of lessening their loans, calling upon other banks for regular settlements and payment of balances in specie, and thus give a check to their too extended operations; to the raging mania for wild speculations and overtrading; and thus restore a more wholesome state in the currency of the country."

There is an awful pressure for money, in most of the cities. The shavers exact their pounds of flesh. The deposit project, we think, has completely failed.

Hear ye, representatives in congress from the old states! Hearken to the voice of the oracle which foretels your destiny, if ye be not wise in time! The Detroit Free Press, the organ of the spoils party in Michigan, cries out against the passage of Mr. Clay's land bill, and predicts its defeat—arguing against present action upon it in the following terms:

"When both Michigan and Arkansas shall become members of the union, the new states will be strong enough in the senate to defeat any measure which may be injurious to their interests, if not powerful enough to accomplish what will promote them. It is highly important for the new states that Mr. Clay's bill, now before congress, should be defeated."

The Washington Globe of Monday, states that authentic information has been received of the payment to our agent at Paris of all the instalments due from France under the treaty of the fourth July, 1831. Its amount in all is over three and a half millions of dollars.

"We understand says the Globe that the money received is in the course of transmission to this country in gold, at the rate of about two hundred thousand dollars in each packet; and that the utmost diligence is employed in the bureaux of the treasury department, so far as consistent with the pressure of the current business and the calls of congress, in comparing the names of the debtors to the United States with those in whose favor awards have been made, for the purpose of retaining such sums as may appear to be due to the government from all such claimants. Scrip for the proper amounts will then be issued to all such as are entitled to the indemnity under the awards.

"If congress do not pass the bill before them, authorising an immediate payment of all the instalments, the net proceeds of the whole amount received from France will be paid over as soon as it arrives and as the amount due each claimant can be ascertained.

"It is expected that the scrip will be ready some time before all the money arrives."

From the Globe of Monday. We are informed that several members of congress have made inquiries of the president in relation to the fact stated by Mr. Adams in debate, that he had consulted him (then a major general in the United States army), in regard to the limits stipulated in the treaty of 1819, for the south western frontier of the union. We are informed that the president, in reply to these inquiries, has said, that Mr. Adams must have fallen into some mistake; that he has not the slightest recollection of having been consulted on the subject; that he could not have expressed an opinion in regard to the topography of the country, or the nature and extent of the claim set up for it by our government, and because the only point in the treaty with which his duties as a military man made him acquainted being Florida, he presumes, if consulted at all, in relation to the treaty, of which he has no recollection, it must have been in regard to that territory.

From the National Intelligencer of Monday, 9th of May. A debate of great interest sprung up in the house of representatives on Saturday last; of which a brief outline will be found in our report of that day's proceedings. [See congress news.] Brief as it is, however, it will serve to give our readers some idea of the topics and course of the debate. We entreat the attention of all our readers to it. If we mistake not, they will find in it much matter for very serious thought. They will be pretty generally surprised at some of the disclosures made, and not least, that, when the most suspicious amongst us never dreamt of it, we should have been deliberately taking steps which, as is proved by the very military appropriations now required from congress by the executive, it has been anticipated might lead to difficulties, if not hostilities, between the United States and Mexico.

It is satisfactory, however, meanwhile, to learn that the arguments in favor of assembling troops on the Sabine, drawn from the employment of Indians by the Mexicans against the Texans, and from the near approach of the Mexican troops to the border, are deprived of all the force to which they were entitled by the positive contradiction of the reports to that effect which have been lately circulated.

We are happy to infer, almost certainly, from the Mexican official papers that the whole story of the massacre of colonel Fanning's command is, from beginning to end, a fabrication, and that colonel Fanning and his men are now prisoners of war in the Mexican territory.

The Richmond Enquirer, whose editor is likely to be well informed on the subject, gives it as its impression, that, if the president felt himself at liberty to indulge his private feelings, he would not hesitate one moment to speak liberty to Texas, and an affiliation with the United States of America.

From the National Intelligencer of May 10.

The Texian subject has assumed an aspect entirely new so far as the government of the United States is concerned since the debate in the house of representatives on Saturday last, in connection with the documents which were read on that day, and which we have copied into the preceding columns from the Globe of yesterday.

From these documents, &c. it will be seen that the executive has undertaken to claim, as being within the limits of the United States, territory over which the Mexican government has heretofore exercised jurisdiction, including "old Fort Nacogdoches;" and has authorized gen. Gaines, under such interpretation of the rights of the United States, to cross the Sabine and occupy that post. Of this determination on the part of the executive, communicated to gen. Gaines by a letter from the war department dated the 26th ult. the secretary of state (Mr. Forsyth) apprized Mr. Gorostiza, the Mexican minister, in a conversation on the 20th of April, assuring him that the measure was "not to be taken as an indication of any hostile feeling, or of a desire to establish a possession or claim not justified by the treaty of limits."

What the Mexican minister said, if he said any thing, in reply to this communication from the secretary of state, has not been communicated to congress. The executive has left congress in doubt on the subject, unless it may be inferred, from nothing being said of it, that the minister had not a word to say in reply to what Mr. Forsyth communicated to him. Such may have been the case. But we doubt it. Be that as it may, however, we should be wanting in our duty to our readers, if we did not warn them, in time, of the imminent danger of our being involved, by this measure in a war which cannot be otherwise than disastrous to the whole western frontier, however fortunate we may be in its prosecution or victorious in its termination. We earnestly hope that the danger may pass away, that the Mexican government will be satisfied with the assurances of the secretary of state, that the military occupation of the Mexican territory is from an amicable motive, and will continue no longer than until the line is run and the true limits marked—notwithstanding the demonstrable proposition that no line that can be run, according to the terms of our treaty with Mexico, can include the said old Fort Nacogdoches. We hope that the government of Mexico will avoid coming into a collision with the United States, which, however it be brought about, would be at least as disastrous to Mexico on her maritime border as it would be to the United States on our western frontier, and would be justly a subject of reproach, in the community of nations, to both countries.

We have assumed it, above, as demonstrable that no line that can be run under the treaty can include the old post of Nacogdoches, which gen. Gaines has been instructed to occupy. We will now state the grounds of this assumption on our part.

But, first, let us state, without reference to our treaties with Spain and Mexico, the material points in this question of boundary:

1. The sources of the Sabine, properly so called, rise near the south side of Red river, and head over all the sources of the river Neches.

2. The Sabine, where intersected by latitude 32 degrees, is a river, which is, at high water, navigable by pirogues and small batteaux. The line of latitude 32, extended westward, would strike only the head-creeks of the Neches.

3. Nacogdoches, situated some fifty miles west of the Sabine, is an ancient Spanish establishment, made long previous to the French colonization of Louisiana. The land-grants of all the country from the main river Sabine westward, and some of them east of that stream, emanated from the land office in San Antonio de Bexar (of which the Alamo was the citadel). Consequently all the country west of the Sabine river has, at all times since the colonization of Louisiana by France, and of Texas by the Spaniards, been regarded, up to the present time, as part of the Spanish (now Mexican) territory.

So clear, indeed, is this question, that no person, even moderately acquainted with the geography of the countries on both sides of the Sabine would any more regard the Neches as the main stream of the Sabine, than they would the Shenandoah as the main stream of the Potomac, or the Juniata as that of the Susquehanna.

Let us now refer to the solemn recognition by treaty of the boundary of Texas, whilst that province, with all the other states of Mexico, was still considered a province of Spain. The treaty with Spain (Feb. 22, 1819) recognizes the boundary between the two countries, west of the Mississippi, as follows: It "shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea, continuing north, along the western bank of that river, to the 32d degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches or Red river; then following the course of the Rio Roxo westward to the degree of longitude 100 west from London and 23 from Washington; then, crossing the said Red river, and running thence, by a line due north, to the river Arkansas; thence, following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source, in latitude 42 north; and thence, by that parallel of latitude, to the South Sea. The whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the first of January, 1818."

The same treaty further stipulates, in reference to the boundary thus recognized, as follows: "The two high contracting parties agree to cede and renounce all their rights, claims and pretensions to the territories described by the said line; that is to say: the United States hereby cede to his Catholic majesty, and renounce forever, all their rights, claims and pretensions to the territories lying west and south of the above described line," &c.

As between the United States and Spain, nothing can be plainer or clearer than this definition of boundary.

But, still later, after the recognition of the independence of Mexico, that is to say, on the 12th of February, 1828, we made a treaty with Mexico (the ratifications of which were exchanged as late as April 5, 1832), in which was a new recognition of boundary, word for word, in the very terms (Melish's map and all) of the article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain.

Again: only on the 20th of the last month (the very day of the conference between the secretary of state and the Mexican minister) were exchanged the ratifications of a supplementary treaty, the sole object of which was to recognize and carry into effect the stipulations of the treaty of 1828 concerning the boundary line between the two countries.

Whatever doubt existed as to the boundary line was ended by the treaty of 1819 with Spain, not contradicted but solemnly renewed and corroborated by subsequent treaties with Mexico.

But, to prevent the possibility of the language of those treaties being subjected to different interpretations, Melish's map of January, 1818, was made a part of each of these treaties; and the line marked on that map, thus recognized, must be the true line, whatever any one may now think ought to have been the recognized line. According to that map, the post of Nacogdoches is, by measurement, forty-eight miles west of the western boundary of the United States, south of its intersection of the latitude of 32 degrees, and is of course so many miles within the Mexican territory.

This is a plain statement of the case as we understand it.

We do not pretend to deny, the reader will readily perceive, that it would be a very convenient thing to have the boundary line of the U. States extended as far west as it is claimed—(though such an extension would not embrace the principal settlements made in that country, by emigrants from the United States)—but it is an acquisition which can be made in one only of two ways; that is, with the consent of Mexico, or by conquest. To the former mode of obtaining it we have no objection: to the latter we have all the repugnance of those who have a due regard either to the faith of treaties or the law of nations.

Nor do we deny that, in the event of any hostile inroad into the territory of the United States, the invaders, whether Indians, Mexicans or Texans, may be pursued into Texas. What we object to is the authority expressly given to our commanding general on that frontier to advance into the Mexican territory as far as Nacogdoches; considering such an authority, under present circumstances, as one very liable, and very likely, to be construed into an order—and, consequently, an authority which ought not to have been given. Still less would we be understood as differing in opinion from those who deem an addition necessary to the existing means and material for the defence of the western frontier. It is due to the people of that frontier, not only that they should be protected from actual danger, but secured from the apprehension of it. All proper measures, having that end in view, and no latent ulterior purpose, will receive our cordial assent and approbation. But, of all conceivable ways of disposing of our surplus revenue, we protest against bringing into the field, upon the plea of defending the frontier, large armies of militia, should obvious necessity and propriety not require it.

From the same. From Tennessee we learn that governor Cannon, as soon as he received the requisition of gen. Gaines from Natchitoches, issued his proclamation calling for volunteers, in companies of 64 rank and file, one captain and three subalterns each. Thirty companies will be received, who will, when assembled, elect their own field officers. We are very glad to observe that the object for which these volunteers are invited is distinctly stated to be "for the purpose of protecting our western frontier, and preserving the neutrality between Mexico and our government."

From a postscript to the same. After our paper was ready for press, last evening, we were happy to learn that a letter had just been received in this city from an officer of the army of the highest rank, at New Orleans, stating that there was not the least danger of any hostilities on the Texian frontier, either from Indians or from the Mexican troops, and that the governor of Louisiana concurred fully in that opinion, founded on the most recent information from the frontier. We infer from this that general Gaines has been misinformed and entirely mistaken as to the fears expressed in his letter to the secretary of war, which we publish to-day.

It has been for some time generally reported that propositions had been made on the part of the Mexican government to the United States, treating of the sale of Texas to our government.

The rumor originated from a story that our minister, Mr. Butler, at Mexico, had caused it to be reported that the secretary of relations in Mexico had conferred with him on the subject of such sale. We find in the government paper of the Mexican republic, published in Mexico, under date of March the 7th, a correspondence between the secretary of Mexican relations and Mr. Butler, in which our minister in replying to the letter addressed him by the secretary, states explicitly, that no proposition or suggestion emanating from the secretary, in relation to the selling or transferring of Texas, or any part of the Mexican territory, was ever made to him, and charges the author of such communication as culpable of a direct falsehood.

So far as we can learn from a perusal of the government paper, the disposing of Texas to the U. States is very far from the intentions or wishes of the existing authorities of the Mexican republic.

[New Orleans Bul. April 26.]

From the Delaware Journal of May 10. It is with deep regret we announce to our fellow citizens the death of our venerable townsman Caleb P. Bennett, governor of the state of Delaware. He departed this life yesterday afternoon about 4 o'clock, in the 78th year of his age, after a painful illness of about four weeks.

Governor Bennett was the last surviving commissioned officer of the gallant regiment of Delaware, and like all the officers of that distinguished corps, bravely and faithfully discharged his duty to his country. He entered the service when about eighteen years of age as an ensign, and with the uncalculating and enthusiastic patriotism which distinguished that period of our history, he embarked his all in the venture and bravely persevered to the end. Major Bennett was present in all the general engagements which were fought in the middle states—at Trenton, Princeton, Long Island, Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, in all these engagements he was with the Delaware regiment, and of course, in the thickest of the fight. At the battle of Germantown, he was severely wounded in the attack upon Chew's house. When general Gates was appointed to the command of the southern army, major Bennett accompanied his regiment under the orders of the brave De Kalb; and in the desperate conflict at Camden, his company was almost annihilated. He was then detached on the recruiting service to Delaware, and having completed his complement of men, joined the army of Washington, and closed a brilliant series of military services, by participating in the capture of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

Since the close of that eventful war, major Bennett has principally resided in Delaware, and for the last twenty years, in this, his native town. He was remarkable for all the qualities which constitute a good citizen: a tender and affectionate husband and father, a warm hearted friend and neighbour, a devoted patriot and an honest man. Amidst all the exacerbations of party contention, major Bennett was popular and respected—and those who differed from him in political sentiment, did full justice to the excellence of his heart, the ardour of his patriotism and the integrity of his life and motives. In the year 1832, he was elected by his fellow citizens to the office of governor of this state—being the first executive elected under the amended constitution. He died as he had lived, with the composure of a Christian and the intrepidity of a soldier. He has gone from works to rewards—the last of that gallant regiment whose deeds and services will live as long as the records of our country endure.

By the death of governor Bennett, the office of governor devolves upon Charles Polk, esq. speaker of the senate.

We have about a—quarter of a peck of articles and scraps relating, or said to relate, to the affairs of Florida and Texas—but only notice a few of them, at present. It is very difficult to distinguish between the probable and the fabulous. The avidity of the newspaper press for articles of intelligence, no matter much from what source, greatly tends to confuse and confound matters of fact.

A Natchez paper of the 26th April says—

Major McCall, aid to gen. Gaines, passed here on Saturday evening direct from Fort Jessup. He is the bearer of despatches to the president of the U. States. He contradicts the rumor that the Indians had taken up arms against the Texans, and states that gen. Gaines is satisfied he has been misinformed, and has consequently recalled the troops he ordered to the Sabine. Major McCall also states that capt. Quitman had spent some days in assisting the fleeing women and children, as he was also led to believe the rumor; but, being disabused of the error, had gone on to join Houston. We hope that the timid and credulous will be satisfied with this information, and no more prevent aid from reaching the Texans by means of giving currency to idle reports.

But a N. Orleans paper of the 27th has the following:

"In camp, Sabine, April 23, 1836.

"DEAR SIR: In my last letter I told you there would probably be 'war in the west.' General Gaines has just learned that an emissary from Santa Anna has been in the camp of Indians, and what the result of this will be we shall see by and by. In the mean time he has despatched capt. Hitchcock, of the U. S. army, and a file of 25 men, with a flag of truce, to the head quarters of the Mexican general, to warn him of the consequences, and to stay his hand, if possible, from the indiscriminate and inhuman slaughter he is committing upon our devoted countrymen."

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 3d of April.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The two houses of parliament adjourned for the Easter holidays on the 30th of March. The house of lords to the 12th and that of commons to the 11th of April. Mr. P. M. Stewart gave notice that on the 15th of April he should call the attention of the house to the late outrageous proceedings at Craew, and also to certain quarantine regulations newly established by the czar, the effect of which would be to close the mouth of the Danube against the British trade with the Black Sea. Mr. Stewart also adverted to the commercial negotiations with Portugal. Lord Palmerston, in answer to a question of Mr. Stewart, admitted that the Portuguese government displayed an unfriendly feeling towards the reciprocity system, and intimated that corresponding measures would probably be resorted to, from necessity, by the British government.

The corporation reform bill for Ireland was read a third time and passed on the 28th of March, by a majority of 61, the division being 260 to 139. The bill had its first reading in the house of lords on the 29th, and lord Melbourne gave notice that he should call it up again on the 18th of April.

The evidence taken before the committee on military punishments continued to occupy a large share of public attention. The duke of Wellington's testimony, for flogging was very much quoted and commented on. The effect of solitary confinement, as ascertained by experiment in the United States, forms a prominent topic of discussion and remark in the London papers. One answer of the duke is worth quoting as a perfect illustration of the mechanical point of view in which soldiers are considered by commanders. The question related to the efficacy of the English army at a particular time, in reply to which the duke stated that "it was impossible to have a machine more highly mounted and in better order than that army."

We regret to say that accounts of outrages, robberies and murders in Ireland, continue to be dreadfully frequent.

The marquis of Waterford, well known to the New York police, got a sound drubbing at Nottingham from three poor gleesingers on whom he attempted to play off some practical jokes not of the most gentle quality.

FRANCE.

The principal item of news found in the Paris papers, is that of the payment of eighteen millions four hundred and sixty thousand six hundred and sixty-six francs, fifty-two centimes, by the French government to Messrs. Rothschild, on account of the American indemnification. Two instalments yet remain to be paid, which will be due, the first February 2, 1837, and the other February 2, 1838.

A grant of 1,200,000 francs for secret service, equivalent to a vote of confidence, was voted in the chamber of deputies, on the 25th March, by the large majority of 152.

The Trocadero, a hundred and twenty gun ship, was destroyed by fire, at Toulon, on the 23d March.

From the London Times of March 28.

The French papers of Friday are again nearly wholly filled with matters relating to the proceedings of the chamber of deputies. A very long and animated debate had arisen on Thursday, on the subject of the supplementary grant for secret service money applied for by the new minister of the interior. Some of the most distinguished speakers, Messrs. Guizot, Odilon Barrot and De Sade, addressed the chamber at great length, the first in favor of, and the two latter against the grant. On the question the respective parties in the chamber seem to have resumed the stations they occupied previous to the late change of ministry, by which change they were for a time, in appearance at least, quite ministerial. The debate, however, was adjourned till Friday, when it was expected to close by a vote in favor of the grant.

In virtue of powers received from the United States government by Messrs. Rothschild & Brothers, of Paris, these gentlemen have applied to the French treasury for the payment of the instalments due, conformably to the convention of 1832, and have received the sum of 18,000,000 francs. The remaining instalments amount to 7,000,000 francs. Thus all remaining doubts as to the possibility of any misunderstanding again arising about the settlement of this long pending suit is removed.

The precise amount paid on account of the American indemnity is 18,460,666f. 52c. There remain yet two instalments to be paid, which will fall due respectively on Feb. 2, 1837, and Feb. 2, 1838. The payment of these instalments will entirely liquidate, with its interest, the debt of 25,000,000, which had well nigh given rise to a collision between France and America.

A rail road between Calais, Paris and Brussels is said to be in contemplation.

A petition signed by the duke of Padua, Massena, prince of Essling, Ney, prince of Moscowa, and several other illustrious names, and praying for the revocation of the law of banishment against the family of Napoleon, has been presented to the chamber of deputies.

SPAIN.

An address expressing the firmest confidence in M. Mendizabal, and signed by more than 500 grandees of Spain, merchants and manufacturers, has been presented to the queen.

The war had been successful, on the part of the queen regent.

A despatch from Madrid, dated March 22, announces that on that day at 3 o'clock, the queen had opened the session of the cortes in person.

The speech from the throne declares that the vote of the electoral law is the only legal means of affecting a revival of the fundamental institutions of the kingdom and of the principal object of the meeting of the chambers; that other important matters will be laid before them, especially that of the negotiation that is opened with the states of South America.

Madrid enjoys the most perfect tranquillity.

PORTUGAL.

The prince consort of Portugal embarked at Portsmouth (England) for Lisbon, on the 29th March, on board a steam vessel, hired by the Portuguese government, and escorted by a Portuguese frigate which had been lying some time at Portsmouth for the purpose. The marriage was to be solemnized on the 4th April, on which day her majesty would attain her 17th year.

RUSSIA.

Letters from the Russian frontier say that the troops in Besarabia, having been gradually augmented, now amount to 100,000 men.

AFRICA.

We copy from the letter of the Morning Herald correspondent, the following paragraph, relating to the supposed desire of our [the American] government to obtain a portion of the territory in Africa.

The letter is dated Lisbon, March 19.

I stated to you in a former letter that there is an American squadron expected here to consist of the North Carolina, 90 gun ship, Potomac and United States frigates, John Adams corvette, and two other smaller vessels. On their arrival the commodore is to shift his flag from the Constitution (now in this port) to the North Carolina. The ostensible object for which they come is the protection of their trade in the event of a war with France; but it is believed, upon very solid ground, that the purpose aimed at is far different. The United States government have been long endeavoring to induce the emperor of Morocco to sell one of his ports to them; and in order to put him in good humor, have made him presents at different times amounting altogether to the value of 150,000 dollars. The frequent visits of American ships of war to the Moorish ports, having begun to awaken in the minds of our rulers some suspicion of what was going forward, and it being guessed that England would not fail to throw every obstacle in the way of any arrangement of that nature, the Yankees (it is surmised) have only withdrawn their squadron from the Mediterranean in order to be able to pursue their object in that quarter unobserved, by feigning to have given it up. The emperor it seems, though for a long while reluctant, on the plea that it would displease England, has lately begun to manifest some disposition to accede to the proposal. The conclusion I drew from the above stated premises was our naval force in this river would be considerably strengthened; and the fact which only came to my knowledge subsequently, that some more ships of the line were in train of equipment in the British ports, appears to corroborate my conjecture.

LATEST FROM FRANCE.

The decree for the payment of the American indemnification was published in the Bulletin des Louis on the 2d of April. The following is a translation.

Palace of the Tuilleries, March 19, 1836.

Louis Philippe, king of the French.

By virtue of the law of June 14th, 1835, relating to the treaty concluded on the 4th of July, 1831, between France and the U. States, which authorises the minister of the finances to take the necessary measures for the execution of that treaty, under the condition expressed in the 1st article of the same law;

Considering that the condition has been satisfied, and upon the report of our minister of the finances, we have ordained and do ordain as follows:

Art. 1. Our minister of the finances will cause to be paid to the government of the United States, or to the bearer of its authorization, eighteen millions, four hundred and eighty-six thousand, six hundred and sixty-six francs, fifty-two centimes, being the amount due on the 2d of February, 1836, of the twenty-five millions, the payment of which was stipulated in the treaty of July 4, 1831, as follows:

Sum of the instalments of principal for 1833, 1834, 1835 and 1836, deducting one million on account of the fifteen hundred thousand francs applicable to French claims, 15,666,666fr. 64c.
Interest computed to February 2d, 1836,	2,819,999 88

Total,	18,486,666fr. 52c.

Art. 2. The said sum of 18,486,666 francs 52 centimes, shall be carried to the account of appropriations for 1836, and placed against the extraordinary credit provided by the law of the 15th June, 1835. It will form the subject of a special article in the account of those appropriations.

Art. 3. Future provision will be made for the execution of the 2d article of the law above cited, as regards the million deducted from the amount due to the United States.

LATER NEWS.

From Liverpool to the 8th of May.

The French government has issued a decree forbidding the exportation of arms and ammunition from France, except under special license: the object is to prevent Don Carlos from receiving his supplies from that country.

The actual surplus revenue of Great Britain and Ireland, beyond the actual expenditure, for the year ending January 5th, 1836, was $1,620,940 pounds, 4 shillings and 11 pence.

It appears to be well established that Roman Catholic establishments are increasing in number, and that very rapidly in England as well as Ireland. One cause of this is stated to be the breaking up of monastic establishments in Spain and other continental countries.

The king of the French has signed an ordinance removing the incertitude heretofore existing as to the perpetual emancipation of a slave who sets foot upon the soil of France, with the consent of the master. Hitherto it has been claimed that the rights of the master were restored, on the return of the slave to the colony. Now those rights are declared to be gone forever the moment the slave lands in France.

A letter from Rome states that Don Miguel, having offered rudeness to the beautiful princess Aldobrandini Burghese, (formerly Miss Talbot) was challenged by the prince, but refused to fight on the plea of superior rank, and that but for the interference of the pope himself he would have been galled by the indignant husband. The insult was offered in the chapel of the Vatican, during the performance of a solemn religious ceremony.

A memorial of a painful and touching character was presented to the queen of Spain on the 23d of March. It was signed by colonel Don Manuel Fontineras, and stated that his young wife had been shot, with twenty-nine other females, by order of the Carlist chief Cabrera, in revenge for the execution of his mother, shot as a spy.

INDIAN WAR—OFFICIAL ACCOUNTS.

From the Globe.

Despatches from major general Scott, dated April 12, at Tampa Bay, have been received at the adjutant general's office, from which the following extracts are made:

"I have the honor to report, for the information of the secretary of war, and general-in-chief, that I reached this place, with the greater part of the right wing under brigadier general Clinch on the 5th instant. Brigadier general Eustis came in with half of the left wing the same day, and colonel Lindsay, who commands the centre, the day before. This approximation of the greater parts of the three columns was the result of no particular instructions. Each found itself compelled to come in for subsistence.

"The reports of those principal commanders, under me, are herewith enclosed and marked respectively, A, B and C.

"It will be seen that although no general battle has been fought, many combats and sharp affairs have taken place.

"The report states that, so far from the enemy having been beaten, and compelled to sue for peace, on the contrary, the small parties which have been met with, almost every where, have fiercely resisted until put in danger of the bayonet. The war, on our part, is, in fact, scarcely begun."

"The report further states that the horses, draft, pack and saddle, were much reduced—many broke down on the march, owing to the bad state of roads, hot weather, great loads and indifferent grazing. Sickness, (measles and mumps) had considerably reduced the effective force.

"The general states that colonel Smith, with his Louisiana regiment, was about to proceed to Charlott's harbor and Peace creek. There he is to be joined by a naval officer, and proceeding up the creek, land on the left bank. On the 14th April, colonel Goodwin's mounted South Carolina volunteers, (five hundred strong), were to march from Tampa Bay for the upper part of Peace creek, followed by the foot of general Eustis' wing. The object of the combined movement is 'to strike at the negroes, women, children and warriors, who have settlements on the upper and lower part of the creek, and who are now in security, supposed to be engaged in planting, fishing and hunting.'

"Colonel Lindsay, with a battalion of United States artillery, a company of Georgia mounted men, the Alabama regiment, and an independent company of Louisiana volunteers is, at the same time, to march northwardly, in pursuit of the Indians, as also general Clinch with his command, both by different routes. Colonel Lindsay will enter the forks of the Wythehatchee, and thence penetrate if practicable, as far as the head of the core, while general Clinch enters it below. Colonel Lindsay is to scour the country, and penetrate the core farther than has hitherto been in the power of troops to do.

"Further operations of course, will depend upon events not yet developed.

During the recent movement of the several columns, and the various operations of their troops, 13 were killed, and 26 wounded. The number of Indians killed, is supposed to be 24.

"The face of the country interspersed with hammocks, cypress swamps and marshes, almost impenetrable to the white man, presents serious obstacles in the prosecution of a campaign in Florida; and while these fastnesses constitute the natural defence of the wily Indians, they present difficulties almost insurmountable to the irrefragable pursuers.

"399 friendly Indians, (one-third warriors), are reported to be on board the transports, for their destination in the west."

THE FLORIDA CAMPAIGN TERMINATED.

From the Charleston Patriot.

Latest from Florida. Termination of the Indian campaign. Lieutenant Van Buren, aid to general Scott, and captain Finley, aid to general Eustis, arrived here this forenoon from Picolata, via Savannah, in the steam packet Wm. Seabrook, from Savannah. We have conversed with both these gentlemen, who have politely imparted to us all the information they possessed.

Lieutenant Van Buren states that, owing to the commencement of the warm weather, the campaign had been brought to a close. The regular forces had gone into summer quarters at St. Augustine. There were supposed to be about 200 on the sick list at Tampa Bay and 70 at Volusia.

Captain Finley has communicated to us the following intelligence:

"The left wing of the army of Florida arrived at Tampa Bay on the 5th of April, left there on the 17th, and marched to Volusia, by Pilaklikaha. The active operations of the campaign have ceased, from the sickly season having commenced. The South Carolina volunteers left Volusia on Friday, 29th, to march to St. Augustine, where col. Brisbane's regiment would be discharged, and sent by transports to this city. Col. Goodwin's mounted men would be discharged at Jacksonville. The regulars, it is believed, will be kept in Florida, to garrison posts which may be important in the commencement of the next campaign. The Indians were no where in any force, and are supposed to be scattered all over the territory."

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

May 6. Several reports from committees were made. The bill providing for the salaries of certain officers and for other purposes, was ordered to a third reading.

The general appropriation bill was further considered. After which the senate spent some time on executive business. Adjourned till Monday.

May 9. Mr. Webster, from the committee on finance, reported the act making appropriations for the army for the year 1836, with two amendments.

Which amendments were read and explained by Mr. Webster, and the bill read a third time and passed.

Other business being attended to—Mr. Preston rose to present a memorial from a number of citizens assembled in Philadelphia on the affairs of Texas, and recommending an early recognition of the independence of that country.

Mr. Preston accompanied the presentation of the petition with some remarks, which produced a debate of much animation and interest, in which Messrs. Preston, Webster, Walker, Brown, Moore, Buchanan and Shepley participated.

Mr. Buchanan presented other memorials in the course of his remarks; and the whole were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, took up the bill from the other house, authorising the president of the United States to accept the services of volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen.

There was some discussion in reference to this bill, in the course of which the bill was amended so as to authorise the number of volunteers to be raised at 10,000 men, and to confine themselves to repelling Indian invasions.

On motion of Mr. Preston, the authority given to the president in these words: "and shall appoint the necessary officers," was amended by adding "above the rank of captain, which appointments shall be submitted to the senate for its advice and approval, at its next session."

Mr. Swift moved to recommit the bill.

It was recommitted, and the senate adjourned.

May 10. There was received to-day a message from the president of the U. States, communicating the fact of the payment by France of the due instalments of the sum adjudged to be due to the U. States as indemnity under the late treaty; which was laid on the table.

The amendments made by the house to the naval appropriation bill, were taken up for consideration, and all concurred in without opposition, with an amendment to one of the amendments of the house on the subject of the exploring expedition to the South Seas, striking out such words as give to the president a discretionary power as to sending out the expedition.—The question on striking out the words was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:—yeas 26, nays 3—Messrs. Hill, King, of Geo. and Wright.

Mr. Clay moved to suspend the previous orders for the purpose of taking up the bill to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain; and the bill being taken up, The bill being amended, on the motion of Mr. Clay, was ordered to a third reading.

Many private bills were disposed of, and then the senate adjourned.

May 11. Mr. Clay, from the committee on foreign relations, to which was referred the message of the president of the United States concerning an additional article in the treaty with Mexico, reported a bill to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of limits with the government of Mexico which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Clay said that the bill was in exact conformity with the former one, and was intended to revive the commission which had expired in consequence of the expiration of the treaty. The committee on foreign relations were desirous that it should pass without delay. There was a peculiar propriety in so passing it, resulting from our existing relations with Mexico. A survey was to be made; and we were endeavoring to ascertain, as precisely as possible, the true boundary line between that country and our own. In the mean time the general commanding our forces in that quarter had taken up a position in or near this disputed territory. Existing circumstances were such as to make it absolutely necessary that proper officers should be authorised to carry out the provisions of the treaty, thereby evincing the sincerity of our intentions, and the fidelity with which we adhered to our engagements.

The bill provided for the services of a commissioner and surveyor, but not for those of a clerk. A provisional appropriation was introduced, however, to pay the salary of such officer, and the executive empowered to appoint him if it was deemed necessary.

The bill was then read a second time, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Webster, from the committee on finance, reported a bill from the house, to provide for the defence of the western frontier, with an amendment; which was ordered to be printed.

Much other business having been disposed of—

On motion of Mr. Benton, the senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the erection of fortifications, purchase of sites, &c.

Numerous amendments were proposed and adopted, when, after some remarks, the further consideration of the bill was postponed, and the senate proceeded to executive business, and then adjourned.

May 12. Among other business—

A bill to carry into effect the treaty of boundary with Mexico, &c.;

A bill authorising the enlistment of boys into the navy of the United States; were severally read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Clayton, the senate took up for consideration a bill to extend the western boundary of the state of Missouri to the Missouri river; which was considered, and ordered to be engrossed.

A discussion on the amendments of the fortification bill, occupied the remainder of the day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, May 6. Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee on ways and means, reported a bill making an appropriation of one million of dollars for the protection of the western frontier, and sent to the chair a letter from the secretary of war, dated the 5th of May, communicating facts in relation to the state of things on that frontier, and urging the necessity of the appropriation called for.

The bill was twice read and committed, and, with the above-mentioned letter, ordered to be printed.

Mr. Craig, from the committee on public lands, reported a resolution making the bill for the graduation of the price of public lands the special order for Monday next.

Mr. Vinton moved to amend the resolution by embracing the bill from the senate for the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands among the several states.

Mr. Patton moved to lay the resolution and amendment on the table. The question was taken by yeas and nays, and there appeared, yeas 91; nays 91.

The speaker voting in the affirmative, the resolution was laid on the table.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the "bill for the relief of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia," in pursuance of the special order of the 1st of April.

The amendments made in committee of the whole were concurred in.

Mr. Wm. B. Shepard spoke, at length, in support of the bill. Mr. Hardin opposed it, at great length.

Mr. Mercer followed in support of the bill.

Mr. Underwood made a proposition to the friends of the bill to this effect—that, if they would modify it so as to provide merely for the payment of the Holland loan, and the transfer, unconditionally, of the canal stock to the United States, he and his friends would vote for it, otherwise they would vote against it.

Mr. Haves moved a call of the house. Lost.

Mr. Mann, of New York, then renewed the call for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Buckee, Borden, Briggs, W. B. Calhoun, G. Chambers, Childs, Cleveland, Corwin, Cramer, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Donny, Doubleday, Everett, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, Fry, Jr. Philo C. Fuller, R. Pierce, Peyton, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Roane, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Seymour, Aug. H. Shepperd, Sprague, Standefer, J. Thomas, Toucey, S. Williams—69.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. W. B. Shepard said, as there were a number of other important bills connected with the District of Columbia, he moved that to-morrow be set apart for their consideration.

Mr. Hoar suggested Monday.

Mr. Jarvis remarked that they had now been in session seven hours, and had appropriated a million and a half of money; and he therefore moved an adjournment, but he withdrew the motion, to enable the speaker to present the following executive communications:

To the senate and house of representatives:

Believing that the act of the 12th of July, 1832, does not enable the executive to carry into effect the recently negotiated additional article to the treaty of limits with Mexico, I herewith transmit to congress copies of that article, that the necessary legislative provisions may be made for its faithful execution on the part of the United States.

(Signed)

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, 6th May, 1836.

A communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting a statement of the amount of the public moneys deposited in the deposit banks, by the several officers thereof, on the public account, on the 1st of April last; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Also a communication from the same, transmitting a statement of the number of clerks employed in the treasury department; which was also laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Jarvis then renewed his motion, and the house adjourned.

Saturday, May 7. After a good deal of minor business—

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. E. Whittelsey in the chair), and took up the "bill making an appropriation of one million of dollars for the protection of the western frontier."

The letter of the secretary of war, published in the Intelligencer on Saturday, and the following documents were read: Quartermaster general's office, Washington city, May 3, 1836.

Sir: The operations on the frontiers of Texas will require large appropriations. I have a requisition on my table for one hundred thousand dollars for that service, and have not a dollar to meet it. I have received a letter from the assistant quartermaster at Natchitoches, reporting that he had found great difficulty in obtaining land transportation for five companies. The wagons and horses, as well as mules for packing, must be taken from Ohio, Kentucky or Tennessee: Should the operations be continued through the season on the scale indicated by gen. Gaines' requisitions, a million of dollars will probably be required for the service of this department alone. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP, quartermaster general.

The hon. secretary of war, Washington city.

War department, May 5, 1836.

Sir: In consequence of the intimation contained in your note of this date, I beg leave to observe, that the request for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the protection of the frontier, in my letter of yesterday, was submitted to, and approved by, the president. Very respectfully your obedient servant,

LEW. CASS.

Hon. C. C. Cambreleng, chairman com. ways & means H. of R. Mr. Cambreleng sent to the clerk some further communications from the war department, embracing all the information in possession of the department on the subject; which were read.

Mr. C. also communicated from the secretary of state an account of a convention between Mr. Forsyth and the Mexican minister on the subject of the orders given to gen. Gaines; which was also read.

Mr. C. stated that it appeared from the New York papers that Santa Anna had made an official report of the capture of the Alamo, and demanded an additional force of 5,000 men and 400 officers, and a farther supply of money, to carry on the war in Texas.

[A paragraph was read by the clerk from the Courier & Inquirer, making the above statement, and commenting upon it in the strongest language of reproach.]

Some remarks having been made upon the phrase "our Texans," as read by the clerk in the communication of general Gaines.

Mr. Cambreleng said it should read "our Texian neighbors," the last word having been accidentally omitted in the copy.

While the paragraph of the newspaper above referred to was being read,

Mr. Vinton objected to having the documents of a newspaper read to influence the action of the house; but, by consent, the clerk read on.

Mr. Storer called for the reading of a paper referred to by gen. Gaines, which had influenced his opinions, and which ought to be known to the house.

Mr. Cambreleng said he had laid before the house all the papers and information in possession of the government, and he had done so that the house might perceive the necessity of acting promptly, and he hoped they would pass the bill that day.

Mr. Underwood rose to make a proposition. He thought this a matter of great importance, and wished to understand the subject fully before he acted upon it, in any way. He wished to have an opportunity to read the documents, and was not prepared to act without. He then proposed that the committee should rise, and have the documents printed. He further wished a call upon the secretary of state, for he wanted to know what the Mexican minister said in reply to the remarks of the secretary. It seemed, he said, that the president had authorized, and the commanding general had declared his intention to take up a position within what was heretofore considered the boundary line; and he thought such an act must lead to bloodshed and war.

Mr. Cambreleng repeated that he knew it was a matter of importance, and with a view that the committee might act promptly, he had brought the documents to the house.

Mr. Adams wished to ask of the chairman of the committee on foreign relations, or of the chairman of the committee of ways and means, whether the report of Santa Anna in possession of the government, which was commented on by the editor of the newspaper in New York.

Mr. Cambreleng said he had no more information than what had been read in the house. His object in bringing the newspaper was to show that the force is not sufficient on that frontier to protect our citizens in case of aggressions either by the Mexicans or Indians.

Mr. Adams also wished to know why the remarks of the minister of Mexico were not sent to the house. He wished to know whether it was to be inferred that the Mexican minister, during the conversation, stood mute and said nothing; whether, in fact, there is any thing to communicate. He thought, if there was any thing more, it was important that it should be communicated to the house, and they ought to be in possession of full information. He asked this the more readily, because a most extraordinary power had been given to the commanding general to cross the boundary of a foreign state, and take up a position within their territory; in other words, to make war. And after the communication of this intention had been made to the minister from Mexico, we are not told what answer he made. If he has not assented to the act—if he stood mute—then there is an after consideration of great moment, as to the constitutional power of the president; whether he could authorise a commanding general to march into a foreign country, to commit an act of hostility; to make war, without the consent of congress.

This was the first intimation the house had of the views of the executive upon this subject of a Texian war, except what was said some days since by the chairman of the committee of ways and means, that the country was already at war upon that frontier, and that gentlemen need not be troubled about a disposition of the surplus funds, for they would all be wanted there. Now, he said, he was not disposed to go into a war with Mexico, or with any other nation, unless in defence of our frontier; but he could see something more than defence in the authority given to the commanding general; it was an invasion of the territory of a government with which we were on terms of amity. If the commanding general has been thus authorized, there ought to be more complete and perfect information before the house. He had said that this was the first day on which any communication had been made of this authority to invade a friendly territory, or of the difficulties between this state and Mexico; and he asked if it was not fitting and proper, when the house was called upon to declare war, that it should be informed how the cause arose.

I have not, (he asked), seen American citizens going from all parts of the country to carry on the war of this province against the united government of Mexico? Who were those who fell at Alamo? Who are now fighting under the command of the hero of Texian fame? And have we not been called upon in this house to recognise Texian independence? It seems that gen. Gaines considers this a war in defence of "our Texans."

Mr. Cambreleng explained that the word neighbors was left out.

Mr. Adams said he understood it. This was, he continued, an intention to conquer Texas, to re-establish that slavery which had been abolished by the United Mexican States. If that was the case, and we were to be drawn into an acknowledgement of their independence, and then, by that preliminary act, by that acknowledgment, if we were upon their application, to admit Texas to become a part of the United States, then the house ought to be informed of it.

He should be for no such war, nor for making any such addition to our territory. Taking it altogether, it was very important that this and the other house of congress should have all the information that could be given upon the subject; and that report of Santa Anna, which was described in a New York paper, not in the language of the governor of Mexico, but in the comments and insinuations of an editor, ought to be before the house. Why, said he, there is in New York a high and confidential officer of the government of the United States, who has called upon the people to go and enter Texas; and to aid in carrying on the war against the government of Mexico. To be sure, this is contrary to the order of the president to the commanding general. He has directed him to preserve strict neutrality; and he, (Mr. Adams), would have been glad if the other parts of the instruction had been consistent with that.

He hoped congress would take care to go into no war for the re-establishment of slavery when it had been abolished; that they would go into no war in behalf of "our Texans," or "our Texian neighbors," that word was quite enough; and that they would go into no war with a foreign power, without other cause than the acquisition of territory.

Mr. Peyton said he had heard with no less astonishment than deep mortification, the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He thought it strange, that now, while we hear of danger to our frontier from savages and a Mexican army no less barbarous, that the gentleman should have introduced the subject of slavery into the discussion. He should have thought he might have held his hand for a moment until some means could be provided for defending the helpless women and children of the Texian frontier from the most horrible butcheries. The gentleman, (Mr. Adams), had seen great cause of alarm in the power conferred on the commanding general to take up a position suitable for defence. Sir, (said Mr. P.) that gentleman does not know, living, as he does, far from such scenes, the vivid feeling of southern and western men, when they see hostile savages hovering around their villages, and lying in ambush, to murder the old and the young, both by stratagem and in open fight. All the power granted was to take up a position on either side of the line, as might be necessary; and, he asked, is an imaginary line to be so much respected in a time of peace, when a most unmerciful tyrant, at the head of an army of savages, threatened our frontier? What respect would he have for that line, when pursuing the conquered Texans, and taking vengeance upon all he could reach? And it is when we hear this news of savage warfare, when our people are driven from their villages, which are burnt, and when they are caught and butchered—it is in this emergency, that the gentleman from Massachusetts wanted to stop to ask what the Mexican minister might think of it. He, (Mr. P.) in such a case would not stop to ask what any minister might think of it. He would defend the people instantly, and at every hazard. On our side of the line, he remarked there might be no proper position for an efficient defence; but on the other the fort may be impregnable, and its possession might afford certain security to the frontier. The gentleman says, if the commanding general goes there, it will be making war upon a sister republic. He did not so understand it.

Mr. Hamer remarked that the whole tract in which the fort of Nacogdoches stood was in dispute; and there was a clause in the instructions of the president, that gen. Gaines should, in no case, go beyond the line, which we claim to be the true line.

The clause having been read,

Mr. Bell said, if the house was not prepared now to act fully upon the subject, the most strict course would be to grant what was recommended on the responsibility of the executive. In addition to the clause which directed the commanding general not to cross the line we claim to be the true one, he was directed, if the commissioners now acting should decide that Nacogdoches was not in our territory, immediately to recede. He considered it not proper now, or at any time, to discuss the question introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts; and he hoped that exciting topic would be left out of consideration. They had not, he remarked, any positive information of the commencement of hostilities; but it was known that agents were at work among the Indians who might excite them to hostilities; should that take place, we have no sufficient armament to protect the frontier, or prevent their encroachments even to the Mississippi; and he would ask if it was proper, under such circumstances of alarm, to stand quietly by and refuse to put at the control of the president the sum of a million for necessary security? Or should any man stop now to discuss the question of slavery, or of addition to our territory, when the cause of humanity calls for prompt relief?

It would seem proper, before any final decision of the question involved in the subject, that the house should have more full information; but that could be had hereafter; and now he was willing to put a proper supply at the control of the executive, to enable him to meet any expected emergency.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, said that now general Gaines had no proper force or supplies to resist the threatened depredations upon our frontiers; and he asked if the house could hesitate about making an appropriation, or about making it on the instant? This was a subject, he said, upon which he felt much excited, for he was aware of the extreme peril of the frontier settlements.

Mr. T. had received information from a gentleman of high character, just returned from a residence of some months in Mexico, that the prospect of a war with this country was the most common topic of conversation; that Mexican officers of high standing habitually talked of the easy conquest of Louisiana; that nothing more was necessary than to approach the confines of that state, and proclaim emancipation, and that the work would be accomplished by the insurrectionary slaves. Santa Anna is now within two days of Natchitoches, thence to New Orleans only two more. Let him siege our army in the arsenal at Baton Rouge, and excite and arm the slaves, and what scenes of horror and atrocity may not be looked for. He would not envy any man his feelings who should, under all these circumstances, refuse to take all proper measures for the security of our frontier. He desired to protect the southern frontier from the combined atrocity of a Spanish, Indian, and African army.

Mr. T. alluded to the most inopportune introduction into this debate of the subject of slavery, by the gentleman from Massachusetts; a subject always exciting beyond any other. He asked if the gentleman thought it wise or safe to refuse the proper aid and protection to the country, because it might lead to an addition to the political power of the slave states? That gentleman had negotiated away Texas—it was natural that he should be disposed to guaranty the peaceable enjoyment of what he had conveyed. It was said at the time that treaty was made, by the enemies of that gentleman, that a leading motive for ceding to Spain this valuable territory was to prevent the addition which it would make to the slavholding interest. Mr. T. had not joined in those charges, but he regretted that the gentleman, by his avowal to-day, should have furnished such strong evidence of the existence of such feelings on his part.

Mr. Adams said this was not the first time since he had had the honor of a seat in this house, nor the first time this session, that when he had made any remarks, his observations were not answered by a replication to his arguments, but by personal attacks upon him, the individual. The rules of the house was, that gentlemen should confine themselves to the question before it, and not indulge in personalities. He had heretofore sat in silence and heard these attacks, for the reasons that though he had a right to occupy the attention of the house upon the business before it, he had no right to occupy it for himself.

Gentlemen seemed to infer, from what he had said, that he was going to oppose the appropriation. He had not said so. He wanted more information. When we found ourselves involved in war, as if a thunderbolt had fallen from a clear sky, he wanted to know the cause of it; and when he had asked a question of the chairman of the committee of ways and means, he was answered by a personal attack. The gentleman, (Mr. Thompson) says (while the Mexican minister is residing here under the hospitality of our country, and secure by the laws of nations), that he is an able man, and a great intriguer; and that he is intriguing against the United States. Was that proper? asked Mr. Adams; or was it an answer to his inquiry, why the Mexican minister's answers were not given by the secretary of state? Another gentleman, (Mr. Peyton) gives a very pathetic picture of the distresses of the people on the frontier; but that was not an answer to a call for information. He (Mr. A.) would vote for millions upon millions, as much as that gentleman; he would pour out the whole treasury, if it were necessary for the defence of that frontier; but he wanted to know why he was called upon to do it, and to have all the requisite information. He had objected to the order to the commanding general, which authorised him to invade the territory of a friendly government; and it was no answer to say that it was a disputed boundary. By the laws of nations every thing in dispute must, during a contest, remain in statu quo; and any act taking possession of the disputed territory is an act of hostility.

Mr. Adams then adverted to the intimation that he had negotiated so as to exclude Texas from our border, with a view to the abolition of slavery; and he would tell the gentleman, (Mr. Thompson), a little of the history of that transaction. When he negotiated the treaty settling the boundary between the United States and Mexico, he acted by the instruction of Mr. Monroe; and nothing was done, not a line of the treaty written, but in accordance with the directions of James Monroe. And he, (Mr. Adams) was the last man in the cabinet who assented to the treaty, with the boundary as now established. He was for including Texas; and was the last member of the cabinet, he would repeat, who assented to the treaty with the present boundary in it. And he would further inform the gentleman that, by direction of James Monroe, before the treaty was signed, he (Mr. A.) took it to general Jackson, he being then in the city, and asked him if it ought to be signed with that boundary, and he said yes. General Jackson had the treaty before him with that boundary, and approved of it; and he (Mr. A.) did at last, and reluctantly, assent to it. He then asked if the gentleman's insinuations were answered?

Mr. Thompson was glad that he had given the gentleman (Mr. Adams) an opportunity of setting himself right before the country on a subject upon which injustice has certainly been done him. Mr. T. disclaimed the slightest intentional disrespect to the Mexican minister. He was incapable of such a violation of courtesy and decorum. He had always heard that the Mexican minister was a man of high character and great ability, and he meant the term intriguer in no disparaging sense: all diplomatists were more or less so. He was sure the Mexican minister was a faithful and able representative of the interests of his country.

Mr. Ripley made a detailed statement of the condition of the country and the state of the frontier. He said that, by the treaty, the boundary commenced at the mouth of the Sabine river, on the Gulf of Mexico, and that river formed the line of boundary, till it came to the latitude 32 deg. when the line was to run north to the Red river. Since the formation of the treaty, a dispute had arisen as to which of the two branches of the Sabine was the true line. The one running to the south included the fort of Nacogdoches; but if the northern branch should be decided the true one, it would leave that fort in the Mexican territory. Then, the line from the Sabine to the Red river had not been run, and was now merely an imaginary line.

The debate continued, Mr. Reed was unwilling to assume the Texian war, though ready to defend our own country. He would not trust the power to make war in the hands of gen. Gaines—he had no confidence in him. He wished for time to investigate the documents and gather information. Mr. Williams went into a statement of the cruel and inhuman conduct of Santa Anna towards the Texans whom he had conquered, and insisted upon the duty of this government to provide adequate forces to defend the frontier, and upon any aggression on the part of the Mexican commander, to conquer his forces and cut off his head. He would not hesitate, upon the slightest possible pretext, to enter the territory of Mexico, and separate Santa Anna's head from his body. Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, said he did not want any war of aggression; and he would call upon the house not to take any steps that would endanger the safety of the people of the frontier settlements hereafter. The frontier should be defended now, but, if ill blood was roused, they would be liable hereafter to constant attacks. His home, where he had lived for many years, was near the Sabine river, and the very first act of hostility or aggression upon our part would bring ruin upon his own home. If the course proposed, of entering the territory of Mexico, was adopted, there will be a war at once; and he should not remain here to give his aid, however humble, to the councils of the nation, for he had a higher and more imperative duty to perform. A newspaper had been read, the editor of which was deeply engaged as the organ and agent of the Texian land company. The house ought not to be led away by any such appeals to the interests or passions of the people. He would charge gentlemen not to carry out the Quixotic notions of these land speculators, who were not engaged in promoting the cause of constitutional liberty, but in land speculations of a selfish character. He religiously believed that speculations in land engaged their attention as deeply as any desire to establish constitutional liberty. He would warn gentlemen again against these exciting efforts of interested editors; for this house ought not to countenance or encourage such Quixotic undertakings. In relation to the cruelties said to have been perpetrated by Santa Anna, he remarked that it was not the duty of this government to punish all acts of barbarity; if it were, they might have found enough to do in the Mexican revolution of 1811. He thought a proper defence should be established, and a strict neutrality observed, or the whole order would be deluged in blood. Mr. J. Y. Mason made some remarks in vindication of the course proposed to be pursued by the executive, in relation to the defence of the frontier, and went into a statement of the existing relations between the United States and Mexico, with a view to show that the instructions to general Gaines were not inconsistent with the terms of the treaty between the two governments. Under the treaty, the two contracting parties were bound to restrain from hostilities the Indian tribes within their respective limits. One of our most distinguished officers, a man of known prudence and discretion, states that the case is about to arise for exerting the restraining power imposed on each party. He states that the discontented spirits among the Camanches are about to be incited to hostilities, which we were bound to prevent. He goes further, and states that if the Indian tribes make an incursion into Texas, and join in the hostilities there, great danger will ensue to the citizens of the United States on our frontier. What was the government to do? Every gentleman who had spoken agreed that the appropriation ought to be granted in order to enable the executive to take precautionary measures. Mr. Underwood was not alarmed by the insinuations of want of patriotism which were thrown out against those who wished to act deliberately on this momentous question. He was not eager to involve this country in a long, expensive, and bloody war. If one thousand men, well appointed and equipped, could effect as much mischief on our borders as the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. Ripley) says they can, and if the Mexican minister here is as shrewd and vigilant as he is represented to be, Santa Anna will soon be advised to act accordingly. If gen. Gaines went into the recognized territory of Mexico with his forces, what was he to do when he got there? Will he say to the Mexicans, I have only come to keep the peace? Whatever he may say, will not the Mexicans order him to go back forthwith? Will he then retire? Not his communications show the spirit and feeling which will govern his course in regard to any Mexican force or authority which he might encounter. His language was hardly less exceptionable than that of his colleague, (Mr. Williams), who talked of cutting off Santa Anna's head. He was sorry to hear language of that kind applied, on this floor, to the head of a republic on terms of amity with us. It had a direct effect to create feelings unfavorable to peace and friendship. Should a conflict take place between gen. Gaines and the Mexican force, what consequences might not ensue? He did not believe that Santa Anna could reach New Orleans, nor even the Mississippi; but he believed that a war would follow which would devastate the frontier, and deluge it in blood. He looked upon the course proposed by the instructions as a violation of the treaty. It commanded the general to make war in order to prevent an invasion of our territory. It violated the treaty on pretence of an intended violation of our neutrality. Ought we not to remonstrate first against any encroachments on our rights? Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, after some preliminary remarks said—in voting for the bill he was not influenced by the accounts contained in the New York paper, so freely commented on, nor was he influenced by the proceedings of the public meetings held in different parts of the union in favor of the Texans, which had been alluded to, or by the sympathy he felt, in common with the whole American people, for the brave men, and helpless women and children, who have been basely butchered, as is believed, by a ruthless tyrant, contrary to the usages of civilized warfare. He acted from information entitled to the highest respect, and should vote for the bill because it contained an appropriation to pay the necessary expenses of the troops now actually employed on our western frontier, and of the militia, called for from several of the states, to aid in checking any hostile incursions of the Indians on that frontier, and in order to preserve the neutrality of the United States. Could any man view the present state of things on the western borders of Louisiana, and contemplate the events daily transpiring in the neighborhood, and not believe that a strong military force should promptly be placed there by our government.

It would be recollected, (said Mr. J.) that in addition to the numerous warlike tribes of Indians residing west of Louisiana, Arkansas and Missouri, a large body of Indians had been recently removed (by the policy of our government) from the east side of the Mississippi, and located on the western borders of Louisiana and Arkansas, who have been for some time in a restless state, and evidently dissatisfied with their situation. To keep them in check, and to prevent them from committing hostilities within our limits, and of waging war among themselves, a large military force, in his opinion, would be constantly required on our western frontier. But at this moment, when all the tribes alluded to are greatly excited, and when we have the strongest reasons to believe, from information received from different sources, that Santa Anna has, in violation of the treaty existing between the United States and Mexico, actually engaged those Indians to aid him in the war he is now waging in Texas, is it possible for any man not to believe that the people of Louisiana and Arkansas are not at this moment in imminent peril? Indeed, he apprehended, that a force of from ten to twenty thousand men might be immediately required on that exposed frontier, not to make war against Mexico, but to protect American citizens, and to defend our own country. * * * * *

Are we not called upon then (said Mr. J.) by every consideration of duty and patriotism, to pass this bill, and to pass it promptly? With respect to the people of Texas he had but little to say. He thought, however, that great injustice had been done to them. No doubt many unworthy men had emigrated to that country, some of whom perhaps had fled from their own country. All new countries had been settled in the same way. But that many gentlemen of talents, wealth and of high respectability of character had been induced to settle in that country, is as certain. They had been invited there under the establishment of liberal institutions, but in fighting to maintain them they had evinced a courage and patriotism worthy any age or country. The progress of the war in that country, marked as it is by a spirit of the most ferocious and sanguinary barbarity on the part of the Mexican commander, must shock every man of common humanity. Was it not natural then that the sufferings of the people of that country should excite the sympathy of those of the United States?

Mr. Sutherland thought this a proper precautionary measure. He was averse to any war of aggression, but there was certainly danger of disturbances on our borders, if they had not already taken place; and while such dangers existed, he should be willing to afford the means of defence and protection to the frontier settlements.

Mr. Cambreleng expressed his surprise that, after all the efforts that had been made by the government to preserve a strict neutrality, and to prevent, even, our citizens from taking a voluntary part in the contest, it should be said that it was the endeavor of the executive to produce a war.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, made some remarks, at length, upon the impropriety of being excited by the cry of war which had been set up all over the country; and especially by the newspaper paragraph which had been read, coming, as it did, from an incendiary paper, for there were more incendiary papers than one, and on more than one subject, and he considered the paper which was read of that character.

He spoke of the necessity of having further documents before any course of action was determined upon. He did not put confidence in the rumors and stories which were circulated by interested speculators; but he thought it all had some remote connexion with the distribution of the public funds. He had voted for other bills of defence, especially that for defending the frontier of Missouri, but he must stop somewhere, and he had determined not to vote for this bill.

Mr. Bynum made some remarks at length in opposition to the idea that there was no urgent necessity for action upon this subject. He said he was sorry to be a member of an American congress when such sentiments were uttered; and went on to show the great danger to the frontier settlements from the present state of hostilities, and the immediate necessity of passing the bill.

After a few observations from Mr. Graves in favor of deliberate action upon this subject, an amendment having been offered providing that the funds should be applied by the secretary of the treasury under the several acts of 1795 and 1832.

Mr. Ashley suggested that it would be better to provide for the disbursement of the appropriation under the act passed a few days since, which made better provisions for the pay of the militia and volunteers. He had not intended, he said, to make any remarks upon this bill; but if he had been opposed to it, he thought the arguments of its opponents would have induced him to vote in its favor. He thought it a safe precautionary measure, which ought to be adopted without delay.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was adopted without a division.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the house, with an amendment, which was concurred in.

Mr. Wise requested leave to explain his reasons for voting in favor of the bill. He said there were current rumors of dangerous disturbances on the boundary of Texas, and he thought the people should be protected on that frontier. There was also rumors and fears that Santa Anna had been sending agents to excite the Indians to warlike movements, and they would not, if once excited to action, recognize or respect either side of an imaginary boundary, but would as soon wield the tomahawk or take a scalp upon one side of the line as the other; and it was known that the people of the frontier settlements were fleeing in terror. He hoped the authority given to general Gaines would be so exercised as not to disturb the harmony between this government and Mexico; and as a measure of prudence and precaution, he was willing to vote for the appropriation.

The question upon ordering the bill to a third reading, having been taken by yeas and nays, was then put and decided in the affirmative—yeas 146, noes 3.

After which the bill was read a third time and passed, when the house adjourned.

[A variety of documents, in relation to Texas, were submitted this day, which must lie over until next week, when a record shall be made of them.]

Monday, May 9. By unanimous consent, Mr. Everett offered the following resolution; which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if, in his opinion, it shall not be incompatible with the public interest, the instructions which have been transmitted from time to time, since the 1st day of January, 1835, to the representative of the United States at the government of Mexico, relative to the boundaries between the two nations, and relative to the setting on foot military expeditions by citizens of the United States against the Mexican province of Texas, and relative to the military occupation or contemplated occupation, under the authority of the president, of any post or place within the said province of Texas; and all correspondence and communications which have passed, at Washington or at Mexico, between the two governments, respecting the same; and all information in possession of the executive respecting the same. And, also, that the president be requested to communicate to this house all orders and instructions issued to the military or other officers of the United States, or of the states, relative to the defence of the western frontier, and all correspondence between them and the government respecting the same.

The unfinished business of last Monday, being the preamble and resolutions of the legislature of Kentucky in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several states, was taken up.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, to commit the same to the committee of ways and means, with instructions to report a bill in conformity with the resolutions, and Mr. Williams being entitled to the floor,

Mr. Graves asked his colleague to give way for a moment to enable him to notice a charge that had been made against himself in the Globe of this morning.

Mr. Williams yielded the floor, and,

Mr. Boon rose to a point of order. He wished to know whether the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Williams) had not lost his right to the floor.

The speaker replied that if any objection was made, the gentleman could not resume the floor, after yielding it.

Mr. Williams said if that was the case he would not yield the floor, and proceeded with his remarks.

Mr. Boon followed in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Graves took the floor, and the special order was then called for.

The house resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriation for the naval service of the United States for the year 1835, which had been returned from the senate with amendments, and acted on in committee of the whole.

The question being on concurring with the committee of the whole in the following amendment to the senate's amendment, providing for an exploring expedition to the South Seas;

A long debate followed, in which Messrs. Patton, Hamer, Reed, Hawes, Phillips and Sutherland took part.

Mr. Cambreleng begged the house not to postpone any longer a decision of the question. He said he was not opposed to the expedition, but he was sorry the senate had proposed it as an amendment to the navy appropriation bill. The senate's amendment had already postponed the passage of the bill a month, and he hoped the amendment would be either accepted or rejected at once.

On motion of Mr. Hawes, the yeas and nays were ordered on the adoption of the amendment; and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 68.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1836, returned from the senate with amendments.

The amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. Mercer, the bill to authorize the Shenandoah Bridge company to erect a bridge over that river at Harper's Ferry, was taken up and passed.

The house then adjourned.

Tuesday, May 10. Mr. J. Q. Adams, by general consent, made some statements in relation to the article which appeared this morning in the Globe, on the subject of his declaration that the Florida treaty, with the present boundary between the United States and Mexico, was submitted to general Jackson and approved by him.

Mr. Adams repeated, in substance, that he was himself opposed to the relinquishment of Texas, and that no other man in the cabinet of Mr. Monroe sustained him. He negotiated the treaty with Don Onís, under the immediate direction of the president, (Mr. Monroe) and never exchanged any communications with that minister which Mr. Monroe did not see. He (Mr. A.) was the last man in the administration who assented to the treaty. The treaty was concluded on the 22d of July, 1819. At that time general Jackson was in the city, attending the proceedings of congress on the Seminole question. After the treaty had been agreed to, and before it was signed, Mr. Monroe requested him (Mr. Adams) to submit it to general Jackson and obtain his opinion upon it. It was accordingly submitted to him, not as a military commander, but as a distinguished citizen. He called upon general Jackson at the hotel then kept by Strother, now Fuller's, and handed him the treaty, directing his attention particularly to the boundary. General Jackson kept it a day or two, and then returned it with his approbation.

The senate bill to distribute the proceeds of the sale of the public lands among the several states was read twice, by its title, and Mr. Williams, of Ky. moved that it be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Gillett moved its reference to the committee on finance. Mr. Carr moved its reference to the committee on public lands.

The subject was debated till 1 o'clock, when the special order was called for.

Mr. Morris moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the above subject, and thereupon he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. Adams suggested that it would be better not to take the yeas and nays, lest it should appear that there was no quorum. For what reason so large a portion of the house was absent he could not say; perhaps it was because the business before the house was so unimportant.

[N. B. The members had adjourned informally to the race field.]

The call for the yeas and nays was withdrawn and the motion was rejected.

The following message was received from the president of the United States, by the hand of Asbury Dickens, esq. and read:

Washington, May 10, 1836.

To the senate and house of representatives:

Information has been received at the treasury department that the four instalments under our treaty with France have been paid to the agent of the United States. In communicating this satisfactory termination of our controversy with France, I feel assured that both houses of congress will unite with me in desiring and believing that the anticipations of a restoration of the ancient cordial relations between the two countries, expressed in my former messages on this subject, will be speedily realized. No proper exertion of mine shall be wanting to efface the remembrance of those misconceptions that have temporarily interrupted the accustomed intercourse between them.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The fortification bill was taken up, and considered. The amendments of the senate to the navy bill were concurred in. And the house adjourned.

Wednesday, May 11. Mr. W. Jackson, of Massachusetts, from the committee on roads and canals, reported the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the U. States of America in congress assembled, That the secretary of the navy be authorized and requested to cause an experiment to be made for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of applying steam power to the navigation of canals, pursuant to a plan invented by Dr. Planton, provided he deems the same expedient; and that four thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated therefor, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

A great deal of minor business being attended to—

The house resumed, as the unfinished business of yesterday, the consideration of the motions pending in relation to the reference of the bill from the senate for the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands among the several states.

The bill was debated—but the house passed to the special order of the day, the fortification bill.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Cambreleng to amend the bill by inserting a clause making an additional appropriation of $700,000 for the armament of the fortifications—

Mr. Townes, who was entitled to the floor, rose and addressed the committee about two hours, on the various topics heretofore brought into the debate. He maintained that the amount of the surplus revenue had been greatly overrated; that the public lands, as had, he said, been before confidently stated by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell), would not, hereafter, yield more than a million of dollars annually; and that the state of things on the southern and western frontier, and the general condition of Europe, admonished us to reserve whatever surplus we might have, whether it was ten or twenty millions, for the great purpose of national defence. He adverted to several of the political topics heretofore discussed in the committee, compared the merits of the different candidates for the presidency, and vindicated the present administration from some of the charges brought against it. The proscriptive policy was, he undertook to show, established and acted upon, in the administration preceding that of general Jackson, and before that time, while general Jackson's immediate predecessor was in the office of secretary of state. He adverted, particularly, to some transfers of public printing made by that secretary of state.

Mr. Adams rose to explain. He said he had never, while he acted as secretary of state, made a single change of a public printer from political causes. While he was before the country as a candidate for the presidency, there were many of the printers of the laws, who were as much opposed to him as any editor could be to any candidate; but he never changed one of them from any political motive. He did make one change at gen. Jackson's personal suggestion; though, whether gen. J. would recollect it or not, he could not tell. It was in the case of an editor at Nashville; and when gen. Jackson and his colleague in the senate came and personally requested it as a favor, for it was supposed the editor was favorable to gen. Jackson, he did make the transfer; but it was without knowing either of the editors. The motive for this change was afterwards the subject of much misconstruction. He did not mean to charge the present or any secretary of state with political motives in relation to changes of this kind; but he did mean to say, that he did not remove one printer while he was secretary of state for political considerations; and further, that while he held a more elevated situation, he never removed one person from office for political causes; and that, he believed, was one among the principal reasons why he was not more successful as a candidate for a second election.

Mr. Townes resumed, and spoke till about 3 o'clock.

Mr. French took the floor, and expressed a wish to address the committee on the subject.

On motion, the committee then rose, and the house then adjourned.

Thursday, May 12. Statements were made by Mr. Rice Garland and John Q. Adams relative to mistakes, or misrepresentations, made by the reporters for distant papers.

Mr. Haynes moved the suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution of the senate, fixing a day (the 23d of May) for the adjournment of the present session of congress.

Mr. Mann, of New York, asked the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 107.

The house resumed the consideration of the motions pending in relation to the reference of the bill from the senate, "providing for the distribution, for a limited time, of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands"—and it was further discussed.

The fortification bill came up, in its course, and was further considered.

RAFT OF THE RED RIVER.

Report of the chief engineer, to the war department, on the removal of the raft in Red River.

Engineer department, February 20, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you, herewith, in duplicate, a communication from captain Shreve, of the 18th ult. relating to the removal of the raft in Red River, which is submitted in continuation of his report on the same subject, transmitted to congress by the president, with his message at the opening of the present session.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,
C. GRATIOT.

The hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war.

Steamer "Java," great raft of Red River, Jan. 18, 1836.

SIR: I have to inform the department that I arrived at the "raft," on the 2d inst. where the force now employed had been at work since the 7th ult. Since my arrival here, I have made an examination of the entire remainder of the raft, and have had in my power to make more minute observations than I had hitherto been able to do, the water being lower than it was last spring. After I had reached the upper section of the raft, I find it to be from where I left off work last year, to Benwares bayou, six miles, and the distance between Coates and Benwares bayou, to be fifteen miles instead of twelve, as stated in my report of the first of July last; from Benwares bayou to Willow chute ten miles, from thence to the head of the raft, seventeen miles; the raft having accumulated since last May about five miles. The very unusual high stage of the water in Red River, in September and October last, brought down treble the quantity of timber that usually drifts in its annual freshets.

On the arrival of the boats at the raft where the operations were closed on the 25th May last, nine miles above Soda bayou, the water was found to be flowing upon the river from the mouth of Soda bayou to Benwares bayou, a distance of fifteen miles. This was caused by so great a quantity of the water from the river being forced out over its banks, and through the numerous bayous above the raft, and passing down the Cado lake and Soda bayou into the river below, that its bed was filled at the mouth of that bayou to a greater elevation than at the mouth of Benwares bayou, consequently the water seeking its level, a portion of it flowed the old bed of the river, and escaped through Benwares bayou. This circumstance has made it impracticable to pass any timber down from the raft.

The whole six miles of raft up to Benwares bayou, has been loosened from its bed and nearly all cut short by saws. In that distance, one and a half miles below Benwares bayou, there was a mass of timber which filled the whole bed of the river for several hundred feet, solid to the bottom, leaving but small spaces for the water to pass between the logs. A part of that timber was cut away last spring, but when the steamboat Souvenir arrived at that point, it was found impossible to find water to pass a small boat over.

It has required the labor of one hundred and twenty men and one steamboat, sixteen days, and will yet require the aid of thirty men with a crab, (which I have caused to be erected on the shore) to haul out the logs that will not float, six days longer.

This day 90 men with one steamboat will begin to pass the raft into Benwares bayou, and by filling it with timber, will, in a few days, give a current down the old bed of the river sufficient to carry off the raft below.

The fifteen miles between the two bayous above named, has been more difficult to remove, and has cost more labor, than sixty miles below.

The next ten miles will be difficult but not by any means so much so as the last fifteen miles. From the Willow chute to the head of the raft, the quantity of timber is greater but the river is wider, and no compact masses of timber is to be found in that part of the raft.

The department may calculate on my completing the whole of the work, that is the removal of the raft so as to open a navigation for steamboats, by the 25th of May next, unless prevented by some unforeseen calamity among my men.

After the raft is removed and a good navigation has been opened, I am of opinion that for several years, say five at least, it will be necessary to keep a boat in the river so constructed as to be able to raise and remove any snag that may make its appearance in the river, either from the timber that will rise from the old bed of the river, or from trees that fall in from its banks; and keep the river clear from raft that will be liable to lodge and make in its bed, until the channel is worked out to its original size by the action of the water, which will require from five to ten years. Such a boat would cost the government about $15,000; to keep her at work eight months in each year will cost about an equal sum. I would, therefore, recommend the appropriation of a further sum of thirty thousand dollars, and above the forty thousand dollars, which I have estimated for this year's work. The department may rely on the necessity of such an appropriation and expenditure being indispensable to effect the design of the government, and that without it, the people will not have confidence in the permanency of the work, and will not pay so high a price for the lands when offered for sale by three times the amount it will require to keep the raft open on the plan I have proposed.

I view it as the most economical plan that can be pursued by the government to make immediate provisions for keeping the river open after the raft is out.

As far as the work has progressed, the navigation is good, and the land on the banks of the river in the immediate vicinity, worth at least five times the amount of the whole expenditure, over and above any value that they would have had without the removal of the raft.

This is a great speculation to the government, without taking into consideration the immense tract of first rate land that bounds on the river for six hundred miles above the raft, every acre of which is equally benefitted by the improvement when it is completed.

I have to inform you that no communication has been received by me from the department since I left Louisville, Ky. on the 26th of November last. I hope, however, that the funds for which I estimated about that date, is at Natchitoches. The department will please inform me as early as practicable, of the passage of a bill making appropriation for the continuance of the work for the present year.

I must also inform you that no account of expenses for any of the western rivers, can be made out by me for the last quarter, as my location makes it utterly out of my power, correctly, to attend to such parts of my duty, as is required to furnish the regular quarterly accounts. However the interest of the government does not suffer, in the smallest degree, by such delays of time.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

THE RED RIVER RAFT.

Extract of a letter from capt. Henry M. Shreve, dated Red River raft, 20th March, 1836.

I had hoped to have seen you or lieutenant Bowman in the raft ere this, as an examining officer. I am getting on with the removal of the raft slowly. I find a much more difficult task to perform than I had anticipated. The fact is, the work is of such a nature, as to make it impossible to judge of the amount of labor required to perform any given portion of it, until after it has been done; but as I progress up, I leave behind a good steamboat navigation. Two old boats have been sunk in the raft, but neither of them fit to navigate, from age and decay, and come up with emigrants. Fifteen boats have been up through the former location of the raft 115 miles since the first of January, and the emigration of the country is immense.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
H. M. SHREVE, superintendent, &c.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4,

On an amendment offered by Mr. Benton to a bill to increase the army.

Mr. Linn expressed his hope that the bill would be taken up at once for consideration, as some immediate action of congress was necessary, in consequence of the state of things on the frontier, and its exposed condition.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, hoped that the amendments would be allowed to take the usual course, and lie for consideration; and that the land bill, which was the order for yesterday, would now be taken up and disposed of before any other subject should be taken up.

Mr. Linn added a few words in addition to what he had before suggested, and which we regret that our position prevented us from hearing.

Mr. Preston stated that the amendments proposed the addition of a regiment of dragoons, and also a considerable augmentation of the army. It was suggested that strange occurrences had taken place on our frontier; that an army, flushed with conquest, and rendered furious from the taste of blood, was rapidly approaching our frontier. Rumors of this character were well calculated to produce a certain degree of anxiety in the bosoms of American citizens. His own imagination had been startled—his feelings deeply pained; he had been sensible even of something of indignation at the rumors of outrages, appalling to humanity, which had reached him. His feelings had been roused; our countrymen, our friends, our relatives massacred in cold blood, and, as report says, in violation of every sort of pledge—massacred after surrendering to a powerful force, acting under an able military commander. But the rumors went still further. It was said that there had been negotiations with the Indians on the frontier, for the purpose of enlisting their hostility against our citizens on the frontier. True, there was no other foundation for these statements but these rumors, and these rumors were in themselves contradictory. Gentlemen who are well versed in the geography of the country, had been unable to trace the operations on the map. The whole was a mass of great confusion. We are all possessed with some vague ideas that something horrible has happened. In this state of things, perplexed by vague and general rumors, we are presented with a case of possible necessity, to urge us to hasten a measure, in reference to which it seems to be particularly desirable that the senate should have the most exact information on the subject. There may be gentlemen who had better information than he had, and, if so, they should come forward and communicate it.

Rumor says that a distinguished officer, a major general in the American army, on the frontiers, has made a call on the executive of three states for a force of militia, and that the militia, to the number of 7,000, have been embodied. It is supposed that a still stronger measure will become necessary, and that the executive arm will have to be extended before a more tranquil state of things can be produced. He was as willing as his friend (Mr. Linn) to protect the frontier. He was as ready to go as far whenever the exigencies of circumstances should require it. But he hoped that gentlemen would not suffer their feelings to be excited and urged beyond what the law of nations would justify. He hoped that gentlemen would concur with him in opinion that they did not come here to indulge private and personal feelings, but to shape their course so as to insure the greatest advantages to those whom they represented. He could not sit down without saying that his feelings had been pained, and he would repeat that he was ready to go as far as his friend from Missouri to protect the frontier, and, in all circumstances, to go as far as he would in doing that which was right. He hoped that some gentleman would take the necessary steps to obtain the information so much desired on the subject. As a member of the military committee, he would be glad that all possible information should be before the senate, and that the measure should not be pressed until that information should be obtained. He did not come into the senate to-day prepared to go into this question. He should be ready at any time to go into the consideration of the subject, but he thought the best course now was to dispose of the land bill, and afterwards to consider this bill.

Mr. Clay said, the proposition, if he understood it, was to take up a military bill from the house, passed this morning, providing for an increase of the army, and authorizing the calling out of ten thousand volunteers. Every senator here was undoubtedly as willing as the gentleman from South Carolina, to do whatever the honor, interest and tranquillity of the country required to be done. But he must see a very different state of things from any that had as yet presented itself, before he should be willing to interrupt the pacific relations of the government, and precipitating it into a war with Mexico.

If there was a cause, a just and righteous cause, for such a step, he trusted we should act promptly and manfully; but, as yet, we had but rumors of the inhuman scenes which were said to have been enacted. As yet, so far as respected this country, there was no ground for engaging in hostilities with any foreign power.

It was not yet the proper time to go into the consideration of this subject. It should be taken up deliberately, and with all the information that could possibly be obtained. It was proposed to augment the military force of the country; and it was proper to consider by how large a number of men, and of officers capable of commanding them. Perhaps an increase of both was necessary; but without a great and controlling necessity, there should be an increase of neither.

He came into the senate this morning under the full expectation that a final disposition would be made of the land bill, before proceeding to the consideration of any other subject. There was time enough to look into this measure. There was no particular urgency for considering it at this moment. He had been told that we had lately at Tampa Bay 7,000 men, engaged in a contest with 6 or 700 miserable Indians; these we had neither conquered nor found; and unless we could show a somewhat better capacity for war, we had better refrain from engaging in one.

If Santa Anna should commence hostilities with us—if he should invade our frontier—and he had, as yet, shown no such intention—what was to prevent our transporting this force from Tampa Bay to the Sabine, to prevent any violation of neutrality and of existing treaties in that quarter? But unless there was an actual or threatened invasion, we were not called upon for any active measures. At any rate we wanted information. Has no communication been made to our government from that of Mexico? No assurances been given that existing treaties would be respected? If so, let us have them. A call, in his opinion, could not fail to bring up such facts as would, in a great measure, quiet the public apprehension. He had risen, however, for the sole purpose of saying, that when a final vote was expected on the land bill to-day, he was unwilling to have that measure put aside, as it had been repeatedly, and that, too, in a very unusual and unparliamentary manner. He hoped the senate would proceed to its consideration.

Mr. Benton said: Here we meet the land bill again. Call up what subject we will, we find the land bill in the way. Bills of the greatest importance are foundered by coming into contact with the land bill. The fortification bill found the land bill too great an impediment to overcome. Every bill finds this land bill in its way. It is like the frogs of Egypt, which were found on the tables, and even in the nuptial bed.

Mr. B. then went on to state the course he had pursued in the progress of the land bill, and the efforts he had made to get up the fortification bill. He trusted that the officers and soldiers of the United States on the frontiers would not subdue their national feelings when they saw the Mexican troops committing such inhuman atrocities on Americans, but that they would strike, and leave it to the God of our country to direct the result. He wanted now to have the sense of the senate as to taking up this bill for consideration. He wished to see whether they would be ready to step forward to vindicate and save their bleeding country, in preference to scrambling for portions of the public money. He had read of accredited authorities who could not be made to show any regard for their bleeding country while they were engaged in dividing the public spoils. He had read of such instances in histories, and he would ask for the yeas and nays in order to see if such would be the case now.

Mr. Porter said he regretted extremely this discussion, as hours, nay, minutes had become precious if we hoped to go through the great mass of business which had been prepared for the action of congress. There had been as much debate on the precedence bills were entitled to, as was sufficient to pass one of them or reject it. He hoped we would continue to act on the bill which was made the special order of the day, until it was finally disposed of. That now proposed by the senator from Missouri had his approbation; and without pledging himself to all its details, he believed it would have his vote. Being friendly to it, he thought it was injuring its chance of adoption to press it on for discussion and decision without affording time for a proper examination of its provisions. That proper examination need not be a long one.

Mr. P. said he was compelled to dissent from what had fallen from the honorable senator from Kentucky in relation to our military force. He (Mr. P.) thought it ought to be augmented. Its numbers were not greater now than they were ten years ago, and since that time our population had vastly increased, our frontier had been extended in the same space of time in a still greater proportion, and was necessarily weakened as it was enlarged. Another circumstance called for an augmentation of our army. Within a very few years (under a policy which Mr. P. said he should ever deplore) an immense body of Indians had been removed from the east side of the Mississippi, and thrown on the frontiers of Louisiana, Arkansas and Missouri. In their original location they were circled on every side by a white population, which insured their good conduct, and restrained their propensity to war. They were now placed on an extended frontier, thinly settled, where, from causes he should not enlarge on, because they were obvious, a military force was indispensable to give security to our borders. Not less, he believed, than 250,000 Indians were now located between the west of the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains, who, from ignorance and the influence of passions which constantly agitate man in a savage state, were liable to be excited to hostilities, ruinous to themselves in the end, but destructive to the borders exposed to their first outbreak. It was humanity, therefore, as well as true economy, to place a force on our frontiers which would hold them in check, and be ready to crush their first movements.

There was another element to be taken into the estimate we should make of the proposed measure, which had been glanced at in the debate, and which could not be properly disregarded. He alluded to the events daily transpiring on the western boundary of Louisiana. By the last intelligence received from that quarter, it appeared that the war which had for some time raged in one of the Mexican provinces, was about to be brought close to ourselves. The inhabitants of Texas were flying from their country, and taking refuge within the state of Louisiana, and their enemies, flushed with victory, were close and hot in their pursuit. He did not believe the Mexican troops would cross the Sabine and violate our territory. If Santa Anna had the wisdom and ability which his friends long since, and his enemies lately, gave him credit for, he would cautiously abstain from any such step. His true interests prompted him to respect our neutrality. He (Mr. P.) believed he would be governed by these interests. But while he believed it, it was impossible to shut our eyes to the danger of collision between the troops of the United States now on the Sabine, and those of Mexico. The people of this country had become painfully excited by the intelligence which had reached them of the war of extermination carried on in Texas. That excitement had been communicated to our troops; it required only a spark to put the combustible materials now on our frontier in a flame, and he was afraid it would soon be furnished.

It had been said that our officers there should have hearts and arms, but no heads; that is, that they should yield themselves up to the influence of their feelings, however their judgment might reprove the measures those feelings prompted them to. He had a better hope of their wisdom and prudence. A heavy responsibility rested on them. If, under the influence of passion, they involved the nation in war, they would have a severe account to render for their actions. And more especially if, at this moment, when the forces stationed on the frontiers of the state of Louisiana might be inadequate to its defence, they should, in their sympathy for Texas, draw the war into that state, he knew of no terms of reprehension too strong for such conduct. With all possible consideration for the inhabitants of Texas, and deep and sincere regret for the condition to which they were reduced, he could not help thinking that the citizens of Louisiana who had remained within their country had the first claim on the attention and protection of the federal government and the federal army. He hoped and believed this view of the matter was taken by the president, however it might be disregarded elsewhere; and that orders had been sent to the commanding officers not to compromise the safety of the state he had the honor in part to represent.

But apart from all considerations of prudence and safety, there were the higher ones of justice, which forbade our intermeddling in this contest. We were acting under the eye of the civilized world. It had heretofore been our boast and our pride that we faithfully maintained all our treaties, in letter and in spirit. He trusted that, under no impulses, however praiseworthy, would we leave the vantage ground we had so long and so honorably occupied, and expose ourselves to the imputation of considering compacts binding only so long as it suited our convenience and our interest. We were the oldest independent nation in the American continent; we were the strongest, too. It behooved us to aspire after the truest glory which a nation can acquire; to exhibit the example of power restrained by justice, and ambition directed, not to subjugate our neighbors, but to improve and to elevate them.

He believed these sentiments were those of the large mass of the American people, but there was danger that they might be forgotten under the excitement of generous feelings. He respected these feelings; he shared in them, but he felt it to be his duty, in the place he occupied, to submit them to the control of his reason and his judgment, and if possible to induce others to do the same. No one had heard with deeper regret than himself, the intelligence of the dreadful massacres which had taken place in Texas. It was possible the statements were exaggerated. He hoped they were so. But if true, they were disgraceful to the perpetrators. The people of Texas, whether right or wrong in their attempt at independence, had done nothing to place them out of the pale of civilization; and if it were true that a body of them, after capitulation as prisoners of war, had been basely shot in cold blood, their murderers should be held up to the common execration of mankind. He (Mr. P.) would rather have been one of the gallant, though misguided men who perished on that occasion, than the ruthless despot by whose orders they were assassinated.

But giving to these feelings their full scope, he could not see in this and other inhuman acts cause for war by the United States against Mexico. We should never be an hour at peace if we set out on a crusade to punish all the cruel deeds which were committed in the world. Their proximity to us, and their being inflicted on men of kindred blood, could not change or enlarge our obligations. In abandoning their own country, and becoming citizens of another, they had placed themselves in relation to that left as strangers, so far as claims for national interference were concerned. We had no more right to make war because they had been unjustly treated by the power to which they had attached themselves, than we had to intermeddle in the contests between the natives of the old states of Mexico.

Our unfortunate countrymen who settled in that portion of Mexico which is now the theatre of war, knew well what kind of people they were going among. In all periods of history, the Spanish race have been distinguished for cruelty in their civil wars: extending no quarter, and sparing neither sex nor age. The scenes now daily enacted in old Spain, of which accounts reach us every day, exhibit the same brutal ferocity and disregard of all the claims of humanity as those lately perpetrated by their descendants in Texas. Those which took place in South America, some years since, were, if possible, more frightful and revolting to humanity. We did not then throw ourselves into the conflict, and he trusted we would not now. A war for revenge he deprecated, as he did one for conquest. He saw as yet no just cause for expending our blood and our treasure, and he hoped that all who had a voice in the councils of the nation would aid in preserving our neutrality.

Mr. Preston said he was misapprehended, if it was supposed he wished to press the consideration of this matter now. He wished merely to draw the attention of the senate to it, and he had succeeded in so doing. The final action upon it might easily be deferred for a day or two.

We had rumors, to be sure, but he saw nothing in them to justify any act of extraordinary vigilance on our part. We need not operate defensively or on the offensive at present. Santa Anna had done enough to curdle our blood, and shock our sensibilities, but not enough to justify any warlike preparation. He would wish to know, however, why general Gaines had made this requisition for more men. It had been stated that the government were in possession of all the facts, but he could not think so. He does not intend to rush down at once upon the Mexican leader—considering him as a monster out of the pale of humanity. Such could not be his intention. Was there not something else? Had not a communication from Santa Anna to the Comanche Indians been intercepted? If so, the president is in possession of the fact.

We cannot interfere in Texas; it is beyond our reach. But if this ruthless desolator of that province has instigated the Indians to cross the frontier and descend upon our settlements, we should hold him responsible for every drop of blood that may be shed.

If such a movement is contemplated—if it is taking place—then, after the necessary information, let the senate act. He agreed with the senator from Louisiana, that an increase of our military was necessary.

Mr. Benton reminded the senate that this bill was not a new measure, and that it was a northwestern, not a southwestern measure. It had originated with one of the senators from Indiana, (Mr. Tipton) and one of the senators from Ohio, (Mr. Morris). These gentlemen made some insipient movements on the subject as much as three months ago, and before they could have had the least idea that general Gaines would be placed in a situation to act in the matter.

Mr. Buchanan said that he had no doubt the government would be guided in its course towards Mexico by that principle which had been established in the commencement of our political history; which had grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength; which always had been, and he trusted always would be, strictly adhered to, viz: never to interfere with the domestic concerns of foreign nations.

General Washington had asserted and maintained that principle in his celebrated proclamation of neutrality; it had met, in theory and practice, with the approbation of the whole world; it regarded other nations as friends in peace, and as enemies in war, and should never, in any contingency, be departed from.

In his eyes, and he trusted in the eyes of all mankind, Santa Anna was a tyrant and a usurper. He had violated the federal compact which had been entered into by the Mexican states; he had overturned that constitutional system of government to which they had looked for the preservation of their peace and prosperity; and Texas, as one of the states of that confederacy, therefore, was justified in her rebellion. Whether her citizens had consulted a wise policy in declaring themselves independent, was not for him to decide; but as a man, and an American, he wished they might acquire and maintain their independence; and he trusted in God they would be able to do so. He would leave them, however, most unwillingly, to their own bravery and exertions, with an ardent hope for their ultimate success.

What, (continued Mr. B.) was the state of our frontier? If this Mexican leader was rousing the Indians within our territories into action; if he was exciting and stimulating their brutal passions; if our defenceless women and children were to be murdered in cold blood, then he would hold him responsible. Should this prove to be true, he has violated our treaty with Mexico, and has clearly made himself the aggressor.

In any event, there was a necessity for sending troops at once—for making ourselves strong in that quarter; for we knew not to what excesses the savage feelings of Santa Anna might impel him.

In the policy of sending a sufficient force of dragoons to the western frontier, as proposed by the senator from Missouri, he entirely coincided; but he was opposed to departing in any the slightest degree from the settled policy of this government, even for the purpose of supporting the cause of the Texans. Thus much in regard to the general subject.

If it were left for him to decide whether the measure now before the senate or the land bill should now be acted upon, he should, other things being equal, give the preference to the former. It was a necessary measure. But he had been instructed, by an authority which he was bound to respect, to support the latter; and he should vote with its warmest friends till it passed or was defeated. He was willing, therefore, to proceed and dispose of the land bill, which had already been ordered to be engrossed for its third reading, until it should be finally disposed of, which he thought might be done to-day, or, at the latest, to-morrow; it would embarrass all our proceedings. We might then take up and pass the important measures of defence now before the senate, without further delay.

Mr. Clayton stated that he should vote for the land bill in preference to this bill, because the former would have still to pass the other house, while the bill now asked to be considered had passed that house. As far as he had seen of this bill, he was favorably disposed towards it. But he was desirous to have a day or two to consider of the amendments. He did not wish it to be said of him that he had thrown any difficulty in the way of the public defence, and he only desired so much delay as would enable him to become acquainted with the character of the amendments.

Mr. Linn referred to the journal to show that this matter had been moved early in March.

The motion to take up the bill was then negatived without a division, the call for the yeas and nays being withdrawn.

REPORT FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Navy department, March 31, 1836.

SIR: In answer to so much of the resolutions of the senate of the United States of the 18th ultimo, as required information as to the probable amount of appropriations that may be necessary to supply the United States with ordnance, arms and munitions of war, which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand, and the probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the union, I have the honor to lay before you a report of the board of navy commissioners, of the 2d inst, a report which contains the best information upon the subjects referred to in the possession of this department; which is respectfully submitted.

MAHLON DICKERSON,

To the president of the United States.

Navy commissioners' office, March 2, 1836.

SIR: The board of navy commissioners have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, requesting a report on the probable amount that would be necessary to supply the United States with the ordnance, arms and munitions of war, (so far as may be wanted for the purposes of the navy), which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand, and on the probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the union.

In conformity to these instructions, the board respectfully state, with respect to the ordnance for the navy, that, after a careful examination of the subject, taking into consideration the ordnance and ordnance stores now on hand, and the extent of force, for which it may be expedient to make early provision, they are of opinion that the sum of one million eight hundred thousand two hundred and fifty dollars will be required to supply the ordnance, arms and munitions of war which may be wanted for the use of the navy, and which a proper regard to self-defence would require to have prepared ready for use.—(See paper A, annexed, for the detail).

The board beg leave respectfully to observe, that, for the vessels which are now built, or have been specially authorised, armaments may be provided, with some partial exceptions, from the cannon and carronades already provided, and the deficient ordnance, arms and other ordnance stores will be principally required for the vessels which are yet to be authorised or built. It is therefore respectfully recommended that any appropriation for this purpose, instead of being special or separate, should be included in an appropriation for "building and repairing vessels, and for the purchase of materials and stores for the navy."

The second object of injury, as to "the probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the union," embraces a wide range, requires an examination of several subjects of great importance, and the expression of opinions upon which differences of opinion may and probably will exist. Before any estimate can be formed of the probable amount that would be necessary for the purposes proposed, an examination must be had, and an opinion formed, of the nature and extent of the naval force which is "necessary to place the naval defences of the United States upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the union;" and the time within which it ought to be, or might be, advantageously prepared.

Taking into view the geographical position of the U. States, with reference to other nations with whom we are most likely to be brought into future collision; the great extent of our maritime frontier, and the extreme importance of securing the communications of the whole valley of the Mississippi, through the Gulf of Mexico, and the intercourse between all parts of the coast; the efficient protection of our widely-extended and extremely valuable commerce, under all circumstances; and the great naval and fiscal resources of the country, the board consider the proper limit for the extent of the naval force to be that which can be properly manned, when the country may be involved in a maritime war.

In estimating this extent, it is assumed that about ninety thousand seamen are employed in the foreign and coasting trade and fisheries. As the navigation has been generally increasing, there is little reason to apprehend any immediate diminution during peace. In any war which would require the employment of all our naval force, it is believed that such interruptions would occur to our commerce as would enable the navy to obtain, without difficulty, at least thirty thousand seamen and ordinary seamen; and if it should continue long, it is probable that a larger number might be engaged. The number of thirty thousand, with the landsmen who may be safely combined with them, will therefore be assumed as the number for which vessels ought to be prepared, for the commencement of a state of hostilities.

With respect to the nature of the force which it would be most advantageous to prepare, there will undoubtedly be differences of opinion. The materials for the larger vessels, as ships of the line and frigates, would be obtained with great difficulty, under circumstances which should interfere with our coasting trade, whilst sloops of war and smaller vessels could be built with greater comparative facility, under such circumstances.

The preparation of a considerable number of steam vessels, ready to defend our great estuaries, to aid the operations of our other naval force, and in the concentration or movements of the military force, as circumstances might require, is believed to demand serious and early attention.

Having due regard to these and other considerations, the board propose that the force to be prepared, ready for use when circumstances may require it, shall consist of 15 ships of the line, 25 frigates, 25 sloops of war, 25 steamers and 25 smaller vessels; and that the frames and other timber, the copper, ordnance, tanks and chain cables shall also be prepared for 10 ships of the line and 10 frigates.

The force proposed to be prepared, ready for use, will employ, and can be manned by, the 30,000 seamen and others which have been considered available in a state of war. The materials for the 10 ships of the line and 10 frigates, will constitute a necessary reserve for increasing the number of those vessels, should they be required, or for supplying losses from decay or casualties.

To estimate the amount necessary to prepare this force, it is proposed to ascertain the whole probable cost, including ordnance, by the average cost of similar vessels already built, (steam vessels excepted), and of materials already procured, and then to deduct the value of the present force, and all other present available means.

The total cost of 15 ships of the line.....	$8,250,000
25 frigates.....	8,750,000
25 sloops.....	3,125,000
25 steamers.....	5,625,000
25 smaller vessels.....	1,250,000

Total for vessels..... 27,000,000
For the proposed materials, as a reserve..... 3,315,000

Total amount required..... $30,315,000

Deduct from this sum the value of the present force and available means, as follows:

In vessels afloat, valued at sixty one-hundredths of original value, about	$4,440,000
In vessels building, at actual cost	2,455,000
In materials collected for building do.	2,945,000
In treasury for these purposes, 1st October, 1835	1,215,000

For three years' appropriation "gradual improvement," when due 1,500,000

Total of present value and available means 12,555,000

Leaves still to be provided for vessels. $17,760,000

In presenting any estimate for the amounts which may be necessary to place the different navy yards in a proper situation, the board can do no more than give very general opinions, as the objects of expenditure are foreign to their own professional pursuits, and they have no civil engineer to whom they can refer for the necessary detailed information.

From a knowledge of the cost of works hitherto completed, or in progress, and of the wants at the respective yards for the proper preservation of materials, and for extending the means for building, preserving, repairing and equipping vessels, they are satisfied, however, that the public interests would be greatly promoted, and, in fact, absolutely require an average annual expenditure of $500,000 for some years to come, upon the different yards.

In New York the necessity of a dry dock is severely felt already, and its importance will increase with an increase of the navy. This, with its dependencies, will require nearly a million of dollars. At Pensacola, which nature has designated as one of the naval keys of the Gulf of Mexico, and of the immense commerce of the valley of the Mississippi, large expenditures will be necessary to secure adequate means for repairing and subsisting a naval force upon that station, and thus prevent the many evils which would be severely felt in a state of war, if the vessels were obliged to resort to the Atlantic ports for ordinary repairs or supplies of any kind. In other yards, there are objects of great and urgent importance.

Generally, the proposed arrangements for the preservation of all materials and vessels should precede their collection or construction. Whilst, therefore, the board propose $500,000 as the average annual appropriation until the yards should be placed in proper order, they would also state that appropriations of $700,000 annually for the next four or five years, and a less sum than $500,000 afterwards, would, in their opinion, be most judicious.

The next subject for consideration is, the nature and extent of force proper to be kept employed in a time of peace, for the protection of our commercial interests, and to prepare the officers and others for the efficient management of the force proposed for a state of war.

Our commerce is spread over every ocean; our tonnage is second only to that of Great Britain, and the value of articles embarked is believed by many to be fully equal to those transported by the ships of that nation. In the safety and prosperity of this commerce all the other interests of the United States are deeply interested. It is liable to be disturbed and injured in various modes, unless the power of the country, exerted through its naval force, is ready to protect it. It is, therefore, proposed that small squadrons should be employed upon different stations, subject, at all times, however, to such modifications as circumstances may require.

Of these squadrons, one might be employed in the Mediterranean, and attend to our interests on the west coasts of Spain and Portugal, and southward to the western coast of Morocco and Madeira.

One in the Indian Ocean, to visit, successively, the most important commercial points east of the Cape of Good Hope, to China, then to cross the Pacific, visit the northern whaling stations and islands, cruise some time upon the west coast of America, and return by way of Cape Horn, the coast of Brazil, and the windward West India islands.

One in the Pacific Ocean, to attend to our interests upon the west coast of America; keeping one or more vessels at or near the Sandwich and other islands which are frequented by our whale ships and other vessels, and, in succession, cross the Pacific, visiting the islands and southern whaling stations, China and other commercial places, and return, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, to the United States.

A squadron upon the coast of Brazil, or east coast of South America, might be charged with attention to our interests on the whole of that coast, and upon the north coast, so far as to include the Orinoco. If a ship of the line should be employed on this station, it might be occasionally sent round to the Pacific.

A squadron in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico will be necessary for, and may be charged with attention to the protection of our commerce amongst the West India islands and along the coast of South America, from the Orinoco, round to the Gulf of Mexico.

A small coast squadron upon our Atlantic coast might be very advantageously employed in making our officers familiarly and thoroughly acquainted with all our ports and harbors, which would be very useful in a state of war. The vessels would also be ready for any unexpected service, either to transmit information or orders; to reinforce other squadrons, or to visit our eastern fisheries. Besides this cruising force, it is recommended that a ship of the line be kept in a state of readiness for service, men excepted, at Boston, New York and Norfolk, and used as receiving-ships for the recruits as they are collected. This would give the means of furnishing a considerable increase of force, with a very small addition to the current expense.

For the nature and distribution of this force, the following is proposed:

	Line.	Frigates.	Sloops.	Steamers.	Smaller.	Total.
Mediterranean.....	1	2	2	—	2	7
Indian ocean.....	—	1	2	—	1	4
Pacific.....	—	2	3	—	2	7
Brazil.....	1	1	2	—	2	6
West Indies.....	—	1	4	1	2	8
Home.....	3*	1	2	3	1	10
	5	8	15	4	10	42

Considering this force with reference to its power of giving experience to the officers, and qualifying them for the management of the force proposed for war, it appears that, for the force proposed to be actually employed at sea, in peace and in war, the peace force will require and employ about two-thirds the number of commanders of squadrons; about one-third the captains and forty one-hundredths of the commanders and lieutenants and masters, which the proposed war force would demand, and midshipmen sufficient to supply the additional number of these last classes which a change to a state of war would require.

Supposing the foregoing force to be that which is to be kept in commission, the next question is, what force will be necessary to keep afloat, to provide the necessary reliefs? The board believe that this force should be the least which will answer the object proposed, as every vessel when launched is exposed to a decay which is much more rapid than when left under the cover of a tight ship-house.

We have already six ships of the line afloat, which will be fully equal to our present wants, when they are repaired. A reserve of three frigates may be required, but only to be launched when the necessity for it shall arise; for the sloops of war and smaller vessels, it will probably be sufficient to merely keep up the cruising force as proposed, except some extraordinary demand should arise. The force of steam vessels proposed, when distributed at Boston, New York, Norfolk and Pensacola, would probably meet all the demands of a state of peace, and furnish useful schools for officers, to prepare them for the proper management of others, when they are required. The force to be kept afloat, then, will be assumed at 6 ships of the line, 11 frigates, 15 sloops of war, 4 steamers and 10 smaller vessels. The annual amount necessary to keep this force in a state of repair, and to supply the wear and tear of stores of cruising vessels, is estimated at $550,000.

The estimated expense of the force which is proposed to be kept in commission, exclusive of the repairs as above stated, and for the pay of the officers of the navy yards, rendezvous, receiving vessels, of superintendents and civil officers, at all the shore establishments, and at the present cost of those establishments, is—

For pay of officers and seamen in commission, superintendents, and civil officers, and all others, at all the establishments, about.....	$2,500,000
For provisions.....	750,000
For medicines and hospital stores.....	60,000
For ordnance stores, powder, &c.....	120,000
For contingencies of all kinds.....	390,000

Total for the navy branch.....$3,850,000

If the marines are continued as a part of the naval establishment, instead of substituting ordinary seamen and landsmen for them in vessels, and watchmen in navy yards, and transferring the marines to the army as artillery, as has sometimes been suggested, the sum of about $400,000 annually, will be required for that corps.

To determine the annual amount which it may be necessary to appropriate to prepare the vessels and reserve frames and other materials which have been proposed some time must be assumed within which they shall be prepared. Believing that reference to the ability of the treasury to meet the probable demands upon it, for all the purposes of the government, must necessarily be considered in determining what amount may be allotted to the navy, the board have examined the reports of the secretary of the treasury, and respectfully propose to establish the ordinary annual appropriations for the navy, including the ordnance, at seven millions of dollars.

The operation of such annual appropriations may be seen by the following recapitulation of the proposed heads of expenditure:

For the force in commission, and its dependencies, as before stated.....	$3,850,000
The average appropriation for navy yards.....	500,000
For the repairs and wear and tear of vessels.....	950,000
For building vessels and purchase of materials.....	1,300,000

Total for the navy proper.....6,600,000
For the marine corps.....400,000

By the adoption of this gross sum for the navy and its dependencies, and the other items as proposed, $1,300,000 would be annually applied to increasing the number of our vessels and the purchase of materials; and, with this annual expenditure, the deficiency of $17,760,000 would not be supplied sooner than between thirteen and fourteen years, or at about the year 1850.

The board consider this as the most remote period at which the proposed force ought to be ready, and are of opinion that it might be prepared much sooner, should congress deem it necessary or advisable to make larger appropriations than have been suggested.

The board have expressed the opinion: that no more vessels should be launched than are absolutely necessary to meet the demands for the force to be kept in commission; but, as a necessary consequence, they recommend that the other additional force should be in such a state of readiness, that it may be launched and equipped by the time that men could be obtained for it. This arrangement renders an early attention to the completion of all the building-ships, ship-houses and launching-ways, at the different yards, so that the ships may be built, and that our docks, wharves, workshops and storehouses should be finished; that our ships may be equipped with the greatest economy and despatch, whenever they may be required.

Before concluding this report, the board would respectfully offer some remarks upon the form of the appropriations, and suggest some attention to existing acts of congress.

By the separate acts for the gradual increase of the navy; for the gradual improvement of the navy; for building and rebuilding different vessels, altogether seven in number, each appropriation is rendered separate and distinct, although the general object is the same, and requires the use of the same kinds of materials. It is necessary, in conformity to the law of the 3d of March, 1809, that the vouchers, receipts, expenditures and accounts of each should be kept separately; and, in strictness, no article purchased for one can be applied to the use of another, however desirable or economical such use may be.

It is suggested, therefore, for consideration, whether it might not be very advantageous for congress to determine, by some general act or resolution, the number and classes of vessels which the president might be authorised to have been built, or for which materials might be procured; and then appropriate specially the amounts which might be devoted to those objects, and for keeping the force afloat in repair, under the general head of "for building and repairing vessels, and for purchase of materials and stores."

The adoption of some such plan, and removing the special restrictions which now exist, and requiring, as at present, detailed estimates for the current repairs, and reports of proceedings in building vessels and for purchase of materials, would, it is believed, greatly simplify and diminish the number of accounts at the treasury department, and in all the navy yards, without infringing in any degree the principle of special appropriations; would furnish to congress all the information they now receive, and would enable us at all times to use those materials which are best prepared, and most appropriate for the different objects for which they might be wanted.

The board, beg leave, also, respectfully to state their opinion of the necessity for the services of a competent civil engineer for the navy, to furnish plans and estimates for all hydraulic and civil objects, and to have a general superintendence of their construction, under the direction of the department. The particular character of these works requires the supervision of such a person, not less from motives of economy in the ordinary expenditures, than from the more important consideration of their proper arrangement, solidity of construction, and durability. All which is respectfully submitted.

JNO. ROGERS.

To the hon. M. Dickerson, secretary of the navy.

A.

Upon the supposition that the naval force to be so prepared that it might be equipped for sea at short notice, shall consist of—15 ships of the line, 25 frigates, 25 sloops of war, 25 steamers, 25 smaller vessels, and that the frames and other durable materials shall be provided for 10 ships of the line and 10 frigates, as a reserve, the following statement shows the total number and character of the armaments which the whole force will require; the number which can be furnished from the ordnance on hand; and the number which will be still required:

Ships of line. Frigates. Sloops. Steamers. S. V.
Total number required	25	35	25	25	25
On hand, for	11	22	16	00	12
Deficient	14	13	9	25	13

Besides the bomb-cannon, guns and carronades for these armaments, there would be required shot, shells, small-arms, pistols and cutlasses, and a supply of powder sufficient for equipping a strong force, in case of a sudden emergency.

The cost of these objects may be estimated as follows:

Armaments for 14 ships of the line, at $45,000 each,	$630,000
13 frigates,	16,500
9 sloops,	6,000
25 steamers	3,000
13 smaller vessels	19,500

For guns, bomb-cannon and carronades.....	993,000
100 shot to each gun, and 200 shells to each bomb-cannon, and shells for guns.....	427,000
8,000 muskets.....	100,000
3,500 pairs of pistols.....	43,750
8,000 cutlasses.....	34,000
9,000 barrels of powder.....	202,500

A LATER REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Navy department, April 27, 1836.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the senate of the 19th instant, requiring of this department "to inform the senate what is the maximum amount which can be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country; embracing, 1st, ordnance and ordnance stores; 2d, gradual increase of the navy, and collection of materials; 3d, repairs; 4th, navy yards and docks and other incidental heads of expenditure; provided the appropriations for the expenditures be made at once, for a series of years, to be drawn from the treasury annually, as needed," I have the honor to state that the subject was referred to the board of navy commissioners, whose report is herewith submitted.

In this report they present estimates of much larger amount than those contained in their report of the 2d of March last, as the maximum which, in their opinion, might be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country, "without any limit in reference to the means."

It will be perceived that these estimates are based upon the supposition that our naval preparations shall have no limit, except that imposed by a due regard to the public revenues, and by the probable condition of other maritime nations; and that the fixed, immovable fortifications of our country are to be kept within prescribed limits; and also upon the supposition that we shall erect six dry docks in addition to those already completed, to wit: one at Portsmouth, one at Boston, two at New York, one at Norfolk and one at Pensacola.

Should it not be deemed expedient by congress to increase our naval preparations to the extent contemplated by the commissioners; or should the estimates for immovable fortifications, now submitted, be adopted; or should it not be deemed expedient to provide, at this time, for the construction of six dry docks, a corresponding reduction in the amount of the estimates of the commissioners should be made.

It must also be observed, that the estimates of expenditures are made without regard to the effect they may have upon the commercial shipping interest of the country.

An expenditure of more than a million and a half of dollars annually, for the "gradual increase of the navy, and collection of materials," would, in my opinion, create such a demand for labor and materials as essentially to increase the expense of ship-building, which could not fail to give foreign navigating interests an advantage over our own.

I thought it due to myself, in presenting the report of the commissioners of the navy board, to make the foregoing observations. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MAHLON DICKERSON.

Hon. M. Van Buren, president of the senate.

Navy commissioners' office, April 21, 1836.

SIR: The commissioners of the navy have had the honor of receiving from your hands the resolution of the senate of the 19th instant, with directions, given personally, and by endorsement on the resolution, to report thereon.

The resolution requires that the senate be informed "what is the maximum amount which can be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country; embracing, first, ordnance and ordnance stores; second, gradual increase of the navy and collection of materials; third, repairs; fourth, navy yards and docks, and other incidental heads of expenditure; provided the appropriations for the expenditure be made at once, for a series of years, to be drawn from the treasury annually, as needed."

In the report which the commissioners had the honor of presenting to you on the 2d ultimo, it was proposed "that the force to be prepared ready for use when circumstances may require it, shall consist of fifteen ships of the line, twenty-five frigates, twenty-five sloops of war, twenty-five steamers and twenty-five smaller vessels; and that the frames and other timber, the copper, ordnance, tanks and chain cables shall also be prepared for ten ships of the line and ten frigates." It was further observed that "the force to be ready for use would employ thirty thousand seamen; the number assumed as that for which vessels ought to be prepared, for the commencement of a state of hostilities." In preparing that report, the board, unapprized of your views or those of the government upon the subject, looked to the fiscal condition of the country, as exhibited in the treasury reports, and thence drew the inferences expressed as to the sums which might annually and conveniently be applied towards completing our naval defences; confining their views to the supposed convenience of the treasury, and indicating rather the minimum of the amount of money necessary to place the naval defences of the U. States upon the footing of strength and respectability due to the security and welfare of the union.

But the resolution of the senate calls for the maximum amount which can be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country, without any limit in reference to the means. The question thus presented appears to be unfettered with any restriction, or any consideration, other than that which refers exclusively to the completion of the naval defences of the country.

Had the resolution given any intimation as to the amount of the naval force, or, in other words, as to the nature and extent of the force deemed necessary for the defence of the country, a satisfactory reply might more easily and with more certainty come within the professional ability of the board. Uninformed upon this material point as to the views of the honorable body by whom the resolution was passed, the board must of necessity express their own, to show the basis of their calculations upon the subject.

If it be the settled policy of our government to consider the navy as "our first and best fortification;" if it be determined that our naval preparations shall have no limit except that imposed by a due regard to public revenues, and by the probable condition of other maritime nations; if the fixed, immovable fortifications of our country are to be kept within prescribed limits, that the naval defences, deemed more important because more efficient, may be enlarged to an extent necessary to defend our coast on the ocean, and guard it against invasion, the commissioners would, with great deference, though with entire confidence in its correctness, express the opinion that an increase of naval preparations beyond that of wisdom in their letter of the 2d ultimo may become a measure of wise precaution in reference to the high interests thus committed to the protection of the navy, and the solemn duties and responsibilities imposed upon it. Our means of naval defence and annoyance should surely be such as, when exerted against those possessed by other maritime nations with whom we may come in conflict, would fairly promise, if not secure, success.

Leaving, however, the nature and extent of our naval preparations to be decided by those with whom the decision rests, the commissioners will suppose that fifteen ships of the line, twenty-five frigates, twenty-five sloops of war, twenty-five steamers and twenty-five smaller vessels, with the frames and other timber, the copper, ordnance, tanks and chain cables for ten ships of the line and ten frigates, as a reserve force, may be considered as the amount of force which it may be the pleasure of congress to provide; and upon this hypothesis they base the reply to the resolution which they have now the honor to submit, observing here that, if a greater force be adjudged expedient, the means necessary to provide it must be proportionately increased.

In the opinion of the board, every ship belonging to the navy should be kept in such a state of preparation that her full equipment and readiness for actual service, on any emergency, may be secured by the time a crew can be collected for her. The hulls of those not in service at sea should be frequently examined and kept in good condition; their armament, masts, spars, boats, tanks, chain cables and perishable stores of every description, should be procured, and carefully preserved in a state of readiness for immediate use; and there should be always kept on hand a full supply of seasoned timber, of all kinds used in the construction of ships of war, and a full supply of spare ready-made masts and spars, of sizes and dimensions adapted to each of the various classes of our ships.

Our navy yards should possess all the conveniences and facilities of building and repairing ships of every class, with the greatest despatch and economy. They should possess ample means of seasoning and preserving timber, and of keeping in a state of perfect security and preservation, ready for immediate use, all the stores and munitions of every description essential in the equipment and armament of our ships. To place the yards in this condition, preparations involving large expenditures are indispensable. Dry docks, timber docks, seasoning sheds, building slips, launching ways, ship houses, store houses, smitheries, workshops, wharves, &c. must be possessed to an extent proportionate to the number and size of our ships, and the quantity of materials to be kept on hand. We cannot, in a state of peace, secure the services of our ships as promptly as would be desirable, without these conveniences. In war, when time is all-important, when celerity of movement and vigorous action are alike in constant requisition, the want of them would paralyze every exertion, and be felt as a heavy national calamity. Suppose a squadron coming into port after a long cruise, or after a serious engagement at sea, or after encountering usual storms, the ships composing it would require repairs, some of them probably very extensive; many might require docking, and they arrive at a port where there is but one dock; while one is in dock, the residue must wait and take their turn to be docked, and months, at least, may elapse before the squadron (possibly wanted for immediate service) can be repaired and put in a condition for further service. Golden opportunities of sustaining the honor of our flag and advancing the highest interests of our country may thus be lost.

But, without supposing a case, the present actual condition of our ships at New York may be cited as affording ample illustration of the value of these facilities and conveniences, and particularly in reference to docks. If we possessed them at that yard, the ships now there, particularly those of the line, which require extensive repairs, might be put in a condition for service in a much shorter space of time, more effectually, at far less expense, and without incurring any of the risks attending the process of heaving down.

With these considerations in view, the commissioners would observe that, in their opinion, the sum of one million and eight hundred thousand dollars might be "beneficially expended" in procuring ordnance and ordnance stores; that the maximum amount which could be expended in the first year, from the date of an appropriation, would probably not exceed $300,000, but in the second and subsequent years at least $500,000 might be beneficially expended in providing cannon, carronades, bombs, shot, bomb-shells, muskets, pistols, entrenches, boarding-pikes, boarding-axes, powder or the materials for making it, and all the other various articles necessary to the armament of the ships. That for "the increase of the navy and collection of materials" the sum of sixteen millions of dollars might be beneficially expended; that during the first year the expenditure for timber could not be very considerable. It might be contracted for in the course of a few months, but the trees should not be felled before the month of October next, and the contractors would not probably commence delivering the timber at the yards before April or May, 1837; and possibly such interruptions from Indian hostilities might arise in getting out the live oak as to postpone the operations of those engaged in that business for a still greater length of time. But the imperishable articles of copper, iron and lead, might be procured, probably during the first year; and it may be observed, as an inducement to procure them now, that the prices now asked for such articles are as low as they have ever been known to be. This observation is grounded upon the latest contracts made for copper and iron.

Under all circumstances, the commissioners believe that the sum of one million and a half of dollars might be judiciously expended "for the gradual increase of the navy, and collection of materials," during the first year after an appropriation, and that, in the six subsequent years, the residue of the $15,000,000 (viz. $14,500,000) might be expended; making in these years, an average expenditure of about $2,417,000.

The probable inability to expend any considerable sum during the first year, for timber, is a circumstance not to be regretted, because we have not the means of seasoning and preserving it. The preparation of such means, which consists of timber docks and seasoning sheds, should precede the reception of timber. They may be prepared by the time the timber will be delivered; and when they shall be ready for the reception of the timber, the timber should be procured as early as may be practicable, in order to give it the longest time possible for seasoning, before it shall be actually used in the construction or repair of ships.

As to "repairs," the operations under this head would necessarily be protracted and limited, until we can have a sufficient number of dry docks, and other conveniences for repairing ships of war. We have now only two dry docks, one at Norfolk, the other at Boston; so that only one vessel can be taken into dock at a time at either of those places; and at other yards where we have ships of the line, it would probably be advisable rather to wait the construction of docks, before commencing any repairs which their bottoms may require. The commissioners, however, believe that under this head, nine hundred thousand to a million of dollars may be annually and judiciously expended.

Upon the subject of "navy yards, docks and other incidental heads of expenditure," the board would respectfully observe, that the plans for improving the yards, adopted under the act of congress of 1827, and approved by the president of the United States, contemplate expenditures to a large amount, the means of estimating which are not in the possession of the board. It is certain, however, that it will require a series of years to complete the improvements, and it is equally certain that the expense will unavoidably be very large. But, to confine our views at present to a portion of those improvements, say a dry dock at Portsmouth; an additional dry dock at Boston; two dry docks at New York; an additional dry dock at Norfolk; and a dry dock at Pensacola; with the number of timber docks, timber sheds, ship houses, slips, wharves, storehouses, &c. required for these and other yards, and adapted to the proposed force, and essential to keep it in a state of desirable preparation for service: one million and a half of dollars may be considered as the maximum amount which could be "beneficially expended" during the first year; but for each succeeding year, two millions and a half may be expended, and very beneficially, until the necessary improvements shall be completed.

These views present the following results; showing the maximum amounts which, in the opinion of the navy commissioners, might be beneficially expended, annually, for different series of years.

1st. "Ordnance and ordnance stores," during the first year $300,000, and during the second year $500,000; the third year $500,000, and the fourth year $500,000.

2d. "Gradual increase of the navy and collection of materials," during the first year, $1,500,000, and each of the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh years, about $2,417,000.

3d. "Repairs," about $1,000,000, say one million of dollars annually.

4th. Navy yards and dock, and other incidental heads of expenditure, $1,500,000 during the first year, and two millions and a half of dollars during the second year, and the like sum annually, till the necessary improvements be completed.

If an appropriation adopting these views were made, and the number and description of vessels recommended in our letter of the 2d ultimo were kept in commission without diminution or increase, then the annual naval expenditure, exclusive of the expenditure under "gradual improvement," but including $400,000 annually for the corps of marines, would be—

For the first year.....	$8,550,000
For the 2d, 3d and 4th years, each.....	10,667,000
For the 5th, 6th and 7th years, each.....	10,167,000
For the subsequent years, each.....	7,750,000

until the improvements in the navy yards should be completed to the extent desirable and necessary. All which is respectfully submitted.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Our paper is almost filled with official documents, in relation to the state of affairs with Mexico, &c.

Very destructive fires have happened at Poughkeepsie and Greenbush, New York, and on the island of Nantucket.

There will be found in subsequent pages some account of the progress and prospects of the "INDIAN WAR." The Seminoles are, again, in action; and have advanced, at different points, committing many ravages—and then as suddenly retiring, leaving a trace marked by conflagration and blood. They had even committed depredations at a very short distance from the capital, Tallahassee—to the great harrassment and disquiet of the people. The Creeks seem to be in state of complete insurrection—they had murdered many in Alabama in a most appalling manner; and, by fire, destroyed many improvements. Col. Crowell takes shelter every night in Fort Mitchell. Great excitement prevailed, and persons were hourly flying into the more densely populated settlements, leaving every thing behind them! It is probable that they will join the Seminoles, and, perhaps, aim at the "conquest of Florida!" These things, with events that will probably happen on the Mexican frontier, are exceedingly unpleasant, and must materially affect our march forward.

The Maryland "democratic state convention" met at Baltimore on the 18th inst. and responded to the nomination of Martin Van Buren, as president, and Richard M. Johnson as vice president of the United States, for four years, from the 4th of March next—and named their electoral ticket, &c.

Both boards of the corporation of New York are ti-ed, and last week took about forty ballots, each, for presidents, without success. In one of them, however, a "whig" clerk had been chosen—9 to 7, in place of a Van Buren man, dismissed. Other ballots have been since made, with the same results.

The elections in Virginia have resulted in the choice of 76 Van Buren men, and 57 whigs.

A great litter of banks is before the New York legislature, amounting to twenty-seven millions—of which about 25, (with several additions to the capital of old banks), and amounting, in all, to $7,500,000 had been already incorporated; and the rest, it was supposed, would follow—for the simple purpose of promoting a "gold currency!" The work is not yet finished.

Offices of the bank of the United States, of Pennsylvania, will be speedily opened at Erie and Beaver, in that state.

During the recent session of the legislature of Massachusetts, $10,320,000 was added to the banking capital of that commonwealth. Capital of sundry banks chartered, $6,720,000. Making the total bank capital of the commonwealth $40,830,000.

We have received a voluminous report in the legislature of this state, of the special committee, who have come to the conclusion, that the Mamhattan company have failed to supply the city with pure and wholesome water, and that the charter ought to cease and be dissolved. They close the same by a resolution that the attorney general be directed to take such proceedings in the premises to procure a final adjudication upon the case. This report is one of a serious character, and we shall, with no little interest, watch to see how the company will escape, and hold on their banking privileges, as well as the public deposits. [N. the paper of other banks to be from 1 to 5 per cent. below par, which presents a fine harvest for its brokers.

The legislature of Maine, at their session just closed, incorporated about five-and-twenty new banks, although the state was very fully provided before. Such legislation is bad, very bad, and especially injurious to merchants. When there are so many banks, the money market will always be subject to violent reactions.

A bill for a two million bank, to be located in the city of New York, has passed the house of representatives of that state. The Commercial Advertiser states that Mr. Lawrence, the present mayor of New York, is to be president of the new institution.

Some idea may be formed of the rapidly increasing importance of the commerce of our inland seas, by the fact, announced in the Buffalo papers, of the launch of an elegant ship of three hundred tons, from Grand Island, on Tuesday. She is designed for a regular trader between Buffalo and Lake Michigan. Another ship of 320 tons is on the stocks at Buffalo.

The following communication from the author of the "Memoirs of Slater," is worthy of the attention of the public, and especially the cotton growers of the south.

MR. NILES:

Sir: In seeking information respecting the nankeen cotton, in which I perceived that some was darker than others, I was surprised to find that there were other varieties of color. Mr. Lyford, of Baltimore, first assured me of the fact, and gave me specimens of the cotton and of the seed, which was presented to him by a friend who gathered it in Chili; one a light nankeen, the other a beautiful brown, a specimen of which can be seen at Mr. Lyford's hotel. In further prosecution of my inquiries at Washington, Cary Seldon, esq. informed me, that, in settling the estate of commodore Thomson, it was found that he had brought from Chili, specimens of cotton, among which was found a beautiful brown and a bright lilac: he had also brought seeds of the different colors; and Mr. Seldon, on the discovery of the fact, distributed the seeds, with the specimens of the colored cotton, to the hon. Messrs. Forsyth, Dixon Lewis and Davis; who took pains to sow them the following season, but they were found too old to vegetate.

The death of com. Thomson prevented the valuable introduction which he intended for his country.

It is very important that this fact should be published, in order that more seed may be imported from South America, where there is no doubt of its existence, and probably in still greater varieties.

The nankeen cotton, so happily cultivated in Georgia, is found superior to the same article in China, and there is a probability that the other varieties may be introduced with great advantage. And if we can obtain all the varieties of the cotton plant, it will add to the importance of our great staple, and encourage the manufacturer to produce fabrics peculiar to America. I publish this fact, with the hope that efforts will be made, to procure the seed, that experiments may be made.

The cultivation of the cotton plant, so as to produce a finer staple, is a subject well worthy the attention of the planter. Yours respectfully,

GEO. S. WHITE.

MILITARY PREPARATIONS. The Pittsburgh Gazette says—We understand that major R. L. Baker, at the Alleghany arsenal near this city, has received orders to send immediately to Baton Rouge ten thousand muskets, a number of pieces of artillery, and a large quantity of ammunition, to supply the troops, for which a requisition has recently been made. They are now being shipped on board the steamboat Emerald and a keel boat.

BANK OF MARYLAND TRIALS AT BEL-AIR. The conspiracy case which was commenced on the opening of the adjourned term of Harford county court, on the first Monday of this month, was continued by the examination of testimony on the part of the state until Tuesday last week, when the counsel for the state abandoned the prosecution as untenable.

On Wednesday the case against Evan Poultny alone was taken up—the examination of testimony on the part of the state occupied the court and jury until noon Thursday. The defence was then stated by Henry Stump, esq. and the evidence in support of it consumed about half an hour—when, after an argument by Messrs. Bond and Gill for the state, and by Messrs. Constable and Scott for the defendant, the case was committed to the jury, who, after an absence of eighteen minutes, returned with a verdict not guilty.

On yesterday morning the only remaining indictment was abandoned by the counsel for the state, who announced to the court their unanimous opinion entertained at all times since the pending of the indictment—that the charge it contained was untrue, in point of fact, and could not be supported. [Gazette.]

INTERESTING RELIC. A late London paper says—“Benjamin Franklin, whilst in London, pursued his business as a compositor with great ardour at the highly respectable establishment in Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, now conducted by John Cox and Sons, printers to the East India company. The compositor's case, occupied by Franklin, exists as when he left it.”

The London Morning Chronicle says that the trade in Barilla, has now fallen into the hands of Americans, “who have already supplanted” the English in other branches of trade in the Mediterranean, and “will soon possess themselves of all the commerce of the Canaries.”

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

From Liverpool papers to the 15th April.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The fine equestrian statue of king William III, in the College Green at Dublin, was wantonly blown up with gunpowder about midnight of the 7th April. A Dublin paper of the 8th says—

The members of the corporation, horror-stricken at the event of this morning, met at their assembly house, William street, to-day. They resolved upon offering a reward of £200 for the apprehension and conviction of the ruffians who blew up the statue, and £50 for any private information that may lead to a discovery. May they not justly have apprehensions for their own security in such a state of affairs?

The quantity of powder used to blow up so mighty a substance (nearly thirteen hundred weight of lead) must have been immense. The lamps in the neighborhood were completely extinguished, and several panes of glass broken in the adjoining houses. The insolent tone of triumph assumed by the radical faction cannot but make a lasting impression on the lovers of peace and good order, who are now prostrated by the machinations of a wily and implacable foe. The lord lieutenant has been sending repeated messages to College street police office, where the investigation is held, for any information they may have received.

London, April 12. The wanton destruction of a very excellent work of art like the equestrian statue of king William III, in College Green, Dublin, which, as our Irish correspondent shows, was the other night blown up with gunpowder, would be an act of mere Vandahic barbarism if it were not inspired by religious bigotry and political malevolence. That statue, the symbol of the revolution of 1688, was a memorial of the deliverance of the civil and religious liberties of the British people from the grasp of a sullen and ruthless tyrant, who labored through his short and ignominious reign to prostrate the Protestant constitution, and the throne of a free people, at the feet of papal Rome. As such a memorial that statue has always been an odious thing in the eyes of that class of the Irish people who hate the principles which the restorer of Protestant freedom successfully asserted, and would rather be the slaves of the vassal-despot of the Romish power than the free subjects of a Protestant British king.

The price of cotton had declined at Liverpool 3d. There had been “a shadow of distrust in the money market” at London.

FRANCE.

A London paper says—

We learn from the Paris papers of Sunday that the debate of Saturday last, on the petitions to the chamber of deputies for the recovery of the remains of Napoleon, and their transit to Paris, and for the repeal of the law which banishes his family from the soil of France, terminated in the reference of the first set of petitions to the minister of the interior, and in the rejection of the second. The discussion did not prove so interesting as the early part of it had promised, but it fully demonstrated the apprehensions of the king, in which the majority of the deputies sympathized, that the presence of the family of Napoleon in France might occasion a new struggle for the throne. Even the arrival of his ashes was deemed dangerous by the ministry, as likely to revive the affection of the nation for him who, when living, had been its idol; and although apparently defeated on the point, government will have completely succeeded, for the petitions referred to the minister will share the fate of their predecessors—that is, in homely language, they will be “cushioned.”

The Courier Francais, states that the reports of the consuls to the government make known that the principal part of the Russian fleet in the Baltic has begun to concentrate at Revel. New orders for the purchase of naval stores had been executed at Dantzic, to be transhipped to Holland, where it would appear the deposit is to be found. Every thing announced that a naval expedition was contemplated.

Of the 200,000,000 lbs. of sugar consumed by France annually, beet-root already supplies 80,000,000 lbs.; whereas in the year 1828, beet-root supplied not more than 16,000,000 lbs.

SPAIN.

The intelligence from the north of Spain given by the Paris papers is not important, but it is in one respect calculated to make the blood freeze with horror. An order of the day of general Bernelle, commander of the (French) foreign legion, in the service of queen Isabella, directs, in reprisal for the massacre of such soldiers of that corps as fell into the hands of the Carlists, that in future no quarter be given. A letter from Bayonne states that the town of Plencia had been taken from the Carlists by a body of men landed from the British squadron.

CRACOW.

Extract of a letter of the 23d nlt. from Cracow:—“At the desire of the government of republic, 530 Polish refugees have gone to Podgoize; among them are two superior officers, 120 officers, 160 disposable officers, 11 private individuals, and about 300 soldiers. Very recently a number of other refugees, who did not comply with the order of the government, were arrested by Russians, who, according to their own expressions, drove them out like dogs. Those of the refugees who were born in the kingdom of Poland have been forced to return thither, and the others have been transferred under escort to Podgoize. The number sent to Russia, or into the kingdom of Poland, is not known. Twenty-three have been given up to Prussia, and conducted to the frontier of that kingdom by the Austrians, under the command of an Irishman named Weston, nephew of sir James Graham.

GREECE.

The king of Bavaria, in his voyage through the Archipelago, stayed some time in the island of Milo, where for a long period he has possessed a large estate, within the bounds of which are still standing the ruins of an amphitheatre. During his stay the workmen continued their excavations in the temple. It was in this spot that the celebrated Venus Aphrodisia was found, which was brought by Mr. Marcellay, the secretary to the French embassy, and is now in the galleries of the Louvre, under the name of the Venus of Milo. Here also was found a statue of Mars, which was afterwards conveyed to Rome.

ALGIERS.

March 28. This day an expedition of 7,000 men, of all arms, has marched against Medeah, so that our domination will be established at all points. [Lr. Paix.]

The Paris Moniteur of Algiers contains the following letter, written by the king of the French to marshal Clausel, on occasion of the success of the Mas eara expedition:—

Paris, 18th January, 1836.

"My dear marshal—I am happy to be enabled to announce to you, that France appreciates, as I do, the most brilliant results of the mission I confided to your experience and ability. After having expressed to you as king, all my satisfaction, I wish also to thank you as a father. I know with what enlightened solicitude you watched over my son, and I delight to tell you how much I rejoiced to see that he worthily partook with you, and with the brave soldiers you commanded, all the fatigues and dangers of an expedition in which the honor of our arms was so gloriously maintained. Receive, my dear marshal, the assurance of all my sentiments for you. Your affectionate, (Signed) LOUIS PHILIPPE."

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

May 13. There appearing to be no quorum present at the usual hour of meeting—

Mr. Grundy moved that the senate adjourn—ayes 14, noes 8. The senate then adjourned.

May 14. Mr. Clayton, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill for the adjustment of the accounts of Stockton & Stokes, and several other persons named; which was read a first and second time, and taken up for consideration in committee of the whole. Mr. Clayton and Mr. Buchanan stated, among other remarks on the subject of this bill, that the committee was unanimous in reporting it, and they hoped that it would be at once ordered to a third reading; and after a few remarks from some other gentlemen, and an unimportant amendment being made, the bill was accordingly ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. King, of Alabama, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported a recommendation of the committee that the senate agree to some and disagree to another of the amendments made by the house to the bill for the relief of the several corporations of the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. King, the senate proceeded to consider the amendments.

[Finally, says the National Intelligencer, the bill for the relief of the corporate cities of the District of Columbia has now passed both houses of congress, and in a shape which it is supposed the president of the United States will approve. It provides simply that the United States, instead of guaranteeing (as it now does) the payment of the interest on the Holland loan to the three cities, shall assume the debt to itself, receiving in trust, towards its eventual extinction, the stock belonging to the three cities, in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, which money was borrowed to pay for. The cities are therefore henceforth to be relieved from the payment of interest on the debt, which has been an exhausting drain to them; the proportion of the principal debt due by Washington being one million of dollars, and that due by each of the other cities a quarter of a million of dollars.]

Mr. Southard, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill to establish a naval academy; which was read, and ordered to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Some other matters being disposed of, the senate adjourned.

May 16. Mr. Shepley presented a certificate from the governor of Connecticut of the election of J. M. Niles, to be a senator of the United States until the 3d of March, 1839, in room of the late N. Smith; which was read.

Mr. Niles was then sworn.

Mr. Mangum presented a series of resolutions adopted at a meeting of the citizens at Morantown, North Carolina, concerning the recognition of the independence of Texas; which were read, and ordered to be printed.

These resolutions request the co-operation of Mr. Preston and Mr. Clay and Mr. Benton, in promoting the object sought for.

Mr. Preston made some remarks in return for the compliment, expressed his high gratification at the intelligence received this morning of the capture of Santa Anna, and the consequent termination of the war in Texas; his admiration of the skill and bravery by which this result had been obtained; adding his opinion, however, that the time had not come for the government of this country to interfere, until the Texans should have a government de facto to be recognised.

The bill for the relief of Stockton & Stokes and others, was read a third time, passed and sent to the house of representatives for concurrence.

Several bills were read and referred to committees.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business—and, after sitting some time with closed doors, adjourned.

May 17. Mr. Buchanan presented thirteen petitions from the city and county of Philadelphia, praying that congress would take measures for the recognition of the independence of Texas; which were laid on the table.

Mr. Naudain moved that the committee of claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of—

Wetmore. To account for the motion, he read a sentence from the memorial, in which the petitioner, in reference to a former application, expressed the presumption that his honor would not again be assailed, declaring his determination to punish an insult were it even in the court of heaven!!

Mr. Webster asked how it had happened that such a petition had been presented?

Mr. Linn said he could answer that question. He had hastily glanced over its contents, and the offensive words had escaped his notice. But had he seen them, he would not say that he should not have presented the petition. He had no objection to having a dozen such referred to him. He could let them pass for just so much as they were worth, and not bring them into importance by any specific reference to them.

Mr. Webster reminded the senator that there was a rule of the senate which required that every senator should be responsible for the respectful terms in which the petitioner addressed congress.

Mr. Linn's reply was not heard. He was understood to say that had he seen the language, the recollection of the rule would have induced him to refrain from presenting it.

The committee were then discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform the senate what amount of transfers of the public money has been made by his direction, since the 30th of June last, from the Commercial bank of Cincinnati, and also from the Clinton bank of Columbus, to banks east of the Alleghany mountains, giving the date and amount of all such transfers, and the banks from and to which they were made. And, also, that he inform the senate what transfers are ordered from each of the abovenamed banks, and when and to what banks they are to be made. That he also inform the senate what amount of transfers were made to each one of the said banks in Ohio since the 30th of June last, and what amount, if any, is now ordered to each.

The resolution lies over one day, under the rule.

A good deal of minor or preparatory business was attended to this day.

May 18. Mr. King, of Alabama, rose and said that, as the morning business was terminated, he wished to state that, in consequence of information received this morning, it appeared that the Creek Indians, who had been for some time in communication with the Seminoles, have broken out into acts of hostility, butchering men, women and children in the settlements. In consequence of this information, he hoped the senate would consent to take up a bill to authorise the president of the United States to accept the service of volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen.

The motion having been agreed to, the bill was considered, the amendments proposed by the committee on military affairs were agreed to and the bill was ordered to be engrossed; and finally passed.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities and other similar objects, for the year 1836.

Various amendments were made to the bill—when it was ordered to be engrossed, &c.

A bill to carry into effect in the states of Alabama and Mississippi the existing compacts with those states in regard to the five per cent. fund and the school reservations, was read a third time, and passed.

A bill to authorise the president to appoint three additional paymasters was read a third time, and passed.

The senate spent a short time in executive business, and then adjourned.

May 19. Mr. Webster offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to the senate, so far as in his judgment the public interest will permit, confidentially or otherwise, information of the present state of the negotiation between the United States and Great Britain, respecting the north eastern boundary of the United States; including all correspondence between the two governments not heretofore communicated to the senate; and those preliminary conditions, without which Great Britain declines to renew the negotiation as stated in the president's message at the opening of the present session, and which conditions he deems to be incompatible with a satisfactory adjustment of the controversy.

On motion of Mr. King, of Alabama, the senate proceeded to consider the decision of the house on the amendments made by the senate to the bill authorising the president to accept the service of volunteers, &c.

The house disagreed to that part of the amendment of the senate which assigned to the president and senate the appointment of the officers of such volunteers as may be accepted.

Mr. King, of Ala. moved that the senate insist on its amendment, which, after some discussion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, a committee of conference was ordered to be appointed by the chair—yeas 20.

The resolution offered some days since by Mr. Ewing, from Ohio, calling on the secretary of the treasury for a statement of the transfers made from certain specified banks in Ohio to banks east of the Alleghany, &c. was, on his motion, taken up—and being amended, was adopted.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the fortification bill, on the merits of which Mr. Wright addressed the senate at length.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, May 13. A great deal of "private" business was attended to this day, [the National Intelligencer of Saturday says—

The races were, yesterday, owing to the combined influence of the fine weather and the competition expected from high-bred animals upon the turf, the great scene of attraction in this city. In consequence, the senate, not being able to make a quorum, adjourned without doing any business; and the house, which meets at 10 o'clock, was without a quorum after 12 o'clock, but continued to do business, by general consent, as if a quorum were present. We are not sure that this precedent may not grow into practice, and come in time to be common law, though against the constitution. It was Mr. Whittlesey's day, however, and the house has so much confidence in him that we verily believe they would be willing, if it were asked of them, to do the same by the whole batch of his bills, as our Franklin, when a boy, is said to have wished his father to do, when he begged him, instead of saying grace upon the daily dinner of salted meat, piece by piece, to say grace at once upon the whole barrel of it.]

Saturday, May 14. After other business—

The house proceeded to the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. Owen, from the committee of ways and means, on the 12th of April.

On motion of Mr. Owen, the said resolution was amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (No. 436) reported by the committee of ways and means, regulating the deposit of the money of the United States in certain local banks, be made the special order of the day for the day next after the disposition of the appropriation bills, under the order of the 26th of January last, and that the said bill in relation to the deposit banks have precedence on the day after the disposition of the appropriation bills, and the following days, over all other business, until the same is disposed of.

A motion was made by Mr. Vinton to amend the said resolution, by inserting therein, after the words "following days," these words: "and after the several bills now on the speaker's table shall be disposed of."

Pending this motion, the house, on motion of Mr. Whittlesey, proceeded to the orders of the day, which were private bills.

The bill to authorise a compromise, and to cede to the U. States the title to the Pea Patch island, in the river Delaware, was read a third time; and the question being on its passage, a debate took place in which Messrs. Dickerson, Howard, Peyton, Reynolds and Fuller took part.

Mr. Milligan next took the floor. But,

On motion of Mr. Underwood, the house, at this stage of the debate, adjourned.

Monday, May 16. The bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, was partially considered, and then postponed. The bill for the relief of the cities of the District, was then taken up and the amendments of the senate considered, and finally passed. [See proceedings of the senate].

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, by general consent, reported the senate bill to provide for carrying into effect the treaty of limits between the United States of America and the Mexican United States, without amendment; which was read twice, and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The house, on motion of Mr. Mason, then went into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Howard in the chair) on the above bill.

[The debate, in committee, on the above bill, ranged, after some discussion on its particular merits, to the general questions involved in the consideration of the late events in the province of Texas, and to various supposable modes of action, in the event of a successful termination of the war on the part of Texas against the United Mexican States; which is unavoidably omitted.]

After some debate, in which Messrs. Wise, Mason, of Va. Peyton, Cushing, Calhoun, of Ky. Bouldin, Hoar, Vanderpoel and Halsey participated. Adjourned.

Tuesday, May 17. Mr. J. Q. Adams asked the consent of the house to submit the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any overture made since the 3d of March, 1829, by his authority, to the government of the United Mexican States, for the acquisition by the United States of any portion of the territories of Mexico; and copies of all correspondence between the two governments relating thereto, and upon any question of boundary existing between the United States and Mexico.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy and translations of any law, decree or ordinance of the Mexican republic, abolishing slavery within the territories thereof, which may be in possession of the executive department of the United States.

Objections being made, Mr. Adams moved the suspension of the rules, and thereupon asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 85.

An amendment made by the senate to a bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain, was disagreed to, on the motion of Mr. John Y. Mason.

Much incidental business was attended to. At last—

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Mann, of New York, in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for fortifications for the year 1836.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Cambreleng to amend the bill by inserting a clause appropriating $700,000 for the armament of the fortifications—

Mr. Maury rose and delivered a speech of considerable length. On a motion for an adjournment, (at half past three), it appeared that a quorum was not present. A variety of motions was then made. After awhile—

Mr. Wise moved an adjournment; which was agreed to—ayes 75, noes 32; and then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, May 18. Mr. Pinckney, from the select committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, by general consent, made a report, which he said had received the unanimous assent of the committee, and which he hoped would be unanimously approved by the house.

Mr. P. asked that the report be read; which was objected to. Mr. Claiborne insisted upon the reading of the report; and it was read through to the conclusion, which is as follows:

"Your committee conclude by reporting the following resolutions, conformably to the instructions given them by the house:

"Resolved, That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy.

"Resolved, That congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia."

"And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation of this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquility to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating, in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Mr. Pinckney said he was instructed to move that 5,000 extra copies be printed.

These proceedings gave rise to a variety of remarks on the report—

Mr. Sutherland was willing to print the report, if for no other reason, because the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pinckney) had been accused of misrepresenting the sentiments of his constituents. He wished to have the people of South Carolina see it, that when the gentleman should return home, the people might know what he had done, and he might have before them the means of defence against such accusations. He replied to the remark that the report conceded that congress had a right to legislate upon the subject in the District of Columbia; and said that such a right had never been till recently denied. It had been expressly conceded by the states of Maryland and Virginia, and John Randolph had once presented a petition for the interference of congress on the subject.

He was not an advocate for the report. He would not pretend to say that it would suit him or his constituents; but he was satisfied it ought to be printed, to let the people know what the arguments were.

Mr. A. H. Shepperd said the report conceded every thing. It conceded the principle that congress has a right to interfere in the question of slavery in the District, and that was conceding the whole. There was some limit to the propriety of printing; and this was a case, he thought, in which the report ought not to be printed. It contains elaborate arguments upon every thing but the subject which ought to have been discussed. He objected to the arguments of the report and to both of the resolutions, and moved to recommit it to the select committee which reported it, with instructions to report a different resolution.

Many other gentlemen made some observations on the subject—but before they had all concluded, the special order of the day was called, and the fortification bill was taken up, and partially considered.

A message from the senate having been received, returning, with amendments, the "bill authorising the president of the United States to accept the services of volunteers, and to raise a regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen"—

The amendments of the senate, with one exception, were concurred in—and that was rejected, 101 to 102.

Mr. Cambreleng asked leave to report a bill, which was objected to.

Mr. C. moved to suspend the rules, which was agreed to, and Mr. C. reported a bill appropriating $500,000 for the suppression of hostilities by the Creek Indians.

After some remarks on the bill, it was read a third time and passed, nem. con.

Thursday, May 19. After the presentation of memorials, resolutions, &c.

The house resumed, as the unfinished business of yesterday, the consideration of the report and resolutions from the select committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

And debate followed—which was arrested by a call for the orders of the day.

On motion of Mr. Connor, the house, in pursuance of a special order to that effect, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Sutherland in the chair), upon the "bill to change the organization of the post office department, and to provide the more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof."

The bill was read by sections, and some amendments were proposed by Mr. Connor, and agreed to.

Other amendments were proposed and debated, and occupied the house until a late hour—7 o'clock.

[Pending the discussion of the post office bill, a message was announced from the senate, and the speaker resumed the chair, for the purpose of receiving it.

The message was that "the senate insist on their third amendment to the bill entitled 'an act authorising the president of the United States to accept the service of volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen,' which has been disagreed to by this house, and ask a conference on the subject matter of the disagreeing vote of the two houses on said amendment."

On motion of Mr. Speight, the house, by general consent, took up the subject for consideration.

Mr. Lewis moved that the house agree to the appointment of a committee of conference on its part.

The motion was agreed to, and it was ordered that the committee, on the part of the house, consist of five members.]

MR. BENTON.

The following is a part of a strange speech delivered by Mr. Benton, in the senate, against the land bill, on the 27th of April ult. Are all the things—the direful things foretold by him to come to pass in the event of the deposit banks being required to return to the people a small part of the people's money which they have "monopolized?" The sum is larger than "some of the deposit banks can pay." A beautiful story is this! They "must all break," if the project be persevered in! One step further, and the "deposit banks" may say—we shall pay you "sixty days after convenience!" A good deal of the money lent to these banks, without interest, will never be returned into the public treasury. It will take some of the rest of their years to prepare a return of it—and in the mean time the "currency" will become more and more deranged. Vast piles of bank notes are now at 5 or 6 per cent discount!

Mr. Benton said—For the present, it could not be overlooked that the whole structure of the bill is changed: it is no longer a bill to divide the proceeds of the lands in future and for five years to come, but it is to reach back into the treasury, to travel back through the years 1835, '34, '33, and to gather up all the proceeds of the land sales for these three past years, and commence dividing this mass on the 1st day of July, and divide one-fourth on that day, one-fourth the 1st of October, one-fourth the 1st of January and one-fourth the 1st of April, 1837. To these divisions are to be added the amounts received from lands this year and next year. It is expected to begin the division upon 28 millions in July, and finish 38 millions by the 1st of January next. Now what is the object and effect of all this? Is it the object to take all the money for distribution, and leave nothing for defending the country? Is it the object to break all the deposit banks? Is it the object to distress the country, by making the deposit banks call in all their loans in six months? Is it their object to ruin the currency by enabling whig states to draw their distributive shares in specie, compelling the banks to stop payment, and then calling for the bank of the United States, as the only remedy for the evil. Whether this is the object, it will be the effect; and to do all this, it is necessary to reach back three years to find money in the treasury, which is not there, and thus make a larger sum for distribution than the deposit banks can pay.

The revenue of the year 1833, were received by the bank of the United States, and have been expended in the public service; no part of those revenues were ever transferred to the deposit banks; they all remained in the bank of the United States until expended; yet this bill, in its mass of deceptions and fallacies, assumes that the deposit banks received all the revenue for the year 1833: has separated the land revenue from the custom house revenue; has saved that land revenue to the present day; and now has it in a separate pile by itself, to be divided out! These are the assumptions of the bill, while the realities are that part of this land revenue never was received at all by the deposit banks; what they actually received for 1833, has been paid out, and what they have got, is the revenue of the country. The land receipts are in the mass of the revenue, and professing to divide the proceeds of the lands, the revenue itself is taken! and it is taken for three years back, in order to raise an immense sum for instant division! such a sum as is expected to tempt the cupidity of distributers beyond resistance, to ruin the president if he vetoes the bill, and ruin the deposit banks and the currency if he does not. Mr. B. said it was a bill to revive the tariff, to re-establish the bank of the United States, and to crush president Jackson, and all who opposed it, by mere dint of money!

But the "Globe" of last week says—

In relation to the public money in the deposit banks, the opposition have changed their tone again, and through their hired letter writers here, they are sounding the alarm, that the banks cannot pay over the public money in their hands at all, and that it is all lost to the country. Now, we venture the assertion, that there is not a single deposit bank which cannot pay over every dollar of the public money on deposit with it in ninety days, in the following instalments, viz: one-fourth at sight; one-fourth at thirty days sight; one-fourth at sixty days sight, and the other fourth at ninety days sight. If the opposition doubt that there is a single bank that cannot do it, name the bank, and we pledge ourselves to prove our assertion.

THE CREEK INDIANS.

In the proceedings of congress it will be seen that there are some mention of hostile doings on the part of the Creeks. The following are some of the accounts received.

From the National Intelligencer of the 19th inst.

The subjoined letters, owing to the source of them, give more alarming signs of the hostility developing itself among the Creeks, than any thing else we have seen. It is distressing to think of the suffering and waste of human life which will certainly follow, if the Creeks are faithless and mad enough to engage in hostilities against their white neighbors:

Copy of a letter from col. Crowell to the gov. of Alabama.

Fort Mitchell, (Ala.) May 9, 1836.

SIR: I arrived at home yesterday, and found the neighbors considerably alarmed about Indian depredations; and in order to satisfy myself of the intentions of the Indians, I despatched a messenger after some of the principal chiefs to come and see me, for the purpose of ascertaining from them what their people intended. The chiefs have not come, but sent me word that their young men were bent upon war, and had assembled in the swamp near the Federal road, with the view of attacking any troops that might march into the nation.

I have satisfied myself that they contemplate mischief, and, without military aid, the settlers must be driven from their homes with a great loss of property, if not their lives. I have thought it my duty to give you this information, that you may call into immediate service a sufficient force to put those Indians down, and protect the lives and property of the settlers.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN CROWELL.

Letter from a citizen of Georgia to a member of congress, dated

Columbus, 10th May, 1836.

It is with feelings of deep sympathy that I address you. Our Alabama neighbors are now pouring into this city with the greatest possible precipitation. Several men, women and children are murdered on the road, in making for this place. Small children are picked up, wandering in the forest; not able to tell who their parents were. Such a state of misery and distress I never before witnessed. Nothing, as yet, has been done by the Alabama military. The Indians are going from one plantation to another, destroying every thing that they cannot convert to their use. The head chief has been waited on by some of our citizens to know the intentions of the Indians; and he stated, unequivocally, they were determined on war, and that he could not prevent it; and for us to be on our guard. It is somewhat feared our city will be attacked by them. At this moment we are poorly provided for defence, but hope to be in a few days. All those fine farms which a few days ago promised so much reward to the owners, are deserted; the fencing thrown down, the inmates of the houses either killed or run away, they present now nothing but a dreary waste. The time has now arrived when nothing short of conquest and immediate removal or extermination, will give peace and stability to our agricultural neighbors.

Copy of a letter to the adjutant general, dated

Fort Mitchell, Alabama, May 7th, 1836.

SIR: It has just been reported to me that Colonel Flournoy was shot dead by Indians they day before yesterday, about fifteen miles below this post. I am also informed that a report is currently circulating among the Creeks, that the Seminole Indians have defeated the whites in their operations in Florida. This report will no doubt embolden them to many acts of hostility that they would not otherwise dare commit.

A constant communication must be kept up between them, as the Creeks are conversant with every transaction that occurs in Florida. Marshal, the half bred, says he is apprehensive mischief will be done by the Indians before long. Other friendly Indians are of this opinion. Opotheyoholo, principal of the upper Creeks, says he cannot keep his people together, or restrain them.

A runner has this instant arrived and informed me that another white man was shot in his bed last night by Indians—that many guns were heard in the neighborhood during the night, and other whites are supposed to have fallen victims.

I am sir, your obedient servant,
(Signed) J. S. McINTOSH, bot. maj. 4th infantry.
Gen. R. Jones, adjutant gen. U. S. Army.

The Columbus Herald of the 3d inst. says: "A letter now before us from an overseer in Alabama, to his employer in this place, gives information of a small clash between a party of Indians, and a few white men. It occurred at the Osawitee bend, fifteen miles below this place. The planters generally have removed their women and property from that part of the nation. We have not room for further particulars this week. The citizens will hold a public meeting in Girard, Ala. to consider this subject to-day."

There are many corroborating accounts.

Uchee Creek, Russell co. Ala. May 8, 1836.

To gen. McDougald.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the citizens of Russell county residing on Uchee Creek, the undersigned were appointed a committee to address you as a chairman of a meeting of the citizens of Columbus, held some time since, at which meeting the citizens of Columbus pledged themselves to march to our relief, whenever occasion should require. We think, sir, the emergency has now arrived, when your gallantry would be of use to us. Our governor has done, and will do nothing. Our citizens have been murdered! and we are unable to avenge their blood! We were, many of us, once Georgians—we are your brethren—but we are unable to invite you to a feast, we cannot furnish a large number of men even the common necessities of life—but we shall hail you as our deliverer, and our women and children will rise and call you blessed. Most respectfully, your obedient servants,

Robert Adams, Matthew Turner, W. W. Pitts, John B. Tate, H. B. Green, Nimrod Long, committee.

FROM TEXAS.

We had "great news" from Texas, on Monday last. It was said, (and the authority of names given), that general Houston had attacked a body of Mexicans, (separated from their main body by a sudden rise of the waters of the Brazos), under the immediate command of Santa Anna, and killed 8 or 900 of them and made prisoners of the remainder, 500 more, including Santa Anna himself, who, with his principal officers were immediately shot—and all with the loss of only 6 killed and 20 wounded! Houston's whole force, engaged being only 600 men. And to this account was added a note from general Gaines to the secretary of war, giving his opinion that the reports were "beyond doubt" correct, &c. Indeed, the statements were made in such a circumstantial manner that they met with a general belief. But on Wednesday we had the following from New Orleans, being of two days later date than the preceding accounts received from the same place.

From the New Orleans Advertiser of May 5.

Texas. By a gentleman who arrived yesterday, we are credibly informed that Santa Anna has not been taken prisoner, and is sentenced and shot, as stated by a contemporary journal. Our informant stated that there had been a fight, or more properly speaking, a skirmish, between a body of the Mexican army and another of the Texans, which terminated in the total rout of the former, with loss on both sides, but principally on the part of the Mexicans; and that Santa Anna, so far from being in the engagement at the time, was, and is, in the city of Mexico.

The following is the proclamation of the president of Texas prohibiting the admission of slaves into that territory.

"PROCLAMATION.

"Whereas, the 8th article of the general provisions of the constitution of the republic of Texas, provides that the 'importation or admission of Africans or negroes into this republic, excepting from the United States of America,' is forever prohibited and declared to be piracy; And whereas, the African slave trade is equally revolting to the best feelings of our nature, and to the benign principles of the Christian faith, is equally destructive to national morals and to individual humanity; and

Whereas, the most enlightened and powerful nations of Christendom are exerting both their moral intelligence and physical power, to suppress that odious and abominable traffic; and

Whereas, it is the imperative duty and the high privilege of the government of Texas, to contribute in all practicable and legitimate means, to the effectual prevention, in its own jurisdiction, of a trade, so atrocious and disreputable; therefore,

I, David G. Burnet, president of the republic of Texas, by and with the advice and consent of my cabinet, and in accordance with the 8th article of the constitution aforesaid, do command and require all officers, naval and military, and all collectors and other functionaries of the government, to be vigilant and active, in detecting and defeating any attempt to violate said article; and to seize, arrest and detain in safe custody, any person or persons that may be found violating or attempting to violate, the same; and to stop, seize, take possession of and detain, any vessel or vessels, with their equipment, tackle, &c. and any boats or other water craft, of any description, attached thereto, on board of which any Africans or negroes so attempted to be imported in contravention of the said 8th article, may be found; and to detain any and all such negroes wherever found, until the further decision of the government can be had in relation thereto; Provided, that any officer making such seizure, &c. shall as soon as may be practicable, report the same, with the relative facts, to the secretary of the navy.

"Excepting from the United States of America." This is a singular phraseology.

Done at Harrisburg, this 3d day of April, 1836, and of the independence of the republic the first.

By the governor: DAVID G. BURNET.
Bailey Hardeman acting secretary of state."

FROM FLORIDA—OFFICIAL.

From the Globe.

The following letter from general Scott to the secretary of war, gives the latest intelligence of the operations of the army in Florida:

Head quarters army of Florida, Picolata, April 30, 1836.

SIR: For the information of the war department, I have the honor to report my arrival here yesterday.

My last report was dated at Tampa Bay the 12th and 13th instant. The right wing and centre of this army moved from that place on the 14th, as did also the South Carolina mounted regiment. The foot of the same wing (the left) had remained encamped for twelve days about fifteen miles from Tampa on the Fort King road, and the Florida battalion commenced embarkation for the mouth of the Wythlacoochee on the 17th. I left Tampa the same day, and joined the foot of the left wing with which I marched to Fort Alabama, on the Hillsborough. Here on the next day we were rejoined by the South Carolina mounted regiment from its expedition to the head of Peas creek, where no Indians and no recent trails were found. Col. Goodwin, the commander, however, discovered and burnt an extensive town on the left bank of that stream.

On the 28th the left wing passed the big Wythlacoochee, where we found the centre engaged in constructing a defence for its baggage train, preparatory to entering and scouring the forks of the Wythlacoochees, whilst the right wing was advancing by the core and the left bank of the main river.

I continued to march with the left wing via the scene of Dade's massacre, Melakleka and the upper crossing of the Ocklawaha. On the night of the 23d, our camp was fired upon by a party of six or eight of the enemy. One man and two horses were slightly wounded. At daylight a detachment of horse was put in pursuit of the enemy; but at the end of a few miles the trail was lost between some of those hammocks, swamps and ponds, which everywhere abound.

Another small party of the enemy was met on the morning of the 24th, and which might have been cut off from the nearest hammock but for a false movement made by the company of horse constituting the advance guard. The horses and packs of the party were captured; but after halting, and scouring a succession of hammocks, which were, as far as practicable, surrounded by the horse, we found ourselves eluded by every Indian. I mention these mortifying incidents to show the character of the enemy and the nature of the country. The foot broke into hammocks where a goat could not penetrate, and the horse rapidly took up the positions assigned; but the enemy, in all such cases, contrived to escape by secret passages which afterwards can but rarely be found.

When at the distance of twenty-three miles, I took an escort of two mounted companies, and proceeded to Volusia on the 24th. Finding there the United States steamer the Es-sayons, I embarked in her, and with a guard of only seventeen men determined to penetrate, by the St. Johns, the southern part of the peninsula as far as practicable. Colonel Gadsden, captain Canfield and lieutenant Johnston accompanied me, to note the course and depth of the river, together with the general topography of the country. We found no difficulty in passing up to the head of Lake Monroe, and might have carried to that point a draft of eight or nine feet of water. The distance ascended is two hundred miles from the mouth of the river, and sixty from Volusia. We found the river beyond the lake nearly as bold as below, and if we could have crossed the bar at the entrance, we do not doubt that we might have gone fifty or seventy miles farther towards Cape Florida; but unfortunately our boat drew more than four feet, and we only found four on the bar.

This reconnaissance was made with a view to several objects; I was anxious to discover whether the Indians had any settlements on the upper part of the river; to find out the place of concealment for their women, children and negroes; to give to the well disposed among the latter an opportunity of communicating with us; to observe trails and crossings, and particularly to find a good point as far in the interior as practical for the establishment of a new post before the commencement of active operations on our part. Such point we found about eight miles below Lake Monroe, on the east bank. A leading trail passes through it. Here we took the ferry canoe in ascending, and here, on returning, a sharp fire was thrown in upon us by a party of ten or fifteen Indians who lay concealed in high grass on the west side. But for their timidity, they might have killed the four officers who were standing exposed on the bow of the boat. They fired from a distance of three hundred yards.

Brigadier general Eustis arrived with the body of the west wing at Volusia on the 25th. The garrison he had left there under major Gates had been sharply attacked on the 14th by perhaps eighty Indians; two of our men who happened to be outside were killed; and possibly the enemy lost as many; but no sortie was made.

Before the arrival of Eustis, I had planned an expedition to Spring Garden, consisting of two companies of horse that had escorted me, and sixty volunteers of the garrison. The detachment returned without discovering any recent signs of the enemy.

All the volunteers of the left wing marched under colonel Goodwin on the morning of the 25th, for St. Augustine via Tomaka, &c. Brigadier generals Eustis and Bull both being much indisposed, came down the river with me. The regulars were left to garrison Volusia and to superintend the evacuation of the post, which had become extremely sickly. Many cases of malignant bilious fever had occurred, which, in the opinion of some of the physicians, threatened the approach of the yellow fever. By the aid of two boats, the Santee and the Essayons, the evacuation may be completed in a week. Colonel Goodwin, and the two regiments of volunteers, may be expected to reach St. Augustine, with the baggage train, in four days from this time. He will pursue any fresh Indian trail he may cross.

I have had as yet no report from brigadier general Clinch. I learn, however, unofficially, that he reached Fort Drane on the 26th, without finding in his march any party of the enemy exceeding fifteen or twenty.

From colonel Smith, who, with the Louisiana volunteers, went on an expedition up the Peas creek via Charlotte harbor, nothing had been heard when I left Tampa Bay. I may receive his report, via St. Marks and Tallahassee, in ten or twelve days. One from major Reed, who commanded the expedition up the Wythlacochee, (from its mouth), may be expected in the same time, and also a third from colonel Lindsay. On the receipt of all these reports, I shall be able to form a pretty accurate opinion of the measures to be pursued to put an end to this war, which must be recommenced at a better season, and with very different means. On our side, so far, nothing of importance has been achieved.

I am more than ever persuaded that the whole force of the enemy, including the negroes, does not exceed twelve hundred fighting men. It is probably something less. Of that force I am equally confident that not five hundred have at any time, since the commencement of hostilities, been brought within the same ten miles square. In all our operations within the last thirty days, we have not found a party of more than perhaps one hundred and thirty; but parties of from ten to thirty have been encountered almost everywhere. No Indian woman, child or negro, nor the trace of one, has been seen in that time. Those non-combatants, it has been evident to us all, have been removed beyond the theatre of our operations. They were, no doubt, even while the parley was going on with gen. Gaines on the 7th March, moving off to the south east, beyond Peas creek and Lake Topkela, and in that almost inaccessible region they are now concealed. That officer, it is said, caused Powell and his chiefs to be informed, by way of inducing them to agree to accept Wythlacochee as a temporary boundary, that large armies were approaching, which would fill up the Indian country, or crush every thing in the way. The wily chiefs profited by the information; sent off their families, and dispersed their warriors into small parties. In this way Powell expects to make good his threat, viz: that he would protract the war three years.

To end this war, I am now persuaded that not less than 3,000 regular troops are indispensable; 2,400 foot and about 600 horse: the country to be scoured and occupied, requires that number. I have no particular desire to conduct the operations of the new forces. That is a duty which I shall neither solicit nor decline.

Of the 3,000 good troops (not volunteers), five hundred will be necessary to garrison five posts for the deposit of supplies, say one on the St. John's seven miles below Lake George; one up the Peas Creek, say fifteen miles above Charlotte harbor; one at Tampa Bay; one twelve miles from the Gulf of Mexico, up the Wythlacochee; and on the same river, near the Fort King road; with one hundred and sixty thousand rations deposited at Tampa Bay, and thirty or forty thousand at each of the other posts. Five columns with haversacks, and a few one-horse carts, may operate securely and with every prospect of success, at least to the north and west of Charlotte harbor. For the country below, additional means will be wanted viz: two or three steamers of a light draft of water, and fifty or sixty barges of different sizes, capable of carrying from ten to fifteen men each.

I give these items, in order, if approved, that the necessary appropriations may be asked at once. I beg leave to add, in haste, that new regiments, or regiments of recruits, would be worth little or nothing in this war. I will, therefore, earnestly recommend, that the companies of the old regiments be extended to eighty or ninety privates each. Recruits mixed up with old soldiers in June or July, would become effective by the first of December; and I repeat, that operations cannot be carried on by any troops whatever, in this peninsula, except between the 20th of November, and the end of April. The intermediate period is too hot or too sickly to be endured.

The boat is about to depart, and I must, for the present, conclude.

At the end of January, I asked for troops of the governors of several states. The last of the South Carolinians arrived at St. Augustine the 9th of March, and at Volusia the 25th; the Georgians, in part, arrived at Fort Drane about the same time; but six companies of horse not till the 9th of this month—after the campaign was nearly over. As it was impossible for them to join either of the columns, lieutenant colonel Crane sent them back to their homes. The Alabama regiment that was expected to reach Tampa Bay about the 25th of February, did not reach that place till (I think) the 13th of March. These extraordinary delays it was impossible for me to foresee or guard against.

A portion of the Georgians have just arrived here to embark for their homes, and the remainder of the same quota will follow. The South Carolinians will be discharged at St. Augustine and Jacksonville.

I shall write again by the first opportunity. In the mean time I shall, here or at St. Augustine, await the orders of the department.

I remain, with great respect, your most obedient servant,
WINFIELD SCOTT.

Brig. gen. R. Jones, adj't gen. U. S. army.

The schr. Bushrod, capt. Houston, arrived at Charleston, on the 8th inst. from St. Augustine, in 3 days, having on board 54 volunteers from Florida. The following gives the latest news from the territory.

Office of the Herald, St. Augustine, May 5, 1836.

The left wing of the army arrived in town on Saturday afternoon last, from Tampa Bay, via Volusia. The objects of the campaign have not been accomplished. The Indians have scattered throughout the country, and are in small detached parties. A few of them were met by the army, and some skirmishing took place between them. The Indians were hovering about the army, and fired into the camp several times, but one Indian is killed that is known certainly.

Fort Alabama, on the bank of the Little Wythlacochee, sustained several attacks.

Camp Shelton, 11 miles from Tampa Bay, was also attacked and one man wounded.

Major Cooper of the Georgia battalion, with 350 men, was stationed on the road between Fort Drane and Tampa Bay, with 17 days provisions, was attacked by about 500 Indians every day, until relieved by gen. Clinch on the 17th day.

Gen. Scott ordered a quantity of provisions into the Wythlacochee, by sea; and capt. McLenore, with 75 men, went with them—they were landed within 18 miles of Clinch's battle ground, and 38 men left to guard them, and it is feared that they have suffered a similar fate to that of the gallant band under major Dade. It is reported that a council of war was held at Fort Drane, and it was decided to be impossible to relieve them. We hope there are no grounds for this report.

That there has been an understanding between Creeks and Seminoles, there are some grounds for believing. A silver whistle was found on the Wythlacochee, which was recognized to belong to a brother of capt. Elmore, who was travelling through the Creek nation last summer, when he lost it. The owner's name was engraved in full upon it.

Generals Scott and Eustis arrived here on Saturday night last.

OFFICIAL PAPERS

Presented in the house of representatives on Saturday last, by the chairman of the committee of ways and means.

War department, Jan. 23, 1836.

Sir: I am instructed by the president to request that you would repair to some proper position near the western frontier of the state of Louisiana, and there assume the personal command of all the troops of the United States who are, or may be, employed in any part of the region adjoining the Mexican boundary. It is not the object of this order to change at all the relations between yourself and the military departments under your command, but to require your personal presence at a point where public considerations demand the exercise of great discretion and experience. An order will be issued without delay to the sixth regiment, to proceed to Fort Jesup; and this force, together with all the troops in the western part of Louisiana, and in the country west of the Mississippi and south of the Missouri rivers, will be employed, as occasion may require, in carrying into effect the instructions herein communicated to you.

The state of affairs in Texas calls for immediate measures on the part of the government. It is the duty of the United States to remain entirely neutral, and to cause their neutrality to be respected. It is possible that the course of operations may induce one or other of the contending parties to approach the boundary line, with a view to cross it in arms. Should you find that the case, you will give notice to the persons having the direction, that they will not be permitted to cross into the territory of the United States; and if they attempt to do so by force, you will resist them with the means at your disposal.

The 33d article of the treaty with Mexico requires both the contracting parties to prevent, "by force, all hostilities and incursions on the part of the Indian nations living within their respective boundaries, so that the United States of America will not suffer their Indians to attack the citizens of the Mexican states," &c.

The provisions of this article you will cause to be faithfully enforced, and the various Indian agents and the officers of the Indian department in that region will be required to furnish you any information in their power in relation to this matter, and to carry into effect any instructions you may give. You will make known to the various Indian tribes inhabiting that part of the United States, the determination of the government to prevent any hostile incursions into Texas, and you will call upon the chiefs to inculcate upon all their people the necessity of carefully abstaining from any violation of the above-mentioned engagement, and you will not hesitate to use the force at your disposal for the purpose of preventing any such designs.

Should you be called upon by the civil authority for any aid towards enforcing the laws having relation to the neutral duties of the United States, you will render such assistance as the laws prescribe.

You are requested to communicate freely with the district attorneys of both the districts of Louisiana, on all points of law connected with the execution of the instructions, and those officers will be desired to give you their opinion.

I will thank you to keep me advised of any occurrences in that quarter, which it may be important for the government to know. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEW. CASS.

Major general E. P. Gaines, Memphis, Tennessee.

Head quarters western department, Baton Rouge March 29, 1836.

SIR: I have received, not until yesterday, an official copy of your letter of the 23d January last, by which I have the satisfaction to be informed that the president of the United States has been pleased to direct my immediate attention to the western frontier of the state of Louisiana, in order to preserve, if necessary, by force, the neutrality of the United States.

In obedience to this order, I have availed myself of the very first S. B. conveyance that offered after the receipt of the order to proceed to Baton Rouge, to enable me to ascertain to what extent the arsenal there will furnish ordnance and ordnance stores for the prompt and efficient discharge of the duties assigned to me—duties which derive great importance from the recent accounts of the sanguinary manner in which the Mexican forces seem disposed to carry on the war against our Texian neighbors. (See the accompanying newspapers).

Upon this point I take leave to suggest whether it may or may not become necessary, in our own defence, to speak to the contending belligerents in a language not to be misunderstood—a language requiring force and military supplies that shall be sufficient, if necessary, for the protection of our frontier, to check the savage operations of each of the contending parties who may forget to respect the laws of war and our neutral rights, until Mexico and the United States shall, by an adjustment of existing difficulties, put an end to scenes of barbarism which cannot but endanger the peace and other vital interests of all the parties concerned—scenes of barbarism disgraceful to all who enact or tolerate them.

Should I find any disposition on the part of the Mexicans or their red allies to menace our frontier, I cannot but deem it to be my duty not only to hold the troops of my command in readiness for action in defence of our slender frontier, but to anticipate their lawless movements, by crossing our supposed or imaginary national boundary, and meeting the savage marauders wherever to be found, in their approach towards our frontier.

Should I err in this view of the subject, in which, however, I am convinced the laws of war and nations will bear me out, I shall be gratified to receive the views of the president, to which I shall scrupulously adhere. But if it be otherwise, if my own views are approved, I shall, in that event, have occasion for some mounted volunteers, with other forces sufficient to make my numerical strength equal to the estimated strength of the contending parties, which is now estimated at eight thousand to twelve thousand men, (8,000 to 12,000 men). With a view to this possible emergency, I have already desired the fine legionary brigade, commanded by general Planche, of the city of New Orleans, to calculate on the possibility of my having occasion to invite the legion to join me. To this suggestion the officers of the legion, with the gallant general at their head, cordially responded that they would, whenever it might be deemed necessary, promptly repair to the frontier, delighted with the opportunity of carrying into effect the wishes of the president, under whose immediate command many of these officers had distinguished themselves in the defence of their city and state in the memorable triumphs of December, 1814, and January, 1815.

All which is submitted for the information of the president of the United States. With profound respect,

To the hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war.

P. S. I arrived at the city of New Orleans at 7 A. M. and departed therefrom on board the steamboat at 7 P. M. yesterday, having taken my passage on board the steamboat the Levant, bound from New Orleans for Natchitoches, and to be at Baton Rouge on the 1st April, Friday next.

E. P. G.

Washington, April 25, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 29th ultimo, was received at the department a few days since, but I have been prevented by indisposition from giving it an earlier answer.

I enclose for your information a copy of the memorandum of an official conference between the secretary of state and the Mexican minister, respecting the present state of affairs upon the south western borders of the United States. You will consider, as a part of your instructions, the declaration made by the secretary of state, and govern yourself accordingly.

It is not the wish of the president to take advantage of present circumstances, and thereby obtain possession of any portion of the Mexican territory. Still, however, the neutral duties as well as the neutral rights of the United States will justify the government in taking all necessary measures to prevent a violation of their territory. Recent events induce the belief that the Mexican forces, as well as the inhabitants of Texas, must be in a high state of excitement. In that portion of the country, there are many Indian tribes whose habitual predisposition to engage in war is well known, as is, also, their reckless disregard of any of the claims of humanity. And from information which has reached the government, there is too much reason to believe that efforts have been made to induce these Indians to join the Mexican troops. It may, therefore, well be, as you anticipate, that these various contending parties may approach our frontiers, and that the lives and property of our citizens may be placed in jeopardy. Should this be the case, the president approves the suggestion you make, and you are authorised to take such position, on either side of the imaginary boundary line, as may be best for your defensive operations. You will, however, under no circumstances, advance farther than old Fort Nacogdoches, which is within the limits of the United States, as claimed by this government. But you will please to observe, that this permission will not be exercised, unless you should find such an advanced position necessary, to afford due security to the frontier, in consequence of the unsettled state of things beyond you.

You will please to explain, fully, your views and instructions to any armed parties who may be marching towards you; and should they continue to threaten your position, or to manifest a design of crossing into the United States, you are authorised to attack and repel them.

I have this day, by direction of the president, requested the governors of Louisiana and Mississippi to call into service any militia force you may find necessary for the protection of the frontiers. This force must be called out for a term of not less than six months from the day they reach their rendezvous, to be discharged at any time by the United States. The necessary means will be furnished to the officers of the proper staff departments, for such supplies as may be required.

I need hardly say that the duty committed to you is one of great importance, as well as of great delicacy; and I do not doubt it will be executed as to preserve, on the one hand, the proper safety of the frontier, while, on the other hand, as little cause of offence as possible will be given to any foreign authority. I have to request that you would keep me regularly advised of your proceedings.

Gaines, major general E. P.

Department of state, Washington, April 23, 1836.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to transmit a memorandum of the substance of what I stated in an official conference, on the 20th instant, with Mr. Gorostiza, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic to the United States. I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

The hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war.
Memorandum for Mr. Gorostiza, of what was said to him by Mr. Forsyth, in their conference on the 20th of April, 1836.

Mr. Forsyth stated to Mr. Gorostiza, that, in consequence of the contest in Texas, the movements of some citizens of the United States on the Red river, and apprehended hostile intentions of the Indians in Mexico against the United States, and of the Indians within the United States against Mexico, orders would be given to general Gaines to take such a position with the troops of the United States as would enable him to preserve the territory of the United States and of Mexico from Indian outrage, and the territory of the United States from any violation by Mexicans, Texans or Indians, during the disturbances unfortunately existing in that quarter, and that the troops of the United States would be ordered to protect the commissioners and surveyors of the two governments, whenever they should meet to execute the instructions to be prepared under the treaty of limits between the United States and the United Mexican States. Should the troops, in the performance of their duty, be advanced beyond the point Mexico might suppose was within the territory of the United States, the occupation of the position was not to be taken as an indication of any hostile feeling, or of a desire to establish a possession or claim not justified by the treaty of limits. The occupation would be precautionary and provisional, and would be abandoned whenever (the line being run and the true limits marked) the disturbances in that region should cease, they being the only motive for it.

Natchitoches, Louisiana, April 8, 1836.*

SIR: I arrived at this place on the 4th instant, since which time I have received information from various sources, which leaves no doubt in my mind that a considerable portion of several tribes of the Indians residing within our territorial limits have gone over to the Texas side of the boundary line between the United States and Mexico.

When to this fact are added the reports daily received at this place, that the army of Mexico, commanded by the president, (Santa Anna) in person, is rapidly approaching in this direction through the centre of Texas; that his plan is to put to death all he finds in arms, and all who do not yield to his dictation; that as soon as he comes to the section of country occupied by the Indians in question on the waters of the Trinidad, or Trinity river, they will unite with him in his war of extermination; and that no boundary line, save such as they find properly guarded with an efficient force, will be sufficient to arrest the sanguinary career of these savages, I cannot but deem it my duty to prepare for action.

For this purpose I have requested of the governors of Louisiana and Mississippi and Tennessee, each, a brigade, and of the state of Alabama a battalion, making altogether three brigades and one battalion; the whole, or as many of them as practicable to be mounted; to repair to this place as soon as may be convenient, by battalions or companies.

This force, though not equal in numbers to that which it may be my duty to meet in battle, will enable me at least to secure the confidence of the frontier settlements, and keep them at home to plant their crops; and moreover enable me to inflict summary punishment on such of the enemy by whom they are now menaced, as may teach them to respect us, and in future to pay more regard than they seem now disposed to pay to our rights and treaties.

I shall in the course of a few days address to each one of the commanders of the armies in Texas a note calling their attention to their duties, and apprising them of the course which I shall pursue towards them, in obedience to the orders of the president of the United States, should they approach our boundary, or suffer the Indians near them to commence hostilities. I have notified the governors of the states to whom I have applied for force, that "should the war in Texas be brought to a close without the apprehended Indian hostilities," the volunteers will in that case "be discharged forthwith." I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

EDMUND P. GAINES, major general commanding.

The hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war, Washington city.

P. S. I enclose a copy of my letters to the governors of the states above named. E. P. G.

War department, May 4, 1836.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 8th ultimo, and, in answer, have to inform you that the president will sanction the employment of whatever force may be necessary to protect the western frontier of the United States from hostile incursions. This department has addressed the governors of the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky and Alabama, requesting them to call into service such militia force as you may find necessary in carrying into effect the instructions heretofore given to you. The theatre of operations is so distant from the seat of government, that much must be entrusted to your discretion. The two great objects you have to attain are, first, the protection of the frontiers, and, secondly, as strict a performance of the neutral duties of the United States as the great object of self-defence will permit. You will take care and do no act which can give just cause of offence to any other government; and, on the other hand, you will not permit the frontiers to be invaded by any forces whatever. I have to request that the militia you may call out may not be more numerous than the exigencies shall seem to require. They ought to be called into service for six months, if practicable, to be disbanded whenever not wanted; and you will take care that all due economy is preserved, as well in your disbursements as in the preservation and accountability of the public property. It is very necessary that you should communicate freely to the commanding officers of any military parties who may approach the frontiers, and inform them of the nature of your orders. You will state to them, that while you have been ordered to that quarter with a view to the execution of the neutral obligations of the United States, you have also been instructed to defend their territory from any invasion whatever; and that this duty will be executed under any circumstances that may happen. You will also remonstrate against the employment of any of the Indians. Although the dictates of humanity forbid the use of this species of force, which cannot be restrained, yet the right of the United States to remonstrate against its service rests upon other grounds. From the habits and dispositions of the Indians, it is well known that the power of employing them cannot restrain them within the legitimate rules of warfare. If they approach the frontiers, they will pay no regard to a mere imaginary line, but will carry on their depredations and massacres wherever inhabitants can be found, and where there is no force to oppose them. It is altogether idle to expect that in such a state of things the frontier settlements of the United States would not be exposed to these calamities. Whoever calls the Indians into service, and induces them to approach our border, cannot but be aware of the consequences that must ensue.

All this you will represent to the proper officers, and you will use your best exertions to keep such a force from marching towards your position, and, if they do so, to repel and disperse it.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
LEW. CASS.

Major general Gaines, Fort Jessup, Louisiana.

War department, May 4, 1836.

SIR: In January last orders were given to major general Gaines to take measures for the defence of the western frontier of Louisiana. Events which were then passing in Texas, led to the belief that a state of things might arise requiring the interposition of the government to protect the inhabitants of that portion of the United States from the calamities of war.

There were placed, subject to general Gaines' orders, three regiments of infantry and seven companies of dragoons; and he was instructed to prevent, by force if necessary, any armed parties from crossing the boundary line into the territory of the United States. He was also informed that the thirty-third article of the treaty with Mexico imposes upon both of the contracting parties the duty of preventing all hostile incursions on the part of the Indians into the possessions of the other; and he was directed to take the necessary measures for fulfilling this obligation on the part of the United States. He was also instructed, if called upon by the civil authority for any aid towards enforcing the laws having relation to the neutral duties of the United States, to render such assistance as the laws prescribe; and he was referred to the district attorneys of the two districts of Louisiana for their opinion upon such points of law connected with his duty as might arise. He was also particularly advised that it was the duty of the United States to remain entirely neutral, and to cause their neutrality to be respected.

By information recently received from general Gaines, it appears that he considers it necessary that his force should be increased, with a view to afford proper protection to the frontiers. He has, therefore, called upon each of the governors of Louisiana, Mississippi and Tennessee for a brigade, and upon the governor of Alabama for a battalion of militia; the whole, or as many of them as practicable, to be mounted. He reports that the Mexican forces are rapidly approaching the border; and he anticipates, that as soon as they have reached the vicinity of the Indians, these will join in the contest, and that the Indian force will respect no boundary line. And the operations in Texas, as described by general Gaines, cannot fail to produce a favorable effect upon the cruel disposition and predatory habits of the Indians.

I have, therefore, the honor to suggest to the committee of ways and means the propriety of an appropriation of one million of dollars "to defray the expenses attending the defence of the western frontier of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the secretary of war, conformably to the provision of the act of April 5th, 1832, making appropriations for the support of the army."

I enclose for the information of the committee a letter from the quartermaster general. Very respectfully your most obedient servant,
LEW. CASS.

Hon. C. C. Cambreleng, chairman committee of ways and means, house of representatives.

Quartermaster general's office, Washington city, May, 3, 1836.

SIR: The operations on the frontiers of Texas will require large appropriations. I have a requisition on my table for one hundred thousand dollars for that service, and have not a dollar to meet it. I have received a letter from the assistant quartermaster at Natchitoches, reporting that he had found great difficulty in obtaining land transportation for five companies. The wagons and horses, as well as mules for packing, must be taken from Ohio, Kentucky or Tennessee. Should the operations be continued through the season on the scale indicated by general Gaines' requisitions, a million of dollars will probably be required for the service of this department alone.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP, quartermaster general.

The hon. secretary of war, Washington city.

War department, May 5, 1836.

SIR: In consequence of the intimation contained in your note of this date, I beg leave to observe, that the request for an appropriation of $1,000,000, for the protection of the frontier, in my letter of yesterday, was submitted to, and approved by, the president. Very respectfully, your obt. servt.,
LEW. CASS.

Hon. C. C. Cambreleng, chairman committee of ways and means, house of representatives.

OFFICIAL PAPERS.

Communicated to the house of representatives by the president of the United States.

The following message from the president of the United States was received by the hands of Mr. Donelson:

In compliance with a resolution of the house of representatives of the 10th instant, I transmit reports from the secretaries of state and war, with the papers accompanying the same.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, 14th May, 1836.

Department of state, 13th May, 1836.

To the president of the United States:

The secretary of state, to whom was referred a resolution of the house of representatives of the 10th instant, has the honor to lay before the president the papers mentioned in the accompanying list, which contain all the instructions to the charge d'affaires of the U. States at Mexico, all the correspondence between the two governments called for, and all other information on the files of the department supposed to be embraced by the resolution.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Butler to Mr. Forsyth.—Extract.

Legation of the U. S. of America, Mexico, 31st March, 1835.

Sir: I have great pleasure in being able to tell you, for the information of the president, that the renewal of the treaty of limits will be completed within a few days, and I shall bring it with me on my return to the United States. The Mexican congress are now in session, and the ratification on the part of Mexico will be obtained at once, and the treaty be delivered to you in conformity with instructions sent me in January, 1834. The mere renewal of the treaty is in itself a matter of importance to us, because I am convinced that we shall gain by its jurisdiction over a very valuable tract of country, now either in an unsettled state, or under the dominion of the Mexican government.

A few weeks since, there was no prospect of my being able to conclude this affair previous to my departure from Mexico, for reasons which were communicated to the president of the United States in my last private letter, and I had actually obtained my audience of leave from this government, with the intention of setting off for Vera Cruz this day, and to return in the New York packet.

The audience was a private one, there being only the president, the secretary of state, the secretary of the treasury, and myself present. At the interview, I spoke to the president very frankly—I may, perhaps, add energetically—upon the several questions pending between the two governments, and expressed my regret at not having it in my power to bear a more favorable representation of the condition of affairs with Mexico than candor would compel me to do. I was listened to by all present with apparent interest; but as my course has always been frank and direct, neither my manner nor language would create surprise. At the close of the interview, the acting president (general Baragan) inquired whether it would be convenient for me to postpone for a short time my departure, in the event of the government being disposed to entertain my proposition relative to the boundary question, and was answered, that notwithstanding the delay in my departure would occasion some inconvenience to myself, still I would not hesitate to remain for a length of time sufficient for the accomplishment of that object, provided the president gave me assurances that no unnecessary delay would be suffered. When about to leave the audience chamber, the president observed that a communication would be made to me before my departure, and as early as practicable. On the 29th, a note from the secretary of foreign affairs informed me that the treaty should be immediately entered upon and concluded, announcing himself and the secretary of the treasury as the plenipotentiaries on the part of Mexico.

We met on the 30th inst. compared and exchanged our powers, and I was requested to prepare the project. This was done on the evening of the same day, and sent to the plenipotentiaries, who appointed two o'clock to-day for the conference, and where signing and sealing would have followed. At eleven o'clock, the enclosed note was received from the chief clerk of the department of foreign affairs, postponing the meeting until to-morrow.

Department, Mexico, March 31, 1835.

To Anthony Butler, &c.

Sir: His excellency the minister has charged me to inform you that, being much occupied, he does not write to inform you that, in consequence of such occupation, he cannot hold the conference appointed for this day, but that it will take place to-morrow between ten and half past ten o'clock, so that the whole day may be employed.

I avail myself of this opportunity to assure you of my most distinguished consideration.

JOSE MARIA ORTIZ MONASTERIO.

Mr. Butler to Mr. Forsyth.

Washington city, June 9, 1835.

To the hon. John Forsyth, secretary of state:

Sir: In pursuance of a leave of absence granted me several months since by the president of the United States, I have the honor of reporting myself to you as just arrived in this city.

In the despatch by which my leave of absence was communicated, I was directed, previous to my departure from Mexico, to conclude with that government a treaty stipulating the revival of the third article of a treaty previously negotiated between the two governments for adjusting limits and boundary, and which had been suffered to expire.

My instructions have been complied with, the duty is performed, and I have now the honor of presenting herewith the treaty; and have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. BUTLER.

Philadelphia, October 14, 1835.

To the hon. Ashbury Dickens:

The undersigned, charge d'affaires of the United Mexican States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a note from Mr. Dickens, dated the 12th instant, with the copy enclosed, and the official letter from the political chief of the department of Nacogdoches for the transmission of which documents he expresses the most sincere thanks to Mr. Dickens.

The said political chief, in his letter, communicates that the tribe of Creeks from Alabama is now emigrating and establishing itself in lands belonging to Mexico, without any license or authority to that effect; he therefore requests me to state the fact to the executive of the United States of America, in order that measures may be taken to restrain that tribe within its proper limits. As the representation made by the political chief of the department of Nacogdoches is founded on the thirty-third article of the existing treaty of friendship between the two republics, the undersigned hopes that Mr. Dickens will submit the import of this note to the president of the United States, and that his excellency will cause the requisite executive measures to be taken, if the facts should be as stated by the political chief, in order to repress any incursions into the Mexican territory on the part of the Indians who inhabit that of the United States.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to Mr. Dickens the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

J. M. DE CASTILLO Y LANZAS.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Castillo.

Department of state, Washington, Oct. 22, 1835.

Senor Don J. M. de Castillo y Lanzas, &c. &c.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Mr. Castillo, charge d'affaires of the United Mexican States, dated the 14th instant, relative to alleged encroachments of Creek Indians from the United States upon Mexican territories. A copy of Mr. Castillo's note having been referred to the secretary of war, who is charged with the superintendence of Indian affairs, that officer has stated that no information has been received by the war department, showing that the Creek Indians from Alabama are removing into the Mexican possessions; that there has not been, during this season any emigration of Creek Indians from Alabama; and that the war department has, on all proper occasions, by direction of the president, disavowed the project of those Indians for removing into the province of Texas.

From this it would appear that the political chief of Nacogdoches has been misinformed. But should it be otherwise, it may be doubtful whether, under the 33d article of the treaty, the intervention of the United States could be claimed or afforded, unless the Indians manifested some hostile intent. If Indians going from the United States or elsewhere, should migrate to the Mexican territories with peaceable intentions, it will be for the Mexican government alone to decide upon their admission or exclusion.

Though the general terms used in the representation of the political chief of Nacogdoches would justify the president in expecting a more explicit statement, showing at what times and places, and under what circumstances, the Indians are alleged to have entered the Mexican territories, he has preferred directing this explanation to be made without delay, in order that there may be no room for doubt as to his views on the subject.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to offer Mr. Castillo renewed assurances of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mexican legation, Philadelphia, October 29, 1835.

To the hon. John Forsyth, &c.

The undersigned, charge d'affaires of the United Mexican States, has been informed that "at New York several vessels were in preparation, which were to join others at the Balize of New Orleans, not less than twelve in number, and to sail together for the coast of Texas. The object of the expedition," continues the notice, "is to introduce into that colony arms and munitions of war, for the assistance of the colonists in their insurrection, (pronunciamiento) against the supreme government of the republic. Of these vessels, some, it appears, are armed for the defence of the expedition against the national cruisers now upon those coasts, and, if possible, for the destruction of those cruisers." "I have been assured," concludes the writer, "that two or three vessels have lately sailed from New York, with arms and ammunition for Texas." The undersigned has the honor to submit this information, which he has received through various channels, to the notice of the secretary of state of the U. States, in order that he may communicate it to his excellency the president, from whose inflexible rectitude he hopes that, for the sake of the peace and harmony subsisting between the two nations, he will order such measures as the case may require for putting an end to these proceedings, and absolutely preventing others of the same class from being carried into execution or projected. Such an order is most necessary, in the opinion of the undersigned, under the present circumstances, as the contempt of obligations arising from the treaty of friendship between the United Mexican States and those of America has reached such a point, that, according to an official notice received from the Mexican consul at New Orleans, it is certain that, between the 10th and 11th of this month, the American armed schooner San Felipe sailed from that port for Brazoria, with the same captain N. E. Hurl, and "having her defences much strengthened, under the protection of which she goes laden with warlike stores and ammunition," and without a single paper which she should carry from the Mexican consul. The undersigned sincerely believes that this conduct will be viewed with disapprobation by the president of the United States.

The undersigned has the pleasure to renew to Mr. Forsyth, on this occasion, the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

J. M. DE CASTILLO Y. LANZAS.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Castillo.

Department of state, Washington, Nov. 10, 1835.

Senor don J. M. de Castillo, &c.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Mr. Castillo charge d'affaires of the United Mexican States, dated the 29th of October, and to acquaint him that, in conformity with the president's views relating to the existing state of affairs in Texas, which the undersigned had the honor to impart at large to Mr. Castillo, in an interview at this office on the 4th instant, the district attorney of the United States at New York, as well as the district attorney at New Orleans, has been instructed to prosecute any persons within the jurisdiction of his district, who have attempted or who may attempt to compromise the neutrality of this government by proceedings in violation of those laws of the United States which have been enacted for the purpose of preserving peace, and fulfilling the obligations of treaties with foreign powers.

The undersigned prays Mr. Castillo to accept renewed assurances of his high consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Department of state, Washington, Nov. 4, 1836.

SIR: It has become necessary for me to call your attention to the probable event of a contest between the different portions of the Mexican empire in the vicinity of the United States. Some of our citizens may, from their connexion with the settlers there, and from their enterprise and love of change, be induced to forget their duty to their own government, and its obligations to foreign powers; but it is the fixed determination of the executive faithfully to discharge, so far as its power extends, all the obligations of the government, and more especially that which requires that we shall abstain, under every temptation, from intermeddling with the domestic disputes of other nations.

You are therefore earnestly enjoined, should the contest begin, to be attentive to all movements of a hostile character which may be contemplated or attempted within your district, and to prosecute, without discrimination, all violations of those laws of the United States which have been enacted for the purpose of preserving peace, and of fulfilling the obligations of treaties with foreign powers. I am, sir, your obedient servant.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Butler—Extract.

Department of state, Washington, Nov. 9, 1835.

The president's views relative to the existing contest in Texas have been imparted to Mr. Castillo in a conference I have had with him at this office, and he will no doubt communicate them to his government; but that there may be no room for misapprehension on the subject, it is deemed best that the Mexican government should also be assured of them through you.

It is the wish of the president, therefore, that as soon as practicable after the receipt of this dispatch, you should seek an interview with the minister of foreign affairs, and acquaint him that the president looks with regret upon the unhappy state of things in Texas. That as the United States are and desire to remain at peace with the United Mexican States, as all measures enjoined and warranted by law have been and will continue to be taken to enforce respect by citizens of the United States, within their jurisdiction, to the neutrality of their government, whose desire is to execute in entire good faith the treaty of limits, he expects nothing will be done by the Mexican authorities tending to frustrate that desire, or to diminish the friendly sentiments entertained for the Mexican republic. In the probable event of a protracted war in Texas itself, neither party can be permitted to encroach upon the territorial limits of the United States, or make our soil a battleground for settling their political dissensions. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Palace of the national government, Mexico, Nov. 19, 1835.

To his excellency the secretary of state and of foreign relations of the United States of America:

The undersigned, chief officer charged with the direction of the department of [foreign] relations of the Mexican republic, has received orders from his excellency the president to address the government of the United States through its secretary of state on two subjects of the utmost importance to both nations, as, should they not be presented in a clear light, and treated with that good faith which characterizes the intercourse between those nations, the bonds of friendship and reciprocal confidence which have hitherto united them may, in a certain contingency, be considered as broken, in defiance of justice, reason and mutual interests. The undersigned, while addressing this communication to the secretary of state of the United States, in performance of his duty, has the satisfaction to be able at once to state with confidence that this government conceives itself to be too well acquainted with the equitable principles which have ever directed the cabinet of Washington, and remembers too distinctly the proofs of affection and sympathy at all times displayed by that cabinet in favor of the prosperity of the Mexican republic, to have the slightest doubt that its complaints will be attended to as soon as they are found to be established on just grounds, and they will be treated with the consideration shown towards those of the most friendly governments.

The first subject to which the undersigned thinks proper to call the attention of the secretary of state of the United States is the notorious co-operation of a great number of the inhabitants of Louisiana in aiding and advancing the cause of the insurgent colonist of Texas. These Mexicans—for they neither are, nor can they be viewed otherwise than as Mexicans, having voluntarily ceased to be what they previously were—would never have ventured, in so open and shameless a manner, to abandon their duty to their adopted country, had they not expected to receive ready and effective support from American speculators, established near their frontiers, with views purely interested.

Unfortunately for themselves, the colonists of Texas were not mistaken in their calculations; and, before raising the standard of rebellion, they had received from their friends in New Orleans the combustibles required for kindling and spreading the conflagration; this conflagration must certainly destroy their infant establishments, unless they quickly open their eyes to the impending danger, and again submit to the authority of the government which they have outraged, and which, although it neither desires nor intends to take vengeance, is nevertheless firmly resolved to enforce respect to itself in every part of our immense territory. The colonists of Texas have since obtained, and continue to obtain, daily, from New Orleans, succors of every kind, in provisions, arms, ammunition, money, and even in soldiers, who are openly enlisted in that city, who sail from it armed for war, against a friendly nation, and, by their mere presence, render more difficult the pacific solution of a question purely domestic. Societies have moreover been formed in New Orleans, which publicly direct or interfere with affairs foreign to their country, either through the instrumentality of the press, or by meetings called ostensibly for the determined object of rendering general throughout the United States the views of a few individuals with regard to Texas. In other words, attempts are made to give a color of nationality to that which is a mere speculation on the part of some adventurers of various sorts.

The undersigned is well aware that many of these acts might have been, and still may be, effected at New Orleans under cover of the very liberality of the American institutions; and that the authorities of the union may have been unable legally to prevent them, especially such as involve questions connected with the freedom of the press, individual liberty, or the privileges allowed to American commerce. For this reason, the government of the undersigned neither should nor does solicit any thing in this case from the government of the United States, except that it should employ every measure permitted by its own laws for preventing, as far as possible, the injury which a friendly nation, connected with the United States by bonds of every kind, may sustain from the interference even of private individuals in a question entirely domestic.

To Mr. John Forsyth, secretary of state of the U. States:

MOST ESTEEMED SIR: In the late message of the president of the United States, the paragraph relative to my country concludes thus: "It has been thought necessary to apprise the government of Mexico that we should require the integrity of our territory to be scrupulously respected by both parties." Now, I recollect well what was said on this subject in our conference at the beginning of the last month, and I admit that the desire of this government is most just; it cannot be other than the desire of the Mexican government. The only point on which I should be happy, if you would inform me, in order that all proceedings in this affair should be conducted with clearness and perfect understanding on both sides, is this: In making use of the expression quoted above, does the executive of these United States perchance intend to convey the idea that he recognizes limits, which are not those expressly determined in the second article of the treaty between the two countries?

I think, sir, you will see that I am induced to put this question, by the interest which I take in preventing any equivocal or false interpretation which might lead to a disturbance of the friendly relations between the two governments. I am, sir, with due respect, your most obedient servant,

J. M. DE CASTILLO Y LANZAS.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Castillo.

Department of state, Washington, December 16, 1835.

Senor Don J. M. de Castillo y Lanzas, &c.

SIR: In answer to your letter of the 11th instant, I have the honor to inform you that remarks made by the president in a message to congress are not deemed a proper subject upon which to enter into explanation with the representative of a foreign government. I take occasion to add, however, that if there be any matter connected with the relations between our two countries, on which it may be interesting to you to receive further information than that conveyed in our conversation to which you refer, I shall be happy to afford it whenever your convenience permits you to visit me at this department.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Castillo.

Department of state, Washington, January 14, 1836.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has the honor to inform Mr. Castillo, charge d'affaires of the Mexican republic, in answer to his note of the 13th instant, that this department will avail itself of the occasion of the departure of Mr. Ellis for Mexico, which will take place immediately, to answer through him the communication of the acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic, dated the 19th of November last, and referred to in Mr. Castillo's note.

The undersigned embraces this opportunity to renew to Mr. Castillo the assurances of his high consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis.—Extract.

Department of state, Washington, January 29, 1836.

You will herewith receive my answer to a late communication of the acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic, complaining of the co-operation of citizens of the United States with the insurgents in Texas. You will deliver this letter to the minister of foreign affairs; and that you may understand the subjects to which it relates, you are herewith furnished with a copy of it, and of the correspondence between this department and Mr. Castillo concerning them.

Extract of a letter from the hon. John Forsyth to his excellency the acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic, dated

Department of state, Washington, January 29, 1836.

"The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has had the honor to receive the note of the 19th November, 1835, addressed to him by the acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic, and avails himself of the departure of Mr. Ellis, recently appointed charge d'affaires for Mexico, to transmit the answer to it, which the undersigned has been directed by the president of the United States to give.

"Both the subjects of that letter had been already acted upon when the note of the acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic was received, and the president instructs the undersigned to express his conviction that the course which has been adopted, while it has been dictated by a just regard to the interest of the United States, and his obligations under their laws, is entirely consistent with that sympathy for the Mexican republic, and that anxiety for its propriety which the United States has ever professed and felt, and by which their intercourse with it has been uniformly regulated. As to the first subject of complaint, the principles which have governed the United States in the contest between Spain and the Spanish American states, and in the numerous internal contests in Spanish America, are too well known to require explanation. So soon as it was apparent that the dispute between Texas and the dominant party in the other Mexican states would be carried to extremities, and indications were observed of a desire in some of the citizens of the United States to take part in the struggle, all the measures in his power were adopted by the president to prevent any interference that could by possibility involve the United States in the dispute, or give just occasion for suspicions of an unfriendly design on the part of this government to intermeddle in a domestic quarrel of a neighboring state. Notice was given to the Mexican charge d'affaires of the measures adopted, and the principles and course of the United States, distinctly and fully, and the undersigned trusts, satisfactorily explained to him. This has certainly been duly communicated to his government, and has, with equal certainty, satisfied the acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic that it is the determination of the executive of the United States to employ every measure permitted by our own laws for preventing, as far as possible, the injury a friendly nation might sustain from interference in a question entirely domestic. For the conduct of individuals, which the government of the United States cannot control, it is not in any respect responsible; and the Mexican government well understands how far the funds and the exertions, and the combined efforts of individuals may be made to contribute to the aid of parties in a foreign contest, without in the slightest degree implicating the government of this country. The acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic must be aware that all this preceded any official communication of the character of the contest going on, or of the precautions and regulations adopted by either party to it in the assertion of their respective pretensions, and that as yet the United States have not been distinctly informed of those adopted by the government of Mexico."

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Castillo.

Department of state, Washington, February 13, 1836.

Senor Don J. M. de Castillo y Lanzas, &c.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, had the honor to receive the note of Mr. J. M. de Castillo y Lanzas, charge d'affaires of the Mexican republic, dated the 4th instant. The acting minister of foreign affairs of the Mexican republic having, by his communication of the 19th of November last, thought proper to address himself directly to the undersigned concerning the differences with Texas, the undersigned deems it unnecessary at present to continue a correspondence with Mr. Castillo on those subjects. In pursuance of the intention expressed in his note to Mr. Castillo of the 14th ultimo, the undersigned has made Mr. Ellis, who will soon be in Mexico, the bearer of the answer of this department to the communication of the acting minister of foreign affairs. Mr. Ellis has also been instructed to acquaint the Mexican government that he is ready to pursue the further discussion of the business at the Mexican capital, if it should be thought necessary. The undersigned will, however, be happy to renew the discussion with Mr. Castillo, if, in the opinion of the Mexican government, there should be any sufficient reasons for such a course, and if Mr. Castillo should be specially instructed to that effect.

The undersigned renews to Mr. Castillo the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Brown.

Department of state, Washington, February 24, 1836.

SIR: I enclose an extract of a letter addressed to the president of the United States, and referred by him to this department, relative to the enlistment of men at Nashville for the Texas service by a certain major Miller. You are requested to satisfy yourself by proper inquiries; and should you find that either he or any other person has, in regard to the transaction therein referred to, violated the laws, you will, without loss of time, institute such proceedings as may be necessary to bring the offender to punishment.

It is to be presumed, however, that you will have done what your duty required, without waiting for instructions from this department. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

William T. Brown, U. S. attorney, Nashville, Tennessee.

Extract of a letter from W. H. Hunt, dated

Nashville, Feb. 10, 1836.

"A certain major Miller, of the Texas service, has recently been in this place, obtaining recruits, and has enticed away young men, even when in debt to their employers, who would otherwise have complied with their engagements.

"In an instance of that kind I have applied to the U. States attorney for this district, who says he has received no instructions from you on the subject. I beg that you will immediately issue those instructions, as this course of the Texas recruiting officers is highly injurious to the citizens of the U. States."

[TRANSLATION.]

Washington, April 4, 1836.

To the hon. John Forsyth, secretary of state of the U. States:

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, has read with pain in some of the newspapers published in Tennessee and Kentucky, that Felix Huston, esq. of Natchez, is actually engaged, in the former of those states, in enlisting, clothing and arming, at his own expense, a corps of volunteers, the number of which is expected to be no less than five hundred, with whom he proposes to march to Texas in the beginning of the ensuing month of May, in order to increase the forces of the rebel colonists.

Such at least is the deduction to be drawn from a letter of his published in several of the newspapers, of which the undersigned has the honor to send one to the honorable John Forsyth, secretary of state of these United States, in order that, having seen it, the federal government may take such measures as, in its conception, may appear sufficient to arrest the plan which Huston proposes to carry into execution, in contempt of the laws of the country itself, as well as of the most obvious and acknowledged principles of international law.

The undersigned might also denounce to Mr. Forsyth other acts of the same nature which are now in progress in the said states of Tennessee and Kentucky, in consequence, no doubt, of the sort of crusade which has been preached there by persons calling themselves commissioners from Texas; among others, the project of raising a company at Nashville at the expense of the ladies of that city. But as the undersigned has had the satisfaction of knowing that some of these acts have already attracted the notice of the American government, and have merited its disapprobation, he does not consider it necessary to spend more time at present in enumerating and complaining of evils which may perhaps have been already, in a great measure, remedied—thanks to the equity and foresight of the department of state.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, avails himself of this opportunity to repeat to the honorable John Forsyth, secretary of state of these United States, the assurances of his esteem and high consideration.

M. E. DE GOROSTIZA.

[TRANSLATION.]

Washington, March 9, 1836.

To the hon. J. Forsyth, &c. &c.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, has seen in the Globe of yesterday, with a degree of regret equal to his surprise, that in the instructions addressed by the secretary of war to general Gaines on the 25th of April last, that general Gaines has been authorised, in case of necessity, to advance with his troops to Nacogdoches, "which old fort" says the secretary of war, "is within the limits of the United States as claimed by this government."

The undersigned cannot form any conjecture with certainty as to the ground on which the American government believes that Nacogdoches would be within the limits of the United States, when the dividing line between the two countries, determined by the third article of the existing treaty, shall have been run and marked down, because, although the undersigned has consulted Melish's map, published in Philadelphia, and improved in 1818—the only authority on the matter which the Mexican government will recognise agreeably to the treaty—he has not been able to find any other thing than that Nacogdoches is situated several miles beyond the Sabine river, and consequently far within the indisputable territory of Mexico.

The undersigned is, moreover, not aware that any claim of this nature has ever been advanced on the part of the American government; and this appears so much the more strange to him, as the undersigned, before leaving Mexico, was enabled to examine all the correspondence which had for many years been carried on between the two governments on the subject of limits, and does not recollect to have found any thing there contradicting his assertion, unless it be the solitary and vague indication contained in Mr. Butler's note of the 21st December, 1834, already mentioned by the undersigned in one of his late communications. The undersigned, in consequence, finds himself now under the sad necessity of addressing the honorable John Forsyth, secretary of state of the United States, for the purpose of protesting against the authorisation given to general Gaines to go with his troops to Nacogdoches, because he considers it essentially, and with regard to its possible effects, as a positive violation of the territory which is known to be Mexican.

The undersigned had the honor already, on the 23d and 28th of April last, to inform Mr. Forsyth under what point of view he considered the communication made to him by the secretary of state in the conference held on the 20th of that month; and if he, in a manner, engaged to await the orders of his government on the subject, it was assuredly not because he yielded his right, but because neither, from the memorandum of the conference, nor from the written communications of Mr. Forsyth, could the undersigned having gathered that general Gaines had already been instructed as to the ground which he might overrun with his troops, and the point where he was to stop.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to the honorable John Forsyth the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

M. E. DE GOROSTIZA.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Gorostiza.

Department of state, Washington, 9th April, 1836.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has received the note which Mr. Gorostiza, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, did him the honor to address to him on the 4th instant, accompanied by extracts from newspapers, showing that, in despite of the laws of their country, Felix Huston, esq. of Natchez, contemplated raising and equipping troops, and that a company was to be raised at the expense of the ladies of Nashville, to aid the Texans. Mr. Gorostiza also intimates that other projects of a like character are on foot in Tennessee and Kentucky, and requests that such measures as may be necessary to arrest them may be taken by this government.

Mr. Gorostiza is aware that the attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Tennessee has already been instructed to prosecute any persons in his district who have offended, or who may offend, in the manner complained of. He will likewise be directed to do whatever may be necessary and proper to frustrate the schemes of Mr. Huston and the ladies of Nashville, and the attorneys of the United States for Mississippi and Kentucky will be enjoined to enforce the law against similar wrong-doers within the jurisdiction of their districts.

The undersigned offers to Mr. Gorostiza renewed assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His ex^{ty} Don Manuel Eduardo de Gorostiza, &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Sanders.

Department of state, Washington, 9th April, 1836.

SIR: It appears from an article in the Western Journal, containing what purports to be an extract of a letter of Felix Huston, esq. of Natchez, that he is in the act of raising and equipping a volunteer company for military service in Texas.

You are requested to satisfy yourself by proper inquiries; and should you find that either he, or any other person, has, in regard to the transaction alluded to, violated the laws within the Kentucky district, you will institute such proceedings as may be necessary to bring the offender to punishment. You will also see the laws enforced with respect to any other similar violation of the neutral relations of the United States.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, JOHN FORSYTH.
Lewis Sanders, esq. U. S. attorney, Frankfort, Kentucky.
Same to Richard M. Gaines, esq. U. S. attorney, Natchez, Miss.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Grundy

Department of state, Washington, 9th April, 1836.

SIR: It has been represented to this department that a volunteer company is in the act of being raised and equipped at Nashville, for military service in Texas. This also appears from an article quoted as having been published in the Kentucky Gazette.

You are requested to satisfy yourself, by proper inquiries, as to the truth of this representation; and should you find that any persons have, in regard to the transaction alluded to, violated the laws, you will institute such proceedings as may be necessary to bring them to punishment.

Enclosed is the copy of a letter addressed, on a similar occasion, to your late predecessor, Mr. Brown. I am, sir, your obedient servant, JOHN FORSYTH.

James P. Grundy, esq. U. S. attorney, Nashville, Tennessee.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Gorostiza.

Department of state, Washington, April 11, 1836.

The secretary of state, in reply to Mr. Gorostiza's note of the 10th instant, on the subject of the publication of the memorandum of the conference of the 20th of April, has the honor to inform him that the communication of the memorandum to a committee of congress, by the department of war, was made without the knowledge of the department of state; that the memorandum has not been published by any branch of this government; but has been made known incidentally, through the public journals, as a part of the proceeding of congress. How far, under these circumstances, a compliance with Mr. Gorostiza's request to have the correspondence, which grew out of the memorandum of the 20th of April, made known, is required by justice to Mexico or her representative, is rendered unnecessary by the call which has just been made by the house of representatives, including that correspondence; which call will be answered as soon as the papers can be prepared. The secretary of state hopes that, in the mean time, the well-understood devotion of Mr. Gorostiza to his country will shield him from the effects of any injurious misconception.

The secretary of state embraces this opportunity to offer Mr. Gorostiza renewed assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His ex^{ty} senor Don Manuel Eduardo de Gorostiza.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Gorostiza.

Memorandum for Mr. Gorostiza of what was said to him by Mr. Forsyth in their conference on the 20th April, 1836.

Mr. Forsyth stated to Mr. Gorostiza that, in consequence of the contest in Texas, the movements of some citizens of the United States on the Red river, and apprehended hostile intentions of those Indians in Mexico against the United States, and of the Indians within the United States against Mexico, orders would be given to general Gaines, to take such a position with the troops of the United States as would enable him to preserve the territory of the United States and of Mexico from Indian outrage, and the territory of the United States from any violation by the Mexicans, Texans or Indians, during the disturbance unfortunately existing in that quarter, and that the troops of the United States would be ordered to protect the commissioners and surveyors of the two governments, whenever they should meet to execute the instructions to be prepared under the treaty of limits between the United States and the United Mexican States. Should the troops, in the performance of their duty, be advanced beyond the point Mexico might suppose was within the territory of the United States, the occupation of the position was not to be taken as an indication of any hostile feeling, or of a desire to establish a possession or claim not justified by the treaty of limits. The occupation would be precautionary and provisional, and would be abandoned whenever (the line being run, and the true limits marked) the disturbances in that region should cease; they being the only motive for it.

21st April, 1836.

[TRANSLATION.]

Reply of the undersigned, Manuel Eduardo de Gorostiza, to the communication made to him verbally by Mr. Forsyth, in the conference between them held on the 20th of April, 1836, at the department of state; of which conference he received a memorandum from the said department, on the 21st of the same month.

In the conference of the 20th of April Mr. Forsyth thought proper to communicate to the undersigned a certain measure which the American government proposed to take respecting the affairs of Texas; and the undersigned immediately considering that communication of great importance, frankly acknowledged his imperfect acquaintance with the English language, and requested Mr. Forsyth, with a view to prevent any misunderstanding on the part of the undersigned, to do him the honor to repeat to him in writing, and in form of a simple memorandum, what he had just communicated. Mr. Forsyth acceded to this request, with his accustomed politeness, and on the ensuing day sent to the undersigned the memorandum requested.

From this memorandum it appears that Mr. Forsyth stated to the undersigned at the said conference, that, in consequence of the contest in Texas, the movements of some citizens of the United States on the Red river, and apprehended hostile intentions of the Indians in Mexico against the United States, and of the Indians within the United States against Mexico, orders would be given to general Gaines to take such a position with the troops of the United States as would enable him to preserve the territory of the United States and of Mexico from Indian outrages, and the territory of the United States from any violation by the Mexicans, Texans or Indians, during the disturbance unfortunately existing in that quarter; that the troops of the United States would be ordered to protect the commissioners and surveyors of the two governments whenever they should meet to execute the instructions to be prepared under the treaty of limits between the United States and the United Mexican States; that, should the troops, in performance of their duty, be advanced beyond the point Mexico might suppose was within the territory of the United States, the occupation of the position was not to be taken as an indication of any hostile feeling, or of a desire to establish a possession or claim not justified by the treaty of limits. The occupation would be precautionary and provisional; and that the position would be abandoned whenever (the line being run, and the true limits marked) the disturbances in that region should cease; they being the only motive for it.

With regard to the first point, the undersigned acknowledges the justice of the views of the government of the United States, in desiring to preserve its territory from any species of violation, and no observation can be made on the subject, as long as general Gaines remains within the known limits of the United States. He, however, thinks it his duty to observe to Mr. Forsyth, availing himself with pleasure of this opportunity, that the Mexican government recognizes the sacredness of the territory of every neighboring nation too much not to have given the most particular orders to the commanders of the national troops in Texas to respect and cause to be respected the frontiers of the territory of the United States. He also avails himself of this opportunity to express thanks, in the name of his government, for the instruction given to general Gaines to preserve the Mexican territory from the outrages of the Indians of the United States; and he flatters himself that, in like manner, and in accordance with this principle of equity and good feeling towards Mexico, orders will be given at the same time to that general to oppose the entrance into Texas of any American citizen who may attempt to pass the frontiers armed, or as a colonist, for the purpose of joining the ranks of the rebels.

The undersigned considers it also very proper (conveniente) that general Gaines' troops should protect, in case of need, the operations of the commissioners and surveyors, who are to settle and mark the dividing line between the two countries, and to meet for that purpose at Natchitoches within one year from the 20th of April, 1836, the date of the signature of the convention imposing that obligation; and the undersigned can moreover immediately give assurance that the Mexican troops will also contribute to the same object, whenever it may be deemed necessary, as the interests of the two governments are the same, and as they are consequently equally called on to do whatever may be requisite for carrying it into effect well and speedily.

But with regard to the supposition contained in the third point of the communication, the undersigned cannot conceive that it could be realized, being, as he is persuaded, that the government of the United States cannot desire to insist upon an act which, if done, would be clearly injurious to the rights and interests of an independent and friendly nation. The undersigned conceives that any position which general Gaines may take beyond the known limits of the United States cannot be upon ground other than that belonging to the Mexican territory, and which should belong to it, until the commissioners and surveyors (the sole judges in the affair by the treaty of 1823) should decide against Mexico, and adjudge a portion of that territory to the United States, on the ground that it is comprehended within the line agreed upon. In the mean time, Mexico has in its favor the right of a constant possession, during which it has exercised there all the acts of sovereignty, has legislated, has appointed the authorities, has kept garrisons, has disposed of lands, &c.

And if it be said that the United States have, at periods since the cession of Louisiana, claimed such or such parts of Texas, or that there are still doubts as to the nature or denomination of such or such locality, the third article of the treaty of 1823 puts an end to all pretensions of the contracting parties, by fixing a dividing line, and confiding to arbiters, by giving them the power to lay down that line, the faculty of resolving all doubts, and removing all difficulties. With them, therefore, rests the decision, and it is only after such decision that the present in statu quo can justly terminate. This was doubtless the understanding of Mr. Butler, the charge d'affaires of the United States, when urging the minister of [foreign] relations of Mexico on the 21st December, 1834, respecting the necessity of speedily carrying into effect the said third article of the treaty of limits, he added, "he would only observe, that Mexico was actually occupying a large territory, which the government of the undersigned considered as justly belonging to the citizens of the United States, according to the rational construction of all the treaties concluded on the subject; and as it was well known that not only the government of Mexico, but that of the United States had already granted a large part of this territory to various natives and foreigners, the prompt conclusion of this affair became every day more urgent."

Can there be a more explicit confession than this of Mr. Butler's, respecting the possession by Mexico of the part which he considered to belong to the citizens of the United States, and of his conviction that the only means of legally terminating the state of things of which he complained was by carrying the treaty into full effect?

That the measure in question would not only affect the rights of Mexico as an independent nation, but also injure its interests, it is most easy to prove. The presence of a body of neutral troops in the very theatre of the war cannot fail to embarrass the operations of the Mexican army to favor the Texans indirectly, and to create a constant risk of collision. The farther general Gaines advances, the more restricted will be the circle within which the belligerents can move, and the greater will be the necessity for approaching the cordon formed by the troops of the United States. And in a country so vast and unpeopled as Texas, how impossible will it be to determine well the line of such a cordon, by a chain of military posts linked together. Who can then prevent the Texans, if they find themselves pursued at any time by Mexican detachments, from taking refuge behind the troops of the United States, by passing a line which is unguarded? How can the Mexicans know where they are to stop so as not to violate the said line? And what will the troops of the United States do with the Texans who thus in a manner place themselves under their protection, or with the Mexicans, who, impelled by the ardor of the fight, should pursue in order to take them? The undersigned shudders at the idea of the evils which the slightest incident may occasion in either of these cases, to two countries which have so many motives for esteeming each other, and whose relations are now so frank and so amicable.

If the undersigned cannot now admit (as he has shown, and for reasons which he has given), the supposition that general Gaines may take a position on a territory possessed by Mexico, until the dividing line between the two countries be marked out according to the terms of the 3d article of the treaty of limits, how can he admit the supposition with which Mr. Forsyth's communication ends?

That general Gaines should not abandon the position taken, even though it be included within the assigned limits of Mexico, until the disturbances of Texas should cease, would be equal to a real military occupation of a part of the territory of Mexico, and to an indirect intervention in its domestic affairs; and the United States can by no means desire this, nor view it with satisfaction, considering the state of their existing relations with Mexico.

The undersigned concludes by hoping that the American government will take these remarks into consideration, and that no case will occur which might authorize general Gaines to assume the advanced position to which this reply alludes.

M. E. DE GOROSTIZA.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Gorostiza.

Mr. Forsyth's informal reply to Mr. Gorostiza's answer to the memorandum of the conference between them on the 20th instant.

Mr. Gorostiza has obviously not comprehended clearly the observations made to him by Mr. Forsyth on the 20th instant, or he would not have thought it necessary to make the extended reply which has been informally submitted. Mr. Gorostiza seems to take it for granted that general Gaines will be ordered to take a position in Texas on territory known to be beyond the limits of the United States. By referring to the paper given to him at his request, Mr. Gorostiza will see that the expression is, "should the troops of the United States, in performance of this duty, be advanced beyond the point Mexico might suppose was within the territory of the United States, the occupation of the position," &c. &c.

This notice to Mr. Gorostiza was not intended to express the intention to occupy a post within the acknowledged known limits of Mexico, but apprise Mexico that if gen. Gaines should occupy a position supposed by each government to be within its limits, that occupation would not be used either as the foundation of a claim or to strengthen a claim—the sole purpose being to enable this government to do its duty to itself and to Mexico; and the concluding paragraph with respect to the abandonment of any post thus occupied which might be found within the territory of Mexico was intended to convey the information that that abandonment would take place as soon as that fact was ascertained, unless the disturbed condition of the country at that time should render its continued possession indispensable to the safety of the United States, and under circumstances which would justify the occupation, if not in the judgment of the Mexican government itself, at least in that of every impartial power. Mr. Gorostiza must not understand that the government of the United States intends to interfere in any manner in the disturbances of its neighbors. The troops of general Gaines will be employed only in protecting the interests of the United States and those of the Mexican territory, according to the obligations of the treaty between the two powers. Whether the territory beyond the United States belongs to the Mexican government, or the newly declared Texian state, is a question into which the United States does not propose to enter. It is a territory protected by the treaty of limits between Spain and the United States, subsequently recognised by the treaty between Mexico and the United States. In this view it will be considered; and while this government sees with great regret the sanguinary struggle which is carried on there, it does not permit itself to look to the result, being prepared, whatever that may be, rigidly to perform its own engagements.

JOHN FORSYTH.

Washington, 26th April, 1836.

Translation of a letter from the Mexican minister.

Washington, April 28, 1836.

To the hon. J. Forsyth, secretary of state.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, having received the reply addressed to him informally on the 26th instant, by the honorable John Forsyth, secretary of state of the United States, to his answer to the memorandum of the conference held on the 20th instant, has the honor now to assure the secretary of state, with the utmost sincerity, that he has never for a moment entertained the idea that the United States could seek to interfere in any way in the disturbances of their neighbors; and that, on the contrary, he had been induced, by his conviction of the rectitude of the principles which have at all times guided the policy of this government, to extend his reply somewhat beyond the bounds assigned by custom to that class of documents; being assured that all other considerations would be unnecessary, as soon as the undersigned shall succeed in demonstrating to Mr. Forsyth how just it was to Mexico, and how mutually convenient for both countries, that, in the present state of things in Texas, former possession should be the only rule for the mutual determination of respective limits, until the commissioners and surveyors shall have marked out the true dividing line.

Fortunately, if the undersigned has rightly comprehended Mr. Forsyth's reply, the opinion of the secretary of state coincides essentially on this point with that of the undersigned, so far as regards the assurance that general Gaines' troops will not take a position on any ground known to be beyond the limits of the United States; and as a natural consequence from this principle, that such position can in no case be on ground previously possessed by Mexico, and of course within its known limits. The undersigned would thank Mr. Forsyth to have the kindness to let him know whether he has been mistaken on this point, in order that, if not, he may immediately inform his government accordingly, and communicate to it this new proof of the justice and good faith which characterize the American government in all its relations with Mexico.

The undersigned, as little as Mr. Forsyth desires to enter into the question, apparently so obvious, whether the territory of Texas, which lies adjacent to the United States, belongs to Mexico and to the Mexicans born in Texas, or to the foreigners who have risen in insurrection there. Nor does he consider it proper at present to insist upon discussing hypothetically what might be suitable for both countries, after the line shall have been marked, with respect to the position which the troops of the United States may then occupy, as the undersigned has reason to hope that the necessity for the said occupation will ere that time have disappeared, and as even, though this should unfortunately not be the case, it is by no means probable that the Mexican government will consider the question then occurring in a light different from that in which it would be viewed by any impartial power.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, avails himself of this opportunity to renew to the honorable Mr. Forsyth, secretary of state of the United States, the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

M. E. DE GOROSTIZA.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Gorostiza.

Department of state, Washington, May 3, 1836.

In reply to Mr. Gorostiza's informal note of the 25th ult. Mr. Forsyth has the honor to state that, except in case of necessity, general Gaines will not occupy ground not indisputably within the limits of the United States. In case of necessity, whether the possession of the ground he may occupy is now, or has heretofore been, claimed by Mexico, cannot be made a question by that officer, he will take it to perform his duties to the United States, and to fulfil the obligations of the United States, to Mexico. The just and friendly purpose for which he does occupy it (if he should do so) being beforehand explained to Mexico, it is expected will prevent either belief or suspicion of any hostile or equivocal design on his part. It is not intended to be the assertion of a right of property or possession. Whether the post occupied shall prove to be in Mexico or the United States, it will be abandoned whenever the necessity ceases by the restoration of tranquility to that distracted neighborhood.

Mr. Forsyth avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Gorostiza the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His exc'y senor D. Manuel E. de Gorostiza, &c. &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

Washington, May 4, 1836.

To the hon. John Forsyth.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, has learnt with sincere regret, from the informal note which the hon. John Forsyth, secretary of state of these United States, did him the honor to address to him on the 3d instant, that the American government has not thought proper to take into consideration the observations which the undersigned believed it his duty to direct to the department of state on the 23d and 28th of April last, respecting the position which the troops of general Gaines might assume in a certain case therein stated; and that consequently the question as regards the United States still remains the same as Mr. Forsyth considered it to be in the conference of the 20th of April. The undersigned, therefore, conceives that nothing is left for him to do, except to inform his government of the determination of the American government, and to await its orders. This he will do by the first opportunity, transmitting to the minister of [foreign] relations of the republic of Mexico literal copies of the correspondence which has passed on the subject between the department of state and this legation extraordinary.

The undersigned will only add, that it would be very desirable, in any event, that the general-in-chief of the national army in Texas might receive, in proper time, from his government, the necessary instructions with regard to the possible advance of general Gaines beyond the known limits of these United States, as the former would thus know the real object of such an advance in case it did take place, and would then adopt, without doubt, such measures as might be within his attributes and faculties, for avoiding on his part any cause of discontent or quarrel (compromiso) between two nations so intimately friendly as the two republics.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, has the honor to repeat to the honorable John Forsyth, secretary of state of these United States, the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

M. E. DE GOROSTIZA.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Gorostiza.

Department of state, Washington, May 10, 1836.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States having submitted the note of Mr. Gorostiza, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Mexican republic, of the 9th instant, to the president, has now the honor, by his instructions, to reply. The president did not expect that any orders given by his authority would have produced either surprise or regret in the mind of a representative of a friendly power. He observes, however, that Mr. Gorostiza has not perceived the peculiar force of the terms used by the authority of the executive. General Gaines is not authorized to advance to Nacogdoches, but he is ordered not to go beyond that point. To Mr. Gorostiza the distinction may not seem to be so, but in the view of the president it is important. The terms used limit the authority given, and were chosen with the express intention to avoid misconstruction of the motive of the advance. To effect one of the great objects for which general Gaines is sent to the frontier, i. e. to fulfil our treaty with Mexico, by protecting its territory against the Indians within the United States, the troops of the United States might justly be sent into the heart of Mexico, and their presence, instead of being complained of, would be the strongest evidence of fidelity to engagements and friendships to Mexico. Nor could the good faith and friendship of the act be doubted if troops of the United States were sent into the Mexican territory to prevent emboldened Mexican Indians, justly suspected of such design, from assailing the frontier settlements of the United States. With the full explanation of the design of the movement as far as Nacogdoches, if it should be made, which it is hoped will not be necessary, the president did not apprehend that any room was left for dissatisfaction or complaint; and he thinks that the course Mr. Gorostiza has thought it his duty to pursue is the result of an apprehension of consequences that cannot ensue if all the parties are just to the designs and pretensions of each other. Mr. Gorostiza's protest obviously springs from the idea that the advance of general Gaines is to be founded on a claim of territory by the United States; and hence his anxiety to argue the question of right to the possession of Nacogdoches and the territory in its vicinity. Contrary to his wish, the president finds himself compelled to require the undersigned to remind Mr. Gorostiza that Mexico is not in possession of the territory bordering on the U. States, wherever the true line may be. Whether the government of Mexico will obtain, and can maintain possession of it, are questions now at issue by the most sanguinary arbitrament. Until they are decided, the undersigned understands Mr. Gorostiza to maintain that the possession of Texas is the possession of Mexico, and that any advance upon the territory claimed as part of Texas by its self-constituted authorities is considered essentially and in its effects a positive violation of the known territory of Mexico. The Mexican government must be aware that portions of the territory ever admitted to belong, as well as that claimed to belong to the United States, are represented in the Texian government. The known territory of the U. States is, then, now violated by Mexico, since the government of Mexico is, upon the principle involved, responsible for this usurpation of a right over the jurisdiction of the United States, and this attempt to limit the extent of their territorial possession. This fact of itself would justify an advance of general Gaines to any point necessary to the vindication of the rights of the United States, or to retort an injury upon Mexico, (or Texas, which ever is responsible), for the original wrong. But the president has not designed to vindicate a right, or retort a wrong, in the orders that have been given. He looks forward patiently to the period, which cannot be far distant, when the territorial rights of the United States will, according to long existing specifications, be authoritatively designated and marked by competent and trustworthy agents, so as to leave no room for further cavil and dispute; and in the meanwhile he desires to occupy no position by military force which the circumstances by which the general commanding the troops of the United States is surrounded do not justify.

The undersigned is instructed further to reply to Mr. Gorostiza, that the claims of the United States are founded upon the treaty of limits, and are to be maintained by the treaty of limits. If the true demarcation, according to that treaty, has not been fully made known to Mexico, it is because there has been, on the part of that government, a delay to proceed to the execution of that instrument. Questions belonging to the duties of the commissioners and surveyors could not be properly presented or considered until they met to enter upon those duties. A correspondence between the United States and Mexico for the adoption of the treaty of limits made between Spain and the U. States was no place to look for traces of the pretensions of the two governments, founded on a construction of that instrument; nor were they likely to be found in the correspondence for the additional article to provide for carrying that treaty into effect. It could only be when in the course of execution that the rival pretensions of the parties and the conflicting constructions could arise. To discuss them in advance would have been useless, if not suspicious. It is not, therefore, surprising that Mr. Gorostiza should have risen from the perusal of the correspondence to which he refers, without accurate knowledge of the claims of the United States. The undersigned is constrained, however, to express his surprise at the apparent want of information on this subject, derivable from other sources, in the Mexican envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. The indication in Mr. Butler's note of the 21st December, 1834, was, of itself, sufficiently distinct to have elicited inquiry. If not made, it is presumed it was because the allusion was understood. Whatever may have been done or omitted prior to that time, it is certain that want of information on this point, since November last, cannot be complained of by the Mexican government. The undersigned had the honor to give to the Mexican charge d'affaires, Mr. Castillo, in a conference in that month, the most distinct intimation of the claims and expectations of the government of the United States, under the treaty of limits and the additional article—a conference which the undersigned has supposed was the chief cause of the subsequent extraordinary mission of Mr. Gorostiza to the United States.

The undersigned is instructed by the president to decline any discussion, at present, of the claims or pretensions of the United States to the territory in question. The appropriate occasion for advancing them is approaching. The United States are preparing, and will hasten to be ready to execute, in perfect good faith, the treaty, according to the second additional article lately agreed upon, and they expect that Mexico will be equally prompt. Whatever the United States cannot maintain by reason and facts, according to a just construction of the treaty of limits, will not be insisted upon. In the mean time, the undersigned is instructed to report, in the most explicit terms, for the satisfaction of the Mexican government, that the orders given to general Gaines were not given because the United States believed they had claims to the territory beyond Nacogdoches, nor with a view to assert, strengthen, or maintain those claims, but simply and exclusively to prevent consequences likely to grow out of the bloody contest begun in that quarter, the end of which it is difficult to foresee.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to reiterate to Mr. Gorostiza the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

His excellency Don Manuel E. de Gorostiza, &c. &c.

Mexican legation extraordinary, in the U. S. of America.
Washington, May 10, 1836.

To the hon. John Forsyth, &c.

Sir: If the publication by itself of the memorandum containing the communication made to me by you in the conference of April 20th could have no other bad effect than to place me, as it has placed me, in a very disagreeable position with regard to the American public, I might perhaps, willingly sacrifice my own self-love, and pass by this circumstance, in order not thereby to involve farther an affair which is unfortunately becoming too complicated already. But you, Mr. Secretary of state, must know that the effects of this publication will not end there; and that from my apparent silence, it has been inferred, even in congress, that I have assented to the measure adopted by the United States, or, at least, that I have made no observations in opposition to it. This you, sir, know is not the case. You must also be aware that, if the newspapers which have entered upon this subject should by chance arrive in my country before my communications reach it, I might appear in the eyes of my fellow citizens, although but for a moment, under a light by no means favorable.

For these reasons, and having good grounds for confiding in the equity of this government, I am under the necessity of requiring you, sir, to adopt such means as you may consider most proper to rectify an error which may do me so much injury, as the representative of the Mexican republic in these United States.

I avail myself of this opportunity, Mr. Secretary of state, to repeat to you the assurances of my high consideration.

M. E. DE GOROSTIZA.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Department of war, May 14, 1836.

Sir: In conformity with the resolution of the house of representatives of the 10th instant, I have the honor to transmit copies of all the orders and instructions of this department, and all the correspondence on its files relating to the defence of the western frontier of the United States.

Every measure taken or authorised by the executive upon this subject is disclosed by these documents. Agreeably to your views of the resolution, I have not sent copies of the instructions from the quartermaster general to the officers of his department, in order to execute the memorandum of May 9th for that officer. They contain merely the usual official directions, in detail, for carrying the orders into effect.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant, LEW. CASS.

The president of the United States.

The principal documents referred to by the secretary of war have been heretofore published. The following letter from gen. Macomb is perhaps the only additional communication of interest:

New Orleans, La. April 25, 1836.

Hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war.

Sir: I arrived here the day before yesterday. It was not long after my arrival that I had the honor of seeing his excellency the governor of the state, and learned from him that general Gaines had made a requisition on him for a brigade of volunteers, partly to be mounted and partly on foot. This force the general deemed necessary to be employed in checking the Caddo Indians, who, he had been informed, were about entering Texas to act against the citizens of that state, under the auspices of the Mexican authorities. The governor, examining the laws in reference to this call of general Gaines, conceived that he was not authorised by the laws of Louisiana, or those of the United States, to furnish the force called for; nor did he, from the information he had obtained, believe it necessary to send to the frontier of the state any troops, as the country was not invaded, nor likely, in his opinion, to be invaded, and, further, was impressed with the belief that it was a scheme of those interested in the Texian speculations, who had been instrumental in making Gaines believe that the Mexican authorities were tampering with the Indians within our boundaries, and at the same time exciting, by false representations here, the sympathies of the people in favor of the Texians, with a view of inducing the authorities of the United States to lend their aid in raising in this city a force composed of interested persons, which force should move to the Texian frontiers, under the call of general Gaines, and afterwards, under false pretensions, actually march into Texas, and take part in the war now raging between the Texians and the government of Mexico; and all this at the expense of the United States, and consequently with the implied sanction of the government; thus giving to the people of Texas the hope of relying on the government of the United States for their protection and support, and to the government of Mexico a positive evidence that the United States were actually engaged, contrary to the treaty stipulations, in a war against that government.

If I understand the instructions of gen. Gaines, as communicated to him before I left Washington, it was his duty to see that the treaty stipulations with Mexico were fulfilled; and further, as it regarded the contending parties, to preserve a perfect neutrality.

I met here col. Darrington, who was formerly in the army, and who gave me the information which you will find in the enclosed printed paper.

He is of the opinion that the Caddo Indians cannot be concerned in attacking the Texians, and that they are but few in number, and quite insignificant.

Gen. Gaines has at his disposal the 3d, 6th and 7th regiments of infantry, and the whole of the regiment of dragoons, which I should think sufficient, if he will properly dispose of them, to enable him to fulfil his instructions without calling for the brigade of volunteers from Louisiana.

From what I can discover, it appears to me that it would be better to extend our military establishment at once to 20,000 men, instead of 10,000, as it has been proposed. The conduct of the Seminoles will have its influence with the other nations and tribes; and knowing the restlessness of the Indians, and their proneness to war, I am persuaded it will be most prudent, as well as most economical, to raise and keep up at once a force capable of effecting promptly any course proper to be pursued towards the Indians or blacks in case of insurrection, and at the same time to defend the maritime frontier against foreign attack. I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

ALEXANDER MACOMB,
Maj. gen. commanding-in-chief.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES. From the accounts published to-day, it will be seen that the Indians in Florida and on the Georgia and Alabama frontiers are committing the most horrid barbarities upon the white inhabitants, and that the war has assumed a character that will require the most vigorous efforts to suppress it, and, that even if the campaign against them is actively prosecuted, not until many valuable lives are lost and much property sacrificed; for the Indians appear to be infuriated and actuated by a deep seated feeling of revenge. This feeling, with the consciousness that they will not be permitted to occupy their present territory in future, will make them struggle to the last; and hence a war of extermination on one side, and uncompromising resistance on the other, that will be pregnant with bloody incidents.

Much dissatisfaction is expressed in Florida at the conduct of gen. Scott, in abandoning the territory to the unrestrained depredations of the Indians; and so great was the indignation toward that officer at Tallahassee, that his effigy was publicly hung and burnt in that city on the 11th inst.

We also see it stated, that gen. Clinch, one of our most experienced officers in the Indian mode of warfare, has, on the ground that injustice has been done him on a question of rank, tendered his resignation to the president, which he has refused to accept.

The most vigorous efforts are making to concentrate all the disposable troops of the U. States, which were stationed on the Atlantic coast, in Florida and on the Georgia and Alabama frontier. Gen. Jessup, the present quartermaster general, has, as we learn from Washington, been ordered to the command of all the forces employed and to be employed in Alabama and Georgia against the Creeks.

We publish this week the report of the select committee of the senate of New York upon the stock-jobbing transactions of John C. Kemble and Isaac W. Bishop, two members of that body, which exhibits a tissue of moral and official misconduct without a parallel in the legislative history of this or any other country. The report has been before the senate for some time, and was again taken up on Saturday last, and after an animated discussion it was decided, in the first place, by a vote of 19 to 9, that the senate did possess the power to expel any of its members for moral and official misconduct—and in the second—by a vote of 21 to 7, that Isaac W. Bishop had been thus guilty—but it refused, 16 to 12, to vote the said Bishop "unworthy of a seat in that body."

The whole subject was then laid upon the table until Monday morning last, when Mr. S. Young presented the resignation of himself and Mr. M. Van Schaick, on the ground that the refusal of the senate to expel Bishop was calculated to "relax those moral principles which the author of our nature designed as the ligaments of society, and which law givers and judges should ever regard and maintain as holy and inviolate—and also to break the bonds by which alone honorable men can be held together."

After Mr. Young had presented his resignation, he asked leave to recall it in order that he might repel an imputation just cast upon him by a member: he then recapitulated the transaction alluded to, and the member who imputed misconduct to him expressing himself satisfied, the resignations were accepted. Mr. Bishop then appeared in his seat, and, after some preliminary remarks, also resigned in a letter addressed to the president of the senate, in which he represents himself as "sacrificed by designing accusers, who thought to extort money from his apprehensions."

The whole proceedings will be given in our next, as an interesting chapter in the history of the times.

VOL. L.—Sic. 16.

DEATH OF MR. LIVINGSTON. The New York papers announce the death of the hon. EDWARD LIVINGSTON, our late minister to France. He died on Monday afternoon, at his seat at Red Hook, after a short illness, induced by drinking cold water, while heated on Sunday.

MR. MADISON. We learn from the Fredericksburg Arena that this venerable patriot is lying dangerously ill.

The extra session of the legislature of Maryland, held with a view to the consideration of what is called the "internal improvement bill," which proposes to aid the Chesapeake and Ohio canal and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, by appropriations, commenced on Monday last. This is the first summer session since 1813, which was then held with the view of providing for any exigencies which might arise from the presence of the British fleet in the Chesapeake bay.

PENNSYLVANIA CANALS. According to the Harrisburgh Telegraph, two hundred and thirty-four thousand three hundred dollars and eighty-seven cents, have been received into the treasury of Pennsylvania for canal and rail road tolls, from the 1st day of November last to the 14th of May, the commencement of the present fiscal year.

The amount received in the different months, is as follows:

1835.	Canal.	Rail road.	Motive power.
November,	$12,441 62	$11,836 82	$10,433 08
December,	23,551 35	17,175 91	5,142 61
1836.
January,	8,915 29	12,116 17	6,710 21
February,	3,861 70	2,447 59	1,482 41
March,	1,939 65	3,454 66	1,729 70
April,	13,440 71	16,685 33	7,897 57

It is proper to remark, that from the amount of tolls actually paid into the treasury any month, no correct estimate can be formed of the amount of tolls actually received by the collectors, during that month, as their payments are made weekly, semi-weekly, monthly and quarterly, in proportion to the amount of business done at the different offices, and the facilities of deposit and transmission. For instance: During the month of April there was received at the collectors' offices, more than seventy thousand dollars, while the payments into the treasury only amounted to 38,000 dollars.

CORPORATED MANUFACTURING COMPANIES. The committee of incorporations in the legislature of Connecticut have reported a bill for a general law of incorporations for manufacturing companies. It allows any number of persons not less than five, to form a voluntary association for these purposes, provided the capital be not less than $10,000 nor more than $100,000. The shares of stock are to be $50 each and a certificate of the amount is to be deposited in the office of the secretary of state.

HEAVY LOADS. Gettysburg, (Pa.) May 23. Two teams of Mr. John Taughinbaugh, [his horses are tough-in-back as well as their master], of this county, drew from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, a few days ago, the astonishing weight of ninety hundred in each wagon!

BOOKS FOR THE BLIND. At a respectable meeting of the citizens of Clinton Hall, New York, on Monday evening, Mr. Gallatin in the chair, and Dr. Proudft, secretary. It was resolved to raise $10,000 by subscription for the purchase of suitable books (printed in raised characters) for the instruction of the blind throughout the United States.

Dr. Howe, the philanthropist and superintendent of the blind institution at Boston, gave an interesting account of these institutions and of the employments made at Boston in the printing of raised characters. He computed the number of blind in the United States at 8,000, and thought the sum proposed would be amply sufficient to supply their wants. Three of the pupils of the Boston institute, between 10 and 13 years of age, were present, and read with facility the raised characters, and translated French. One of the girls wrote an excellent hand. A committee to solicit donations were appointed, consisting of the following gentlemen:—Nathan Littlefield, Theodore Dwight, jr. Wm. L. Stone, Charles King, John W. Walker, professor Proudfit, Dr. Howe. Mr. Littlefield was appointed treasurer. Subscriptions will be received by any of the above named gentlemen.

SMALL POX. Important discovery. Dr. Luzenburg, a respectable physician of New Orleans, says he has discovered the cause and the remedy for the disfiguration of the face by the small pox. It is well known that the face is usually the only part of the body which is pitted and deformed by this disease; and Dr. Luzenburg says it is because this is the only part that is exposed to the action of light. He has ascertained by experiment that when the face, however covered with the pustules of this disease, is completely sheltered from the light, it will not be more marked than any other part which is thus protected.

RAIL ROADS IN EUROPE. The deputation from England, consisting of Dr. Bowring, Mr. Thomas and captain Pringle, who undertook to obtain the co-operation of the French and Belgian governments in the project of a great rail road to connect Paris and Brussels with London, have had, according to the late Paris papers, an interview with Louis Philippe. The king expressed his earnest desire that his government should lend its hearty co-operation for the furtherance of a project which he looked upon with the greatest interest, and to which he would lend his most cordial support.

THE LATE COMMODORE PERRY. The citizens of Buffalo are going to commemorate the battle of Lake Erie by erecting a monument to Perry in that city. The monument is to be 100 feet high, surmounted by a colossal statue of Perry, fifteen feet in height. On the sides of the pedestal, which is 34 feet square are to be sculptured relievos representing the battle of Lake Erie, and other prominent events in the life of the hero. The whole work will be constructed of American white marble, and cost $75,000. It is to be built by Frazee and Lannitz, of New York. The design is by Frazee. Its style and architectural character are purely Grecian.

The legislature of Rhode Island voted some twenty years ago to publish a biography of the hero of Lake Erie and appointed a gentleman to prepare it—which is the last we have heard of the subject.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT,

By and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Hopeful Toler, to be consul for the port of Buenos Ayres.

James H. Williams, to be consul for the port of Sydney, in New South Wales.

NEAPOLITAN INDEMNITY.

Treasury department, May 21, 1836.

The holders of the certificates under the Neapolitan treaty are hereby notified, that the proposed arrangement to pay a stipulated sum in full of all the future instalments due, has not been ratified by the king of the two Sicilies. But the instalment due on the 1st of June next, it is expected, will be punctually paid and remitted to this country; and in the mean time such disposition will be made of the certificates at the department, as the several claimants may be pleased to request.

Mr. Stevenson is to sail on his mission to England in the packet ship Montreal which departs for London on the first of June next—and about the same time, major Eaton is to proceed on his mission to the court of Madrid, and will go by the way of England. It is also stated that Mr. Wilkins, our minister to Russia will return during the ensuing summer.

A very destructive fire broke out in Albany, N. Y. on Thursday the 19th instant, which was not arrested until it consumed several dwellings and manufactories, by which nearly five hundred poor persons are deprived of employment.

A drug store and contents, the property of Messrs. N. Lenning, & Co. valued at upwards of one hundred thousand dollars, situated on Front st. Philadelphia, was destroyed by fire on Sunday morning last.

A RIGHTEOUS JUDGMENT. A cause involving questions deeply interesting to steamboat proprietors and the public, has occupied the circuit court, sitting at Albany. The suit was brought by John Smith, who, with his family, were on board the steamboat Advocate when she blew up, at Coeymans Landing, in May last. Three of Mr. Smith's children died of the injuries received, and his wife was seriously scalped.

The plaintiff claimed to recover on the ground that the boat was of a novel construction, and that the engineer and firemen were unskilful and incompetent men.

The summing up of the cause occupied the whole of yesterday. The counsel on both sides acquitted themselves with great ability. The jury was addressed by Salem Dutcher and Samuel Stevens, esqrs. for the defendants, and by A. L. Jordan and Dudley Marvin, esqrs. for the plaintiff.

P. S. The jury came into court this morning, and delivered a sealed verdict for the plaintiff of eight thousand dollars.

TEXAS BOUNTY LANDS. The following laws regulating the military bounty lands of Texas, to its citizens and volunteers, was adopted by the convention held at Washington, Texas, on the 17th March.

Whereas, many individuals of the United States have left their homes of peace and comfort, to volunteer in the service of this country, and endure the hardships and perils of the war, in the struggle of Mexican tyranny, and have by their generous patriotism and gallant conduct in the field, earned our warmest gratitude:

Resolved, That bounties of land be granted and are hereby granted to the said volunteers, as follows, viz:

To all who are now in service, and shall continue faithfully in service during the war—1,280 acres.

To all who served faithfully or shall have served faithfully for a period not less than six months—640 acres.

To all who served faithfully for a period not less than three months—320 acres.

To all who shall enter the service previous to the first day of July, and shall continue in service faithfully during the war, provided the war shall continue for a period more than six months—960.

To all who shall enter the service after the first of July, a quantity proportionate to their service—to be hereafter determined on by law.

The lawful heir or heirs of all such volunteers as may have fallen or may hereafter fall in the present contest with the Mexican government, or who may have died or may hereafter die from any accident while in the service of the country during the war, shall be entitled to the quantity of land which would have been due the deceased under the colonization law, as established by the laws of the land, had he have survived; that is to say: one league and lot, (or 460 acres), for a man of family, and one-third of a league (147 acres), for a single man; also that the said heir or heirs shall receive in addition to the land granted as aforesaid, a bounty of 640 acres, as decreed by the council at San Felipe on the 11th of December, 1835.

That every applicant for land under these claims shall present a certificate from the proper officer under whose command he served—of the time of his service and discharge, and such further evidence as may be sufficient, and the said evidence shall be presented to a land commissioner, or such proper agent as may be established by law, to establish the correctness of the claim. Further, that these claims may be located on any unappropriated or vacant lands in Texas, provided that no single grant shall be located in more than one body, nor any grant of 1,280 acres in any form than two equal squares; nor any grant of 960 acres in any other form than one square of 640 acres, and another square of 320 acres; nor any grant of 640 acres in any form other than a square the expenses of surveying, office fees, &c. to be borne by the claimant.

Resolved, That no bounty of land as herein specified, shall be construed so as to effect therights and privileges to lands under the colonization laws established by the law of the land, of any said volunteer more than if it never had been granted.

Resolved, That said volunteers shall, in case they may by error locate any of said claims previously held by legal titles or possession, be allowed to lift said location and again locate said claims upon any vacant lands in the republic.

The foregoing resolutions were adopted in the convention of Texas, at the town of Washington, on the 17th day of March, 1836.

In addition to the bounty, volunteers in the army of Texas receive the same pay and rations as soldiers in the regular army of the United States.

LAW CASE. From the Wheeling Times. At the late term of the federal court, judge Caldwell presiding, holden at Staunton on the 2d of this month, the trial of Peter Dingess came up on a charge of having passed counterfeit notes purporting to have been issued by the bank of the United States. Upon a full investigation, which lasted several days, the jury found the prisoner guilty of the offence, provided there was then in existence any law which punishes such an offence; upon this verdict the court gave judgment for the prisoner. There were several other indictments against this man for similar offences, and demurs being filed to all of them on the ground that the bank charter having expired, all further prosecution was at an end, and the court being of that opinion, the prisoner was discharged; but was forthwith taken into custody by the state authorities.

We understand it to be a principle of criminal law, that when a statute creates an offence, and defines its punishment, and is limited in its duration, no conviction can lawfully be had after the expiration of the statute, unless such an event be officially provided for. No such provision is contained in the bank charter.

This man being one of the principal chiefs of counterfeiters, and vendors of base money, it is to be regretted that he was not brought to trial during the existence of the law against which he has offended. His example in the country in which he resided must have been very pernicious. He possesses considerable property, is a colonel in the militia, and has been elected twice to the house of delegates by the citizens of Logan county where he resides.

Two of Dingess' confederates of equal consideration with himself, were arrested by the deputy marshals appointed for the purpose, but made their escape, and have left the country. Two others having a separate establishment were indicted, and held to bail, and shortly before court sat, left the state, their securities accompanying them. Four others have been sentenced for long periods, one to the penitentiary at Richmond, the others to the penitentiary in the District of Columbia.

These prosecutions have totally broken up the establishment for counterfeiting notes and bills on the bank of the United States, and on the various banks of Virginia, which had so long infested the south western part of this state.

Much credit is due to the marshal of this district for the plans laid by him to detect these men, and the address with which he carried them into execution. In this matter he has been engaged for two years past and has accomplished much for the security of society.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

The following are the latest accounts from the Georgia and Alabama frontier:

The National Intelligencer states that a letter from the governor of Georgia, under date of the 13th instant, to a member of congress, fully confirms the information received at the war department from major McIntosh and from other sources.

The following is major McIntosh's letter to the war department:

Fort Mitchell, May 9, 1836.

SIR: Hostilities have commenced in serious earnestness. Within a few days four individuals have been murdered, and it is feared many others have fallen victims. Yesterday I sent an interpreter to a few of the principal chiefs, requesting they would meet me in council at this place. They have failed to come. Ne-ah-math-la sent me word that he had said all he could to his people to restrain them, without effect. They were determined on war; and they had divided powder and lead, and embodied in a swamp near the Federal road, about five miles from this post, evidently with the intention of cutting off all communication between us and the governor of Alabama.

The interpreter says, Ne-ah-math-la had every thing in readiness for a move; that he (Ne-ah-math-la) inquired particularly about the strength of my command, and if any additional troops were expected. I am convinced it is his intention to head the hostile party.

The war-whoop is now sounding throughout the nation. Respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant, (Signed) J. S. MCINTOSH, major, 4th infantry.

Gen. R. S. Jones, adjutant gen. U. S. A. Washington, D. C.
From the Charleston Mercury of May 19.

Letter from our correspondent, dated Augusta, May 17. "The mail from Columbus arrived this afternoon about five o'clock. I received nothing printed beyond Milledgeville, and have not heard of any written intelligence in relation to Indian affairs.

"Three or four passengers in the stage from Columbus, among them Mr. —, agent for the post office department, report that two stage drivers and a stage agent had been murdered, and that col. Crowell's plantation, &c. had been destroyed. Mr. — leaves in the morning for Charleston, and if you should see him he will give you farther particulars."

We last evening saw and conversed with the gentleman above alluded to, who left Columbus on Sunday morning last at 7 o'clock, and from whom we derived the following information.

Extract of a letter from the post master at Columbus, to the post master general:

Columbus, Ga. Monday evening, May 16, 1836—at dark.

SIR: Two drivers have this morning arrived bringing the distressing intelligence that two stages containing five heavy leather mails, accompanied by a guard of six men, and several passengers, making in all 14 persons, were attacked this day about noon, 18 miles from this town, by a large body of Indians; and overpowered. The drivers left the stages, and have reached town. They know nothing of the guard or the passengers. I have employed fifty friendly Indians at an expense of $200 to go out to night and bring in the mails. They will start immediately, and by morning we shall know the fate of the mails. Very respectfully, J. VAN NESS, P. M.

It was reported at Columbus that the Indians had crossed over to the town of Roanoke, of which they had entire possession, and had in that neighborhood attacked and taken possession of the steamboat Georgian. It was not stated what depredations had been committed on this boat, but it was generally believed that nearly all on board had been murdered. The plantation of gen. Abercrombie, a few miles below Columbus, had been visited by the Indians, and all the buildings on it totally destroyed. But a few of the friendly Indians who had been requested to repair to Columbus had made their appearance, and it was therefore the general impression that the whole Indian nation was preparing for a general war.

From the Columbus Sentinel, May 13.

On Monday we received information that hostilities had commenced on the road between Columbus and Montgomery, at the Uchee bridge, and farther on, and in the evening the bridge at this place and the streets leading from it were thronged with the unfortunate refugees who were fleeing before their savage neighbors. The pitiable condition of many of them was past the power of description. Wives severed from their husbands, and parents from their children, all disarrayed, all terror stricken, presented a scene which we never again desire to witness. An interesting looking girl, just blooming into womanhood, was brought in on horseback behind a benevolent stranger who had found her in the nation making her way, unattended, to this place. She started in company with her parents, but before they had proceeded far, they were brutally shot down before her eyes. She fled to the woods and escaped from her savage pursuers, and was found and brought to Columbus as above stated. A young man arrived at this place also witnessed the savage murder of his parents. Another young man in the act of fleeing, perceived the Indians dragging away his sister. He returned declaring he would rescue her or die in the attempt, and he has not since been heard of. From this time their deeds of savage barbarity have been too numerous to particularise. A woman was brought in on Tuesday wounded in the hand, whose husband had been shot the preceding evening at the Uchee bridge.

Colonel A. B. Dawson's negroes, who were taken by the Indians, and made their escape, state that they saw three corpses on the road near the Uchee bridge, a man, woman and child who had all been murdered.

We learn that about 150 friendly Indians have reported themselves at Fort Mitchell, and are ready to assist the whites.

The above details are confirmed by a Columbus paper of the 16th and a Milledgeville paper of the 17th instant. It is further stated that the Indians had entered the house of one family, and murdered the whole—including husband, wife and six children. All were scalped, and the children beheaded. The house of a Mr. Colton had been attacked, and Mr. C. himself killed.

The following towns and tribes of Indians, are without doubt hostile; a part of the Uchees, the Hitchatic, the Pah-lo-cho-ko-los, the So-wo-ko-los, and a part of the Ullallays. Neah-Matchlee, chief of the Hitchatic, &c. is full of ill-feeling towards the white people, and determined on revenge. Old Neah-Micco, the head of the Creek nation, must be considered as hostile, having been sent for several different times, to come in and hold a friendly talk—and as often refused to comply with the request—col. Crowell has been acquainted with this old chief for a series of years, and they have been on terms of strict friendship.

The Indians are acting with great boldness. They had appeared within thirty yards of Fort Mitchell, and entered and plundered the hospital. The garrison was not strong enough to make a rally.

The attack upon the mail stage is confirmed. The driver, and an inside passenger, were killed. Mr. Adams, an agent, who was in the stage, succeeded in making his escape. The horses attached to the stage came in at the next stage-house, but without the coach. There were nineteen horses in company with the coach, some of which had come in, though several were wounded.

Columbus, May 16.

Not content with the foul deeds on "terra firma," the savages have approached to the brink of the Chattahoochee, and made their death marks on board of our steamboats. The Hyperion, captain Smyth, while ascending our river on yesterday, was fired upon by the Indians, some 15 or 20 in number, who had stationed themselves on the plantation of the Messrs. Abercrombies, about 8 miles below this place. Eight rifles were discharged in quick succession, and at the first fire, Mr. Brockway, the first pilot on the Hyperion, who was standing on the boiler deck, fell dead, being shot in the throat, one of the pilots, Mr. Smith, was badly wounded, and four other individuals, whose names we have not learned. The boat was run ashore, and the passengers flew from her in terror and dismay.

The old Georgian, whilst lying at Roanoke, was set on fire by the Indians, and burned; not a soul on board escaped, except the engineer. The town of Roanoke was at the same time fired and burned to ashes. We believe no lives were lost.

P. S. We are informed that a contest is now going on between col. Spivy's company of mounted volunteers, and a party of Indians on the Alabama side of the Chattahoochee. A sharp firing has been heard within the last hour, and no doubt a severe battle is now being fought.

The bodies of eight persons, mostly women and children, inhumanly mangled, were discovered near the plantation of Mr. Briton Harris, about thirty-four miles from West Point.

Augusta (Ga.) May 18.

The Indians have now cut off all communication. The western stage last evening brought back all the mails forwarded for Montgomery from our post office for the last week, and the only communication now open is the Florida line to Mobile; and there is no knowing how long that will be passable. Colonel Crowell's plantation has been burnt, and it is reported the stage agent and two stage drivers have been killed. The governor has issued his proclamation calling for two regiments of volunteers.

Another letter from Augusta states that Irwinton, a flourishing town, on the Georgia side of the river, had also been burnt by the Indians.

A letter from a gentleman in Columbus to his friend in Washington city dated on the 16th, after confirming the account of the attack on the steamboats says—All the boats have valuable cargoes on board, and are now at the mercy of the Indians. An express reached here on last night that the town of Tallahassee [not Tallahassee] on the Tallapoosa was destroyed. The work of murder goes on in Chambers county: four white men and a negro were killed there on last Thursday morning. Two men were killed this side of Tuskegee, and yesterday morning the stage horses broke across the bridge here and ran bleeding into town, two being badly shot. Two men were killed in the stage, one made his escape, who got in last night, after being pursued by the Indians all day. The stage had been stopped for several days; but the contractors thought they would venture again, and the result of the rash attempt was as I have related. The man who escaped was one of the stage agents. Many persons are missing, and many, we presume, are killed. The amount of property destroyed is immense, and that fair portion of Alabama, included in the late treaty, will never be occupied again as long as an Indian resides within the territory. Very few friendly Indians have come in. Alabama has no troops in the field. Georgia is doing all she can for her own safety, though not a single company has arrived in Columbus yet for her defence.

An appeal has been made by the governor of Georgia, as commander-in-chief, to the citizens of that state, to fly to the standard of their country for the purpose of constituting a force which will afford protection to their fellow citizens "from the tomahawk and scalping knife." A permanent military organization is to be kept up along the line of the Chattahoochee, the western boundary of the state.

THE SOUTHERN MAILS.
From the Washington Globe.

From the post office department we learn, that all attempts to keep up the mail connexion between Columbus, Georgia, and Montgomery, Alabama, have been abandoned for the present.

It may be satisfactory to the public to be informed, that there is good reason to believe that all the mails sent on that route south have gone safely through. The peril to which they were exposed, however, induced Mr. George Plitt, agent of the department, who was at Columbus, to return all mails for that direction back to Augusta after the 15th instant, whence they have been forwarded by the lower Florida route, which is now the only line of communication between the south and New Orleans.

The possibility that even that line may be interrupted, has induced the department to direct the entire northern mail for New Orleans, and that section of the union generally, to be sent from Baltimore and Washington, over the Cumberland road, to Wheeling, and thence down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers by the steamboat mail lines now in operation. No apprehension need be entertained in future for the safety of communication by mail between the eastern cities and New Orleans.

FROM FLORIDA.

Tallahassee, May 7. God save the republic. The entire force of the United States army left for the defence of our frontier is estimated, on good authority, at 1,040 men. It is composed as follows:

Seven companies,	2d regiment, artillery,	280
Eight	1st " "	320
One	3d " "	40
Nine	4th " " infantry,	300
United States dragoons,		100

Grand total, 1,040

The force is scattered at different points on the frontier, over an extent of not less than four hundred miles, viz: Tampa, Fort King, Fort Drane, Picolata, St. Augustine and Mosquito. The consequence is that each post is so weak, as to be entirely unable to act on the offensive, or to punish the depredations committed actually within the range of the guns, as was recently the case at Fort Drane, where we are told not a single cartridge was prepared for the piece of artillery left for the protection of the post. The Indians have become daring and impudent to a degree hardly conceivable. The inhabitants are every where flying from midnight murder, and massacre on our devoted frontier.

From an extract of a letter from an officer in the army published in the Globe, we learn that that part of the army under the command of col. Chisholm, of the Alabama regiment, composed of the 4th regiment U. S. infantry, and part of his own troops were attacked on the 27th inst. about fourteen miles from Fort Brooke, whilst escorting the sick, stores, &c. from Fort Alabama, and quite a spirited engagement ensued, in which, it is supposed, the Indians met with severe loss. The action commenced at about half past 3 o'clock, P. M. and lasted three hours; three killed and twenty wounded; of the last, three or four badly.

Extract of a letter dated Tallahassee, May 11.

All the plantations bordering on the Osila river, in Jefferson county, have been abandoned, and the inhabitants are flying before the enemy. I should not be the least astonished if they attack Tallahassee. A report has just reached town based on good authority, that thirty-five of our volunteers under command of capt. Razor, of Gadsden county, had encountered a party of Indians in the vicinity of St. Marks and that a desperate engagement had ensued. They could be plainly seen with spy glasses from the "old bomb proof"—Fort St. Marks—by the citizens and it was generally thought that our men had out flanked them and cut them off from the hammock. To-night the whole town will be under arms. The Indian hostilities will retard the prosperity of our growing territory at least five years, unless immediate relief is sent to us.

Advices have been received from Tallahassee to the 12th inst. at which time the apprehension of an attack from the Indians had in some measure subsided, and the inhabitants seemed confident in their own strength—but the National Intelligence of Saturday last says:

A letter received in this city from Tallahassee, under date of May 7th, states that, on the night before, an attack was made by the Indians upon St. Marks, only sixteen or eighteen miles distant from Tallahassee! "This," says the letter, "is bringing the war near to us; and I verily believe that the country will be abandoned if they make a desperate rush to take it."

The above cannot be true, as the Baltimore Patriot publishes a letter from Fort Marks, dated on the 9th, which says that no Indians were seen in the vicinity, and expresses an opinion that the inhabitants with the seamen in port, are able to defend it against the savages.

FROM TEXAS.

The account of an important victory achieved by gen. Houston, over the Mexicans, is confirmed in its chief particulars by more recent intelligence from the seat of war. The following letter, from col. Hockley, of the Texian army to a friend in Natchitoches, comprises the most interesting details, and is, probably, generally correct. But we are still doubtful about the capture of Santa Anna; the account of which is rendered apocryphal by the manner of it, and the extraordinary propositions which it is said he made to gen. Houston. In addition, we see it stated, with some degree of probability, that Santa Anna was not in the battle, but in the city of Mexico at the time it occurred, whither he had been called to quell some dissensions among the officers of government and the people.

Srr: I have but a moment to give you an account of our victory. Our spies having taken a courier and officer on the 19th, who informed us that gen. Santa Anna and his army were across the San Jacinto, at this point; we immediately took up our line of march and reached that place on the morning of the 20th; the day was passed in reconnoitering the enemy. Some few shots during the time having been exchanged between the artillery without much effect on either side. On the morning of the 21st, the enemy commenced maneuvering, and we expected to be attacked in our camp, as they had received a reinforcement of 500 men, which made them 1,200 strong; but they settled down and continued throwing up a breast work, that they commenced at the first news of our approach. We commenced the attack upon them at half-past 5 o'clock, P. M. by a hot fire from our artillery, consisting of two ordinary 4 pounders. The enemy returned our fire with a long brass nine-pounder.

Our first fire having carried away their powder box caused their loud shouting to cease. We marched up within 75 yards, limbered our pieces and gave them the grape and canister, while our brave riflemen poured in their deadly fire. A fifteen minutes the enemy were flying in every direction, and were hotly pursued by us. They left 500 of their slain behind them. Never was there a victory more complete. General Cos was taken and killed by a pistol ball from one of our men, who instantly recognised him. General Santa Anna was taken next day about ten miles from the place of action, by one of our spies, who, on being brought forward, immediately requested to see general Houston. I happened to be passing at the time he was conveyed to general Houston, who was lying on a bed in his tent, having been wounded in the action, and heard them say, "we surrender into your hands general Santa Anna, governor of the republic of Mexico." He was ordered to call in his aids, who were nearly all taken, among whom was Almonte. There were then propositions made, of which you will have the details by express.

Houston was wounded in the ankle by a musket ball in the early part of the engagement; but remained on his horse until it terminated. There is a list of the names of the Mexican prisoners, which shall be transmitted you by express. They amount to nearly six hundred, among whom are six women.

The manner of Santa Anna's capture is thus related:

After the Mexican soldiers had thrown down their arms, the officers broke and endeavored to escape. The mounted riflemen, however, soon overtook all but one, who distanced the rest; him they ran 15 miles, when his horse bogged down in the prairie near the Brassos timber; he then made for the timber on foot. His pursuers in the eagerness of the chase, dashed into the same bog, and continued the pursuit on foot, following the trail of the fugitive, which was very plain owing to the recent rains, until they reached the timber, where it was lost. The pursuers then spread themselves and searched the woods for a long time in vain, when it occurred to Arnold Hunter that the chase might, like a hard pressed bear, have taken a tree. The tree tops were then examined, when lo, the game was discovered snugly ensconced in the forks of a large live-oak. The captors did not know who the prisoner was, until they reached the camp, when the Mexican soldiers exclaimed "el general, el general Santa Anna!"

The following are the propositions which, it is reported, Santa Anna has made to gen. Houston, viz: That he will pay the indemnity for the war—recognize Texas as an independent state, besides order the remaining part of his troops at present stationed in different parts of Texas, to assemble immediately, and lay down their arms; and that Houston's reply was, that Santa Anna, his officers, and the remaining part of his forces, should be shot as soon as the latter should make their appearance.

General Houston had issued orders that a farther advance of the Mexican army should be the signal for the slaughter of Santa Anna, and all the prisoners. The report of the terms of peace were not official but supported by a great number of letters from officers of the army.

It is also reported that, with the Mexican detachment, $50,000 in specie were taken—200 doubloons, found in Travis' saddle bags, 1,400 stand of arms and 2 cannons!

From the New Orleans Bulletin, May 9.

Col. A. Houston, of the Texian army, has arrived in the steamboat Caspian, and confirms the news of the glorious victory of gen. Houston, and has favored us with the following list of the Mexican officers killed, wounded and prisoners:

Killed—gen. Castrillon, col. Barnes, col. Mora, col. Trevino, col. Don Jose Maria Romero, lieu. col. Manuel Acquire, lieu. col. Castillo.

Gen. Cos and many others supposed to be killed, but not yet found.

Prisoners—gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, col. Almonti, aid de camp, Colos Csepiles of the Guerrero battalion Brings, aid to Santa Anna. Portilla de la Pedreguire, aid to Santa Anna; Nuner, Valienti; lieu. cols. Philippe Romero, (wounded), Valienti, Don Pedro del Gardo, Fernando Uriza, wounded, aid to Santa Anna, Arcos, Encie, Migla Don Ramon Curro, private secretary to Santa Anna; also 5 captains and 12 lieuts.

LATER NEWS.

From the Louisville Journal, May 18.

We have seen a passenger in the steamboat Mediterranean, apparently of high respectability, directly from Texas. He says, that he was not in the fight between the Texans and Mexicans, but that he heard the firing, and arrived upon the ground soon after the termination of the battle. He says, that gen. Houston came suddenly upon the enemy, about an hour before sunset, after a forced march of several miles. Finding them wholly unprepared, his troops rushed upon them with fixed bayonets, and the carnage was terrible. Our informant left the scene of slaughter on the morning after the battle. His description of the incidents accords very minutely with that of gen. Gaines, although, at the time of his arrival here, he had not seen gen. Gaines' letter. He says that, at the time of his leaving the Texian camp, the individual spoken of by general Gaines as having been found secreted in a tree, was supposed to be Santa Anna, but that his identity had not been satisfactorily established.

From the same.

Later. Since writing the above, a gentleman just from Red river has communicated the following, as the latest intelligence from Texas. After routing the detachment on the east side of the Brassos, Houston crossed that river and attacked the main body of the Mexican army, with great effect. Many were killed or made prisoners, and the rest put to flight. Santa Anna had been identified and beheaded. About half of the Mexican prisoners are said to have been put to death, and the rest detained as hostages.

The Memphis Enquirer of May 14th, confirms the above intelligence on the authority of a gentleman just arrived from Nacogdoches, who saw Houston's express, and had the account from his own lips. The statement that Santa Anna and his staff had been shot by a council of war, the Enquirer says his informant does not confirm; but he states that Santa Anna told Houston that he had sent to Mexico for supplies and troops, which had been refused him, and he feared he had been supplanted by gen. Bustamente, and also Santa Anna had recognized the independence of Texas; the Enquirer adds, "we have every confidence in the truth of this rich intelligence."

Massacre of col. Fanning. The following letter from a young man of Louisville, Ky. to his father, confirms, we think, beyond doubt, the reported massacre of col. Fanning and his detachment. It is dated at Groce's Crossing, on the Brazos river, April 11.

"DEAR FATHER: I take this opportunity of writing you a few lines to let you know that I am still in existence. I suppose you will have heard before this reaches you that I was either taken prisoner or killed. I was taken prisoner on the 29th of last month, and kept a week, when all of us were taken with col. Fanning, besides other prisoners were ordered out to be shot, but I, with six others out of five hundred and twenty-one, escaped. Before we were taken, col. Fanning's party had a battle with the Mexicans in a large prairie, and killed and wounded, as the Mexicans themselves said, three hundred of them; but one of the Texans, who was a prisoner at the time, says that it took them all night of the 19th to bury their dead, and that we must have killed and wounded something like eight hundred or a thousand. Their force was nineteen hundred strong—ours, two hundred and fifty.

"The circumstances under which we were taken are these: we were completely surrounded, without any provision or water, and in such a situation that we could not use our cannon; in consequence of which we thought it best to surrender on the terms offered to us—which were, to treat us as prisoners of war, and according to the rules of Christian warfare. But how sadly we were deceived, the sequel will show: after starving us for a week they ordered us out, saying we were going after beef, but when we had marched about a half mile from the fort we were ordered to halt. The Mexicans marched all on one side of us, and took deliberate aim at us, but I, as you have seen, was fortunate enough to escape. I have, however, had monstrous hard times, having nothing to eat for five successive days and nights, but at length arrived safely here this morning, after a travel of two weeks through prairies and dangers, during which time I had some narrow escapes, especially the night before last on the line of the picket guards of the Mexican force. I was near being killed or taken.

"San Felipe is taken. The Mexicans are in Texas, but I think I shall live to see her free notwithstanding. We have near 1,500 men in the camp and expect to attack the enemy in a few days.

"I am well with the exception of very sore feet, occasioned by walking through the prairies bare footed. To-morrow I shall go over the river to a farm to stay until I get entirely well, when I will try to avenge the death of some of my brave friends. All of my company were killed.

Your affectionate son, CHAS. B. SHAIN."

OFFICIAL—NAVAL GENERAL ORDER.

Navy department, 20th May, 1836.

Whereas, it has heretofore been decided that midshipmen were to be considered as exempted from arrest for any debt or contract, under the provisions of the 15th section of the act of congress of the 11th of July, 1798, for establishing and organizing a marine corps, which section is in these words: "The non-commissioned officers, musicians, seamen and marines, who are or shall be enlisted into the service of the United States, shall be, and they are hereby, exempted, during their term of service, from all personal arrest for any debt or contract." Doubts have arisen as to the correctness of this decision, the subject has been carefully examined by the attorney general of the United States, whose opinion is, that under that section midshipmen cannot be considered as exempted from arrest for debts or contracts; and as I fully concur in the opinion, it is decided by this department that midshipmen in the navy of the United States are not to be considered as exempted from arrest within the meaning of the foregoing section.

MAILON DICKERSON.

To all officers of the navy of the United States.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

May 20. Mr. Calhoun rose and stated that the committee of conference on the disagreeing vote on the bill authorizing the president to accept the services of volunteers, and to raise another regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen, had met and deliberated, and that a report would be made from the other house.

Mr. King, of Ala. expressed with some feeling, his regret, that a committee had not been selected who, instead of going into the whole merits of the bill, would have confined themselves to the point upon which the senate and house were at issue.

Mr. Calhoun discussed at some length the character and effect of the act of 1812, and argued that it would be safer and not in violation of the constitution to form the force provided by this bill as militia, rather than to make it a portion of the regular army.

The message was received from the house of representatives, announcing that they had determined to insist upon their amendment.

The amendment of the house, was, in effect, a disagreement from the provision introduced by the senate that the president and senate should have the authority to appoint the field officers.

Mr. Calhoun then moved that the senate insist, and that another committee of conference be appointed on the part of the senate.

This motion gave rise to a debate in which Messrs. King, of Ala. Calhoun, Porter, Leigh and Webster took part.

On one side it was contended that the force which the president ought to have power to accept should be to all intents and purposes militia, and that, being militia, this force should be officered by the states, and not by the executive, because the militia belonging to the states, their governments, and not the general government, have the power of organizing them. There is no such thing known as a national militia.

It was stated on the other side, that it might be necessary to organize this force into battalions, regiments and brigades, in case no one of the states furnish a sufficient number of men to form a battalion, regiment or brigade, they could not be officered by the executive and senate. The efficiency of such a force would also be greatly increased by having its officers appointed by the general government.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate then proceeded to ballot for a new committee, and Messrs. Calhoun, King, of Ala. and Nicholas, were elected.

The senate then, on motion of Mr. White, took up the bill making appropriations for suppressing Creek hostilities, which was read twice and referred to the committee on finance.

After which the senate went into executive business and then adjourned.

May 21. Mr. Southard reported, from the committee on the District of Columbia, a bill amendatory of an act for quieting possessions and confirming certain titles, &c. in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Naudain reported a bill to incorporate the Washington manual labor school and male orphan asylum, in the District of Columbia—ordered to a second reading.

The senate refused to take up the bill to recharter the banks in the District of Columbia.

A bill to provide for the better protection of the western frontier was read and referred, as was also a bill to construct an arsenal in North Carolina.

The amendment of the house to the bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain was referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for fortifications. The question being on the motion of Mr. Benton, to strike out the item of $101,000 for the item of fortifications at Pensacola, and to insert an appropriation of $75,000 for the present year, and $75,000 for the next year.

Mr. Benton addressed the senate in support of his motion, and the discussion was further continued by Messrs. Southard, Hill, Buchanan, Wall and Ewing, of Ohio.

Mr. Calhoun, the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. Calhoun then reported, from the committee of conference appointed on the disagreement between the two houses on the subject of the bill authorizing the president to accept the services of volunteers, &c.

The report recommended the substitution of three sections for the present third section, the effect of which is to convert the whole force to be accepted into volunteer militia, to be officered by the states, in the way in which the militia are officered, with some immaterial modifications.

There was no action on the report.

Mr. Benton moved to take up again the fortification bill; which was agreed to.

After a few words from Mr. Calhoun, the yeas and nays on the motion to amend were ordered.

Mr. Calhoun suggested that the adoption of this amendment would fix the principle of a prospective appropriation for all the works in the present bill, and he objected to such power being given to the secretary of war.

The question was then taken, first on the amendment in blank, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King, of Ala. Linn, Morris, Niles, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, King, of Georgia, Mangum, Naudain, Nicholas, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, White—13.

Mr. Benton then moved to fill the blank with $75,000.

[At this period the debate was interrupted by a message from the house, and the senate concurred in the report of the committee of conference, (as before specified), and the bill to provide for the payment of the militia in Florida, &c. was read twice, and referred to the committee on military affairs.]

The amendment was then agreed to.

The next question was on a motion of Mr. Preston to strike out the appropriation for Kennebeck river, which was decided in the negative. Yeas 7—nays 23.

Mr. Preston then moved that the senate adjourn. Decided in the negative.

Mr. Hill moved to amend the amendment by making it read like the preceding one, $100,000 for 1836, and $100,000 for 1837, for fortifications at Kennebeck river. This was modified so as to read, "$100,000 per annum for two years."

Mr. Webster asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, Hill, Hubbard, King, of Ala. Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, King, of Geo. Mangum, Preston, Webster, White—9.

The next amendment was to strike out $103,000 for the appropriation of a fortification at Portland harbor, and insert 75,000 dollars per annum for two years. Agreed to—yeas 20, nays 8.

The next amendment was the appropriation for Portsmouth harbor, which, after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. Preston to strike it out, was filed with a blank to be filled, when it appeared that no quorum was present.

The senate then adjourned.

May 23. Mr. Walker, of Mississippi, presented the proceedings of a meeting in one of the counties of the state of Mississippi, on the subject of the recognition of the independence of Texas. He wished to take up the subject at once, and, with that view, he would move a reference of these proceedings, and certain resolutions previously offered by Mr. Morris and other senators, to the committee on foreign relations.

The chair having decided that there was some informality in the proceedings which were cut from a newspaper, and of the authenticity of which there was insufficient evidence, the motion was varied so as to refer to the former proceedings.

Mr. Walker made some observations in a very enthusiastic tone and temper, in favor of immediate action on the subject.

Mr. Morris was in favor of pausing on the subject before we proceeded so far as to connect ourselves to any particular line of policy.

Mr. Preston repeated what he had formerly said on this subject, as to his delight in the progress of their struggle for rights and free institutions.

Mr. Webster expressed a wish that this question would not be pressed, until we should have official notification of the establishment of a government in Texas. Whenever that should take place, he would be in favor of a recognition of the independence of Texas. But there were other important matters connected with the subject, which must be considered whenever the question should come up.

Mr. Mangum took a somewhat similar view of the subject, and moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. Calhoun also recommended patience to the friends of Texas, on this floor, and moderation to the Texans themselves. He said that Texas could never again be subjected to Mexico, and that the Texans had Mexico in their power; but he repeated his hope that the advantages in their hands would be used with wisdom. He expressed a hope that Mr. Walker himself would reflect and consent to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. Lewis joined in the recommendation.

Mr. Walker replied—"now's the day and now's the hour," and made some further observations to sustain his position.

Mr. Calhoun repeated his suggestion that those who wished well to the Texans would wait until sufficient information should have been received. He hoped there would be information which would enable the United States to recognize the Texian government before the rising of the present congress.

Mr. Mangum followed, and again urged the impropriety of any immediate action on the part of congress because the effect would be a war with Mexico, unless Mexico should be restrained by paramount considerations of expediency.

The motion, was then agreed to, to refer the proceedings to the committee on foreign relations.

A communication was received from the treasury department, enclosing a statement of the condition of the deposit banks to the 1st day of May; which was ordered to be laid on the table, and printed.

Mr. Benton, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill for the payment of the expense of militia or volunteers in the southern states; which was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the fortification bill was laid on the table until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. White, the rescinding resolution which came up as the special order, was postponed and made the special order for Thursday.

Mr. Hubbard offered a resolution setting apart Friday and Saturday of every week for the consideration of private bills, and asked the consideration of the resolution; but an objection was made, and the resolution lies over.

The special orders were then postponed until to-morrow, for the purpose of taking up the general orders.

The senate then adjourned.

May 24. After the usual morning business,

Mr. King, of Alabama, stated that from information which he had received, and which was entitled to the utmost reliance, he learned that there were numbers of individuals who had been driven by the Indians from their homes in Alabama, and compelled to cross the river, and take refuge in Georgia. These persons, being driven from their homes, and having no means, are reduced to the greatest possible distress, and it was the duty of congress to do all which they could do to enable these flying citizens to sustain nature. He would, therefore, ask leave to introduce at once a joint resolution to authorise and direct the delivery of rations from the public stores to these individuals until such relief shall be no longer necessary.

Leave being given, the joint resolution was introduced, read twice, and ordered to be engrossed. It was afterwards read a third time and passed.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Hubbard, of New Hampshire, setting apart Fridays and Saturdays for the exclusive consideration of private bills and private business, was taken up, discussed and rejected.

A bill to provide for the payment of volunteers and militia employed in the service of the United States against the Indians, was read a third time and passed.

A resolution lying on the table, to authorise the payment of witnesses examined before the committee on public lands, in reference to alleged frauds, was taken up and agreed to.

The fortification bill was again taken up and considered, but before a final disposition of it, the senate adjourned.

May 25. Mr. McKean presented a petition from citizens of Philadelphia against the admission of Arkansas into the union, without a modification of her constitution in reference to slavery.

After the transaction of some business of minor importance, the senate proceeded to the general orders, and took up the bill to authorise the purchase, by the United States, of public stock in the Louisville and Portland canal company. Some time was occupied in its consideration, when it was laid on the table, on motion of Mr. Ewing, who stated he would call it up again to-morrow.

The senate then resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the collection of materials, the building of forts, &c. which was amended, and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

[The senate refused to concur in any of the prospective appropriations.]

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate took up the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The amendment offered by Mr. Calhoun to this bill having been read,

Mr. Calhoun moved to fill the blank for the sum to be left in the treasury before any division is made of the surplus revenue among the several states of the union, with the sum of "three millions."

The bill was then laid on the table until to-morrow, with the understanding that it will then be taken up.

The bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, being the next special order, Mr. Benton moved that its consideration be postponed for the purpose of taking up the defence bill—negatived: ayes 14, nays 19. The bill was then read as reported by the committee to the senate, the amendments agreed to, and then the bill was made the order of the day for Friday next.

The senate proceeded to consider a bill in addition to an act providing for the admission of Arkansas into the union, which was amended in some unimportant particulars. After which the bill was reported as amended, the amendments concurred in, and the bill then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The senate then adjourned.

May 26. A memorial was presented by Mr. Crittenden on behalf of Mr. Clay, who was confined by indisposition, having relation to the independence of Texas.

Mr. Preston presented the proceedings of a meeting held in the city of Washington in relation to the same subject. He remarked on the gratifying desire which prevailed, that as soon as our government can, without violation of its obligations, it shall recognise the independence of Texas.

These memorials were referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and ordered to be printed.

After the transaction of other business, which will be noticed in its progress, Mr. Webster moved the following resolution, on which he offered a few remarks enforcing the necessity of restraining the territorial legislatures in their action upon bank charters. It was then considered and agreed to.

Resolved, That the secretary of state communicate to the senate, as soon as they may be obtained, copies of all acts of the territorial legislatures of Florida, granting or creating banking charters, or any institutions with banking powers and privileges within the last three years.

An act making appropriations for the purchase of materials, the erection of fortifications, the purchase of sites, &c. was read a third time.

On the question of its passage, the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. Leigh, and ordered accordingly.

The passage of the bill was then opposed by Messrs. Calhoun, King, of Geo. and Crittenden, and advocated by Messrs. Benton, Walker, Rives and Webster.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hill, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, Linn, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Rugles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Toinlinson, Walker, Webster, Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, King, of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Preston, White—9.

So the bill was passed.

An act in relation to the admission of Arkansas into the union was read a third time, and passed.

The joint resolution of the senate, authorising the president to issue rations to those citizens who have been driven by the Indians from their homes in Alabama, having been returned from the house with an amendment by adding the words "or Georgia"—

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "homes" the words "provided their homes are not in the Indian lands unceded to the United States."

The motion to amend was not agreed to.

The resolution and amendment were then laid on the table, on motion of Mr. King, of Georgia—yeas 18, nays 15.

The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, May 20. Mr. Lewis, from the committee of conference, appointed by the house to confer with the senate committee on the subject of the disagreement, on the part of the house, to the amendment of the senate to the bill authorising the president of the United States to accept the services of volunteers (which amendment provides that the president, with the advice and consent of the senate, shall commission the officers, elected by the volunteers), reported that the committee could not agree and that he was instructed to move that the house insist upon their disagreement.

Mr. L. stated that, although he made the motion under the instruction of the committee, yet he hoped it would not prevail, and that some gentleman would move that the house recede from their disagreement.

After some discussion, Mr. Glascock moved that the house recede from their disagreement.

At eleven o'clock, Mr. Conner called for the special order of the day, viz: the bill for changing the organization of the post office department.

Mr. Miller, moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of proceeding in the consideration of the subject, and thereupon the yeas and nays were ordered.

The motion was agreed to: yeas 136, nays 37.

Mr. Halsey spoke briefly in support of the motion to recede.

Mr. Speight, believing, he said, that the bill had been sufficiently discussed, and that it ought to pass without delay, moved the previous question.

The chair decided that the previous question was the motion to recede.

The motion having been seconded, and the question being "shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. Patton called for the yeas and nays, as he considered, he said, that the bill involved a violation of the constitution.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 126, nays 7.

The main question being then taken, it was decided in the negative, yeas 74, nays 123.

So the house refused to recede.

The motion to insist was then agreed to.

The remainder of the session was occupied in considering the bill to change the organization of the post office department, &c. and the bill for the discontinuance of certain post routes and the alteration of others. To the first several amendments were offered and rejected, and it was then laid aside—the latter was amended and made the special order of the day for Thursday next, and ordered to be printed. The house then, at 8 o'clock, adjourned.

[Pending the consideration in committee of the mail route bill, the speaker momentarily resumed the chair and on motion of Mr. Lewis, the house agreed to a second joint committee of conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two houses, upon the amendment of the senate to the bill authorising the president to accept the service of volunteers; and a committee was appointed on the part of the house.]

Saturday, May 21. The house resumed the consideration of the report and resolution of the select committee on abolition memorials. The question being on the motion of Mr. Robertson to recommit the report to the committee with instructions to report a resolution declaring that congress has no power under the constitution, to abolish slavery in the District or in the territories.

Mr. Robertson resumed his remarks and spoke at length in opposition to the report, maintaining that it surrendered in effect, the rights and protection claimed by the south, under the constitution. At the expiration of the hour, the orders of the day were called.

Mr. White, of Florida, obtained the consent of the house to call up the bill to provide for the payment of expenses incurred and supplies furnished on account of the militia received in the service of the United States for the defence of Florida.

This bill was considered as in committee of the whole, and amended so as to provide for the payment of all the militia and volunteers engaged in the Florida campaign, and have been regularly discharged.

[This bill is merely explanatory of a former act, by which it was intended to provide for all such cases.]

The committee rose and reported the bill with the amendment.

Mr. Jarvis adverted to the haste and informality in which bills of this kind have lately been hurried through the house. Bills were brought up and passed through the house, in violation of all its rules, upon vague and insufficient information, and information not communicated to the house, but to a committee, or, as in this case, to an individual member, who was not upon any committee. He wished to know how long the system was to be pursued. If it was established, this house would soon have nothing to do but to register the edicts of the executive, and not of the supreme executive, but of his subordinates.

A debate ensued in which Messrs. White, of Florida, Hawes, Granger, Speight, Cambreleng, Everett, Parker, Bell, R. M. Johnson, Grennell, Lincoln and Ward took part. The discussion was afterwards continued by Messrs. Jarvis, Vanderpoel, Graves and others. The amendments to the bill were concurred in and the bill ordered to be engrossed.

After a short time spent in considering private business the house adjourned.

Monday, May 23. After the usual morning business, the house resumed the consideration of the resolutions from the legislature of the state of Kentucky, with the motion to commit them to a committee with instructions to report a bill providing for the distribution of the revenue arising from the sales of public lands among the several states, according to their population.

Mr. Cushing, of Mass. spoke at considerable length in favor of the proposed measure—and was followed by Mr. Haynes in a speech in opposition to the distribution. When he had concluded,

Mr. Hannegan moved to lay the resolutions on the table; and the question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 110, noes 89. So the resolutions were laid on the table.

Mr. Williams, of Ken. moved to suspend the rule for the purpose of considering the resolution from the senate, fixing a day for the adjournment of congress; upon which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken, was decided in the negative; two-thirds being required—yeas 98, nays 89.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, went into committee of the whole, in execution of the special order, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications.

Mr. Forrester resumed his remarks, and went at length into a consideration of the various topics connected with the subject, and heretofore introduced into the debate.

The question being on the motion to appropriate $700,000 for the arming of fortifications.

Mr. Mercer moved to amend the amendment by authorising the president of the United States to expend so much of said sum as he might deem expedient for the purpose of establishing a national foundry for the casting of cannon, if he should deem it expedient.

Mr. Underwood was proceeding to give his views on the subject, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise; which motion having been put, there was found to be no quorum, when the committee rose and reported that fact to the house.

Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, moved a call of the house; which was ordered; but before proceeding with the call,

Mr. Vinton moved an adjournment—decided in the negative, yeas 39, nays 87. Mr. Underwood again took the floor, and after speaking some time, gave way for a motion that the committee rise; decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 71. Mr. Wise renewed the motion. The vote on this motion was, yeas 51, nays 55; and no quorum voting, the committee rose, and reported that fact to the house. A motion was then made that the house adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 69. Mr. Adams moved a call of the house; upon which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 95. So the motion for a call of the house was over-ruled.

Mr. Sutherland moved to suspend the rules so as to make the bill the order of the day for to-morrow at 11 o'clock; which motion prevailed—yeas 110, nays 19. And then the house adjourned.

Tuesday, May 24. Mr. Adams asked the consent of the house to offer the two following resolutions, and to state a few reasons for offering them:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any overture made since the 3d of March, 1829, by his authority, to the government of the United Mexican States, for the acquisition by the United States of any portion of the territories of Mexico; and copies of all correspondence between the two governments relating thereto, and upon any question of boundary existing between the United States and Mexico.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy and translations of any law, decree or ordinance of the Mexican republic, abolishing slavery within the territories thereof, which may be in possession of the executive department of the United States.

Objections being made, Mr. Adams asked leave to state his reasons for desiring to move these resolutions; which being objected to,

Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, moved to suspend the rules to allow Mr. Adams to state the reasons; and that motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. Adams then moved to suspend the rules to allow him to offer the resolutions, and asked for the yeas and nays on that question; which were ordered.

Mr. Huntsman asked if the motion was divisible. He said he was willing to vote for the first resolution, and he did not doubt the president would be willing to give all the information required by it, but he was opposed to receiving the second resolution.

Mr. Adams said, to accommodate the gentleman, (Mr. Huntsman) he would modify his motion so as to apply it to the first resolution only.

Mr. Huntsman then remarked that he would vote to suspend the rules to allow that resolution to be offered.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, stated that if the house should allow the resolution to be offered, and when it should come before the house, he should move an amendment to it, [proposing, it was understood, to ask of the executive his opinion as to the expediency of recognizing the independence of Texas].

The question was then taken on suspending the rules to enable Mr. Adams to offer the first of the above resolutions, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Chilton Allau, H. Allen, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Beaumont, Bell, Borden, Boyd, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, W. B. Calhoun, Carter, J. Chambers, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Crane, Cushing, Deberry, Denny, Everett, French, Fry, Philo C. Fuller, R. Garland, Granger, Grandland, Graves, H. Hall, Hard, Harper, S. S. Harrison, A. G. Harrison, Hawes, Hazeltine, Heister, Hoar, Holsey, Howell, Huntsman, Ingersoll, W. Jackson, J. Jackson, James, Jarvis, Kinnard, Laporte, Lawrence, L. Lea, Lincoln, Logau, J. Mann, S. Mason, McCarty, McKay, McKennan, Mercer, Parker, Patton, J. A. Pearce, Pettigrew, Phillips, Potts, Russell, Seymour, Slade, Spangler, Sprague, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, J. Tomson, W. Thompson, Turner, Underwood, E. Whittlesey—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Beale, Bean, Boon, Bouldin, Rovee, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, J. F. H. Claiborne, Coles, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Donbleday, Drongoole, Dunlap, Fairchild, Farlin, Galbraith, Glasecock, Haley, Hamer, Hannegan, Haynes, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, Cave Johnson, J. W. Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilegore, Lane, E. Lee, J. Lee, Leonard, Loyal, Lyon, Abija Mann, Miller, E. M. Miller, Montgomery, May, McComas, McKoon, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Owens Parks, Patterson, F. Pierce, Phelps, Pinckney, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Roane, Rogers, Wm. B. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, Smith, Sutherland, Toucey, Turrill, Vinton, Wardwell, S. Williams—68.

So the house refused (two-thirds of the members present being required to carry it) to suspend the rules to allow Mr. Adams to offer his resolution.

The house then resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery, the pending question being the motion of Mr. Robertson to recommit the same, with instructions to report a resolution declaring that congress has no power, under the constitution to interfere with the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia or in the territories of the United States.

Mr. R. resumed his remarks and spoke until the expiration of the hour.

Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house go into committee of the whole.

Mr. Chilton Allan moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of taking up the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the United States, and for granting land to certain states, with the several motions pending to commit the same.

Mr. C. Allan said that he would renew this motion from day to day, if he could get the floor, and would call upon his friends to give the yeas and nays. It was his desire to bring the house to a direct vote on the bill, that the question might not be dodged.

On this question, the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 108.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications.

Mr. Underwood resumed and concluded his speech. A desultory discussion then ensued, which occupied the attention of the committee until about half past 12 o'clock, (at night), when it arose, reported the bill with amendments, and then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, May 25. After the usual preparatory business, the house again took up the unfinished business of the morning hour, being the report of the select committee to whom was referred the memorials and petitions on the subject of slavery.

Mr. Robertson then resumed his argument in favor of his motion, which was to recommit the report with instructions to report a resolution declaring that congress has no right to interfere in the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia or in the territories of the United States; and, after speaking at length upon the various subjects connected with the report, concluded his remarks.

Mr. Queens expressed an opinion that the discussion ought not to be continued, and moved the previous question.

Mr. Williams, of Ky. called for the orders of the day, lost—ayes 64, noes 86.

The house seconded the call for the previous question, 95 to 82, and the main question was ordered to be put by a vote of 109 to 89.

The first resolution of the committee declaring that congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy, was then taken up.

Mr. Adams said if the house would allow him five minutes time he would prove that resolution to be false and utterly untrue.

The following gentlemen refused to vote:

Messrs. Robertson and Wise, of Va. Glasecock, of Ga. Thompson and Pickets of South Carolina.

Before the vote was announced the house passed to the special order.

[Eight gentlemen only were understood to have voted in the negative, viz: Messrs. Adams, Everett, Slade, Clarke, Denny, Jackson, of Mass. Phillips and Potts.]

The house then went into committee on the joint resolution to authorize the president of the United States to furnish rations to certain citizens of Alabama, which was discussed at length by Messrs. Hawes, Lewis, Townes, Whittlesey, of Ohio, Parker, Halsey, Lane, Glasecock, Wise.

On motion of Mr. Boyd, the committee rose.

On motion of Mr. Lane, the committee of the whole was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution.

The whole action of the committee being rendered null and void by the discharge,

Mr. Miller moved to amend by inserting the words "and Georgia," after the word Alabama.

Mr. Cave Johnson called for the previous question; which was seconded by the house—yeas 88, nays 34.

The main question was then put, and the resolution was ordered to a third reading.

The resolution was then read a third time by general consent, and was passed without a count.

The speaker presented several executive communications, after which, the house adjourned.

Thursday, May 26. The unfinished business of the morning hour, being the consideration of the report (by Mr. Pinckney) on the abolition petitions and memorials, was then taken up.

The chair stated that he had deliberated carefully upon the novel and delicate questions submitted at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday; and had found that, in a case which occurred in 1823, it was decided that the decision of the main question could not be arrested by the consideration of the subject of excusing any gentleman who might ask to be excused from voting; and, in that case, the question upon excusing was postponed till after the vote had been declared, and had never been decided to this hour.

In accordance with that precedent, the chair decided that it was his duty to announce the decision of the house upon the first resolution; and leave the question of excusing those gentlemen who had requested it to a subsequent stage of the proceedings; and he was proceeding to announce the vote, when

Mr. Whittlesey appealed from the decision of the chair, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Adams said, as the chair had rested on a decision which was presented to him, he wished to state that, when he asked to be excused from voting, and was refused by the house, his reasons were assigned in writing, were entered on the journal, and were there to be found.

The chair replied that he was aware that such was the fact. Mr. Whittlesey said that he wished to make a few remarks on the appeal.

The chair said it was not debatable.

The question was then taken and decided, yeas 138, nays 46. So the decision of the chair was sustained.

The vote of yesterday, on the first resolution, was then declared to be—yeas 182, nays 9. So the first resolution reported by the committee was agreed to, in the following terms:

"Resolved, That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy."

The second resolution was then read as follows:

"Resolved, That congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia."

The question being taken on this resolution, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 132, nays 45.

So the second resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Adams asked to be excused from voting, and Mr. Granger and Mr. Wise declined doing so; when, after some confusion, the question being on the third resolution, it was read as follows:

"And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation on this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquility to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating, in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Mr. Phillips objected to the resolution on the ground that it was not in conformity with the instructions to the committee. It was now 11 o'clock and the chair announced the special order. Mr. Pinckney moved a suspension of the rules. Agreed to—ayes 126. Mr. Phillips after again rising to a question of order, moved to lay the resolution on the table—negatived, yeas 69, nays 118. The question next recurred on the passage of the resolution, and the name of Mr. Adams having been called, he said the resolution was in direct violation of the constitution of the United States. He was called to order, after which the vote was taken, and the resolution agreed to. Ayes 117, nays 68. [The yeas and nays will be published in our next.]

Mr. Pinckney moved, under instructions of the select committee on abolition, that 5,000 extra copies of the report and resolutions be printed.

The chair stated that the motion must lie one day.

The chair stated to the house that the questions of order which had arisen in the course of the consideration of the report and resolutions having been suspended, under a decision of the chair, sustained by the house, until the decision of the house was ascertained on the resolutions, upon which the previous question had been ordered, were now in order and subject to the disposition of the house. He also stated that he had received written communications from two members, stating their views on certain points of order, which were also subject to the disposition of the house.

Mr. Glasecock arose to give his reasons for asking to be excused from voting, when a scene of confusion ensued which was only terminated by the house proceeding to the orders of the day; when it resumed the consideration of the bill to change the organization of the post office department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof.

The bill had been reported from the committee of the whole, with sundry amendments, and the question was on concurring with the committee in these proposed amendments—Some of which were agreed to without opposition, and others occupied the attention of the house until the hour of adjournment.

THE TOBACCO TRADE.

IN THE SENATE—MAY 2.

The senate having resumed the consideration of the following resolutions, submitted some days ago by Mr. Kent, of Maryland:

"Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to open negotiations with the government of France, as soon as the diplomatic intercourse between the two countries shall be renewed, for the purpose of placing our trade in tobacco with that country upon a more liberal footing than the existing system of administration "en regie" admits of, and corresponding better with the generous spirit exhibited heretofore, as well as at this time, by the United States, in reducing the duties on various products from that country.

And the question being on agreeing to the resolution—Mr. Kent said he had been induced to offer the resolution just read, under the persuasion that the renewal of diplomatic intercourse between the two countries would be an auspicious moment to attempt to place our trade with France upon a footing of greater reciprocity than existed at present, in his estimation, especially as regards the article of tobacco, which, in amount shipped to foreign countries, exceeds that of any other agricultural product except cotton.

We (said Mr. K.) are importing, very freely, indeed, the silks, wines and brandies from France at this time almost free of duty. Our trade in those articles is every day increasing; and low as the duties are at present, they will, under our existing laws regulating our tariff, be made still lower during the next four years. Under these favorable circumstances, all the productions of that country, at the head of which are the articles I have mentioned, are rapidly finding their way to us, and entering freely into our daily consumption, whilst the products of the United States, sent to France in exchange increase but in a small degree, except the article of cotton. Tobacco, the growth of this country, is of a superior quality to that they are forced to grow in France, in consequence of the high duties imposed upon it; and could the government of that country be induced to reciprocate the liberal spirit evinced on the part of the government of the United States, in our commercial regulations with her, and remove the restraints existing under her laws upon our tobacco trade, which are truly embarrassing and injurious to it, it would prove mutually beneficial. France could then advantageously discontinue its cultivation, and more of her products suitable to our consumption would be produced, and those much more congenial to her soil, and the habits of her people, than the culture of an inferior description of tobacco, whilst our citizens would be encouraged in their use by finding that, in doing so, they were extending their market for an article the growth of which had been long familiar to them, and which continued to employ a large capital in its production.

I presume, Mr. President, more capital is engaged at this time in the cultivation of tobacco than is employed in producing sugar and rice together.

In Austria the system of monopoly also exists similar to that which prevails in France at this time. Under our existing commercial regulations with that country, liberal in every respect but as regards the article of tobacco, we rarely find a hoghead of tobacco from our country finding its way into an Austrian port, and it has only been latterly that the enterprising tobacco dealers of Bremen have been able to extend the quantity introduced in that country to a few thousand hogheads.

In England, also, the duty is excessive.

I have submitted the resolution before you, Mr. President, and made these few remarks, that the attention of the executive department of the government may be forcibly drawn to an important branch of our trade, at a moment when it appears we are about to introduce in the freest manner all foreign production into our country.

Commerce consists of an exchange of commodities, and unless those exchanges are reciprocal, it cannot continue long, or to any extent beneficially. During the last three years, so far as our custom-house returns are a safe guide, our imports have exceeded our exports between sixty-eight and sixty-nine millions of dollars. I am aware that a large portion of this apparent balance, during a prosperous condition of our commerce, is absorbed by freights, commissions and profits; but let a reverse occur, and our produce be sent to a declining market, and this balance against our exports is no longer nominal; it is real, and can only be discharged by exporting our specie to pay it.

The resolution I have submitted refers to a lucrative portion of our trade; one valuable from its amount as well as its importance to our shipping interest. From its bulky character, it requires a large proportion of tonnage to transport it to market. Under these considerations, I hope it will receive the sanction of the senate.

The resolution was then agreed to.

FOREIGN PAUPERS.

In the senate of the United States, May 2, Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts presented the following resolution, adopted by the legislature of that state.

Resolved, That it is expedient to instruct our senators and request our representatives in congress to use their endeavors to obtain the passage of a law to prevent the introduction of foreign paupers into this country, and to favor any other measures which congress may be disposed to adopt to effect this object.

Mr. Davis said he feared the resolve would not be fully understood in all parts of the country, and would therefore take leave to offer some explanation of the reason which had probably induced the legislature to act upon the subject.

He need not say it was important, as, otherwise, it would not be presented here in this form. If he did not mistake the signs of the times, the wrongs which had been inflicted on Massachusetts would soon reach other places, and the country would participate in her sufferings.

It is well known that pauperism in Europe has become a great and oppressive burden. In England, especially, it has become so powerful in numbers and physical power, as to be, in some districts, almost uncontrollable. The number had not, to his knowledge, been accurately ascertained, but the means were at hand to prove that the aggregate and power were great and oppressive. It appeared, from parliamentary documents, that in 1818, the sum expended by the parishes in England and Wales alone, where these corporations provide for the poor, amounted to about thirty-eight millions of dollars; a sum greater than the whole revenue of this country for public purposes.

The burden, as well as other evils, were so severely felt, that the public attention had been drawn to the subject, with a hope of obtaining relief. Much had been written and much said, but no efficient action had taken place up to 1833, when the king appointed a commission, with large powers, to collect evidence, and report to the parliament. The commissioners appointed a large number of sub-commissioners, assigning to each a district, and authorising them to collect evidence, and report to the general board.

They proceeded in the execution of their duty, and their reports, with the evidence, went with the report of the general board into parliament, when all were published, and fill a large number of closely printed folio volumes, which are in the possession of the United States.

These volumes shed light upon this subject, which may well fill the mind with astonishment.

The evidence shows that the paupers of England and Wales are debased, demoralized and depraved to a degree that surpasses belief; and the commissioners impute much of this to the mode of granting relief. This deserves to be much considered; for the mode did not essentially differ from that pursued in many places in this country.

It was founded on an equitable arrangement, by which they attempted to measure out relief in proportion to the necessity of the pauper. It appeared that the relief was furnished by a scale, it is called, and the pauper usually received it at his place of abode.

To a married person the allowance was more liberal than to one single; to one with children more liberal than to one without. Consequences of the most disgusting character had resulted from this arrangement.

Marriages, such as could never have been anticipated, had been solemnized. Women advanced in life had led minors to the altar, and nuptials of the most thoughtless, revolting character had been consecrated, and followed by domestic relations, such as may be easily imagined where there is no motive to union beyond the sordid one of obtaining larger allowances.

As children give to the parent enlarged claims to public bounty, females abandoned themselves to shameless debauchery, and thus, and for such causes, seduction and open profligacy were encouraged. These were not matters of occasional occurrence, but, as the commissioners state, common, every day's practice.

So shameless and lost are they to all moral decency and propriety, that they treat with scorn and contempt those who endeavor, by honest labor, to sustain themselves; they sneer at them as slaves to their own necessities, as in a condition less independent and more to be deplored than their own, holding themselves to be a privileged body, an aristocracy living upon what they extort from others. Thus they seduce the industrious from their principles and habits, and convert them into associates in their own idleness and vice.

In this manner the tide of pauperism has swelled and swept with a fearful current over some portions of England, bidding defiance to the laws, and almost prostrating the civil authority.

In one parish the numbers increased, and the demands with them, until the taxes exceeded the rents and income of the whole landed territory, and landlords and tenants, being thus made paupers, abandoned the soil.

In many parishes the officers have declared, that they dare not withhold relief, even when demanded by persons, well able to support themselves, for fear of personal injury or malicious mischief to their property; and it is said, that the burning of many ricks of hay and grain, of which we have heard, come from this cause.

Such is a faint outline of the picture of idleness and moral depravity disclosed by this evidence, and it is but an outline, for the details of disgusting particulars would more than sustain and fill up the picture. The proof shows that their lives are stained with guilt and crime. It is greatly to be deplored that such a state of things exists; but such is the character of these proofs, that it may well be doubted if there is among civilized man to be found another class so reckless and depraved.

It is not singular that the body politic should seek relief from such a disease, preying upon its vitals, and threatening it with abiding infirmity.

This, (said Mr. Davis), brings me to a point where I will show the interest which the American people have in this matter. In the course of the inquiries made by the commissioners, they discovered that some of the parishes had, of their own accord, and without any authority in law, as it seems, adopted the plan of ridding themselves of the evil, by persuading the paupers to emigrate to this side of the Atlantic. And whom, Mr. President, did they send? The most idle and vicious; furnishing them with money, besides paying their passage, and then leaving them on this continent, either to reform, or to rely on the people here for support. The commissioners, forcibly impressed with the efficiency of this plan, as a complete remedy, strongly recommended to parliament to adopt it, and to authorise the parishes to raise money by taxes for this purpose. They propose, too, that the most idle, debauched and corrupt, the incurable portion, should be selected for this purpose; while the better portion should be left, to be reclaimed when detached from the force of evil counsel and evil example. They do not, it is true, propose to send them to the United States; this would be too bold a proposition; but it seems that they have no objection to their finding their way hither. True to their own sentiments and unconquerable idleness, these paupers no sooner reach here, than they cast themselves upon the public for support. Those acknowledging themselves to be pauper emigrants, have been repeatedly found in the house of industry in Boston, with the very money received from the parish concealed about them, and, in some instances, to prevent detection, sewed into their clothes. Out of 866 persons received into that place, during the last year, 516 were foreigners; not all, by any means, of this class, nor is it possible to ascertain how many. In this way, Massachusetts disbursts from her public treasury, over fifty thousand dollars annually, to relieve foreign paupers, and this but imperfectly meets the expense.

She has attempted to modify the evil by countervailing legislation, by requiring bonds from masters of vessels bringing foreign passengers, conditioned that for a given period they shall not become chargeable to the public. This, however, proves inadequate; for while her laws on this subject are more humane than some of the adjoining states, the emigrants will find their way into the commonwealth. Many, doubtless, are sent out to the neighboring provinces, and thence come to us coastwise; others, perhaps, have, or will enter by the Canada frontier, and penetrate to places where they can find the best provision for them. They have been detected in New York, as in Massachusetts.

Now, sir, is it just? Is it morally right for Great Britain to attempt to throw upon us this oppressive burden of sustaining her poor? Shall she be permitted to legislate them out of the kingdom, and to impose on us a tax for their support, without an effort on our part to countervail such a policy? Would it not be wronging our own virtuous poor to divide their bread with those who have no just or natural claims upon us? And above all, sir, shall we fold our arms and see this moral pestilence sent amongst us to poison the public mind, and do irremediable mischief? Sir, I hope this country will always afford an asylum to the worthy and oppressed, of all classes and conditions; but humanity makes no appeal to us to receive and cherish those who have no respect for virtue, morality or themselves; those who are forced among us, because they are too corrupt, debauched and indolent, to be tolerated in a country not over scrupulous in its morals.*

The subject, sir, merits consideration and further examination; and I move the printing of the resolution, and its reference to the committee on commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

THE INDIANS.—WINNEBAGO SCHOOL.

From the Galena Advertiser.

The school established by government, for the benefit of the Winnebagoes, at Prairie du Chien, contains at this time, 9 scholars, viz:

Three Winnebago boys, and one woman of the same nation. One half breed woman (Winnebago and Sac) and her little girl.

One quarter breed girl (Winnebago and white).

One Menominee woman and her daughter, (half breed).

When we look at the expense which this establishment has been and is to the government, and the little benefit which the Indians derive from it, it may well excite the surprise of those who believe that government should be administered with an eye to the strictest economy, that it is not abolished at once. Here are a few of the items of the expense to the government of this philanthropic institution. The buildings in the outstair, cost the government $3,000, and the annual expense of the establishment $4,500. The teachers' salaries, boarding of scholars, and other immediate expenses of the school, $3,000, add to which $1,500 for labor on a farm attached to the establishment makes the sum $4,500. This sum, treble what it ought to be, is expended to little if any purpose. The school is not recognized by the Indians, and is looked upon by them with any other than friendly feelings. They have taken their children away from it, and are loud in their execrations against government, for imposing it upon them. Its expenses are defrayed by government, but nevertheless they look upon it as another fraud and imposition upon their ignorance and credulity, which has so repeatedly been practised upon this frontier. The manner in which the Indian department has been conducted, is perfectly unknown to the public generally, but could all the facts connected with the department come out—could the transactions of the department with its under agents, traders, &c. and they with the Indians, be laid bare to the public gaze, we are confident there would be but one opinion among honest and disinterested men, of its value or benefit to the government or the Indians, under its present organization. The manner of paying money to the Indians, we look upon as a very poor one at best. The English mode of treating with the Indians we consider altogether the most proper and beneficial to all concerned. We are not disposed to find fault without a cause, neither are we about to suggest a new method for a different organization of the department, but we believe if a different course was pursued towards the Indians, we would not hear of so much discontent manifested among them. Let government once or twice a year, spring and fall, assemble the Indians by tribes, at some convenient point, and make them presents, not in money, but in corn, meat, blankets and other necessities of life, to the full value of their annuities, and let these presents or rations be distributed by honest and responsible men, who have no pecuniary interest in their disposal, and under the direct surveillance of the department. We are confident that if some such arrangement could be effected, it would operate advantageously to the future peace of the frontier, and while rendering the Indians comfortable and at ease, it would preserve a friendly disposition towards the whites. Responsible men can be found all along the frontier, every way competent, by acquaintance with the habits, character and disposition of the Indians, for disbursing agents. Warehouses might be built and furnished for the purpose with a supply for each tribe per year, and enough might be given out to them at one time to last them until another regular distribution. Government having purchased their lands, their finest hunting grounds, and located them on lands which yield little or nothing from cultivation or game, many of the tribes are in a truly pitiable condition. They dare not come back on their old hunting grounds, lest it be deemed an infraction of the treaty, which they had agreed to, in many instances, while in a state of little better than inebriety, and defrauded and swindled by men in whom they had put confidence, the poor devils are left to pick their way through the world as they best may, living upon the scanty roots which the soil affords, or shooting the settlers' hogs and cattle when they happen to wander too near their wigwams. In this state of things it is not the least surprising that their passions should become inflamed, and discontent spread rapidly among them. Government should take them into its especial keeping and protection. We have realized an immense surplus revenue from the sale of their hunting grounds, and in what manner could we better dispose of a part of it, than in ameliorating their condition as far as possible, and in strengthening the friendly relations existing between us.

At present many of the immediate disbursing agents, are traders, who have credited the Indians to a large amount in expectation of deducting it out of their annual annuities when the money should be placed in their hands. We are informed that one trading establishment had credited the Indians to a heavy amount, during the past year, no one knows for what, and when the annuities came on, refused to distribute them, but hold on to the whole amount—$11,000. Is this justice to the Indian? Is this the way that a high-minded, liberal people should treat the weak and deluded sons of the forest? Assuredly not. But the answer may be returned that the Indians have received the value of the money in goods and liquors—perhaps they have. But do these gentlemen—these traders, account for the distribution of the money, and how and to whom was the money distributed? They may account to the superintendent.

dent of Indian affairs, but are these accounts open to the inspection of the public?

Why is it that we never hear of Indian disturbances on the Canadian frontier? Because the policy pursued by that government towards their red neighbors, has been such that it secures the good will, while it ameliorates in a degree, their moral condition. The Indian knows not the real value of money, only that it secures to him the gratifying of his vicious propensity for drink, which the whites have introduced, is the summit of his wish as long as he has a cent of the unexpended annuity left in his pouch. This excites brawls among themselves, often, yea very often, ending in the destruction of life, and sometimes in the death of a white, against whom they have a grudge, or from whom they have received an affront. If a white man kills an Indian, there is nothing said about it—the offender is never brought to justice. But if an Indian kills a white man, he is pursued with the utmost rigor of the laws—detachments of troops are sent in pursuit, and the offender is demanded of the tribe of which he happens to be a member. So there is no other resource but to surrender up the offender, or resist in open and sanguinary war. The offender is taken by the whites, tried by the same, whites give testimony against him, and he is finally executed by the whites.

But the school. Letters have frequently gone on to Washington, disclosing the real situation of this establishment, but there appears to have been no attention paid to them. Individuals have laid these facts before the department, and yet there is no remedy. Government still pours its thousands into the lap of the rev. schoolmaster, without considering whether the Indians reap any benefit from the institution or no. How long this state of things may last, we know not, but if there is not something done, and that speedily, in relation to this matter, the department will not gain many admirers of its efficiency and usefulness, in this quarter. All parties join in the opinion, that 4,500 dollars per annum for educating nine Indian women and children, is paying rather dear for the while.

Kalamazoo land office, April 20th, 1836.

The undersigned deeply regretting the nefarious transactions, which are daily practised and repeated by certain individuals in the vicinity of this land office, and impelled by a sense of duty, both to the public and themselves, feel bound to state, that from facts and circumstances within their knowledge, they are thoroughly convinced that numerous individuals, without capital, and without integrity, are in the constant practice of making applications to the register of this office for large quantities of land for the purpose of imposing upon the honest purchaser, by inducing him to pay them for what they are pleased to call their right, thereby assuming and exercising a partial control over numerous lots of land, without either the intention or ability to pay for it, and in many instances with no knowledge of its quality. This practice, so dastardly in itself, and so injurious in its consequences, is nevertheless beyond the power of the officers wholly to prevent. Many instances have therefore occurred where these gentry have taken applications for land and being unable to sell their right, have failed to complete them—thus leaving the land marked on the plats as sold until the arrears of business could be brought up and the fraud detected. Other individuals may have honestly applied, in the mean time for the same land, and been answered that it was taken, when an application, subsequent to the detection of this fraud, may have purchased it; thereby causing, on the part of the intermediate applicants, just indignation, and inducing them in some instances, to reproach the officers and charge them with exercising partiality among purchasers. It is therefore confidently hoped, that real and honest purchasers will aid in suppressing this species of swindling, by treating every effort of the kind with merited contempt.

DINNER TO MR. FOX.

In celebration of the mediation of Great Britain between the United States and France.

A number of gentlemen of Baltimore having determined to express their approbation of the liberal course pursued towards the United States by the government of Great Britain in the affair of the mediation, took an early opportunity after the arrival of Henry S. Fox, esq. his Britannic majesty's minister, to invite him to a dinner to be given at Mr. Page's in this city, on the 7th inst. Mr. Fox promptly accepted the invitation, and suitable preparations were accordingly made to signalize the event which the dinner was intended to celebrate. The chief justice of the United States, the vice president and the heads of departments, the diplomatic representatives of foreign powers, (including the secretary of the British legation and the British consul at Baltimore), the commissioners of the navy, the Maryland senators in the United States senate, the representatives in congress from the city of Baltimore, the district judge of this district, and the mayor of the city, were invited as guests.

On Saturday, the 7th inst. the company sat down to dinner at half past six o'clock. The table was most sumptuously supplied with every thing to gratify the palate, served up with an elegance certainly never surpassed, if ever equalled, at any public dinner in this city. The liberality and taste of the host, Mr. Page, were conspicuously displayed in the abundance as well as in the matchless cookery of his viands, in the delicacies which his research had provided, in the costliness, excellence and variety of his wines, and in the rich embellishments with which the board was adorned. The room was decorated with portraits of the president of the United States and of William the fourth, surrounded each with the flag of his country. For the taste exhibited in these and other arrangements of the feast, we are indebted to col. John Thomas.

Mr. Gilmer presided, assisted by J. Meredith, J. P. Kennedy, Dr. Macauley and J. S. Nicholas as vice presidents.

During the evening the company drank the following toasts:

1. The president of the United States.
2. His Britannic majesty William the fourth—we recognise in his late mediation, on one hand, the chivalrous courtesy of a gallant nation to an ancient and brave foe and, on the other, an honorable acknowledgment of the ties of kindred to a people who have inherited with English law and liberty a claim to share in the early triumphs of England's arts and arms. May this sentiment be the sure foundation of perpetual friendship between us and our father-land.

This sentiment was received with a lively manifestation of good feeling by the company, and was responded to by Mr. Fox in the following language:

Gentlemen: I thank you, most cordially, in the name of my government and of my country, for the manner in which you have drunk the health of the sovereign of Great Britain, and for the handsome terms in which you have spoken of the late offer of mediation. That offer has been nobly responded to by the government and by the people of America. We know that the office of peace-maker is blessed throughout all lands; but how supremely gratifying, when the occasion is found for exercising that office towards a friendly and a kindred nation!—towards a people who feel and acknowledge the kindness of the act, and who well know the value of its results! Gentlemen, I may truly say that it is for the interests of the whole human race that America should continue to enjoy the blessings of peace—for America knows how to turn those blessings to a noble use. When I behold the amazing, the unexampled progress which this country is making, is daily and hourly making, in all the paths of peaceful civilization, in arts and in literature, and in every noble enterprise of industry and commerce; when I behold these things, and when I reflect, on the other hand, upon how nice a balance the event seemed lately to hang, whether all these happy pursuits, whether all these fair hopes, were not to be suddenly crossed and interrupted by the rude hand of war—I feel that it is a just cause for exultation to an Englishman that the mediation of his government has been in some degree instrumental in averting so cruel a calamity. I firmly believe that so long as friendship subsists between England, America and France, they may command peace over the globe. I am as firmly persuaded that a war now waged between any two of these three great liberal powers would retard, and perhaps for generations to come, the general improvement of mankind.

Gentlemen, in thanking you for the toast you have drunk to the health of my beloved sovereign, I will add that, if ever there was a king in the world whose name may be hailed with pride and satisfaction in an assembly of freemen—in an assembly of American citizens—it is king William the fourth of England. For already, during the few years that he has reigned, and under his generous auspices, a greater progress has been made in England in strengthening and securing our free and popular institutions, than during long ages that preceded. As Americans, you are partakers, you are inheritors, together with ourselves, of the glorious birthright of British liberty; and I am sure that you behold with interest and affection the present course of public affairs in England. You there behold a king and his subjects, not madly struggling against each other for vain supremacy, but a patriot king leading on a willing people in the great march of intellect and improvement—a government and a nation laboring cordially together, not to extend the dominions of their country by war, but to render its social and political institutions more free and more popular. This is the great work in which your brethren in England are now employed, and I am sure that they have the good wishes of the people of America for their success.

Gentlemen, my sincere and ardent hope is that the friendship which now unites our two countries—the two great nations of kindred race that people America and England—that our friendship may be as lasting as it is honorable and precious to both. We will all strive and study to cultivate and to perpetuate it. We owe this to our common language, we owe it to the memory of our common ancestors. Americans will not forget that in England repose the ashes of their fathers; and England will look with pride and exultation upon America, as the noblest, the first-born and the best beloved of her children.

Mr. Fox concluded by offering the following sentiment:

"The United States of America—May the friendship which unites the two kindred nations of America and England be as lasting as it is honorable and precious to both!"

This was followed by—

"Our guest—We tender him the cordial welcome due to the station he fills, and the name he bears; both deeply interesting to the affections of the American people."

This toast drew forth a second reply from Mr. Fox, which was delivered with much emotion:

"Gentlemen: I am overcome with the very kind and flattering manner in which you have been good enough to drink my health. I want words to express my sense of your kindness.

The friendly, and I may say the affectionate welcome which I have met with in America, can never be effaced from my recollection. If my conduct, as British representative in this country, shall in any way contribute to strengthen the ties of friendship which now unite America to England, that will indeed be the most fortunate circumstance of my life. Gentlemen, it has been my destiny in the public service, to be for many years absent from my native country. But I assure you that I have felt, upon landing in America, as if I were at once returned to my family, and my home, and my native land. I have found myself among men who speak the same language, who have the same thoughts, habits and feelings—who are governed, almost by the same laws and institutions—who look back with pride upon the same pages of history—who delight in the fame of the same poets and orators: in short, I have found in America another England.

"Gentlemen, you have been kind enough to allude to the name which I bear, and to the affection with which that name is cherished in America. I thank you most cordially for that friendly allusion. I feel, indeed, in this country, a peculiar pride in being related by birth to a British statesman, Mr. Charles Fox, who was the truest and earliest friend to America that appeared amongst my countrymen. If we might imagine that the spirits of great men that are departed could look back upon the world which they have left, how it would cheer that generous spirit to behold the America of the present day—to see that the greatness, which he oftentimes in the British parliament prophesied for this free and happy land, has been more than realized—to find those prophecies a hundred and a thousand fold fulfilled!"

Mr. Fox concluded with the sentiment:

"The city of Baltimore—Long may liberty and peace protect the industry and enterprise of her citizens!"

General Smith, the mayor of the city, rose to reply to Mr. Fox's last toast, and after some appropriate remarks, uttered with a firmness of tone that showed the vigor and animation of the veteran whose fire time has not yet been able to quench, gave the following:

"The floating bulwarks of Great Britain and the U. States—a host against the world. May they never again be found in hostile array against each other."

The president then announced

4. Charles Bankhead, esq. secretary of the British legation—He has added a new claim to our regard by his efficient co-operation with his own government in the restoration of harmony between the United States and France.

Mr. Bankhead rose, and replied—

Gentlemen: I beg leave to return you my best thanks for the honor you have conferred upon me by drinking my health.

I am so little in the habit of addressing a public company, and especially so distinguished a party as that now before me, that I must crave your indulgence. I assure you that I am deeply impressed by your kindness, although I am utterly at a loss to give a proper expression to my feelings.

I received with unalloyed pride and gratification the order of my government to offer his majesty's mediation to the president of the United States; and whatever difficulties I fancied would exist in the fulfilment of that negotiation, they were instantly dispelled by the prompt and friendly reception and acceptance of that offer by general Jackson and his cabinet. Such conciliatory conduct will be viewed with admiration by his majesty's government, and must have the effect of healing those differences which existed for a moment between the United States and France, and of restoring to their former intimacy the relations of friendship which have so long united those two nations.

I beg leave to propose the following toast:

"May the intercourse subsisting between Great Britain and her glorious offspring, the United States, ever have for its basis mutual attachment and good will, and the exercise of a just and honorable ambition."

After the mayor had retired, his health was proposed and drank; and as the hour of midnight approached, the guests withdrew. Soon afterwards the company broke up. This concluded an evening replete with social gratification, and to the enjoyments of which every one felt how important a share had been contributed by Mr. Page. [Patriot.]

CRUISE OF THE PEACOCK.

By the ship Shepherdess, from Bombay arrived at Saletti, we have received papers and letters to the 23d December. At that date the U. S. ship Peacock and schooner Enterprise were at Colombo, Isle of Ceylon, where they had put in for water, &c. The officers and crews of both vessels were in good health, and not a death had occurred since the commencement of the cruise. [Gazette.]

We find the following correspondence in the Bombay Gazette of the 15th December:

Messrs. Editors. Assured that you will not object to publishing the enclosed copy of a letter from commodore E. P. Kennedy, to sir Charles Malcolm, I forward it to you to show you that we are not unmindful of the kindness and attention received from the officers of the government during our stay at Bombay.

I am sure that the friendly feelings produced by our visit to this presidency will be long cherished by us. Very respectfully, yours, obediently, C. W. STRIBLING.

SIR: I cannot leave Bombay without expressing through you the obligations which I feel to the master attendant and the officers of the dock at this place, for the prompt and efficient assistance which I have received in the repairs of this ship, and the schooner Enterprise; without such friendly aid and assistance, our reef would have been attended with increased expense and delay. I would at the same time desire to express, in the name of my country, the obligations I feel to the governor in council for his ready compliance with every request which I have had occasion to make; and I shall take care that the government of the United States is duly informed of the same. Permit me also to say, that for your continued personal attentions, I cannot express myself in terms equal to my feelings. I am, sir, with great respect, yours, respectfully, (Signed) E. P. KENNEDY, commanding U. S. naval forces.

To capt. sir Charles Malcolm, R. N. superintendent of the Indian navy.

CRUISE OF THE VINCENNES.

Copy of a letter received by the secretary of the navy, from captain John H. Aulick, dated

U. S. ship Vincennes, Lintre, January 6, 1836.

SIR: By a vessel on the point of sailing for New York, I do myself the honor of informing you, that I arrived at this place on the second instant. As I was not apprised of the intended departure of this vessel until within a few hours since, want of time precludes my making at present, a full report in detail of my proceedings since I left the coast of Peru, and compels me to limit myself to inform the department, that in the course of my passage across the Pacific, I visited the Washington or Northern Marquesas, the Society, the Friendly, and the Navigators' islands; Wallis' Island, Rotonah, Quam, Lord North's and the Peleaga islands. From the last named I brought off, after considerable difficulty with the chiefs, the only remaining men (two) of the ship of the Mentor, left there as hostages by captain Barnard in 1832. Of the six of his crew which he left on North's island, four died, and two made their escape in a passing vessel, some months ago.

I have taken note of the different islands I have touched at, in all, twenty American seamen, who had been left on shore in a desolate condition by different whalers and traders; the greater part of whom I have put on board, by their own consent, of various American vessels that were in want of hands. We have all enjoyed remarkably good health, and there are this day but five on the surgeon's report, and those with but trifling complaints. I had but a few days since anticipated the gratification of being able to report that this interesting cruise had been thus far accomplished without the occurrence of a single casualty or accident of any description whatever; but unfortunately, on the very day we entered the China sea, William (Williams, a seaman), fell from aloft overboard, and although the life buoy was dropped near him, and every effort promptly made to save him, he was so much injured by the fall, that he almost immediately sunk and was lost.

I shall leave here for the west coast of Sumatra by way of the straits of Malacca, as soon as I have put my sails and rigging in order, and take in the necessary supplies of provision and water which will probably be about the 25th instant; and I hope to arrive in the United States in all June.

I herewith enclose the monthly returns up to the 1st of this month. I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. H. AULICK.

COMMERCIAL BANK INVESTIGATION.

From the Albany Evening Journal.

IN THE SENATE OF NEW YORK.

Report of the select committee on the Commercial bank investigation.

The select committee, appointed by a resolution of the senate, of the 16th of February last, to inquire whether any member of the senate was concerned with the late cashier Bartow, in his abstraction of the funds of the Commercial bank, &c. submit their proceedings, the expose of the bank, the answer thereto of Mr. Kemble and Mr. Bishop, and the testimony which was adduced on the investigation, together with the following

REPORT:

It may, perhaps, be proper in the first place, to spend a few moments in an examination of the nature, extent and object of the jurisdiction which is conferred on the senate by that clause in the constitution, which constitutes it the judge of the qualifications of its members. It was, doubtless, under the authority derived from this clause, that the committee were instructed to make the inquiry which was committed to them.

This power of judging, it is presumed, gives no authority to the senate to supervise the talents, patriotism or learning of any of its members, nor to prescribe any standard of religious or political opinion, or any particular grade of moral worth.—With respect to these, and all other general qualifications, or disqualifications, the electors are the only judges; and although they may be sometimes deceived, yet the mischief is but temporary.

But every legislative body must have rules of proceeding in the transaction of its business; and to these rules it is indispensable that its members should conform. Of this conformity, the senate is the only judge; and its existence, as a deliberative body, requires it to enforce, if necessary, obedience to its rules, and even to expel any member who might put its authority at defiance.

There is also a moral supervision which, of necessity, belongs to the senate, and which, on all proper occasions, it is bound to exercise. If a member of this body should so far forget the duties of his station, as to prostitute his official acts to the purposes of private gain or individual emolument, such a dereliction of official duty, when brought to the notice of the senate, would call for a prompt examination, and if sustained, would require such reprehension as the character of the transaction might merit. Gross and notorious immorality also, which should indicate a palpable want of moral principle, such as would be calculated to tarnish the character of the senate, and bring its acts into disrespect and contempt, would be a fit subject of examination and censure.

To legislate is the highest and holiest function, that man can delegate to his fellow man. Life, liberty, property and the pursuit of happiness, are materially dependent on the integrity of legislation. Laws affect a whole community, and much of the respect and obedience which they inspire, arises from the purity of the source from which they are supposed to emanate. It is, therefore, of vast moment to the public morality, and to the general good, that every legislative body should preserve itself free from imputation or reproach. And should any of its members conduct in such manner as to attach odium to their official associates, it is due to the community which they represent, it is sanctioned by immemorial parliamentary usage, and is required by the dictates of reason and justice, and the laws of self-preservation, that they should shield themselves from imputed censure and reflected disgrace, by an open reprobation of the delinquents. But this supervision should never be exercised, except in cases which are distinctly marked with an obvious dereliction of moral principle. It is better to leave the ordinary delinquencies of public men to the correction of public sentiment, than to waste time in making an exhibition of venial frailties. It may, perhaps, be assumed as a safe position, that should a member of the senate be guilty of such glaring immorality, or such official misconduct, as would produce a clear moral conviction that he would be condemned by his constituents, if put to the test of the ballot box, it would be the duty of the senate in such case, in deference to public sentiment as well as out of respect to itself, to expel such member from his seat. This position is founded on the assumption, that the senate ought to maintain a tone of moral feeling, as lofty and as pure as is maintained by the community which it represents.

If the foregoing suggestions are sound, they will furnish some guide to the committee and the senate in the examination of the voluminous mass of testimony which is herewith submitted. In the judgment of the committee, much of the evidence has very little, if any, application to any matter of which the senate should take cognizance.

The committee do not consider it their duty to inquire, whether any of the directors of the Commercial bank may have been influenced by personal or political hostility, in their disclosure of a supposed connexion between their late cashier Bartow, and Messrs. Kemble and Bishop, in the abstraction of the funds of the bank. Nor whether the suspicion or knowledge which some of the directors may have had last spring and summer, that Bartow was dealing more or less in stocks, ought to have shaken their confidence in his integrity, and put them on their guard. If the reluctance of the board in the integrity of their cashier was too unbounded, the visitation for that indiscretion or apathy, has been severe. Nor is it of any moment, in the opinion of the committee, to examine minutely the purchases and sales of stocks, the losses or gains which their fluctuations produced, or to trace the late cashier through all the evolutions of stock gambling to his final catastrophe: And it is not, as the committee believe, legitimately within their province to inquire, whether there was such a connexion between Messrs. Bartow, Kemble and Bishop, as to make the two latter legally responsible to the bank for that portion of its funds which was drawn on their checks. It is not legal liabilities, but moral and official delinquencies to which the committee believe their attention ought to be exclusively directed.

The purity of modern and improved ethical science reprobates the position, that the ends justifies the means, or the means the end. The committee do not, therefore, perceive the materiality of endeavoring to ascertain whether, in the purchase and sale of stocks, in which Messrs. Bartow, Kemble and Bishop were jointly interested, money was or might have been made or lost. In a court of conscience, the moral character of any human transaction cannot be materially changed by the contingency of failure or success.

The committee will, as they have before intimated, omit to enter into a minute review of the great mass of testimony, and will confine themselves to a short commentary on such parts of it only as they deem material. They will also exclude from their consideration, every extraneous matter, whether of accusation or of exculpation, and confine themselves strictly to the evidence.

They would in the first place call the attention of the senate to eight letters of Messrs. Bishop and Kemble, directed to H. Bartow, and found among papers which he left when he absconded. These letters will be found in the expose of the bank, and were admitted by Messrs. Kemble and Bishop to be genuine. From them it clearly appears, that Messrs. Kemble and Bishop was largely engaged in the purchase and sale of stocks, in which Bartow and they had a joint interest. To carry on these stock transactions, they drew on the Commercial bank for large sums of money, which were paid by Bartow's directions; the amounts of which drafts are particularly detailed in the testimony of Mr. Lovett, the teller of the bank. There seems to have been some agreement, by which Messrs. Kemble and Bishop were to deal generally in any kind of stock in the market; were to buy and sell, and draw on the late cashier Bartow for the necessary funds. The nature and extent of the mutual interest which existed between Messrs. Kemble, Bishop and Bartow, in their extensive dealings, may perhaps be inferred from the letters of the two former; but of the exact time when the agreement creating this interest was made, the committee have found no proof, except that which is contained in the evidence of Mr. Bishop.

In the first letter of Mr. Bishop, dated the 25th of May, as the committee understand it, a loss which had been previously sustained or anticipated, in some stock transaction, is alluded to in the following words: "If we have been sucked, I extremely regret that it was not to a much greater extent." And in a postscript to the same letter, by Mr. Kemble, he apprised Bartow of large purchases of stocks already made, and to be made, and closes by saying, "you need not fear that we are sucked." Mr. Kemble's reason for this assurance, seems to be found in his previous remarks, respecting one kind of stocks: that "having about 175 shares, we design to buy up 1,050 or more, and, in alliance with — run it up." In Mr. Bishop's letter of the 26th of May, he informs Bartow, "we sold all our Harlaem, purchased and on subscription, yesterday afternoon, at 112 to 112½; to-day it is worth more, but it is a damned bubble. I would engage to sell, at 30 days, for 105; we have made money on it, and let others do better. I was especially induced to sell, as you seemed to be fearful of losing upon it, (from your letter). We yesterday afternoon purchased 359 shares of Long Island rail road, at 102½ to 103, which including 185 on subscription, is 525 shares. I would take 1,000 more at the same price." &c.—Again, in the same letter, "I have been in hopes you would advise us of your opinion in reference to stocks, and instruct us to buy something; but you do not seem to be in a speculating mood." Again, "we got 100 more of the Long Island at 103, but it immediately advanced to 104, and so we are up as to that. We have now 625 shares, $31,250. I think we shall make $1,500 upon it."

In Mr. Bishop's letter of the 29th May, he informs Bartow, "I have barely time to observe, that we have drawn upon you for $12,500; you must not be alarmed. We have the advice of the best financiers in this city, and although stocks are now depressed, rely upon a reaction."

In Mr. Bishop's letter of the 16th July, he says: "I observe from the newspapers that the stocks in which we are interested, are rather low. I am willing to sell at present prices, if it is thought best by all concerned," &c.

In Mr. Kemble's letter of the 6th of October, he writes to Bartow as follows: "The long wished for event has arrived.—Long Island has gone up, and may still go up or down, as we determine. I have negotiated day after day, and kept the business unfinished, until an expression has gone abroad in Wall, that a combination has been formed. But I have not pledged our stock; and it can now probably be sold at 105, and upwards, or a most excellent arrangement can be made to run it up, and then dispose of it. Those who have been buying largely on time, are now in our power, and are willing now to come to almost any terms.

"I wish yourself or Mr. —, to come down immediately, and have all our stock in hand, so that we can sell if we think proper, or otherwise ripen a combination."

From the above extracts the character of the business in which Messrs. Kemble and Bishop were engaged, by the aid of funds drawn from the Commercial bank, is sufficiently obvious.

The frauds, concealments and false entry of Bartow, connected with the furnishing of these funds, are fully detailed by the testimony of Mr. Lovett, the teller. If the business in which Messrs. Kemble and Bishop were engaged, in joint interest with Bartow, was fair and honest, then they ought not, in the least, to be censured for the fraud and concealment which he practised on the directors of the bank, in supplying funds to conduct it. But if the transactions in which they were engaged were of an opposite character, then it will be for the senate to determine whether they are not morally responsible for the results which followed. It is believed to be a sound rule in morals, that he who acts against the dictates of conscience, is responsible for all the consequences of his conduct.

It can hardly be necessary to inform the senate, that the letters of Messrs. Kemble and Bishop clearly prove that they were deeply concerned in stock-jobbing. Stock-jobbing is the buying and selling of stocks for the purpose of deriving gain from the fluctuations in their prices. And the arts which are resorted to in this business, to "run up," or to depress stocks, and the secret combinations which are sometimes formed, to control the market and extort money from those who have sold on time, render stock-jobbing, under such circumstances, one of the most hazardous and demoralizing species of gambling. The buying of stocks on time, is tantamount to a wager as to their price on a given future day. The investment of money or other property in stocks, may be an innocent transaction. But, observes Say, in his treatise on political economy, "when these transfers degenerate into stock-jobbing, that is to say, the making of a profit by the rise and fall of their price, they are productive of much mischief. In the first place, by the unproductive employment, on this object, of the agent of circulation, money, which is an item of the national capital; and in the next, by procuring a gain to one person by the loss of another, which is the characteristic of gambling. The occupation of the stock-jobber yields no new or useful product; consequently, having no product of his own to give in exchange, he has no gains but what he contrives to make out of the unskilfulness or ill-fortune of gamblers like himself." Stock-jobbing is regarded as a great immorality and evil in all civilized communities. The reckless spirit of gambling which it excites; the individual loss and ruin which it occasions, and its demoralizing effects upon the young and thoughtless, by diverting them from the sober pursuits of industry, under the delusive hopes of acquiring sudden wealth, have been long deplored. The gains of the few create the madness of the many; like the adventurers in a lottery, who are too intent upon the prizes to reflect upon the blanks.

In Europe, government stocks exist to an almost indefinite amount, and their variations in value are, for that cause, nearly beyond the control of individual management: changes of ministry and rumors of peace or war, are the ordinary causes of fluctuations in their prices. But in this country, where many stock companies, with comparatively small capitals exist, the game of stock-jobbing becomes the more desperate, in proportion to the sudden elevations and depressions of price which individual fraud and art can produce.

The manner in which a combination in stock-jobbing is secretly formed and matured, its design and end, and the contingencies with which it is beset, will be found in the testimony of Henry Lynch, a stock broker from the city of New York. Such a combination is a secret and artful conspiracy to cheat, and would be an indictable offence at common law. And the committee exceedingly regret to perceive in the correspondence of Mr. Kemble, the expression of a willingness to enter into an alliance to "run up" stock, and to "ripen a combination." Such sentiments uttered by a private individual, would receive the reprobation of the moral portion of mankind; but when avowed by a senator, they assume, in the judgment of the committee, a much deeper shade.

Corporations or stock companies are created by acts of the legislature: And will the community believe that acts of this description are fairly and honestly obtained, whilst members of the senate are notoriously engaged in stock-jobbing, with all its immoralities? Is not the conduct of Messrs. Kemble and Bishop, and particularly of the former, as detailed in the testimony herewith submitted, calculated by its example to relax the public morality, and by its tendency, to shake the confidence of the community in the purity of the legislation? These are questions which deserve grave consideration.

At the last session of the legislature a bill passed the senate to repress the demoralizing practice of stock-jobbing. This bill received no opposition in the senate, but owing, as the committee understand, to a great press of business, was not finally acted upon in the assembly. It had its third reading in the senate on the 16th of March, 1835, as appears from the journal. One of the sections of this bill declared all contracts for the sale or transfer of stocks to be absolutely void, unless the party contracting to sell or transfer, should at the time be owner or assignee thereof, and should actually be in possession of the certificate or other evidences of such stock. This provision was designed to prevent the combination alluded to and described in the testimony. Another section provided, that all wagers concerning the price, present or future, of any stock, should be void. The object of this provision was to prevent the gambling purchases and sales of stock on time. This bill provided, that all offences against it should be deemed misdemeanors, and punished by fine and imprisonment. A bill with the same provisions passed the senate unanimously, in the early part of the present session. It provides that every offender against any of its provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court; and all courts of oyer and terminer and general sessions are required to charge grand juries to inquire into offences against this act. The bill of the last session, as well as of the present, recognizes every offence against it as "malum in se," or in other words as involving conscious immorality, or as being a sin against light and knowledge. The declaration in the bill, that every offence against it shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be visited by severe pains and penalties, will, it is believed, justify this inference. And it is deeply to be regretted that Messrs. Kemble and Bishop, so soon after its passing through the senate, should have forgotten or disregarded its moral admonitions.

By recurring to the testimony of Henry Lynch, the stock broker for Messrs. Kemble and Bishop, it will be found that they purchased through him several lots of stock on time; that is to say, deliverable sometime after the purchase at the option of the purchasers. It will be for the senate to determine whether members of its body, under the circumstances of the case, did not act under higher moral responsibilities, and render themselves obnoxious to more severe censures than would have been incurred by private individuals.

But there are other parts of the testimony which contain imputations of direct official misconduct. The facts and circumstances connected with the passage of the bill through the senate, to increase the capital of the Harlem rail road company, are of this character. Such a connexion between Messrs. Kemble, Bishop and Bartow had been shown by the letters of the two former, and other testimony, that a majority of the committee were of opinion that the declaration of Bartow, as to an understanding between him and them in relation to the passage of the said bill, in connexion with the proof of their having acted in accordance with such understanding would be admissible testimony. The declaration beforehand of the course which two senators were, by an alleged arrangement, to pursue, would be either rendered probable as to its truth, or falsified by the event. It was on this ground that a majority of the committee believed the testimony ought to be received. But as the committee, after the question had been argued before them, were divided in opinion, they concluded that it would be the most discreet course to take the direction of the senate. Under this direction, given by a vote of 23 to 6, they proceeded to hear the testimony.

The testimony of A. H. Lovett, the teller of the Commercial bank, to this point, is as follows: He swears that in a conversation which Bartow commenced with him by saying, that he meant to make some money out of the Harlem rail road stock, and while the bill was pending in the senate, Bartow said to him, "I have an understanding with Messrs. Bishop and Kemble, and they are to raise such objections to that bill as to blind the eyes of the New Yorkers until we have got things to suit ourselves, and then the bill will pass."

The testimony of John Townsend, president of the bank, is to the same effect, except that it does not implicate Mr. Bishop; but as respects Mr. Kemble, is strongly confirmatory of the testimony of the teller. He says in substance, that when the Harlem rail road bill was under consideration in the senate, Bartow stated to him that he had arranged with Mr. Kemble to make some movement to delay the passage of the bill that day; that he, Bartow, had entered into a speculation in the Harlem stock, and meant to make money by it; that this made a strong impression on his mind at the time, and that he noticed in the Argus the next day, Mr. Kemble's speech, in fulfilment of what Mr. Kemble was to do, as stated to him by Bartow.

The remarks of Mr. Kemble against the bill, made on the 16th of April, in pursuance of Bartow's prediction, and reported in the Daily Argus of the 15th, and his vote two days afterwards for the bill; his declaration to J. B. Murray, that he only wished to delay the bill two or three days to get information from New York; the advice given by him, on the day he made the attack on the bill, to John L. Schoolcraft on board the steamboat, before it started for New York, to purchase Harlem stock if he wished to make money, and his declaration that the lobby members were then on board the boat going to New York, under the belief that the bill would not pass, but that it would pass in a few days; the anxiety of Bartow, as manifested in his conversation with Augustus James, and in his letters to the same individual, and while the bill was to be delayed, but was finally to pass, and that the New Yorkers were to be blinded; afford a chain of circumstances, which, if they do not produce a conviction of an understanding between Messrs. Bartow and Kemble, manifest a most singular identity of knowledge and of views on the subject of the bill.

There is no testimony to show that Mr. Kemble was to receive or did receive any pecuniary advantage from the purchases of stock, which were made before the bill passed; but if there was a preconcert between him and Bartow, with respect to the course he was to pursue, there is very little difference in the coloring of the transaction, whether that course was for his or Bartow's benefit, or for the benefit of any other individual. It is proven by the testimony of Messrs. Bloomfield and Warren, that the next day after his opposition to this bill, Mr. Kemble assigned as the reason of his opposition, that it had got ahead of a bill or bills of which he had charge. If this reason had been assigned in the senate, and an effort made on his part to rectify any alleged derangement in the regular order of business, it would have been more satisfactory. It will be perceived, also, that the reason assigned by Mr. Kemble to J. B. Murray, for his opposition to the bill, is wholly inconsistent with the above.

On the 18th of April, as appears by the Daily Argus of the 19th, the Harlaem rail road bill was reported by the committee on rail roads in the senate, and Mr. Bishop moved to lay the report on the table; but on a suggestion from the chairman of the committee on rail roads, that the senate would be moved on that day to go into a committee of the whole on the bill, Mr. Bishop withdrew the motion. This appears to have been the only effort made by Mr. Bishop to delay the passage of the bill. Mr. Kemble's attack on the bill was two days thereafter. And it will be perceived by recurring to the reports of the Daily Argus, that both Messrs. Kemble and Bishop interposed obstacles to the passage of the bill, as above stated; and it appears by the journal that they both voted for its final passage on the 17th.

It is in proof that Augustus James, who had been pressed by Bartow to purchase Harlaem rail road stock on their joint account, did purchase, in the city of New York, 800 shares on the 14th and 15th of April, which he afterwards sold at a profit or net gain of $2,239 88; which sum he transmitted to Bartow by a check on the 27th April. On the 28th, the next day, Bartow drew his check on the Commercial bank for $742, and placed that sum to the credit of Mr. Bishop, on the books of the bank. The sum is $1 62 less than the one-third of the profit, as above mentioned, which was made on the purchase and sale of the aforesaid Harlaem stock. Mr. Bishop has been requested by the committee to explain why and on what account that sum, at that time, was placed to his credit by Bartow; but no explanation has been given.

The declaration also of Bartow, to M. H. Webster, while the bill was pending, that Mr. Bishop was interested with him in the Harlaem stock which A. James was going to purchase in New York, is a circumstance of more or less weight, in proportion to the credibility which is due, under the circumstances of the case, to the assertion of Bartow.

On carefully examining all the facts and circumstances connected with the Harlaem rail road bill, before and after its passage, the committee feel constrained to say, that there is strong ground for suspicion, if not for belief, that there was an understanding between Messrs. Kemble, Bishop and Bartow, as to the course which the two former pursued in relation to the passage of the bill, and that this course was adopted and pursued to enable Bartow, if not others, to make money by purchases and sales of the stock to be created by that bill.

There is one other part of the testimony to which the committee will call the attention of the senate: Mr. Schoolcraft, one of the directors of the Commercial bank, testifies, that during the present session, and since the Commercial bank presented its petition to the legislature for an increase of its capital, Mr. Kemble held a conversation with him of the following tenor: Mr. Kemble told him that if the bank would come out and disclaim that they had any thing to do with the circulation of reports that he, Mr. Kemble, had been deeply engaged with Bartow in his abstraction of the funds of the bank, that he, Mr. Kemble, would guaranty the passage of the bill which their petition asked for. The testimony of Mr. Schoolcraft stands unimpeached and unexplained, and the committee cannot therefore doubt that this extraordinary proposition was made by Mr. Kemble, as stated.

If a member of the senate could be supposed to possess a sufficient degree of influence to effect the passage of a law, yet such influence can hardly be deemed to be the legitimate subject of private barter. The offer to guaranty the passage of a law, in consideration of obtaining a disclaimer, does not, in the judgment of the committee, materially differ from a proposition to receive, for a like guarantee, a sum of money. In both cases the motive could be traced with equal certainty, to a desire to subvert the gratification of individual wants, private convenience, or personal cupidity. Members of the legislature, like other men, have various private wants; but to convert legislative influence into an exchangeable commodity, in order to gratify these wants, would shock the moral sense of the community. To exercise the functions of legislation under the influence of mercenary motives, would be a gross dereliction of duty. The making of laws should be characterized with as much purity as is required in their administration; for no better apology can be found for venality in legislative halls, than for corruption in courts of justice.

The power which is delegated to the lawgiver, is superior to that which is confided to the judge; and in proportion to the magnitude of the trust, should its exercise be the more assiduously purified from the alloy of self-interest, and the more devotedly consecrated to the public good.

The committee have now adverted to such portions of the testimony as implicates the moral and official conduct of Messrs. Kemble and Bishop, in such manner as calls for the notice of the senate. Their connexion with Bartow in stock-jobbing, which led to the abstraction of funds for this purpose from the Commercial bank, cannot be regarded, under the circumstances of the case, in any other light than as grossly immoral.

There are strong reasons for believing, from the testimony of Messrs. Lovett, Townsend, Webster, Schoolcraft, James and Murray, together with the reports of the Daily Argus at the time, when all the circumstances are carefully considered and compared, that the official conduct of Messrs. Kemble and Bishop, and particularly of the former, on the bill to increase the stock of the Harlaem rail road company, was pre-concerted with Bartow, for his private benefit, and probably for the benefit of some other individuals. The committee submit to the senate, whether this charge is not established with reasonable certainty against Mr. Kemble, and with strong probability against Mr. Bishop. Men never call witnesses to their unlawful or improper acts; and it is, in general, only from circumstances that such acts can be inferred and established. If this charge is sustained by the testimony, the official conduct of Messrs. Kemble and Bishop, on the aforesaid bill, strongly merits the condemnation of the senate.

The willingness, if not the desire, which is repeatedly expressed by Mr. Kemble, in his letters to Bartow, to form alliances to run up stocks, and his avowed readiness to "ripen a combination," indicate, in the judgment of the committee, such an abandonment of moral principle, as deserves severe reprobation.

The proposition of Mr. Kemble to one of the directors of the Commercial bank, that he would procure the passage of such a law as was solicited by their petition, if the directors of that institution would come out with a disclaimer as to his being concerned with Bartow in abstracting the funds of the bank, evinces, in the judgment of the committee, an utter disregard of official duty. If a member of the senate should offer to pledge his own vote in favor of any pending application, on condition of his obtaining any object which might suit his own private convenience, such offer would be regarded as evidence of official corruption. And a proposition for a like consideration, to guaranty the votes of the members of both branches of the legislature, can hardly be viewed as less revolting, unless the turpitude of the offer can be supposed to be merged in the wholesale character of the transaction.

If the proposition to hypothecate the vote of a single member, would compromise official purity, it is believed that an aggravation of the offence would be found in an extension of the pledge to the representatives of a whole community.

Having thus adverted to the prominent facts and circumstances which have been disclosed in the course of this protracted, laborious and painful investigation, the committee respectfully submit the whole matter to the final judgment of the senate.

S. YOUNG, chairman.

From the same.

In senate—Monday, May 2.

Mr. Van Satch called on the table the following resolutions:

Whereas, it appears from the testimony taken by the committee of investigation appointed on the 16th day of February last, upon the complaint of the Commercial bank of Albany, that John C. Kemble, a member of the senate from the 3d senatorial district, has been guilty of moral and official misconduct, rendering him unworthy of a seat in this body: therefore,

Resolved, That the said John C. Kemble be and he is hereby expelled.

Whereas, it appears from the testimony taken by the committee of investigation appointed on the 16th day of February last, upon the complaint of the Commercial bank of Albany, and also from the facts developed in the investigation ordered by the senate upon the complaint of Lewis Benedict, that Isaac W. Bishop, a member of the senate from the 4th senatorial district, has been guilty of moral and official misconduct, rendering him unworthy of a seat in this body: therefore,

Resolved, That the said Isaac W. Bishop be and he is hereby expelled.

In the course of the debate to expel Mr. Bishop, he addressed the senate as follows: His is the fate of politicians.

He would not make a single effort to repel this or any other accusation, for the sake of retaining his seat in the senate. He should leave this body with no other regrets than those growing out of the severance of the pleasing associations which he had formed with its members, and for whom he should always retain the liveliest sentiments of esteem and respect. Long before this charge or any other had been brought against him, political life had lost all charms for him, and not without good reason; for in sustaining, as he had endeavored to do, the doctrines of the democratic party, and the public men at the head of that party, he had done so at the expense of his peace of mind—been covered with obloquy and reproach by his opponents—and sacrificed his private fortune. It only remained, as a termination of his political career, to overwhelm him with disgrace and destroy his reputation. If such should be the judgment of the senate, he must submit.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 14—VOL. XIV.] BALTIMORE, JUNE 4, 1836. [VOL. L. WHOLE No. 1,289

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

We have given up a large portion of the present sheet to the report of Mr. Pinckney from the select committee to whom was referred the memorials praying for the abolishment of slavery in the District of Columbia. The resolutions which accompanied it, it will be recollected, were passed on the 26th ult. but we have not seen correct lists of the yeas and nays on their passage, which will also be registered as soon as received. We have, however, recorded a curious fact in relation to them, which will be found in our abstract of Wednesday's proceeding of the house of representatives.

We have been compelled to omit, for the want of room, a large number of incidents of savage barbarity which have transpired on the Georgia and Alabama frontier since our last publication—but in our next we will give the details that a correct history of the war may be preserved. By the last accounts the Indians were increasing in boldness and audacity, and making every preparation for a determined resistance. The passage of the mails through the country occupied by them has been completely interrupted, and it has been found necessary to send those intended for New Orleans and the adjacent country, from Wheeling via the steamboats.

The accounts from Florida are also gloomy, and represent the savages as still in uncontrolled possession of the country. The block house at the Wythlacoochee, which was under the command of capt. Hollman, had been attacked by the Indians and that officer killed.

The letters which we publish from generals Scott and Clinch exhibit the operations of the army up to the latest advices, and show any thing but lukewarmness in the discharge of the duties committed to them. The officer first named does not seem disposed quietly to submit to the imputations cast upon him, and his general order of the 17th May, in which he retorts upon his accusers, has, as might have been expected, created great excitement at St. Augustine and among the people of Florida generally.

It is a severe trial to the best disciplined mind to rest quietly under undeserved censure, though fortified by the conviction that justice will ultimately accomplish its work. There are many reasons why a public officer should not come into collision with the people, whose grumblings, when tolerated as a privilege, easily give way to the force of truth; but when retorted by sarcasm become prejudices that it is difficult for truth itself to overcome. Gen. Scott is responsible to his government for his conduct, and, though he has felt as a man under the censure which has been cast upon him as an officer he should not have made up an issue with the people. His reputation is too dear to the country to be frittered away in a war of recrimination.

The bill for the reorganization of the post office department, which has been before the house of representatives for a long time, finally passed that body on Thursday last. It comprises forty-five sections, and was designed to meet every possible contingency that may arise in the administration of the complex affairs of the department. It is, however, still considered incomplete, and will probably undergo many modifications in the senate. Not the least important of its provisions is that reducing the rates of postage, which are also made to conform to the currency of the country—whereby a material benefit will be conferred on the people, and the business of the numerous agents of the department greatly simplified.

The bill prohibiting deputy postmasters from receiving or transmitting incendiary publications through the mail, was ordered to be engrossed in the senate on Thursday last by the casting vote of the vice president. For the proceedings, see page 236.

THE CROPS. The excessive drought of the past season had greatly checked vegetation, and so severely injured the growing crops that they cannot be recovered by the late copious rains. In some sections of the country, wheat fields which presented the promise of the usual crops early in the spring, will barely return the seed; and others have been ploughed up and planted in corn. The wealthy and populous counties of Frederick and Washington, in this state, have suffered severely, and many who have sent wheat to market will be compelled to purchase it for the ordinary consumption of their families. The rye crop is also very bad, and fears are entertained of the corn crop, which it is thought will be seriously injured by the vast quantity of rain that has fallen within the last ten days.

The Attakapas Banner of the 3d ultimo states that the growing sugar crops in that parish promise a greater yield than they have done for a number of years past.

Among the passengers who arrived at New York in the ship Philadelphia, on the 29th ult. from London, were Mr. Wilkins, late minister of the United States to Russia, and James Brooks, esq. editor of the Portland Advertiser, whose letters from Europe have afforded so much instruction and amusement to his countrymen.

The governor of Maryland has pardoned the individuals imprisoned on account of their agency in the riots which took place in Baltimore in August last. The petitions invoking the clemency of the executive, were signed by a large number of the citizens of Baltimore.

The whig convention of Georgia have unanimously nominated Hugh L. White as a candidate for the presidency, and John Tyler as a candidate for the vice presidency. It also framed an electoral ticket.

A FRANKLIN PRESS. We published a paragraph in the "REGISTER," 21st ult. from a London paper, stating that the compositors' case, at which Franklin worked whilst in London still exists as when he left it; and we now see it stated in the New York Courier that the editor of that paper saw, last summer, in the museum at Providence, R. I. the identical rude printing press, complete in all its parts, at which Franklin worked while a journeyman printer in Philadelphia. The editor of the "Register," many years since, had a press in his possession that formerly belonged to Franklin; and if our memory does not deceive us, it formed part of the outfit of Miranda's celebrated expedition.

Among the distinguished transient visitors who were recently, or are now, at Washington, the Intelligencer mentions Jeremiah Smith and Harrison Gray Otis, both members of congress more than forty years ago; gen. Stephen Van Rensselaer (the patroon) of New York; judges Woodworth and Rochester, of New York; judge Dabney Carr, of Virginia; John Branch, of North Carolina, and Edward Colston, formerly members of congress, &c. Mr. Branch is direct from Tallahassee, Florida, and it is said that he confirms the late accounts of the Indian depredations.

ABOLITION. At the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, recently held in Cincinnati, Ohio, the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved by the delegates of the annual conferences, in general conference assembled, That we are entirely opposed to modern abolitionism, and wholly disclaim any right, wish or intention to interfere with the civil and political relation of master and slave, as it exists in the slaveholding states of this country."

"The question on this resolution was divided, and the first branch, which refers to abolitionism, or the part preceeding the word 'and,' was carried by a vote of 122 to 14. After which, the latter part of the resolution was unanimously adopted."

HORRIBLE. The spirit of the first born appears to be rife in some sections of our country, and both humanity and the law are set at defiance. The following account of an "honorable affair," from an eye witness, adds another to the black catalogue of crimes which have lately disgraced the land.

"A Spaniard and a Frenchman, who have long been accustomed to trapping on the mountains, on arriving at this place went out to settle an affair of honor. The spot selected for the purpose was an open square in the suburbs of the city. When all parties were ready and stripped for the occasion, with two large Bowie-knives, (an instrument about twelve inches in length, and an inch and a half wide at the hilt, with two edges tapering to a sharp point), and the word "ready" was given, both rushed to the contest! After parrying these deadly weapons, and guarding and plunging some half minute, the Frenchman made a strike at the Spaniard, and succeeded in cutting open the abdomen, so as to let out all the bowels! At the same time the Spaniard plunged his knife about ten inches in the breast of his antagonist, who immediately yielded up the ghost with a deep groan. The Spaniard survived some hours. With me the scene created the most wretched feelings of horror; but with many of the spectators it served only for a subject of discussion, as to which showed the most coolness, and parried the thrusts of his antagonist with the most skill; in short, which showed the most sleight in killing his fellow man."

EMIGRATION. The Erie Observer says: The emigration westward this season exceeds all bounds of calculation. Though we had before estimated, and so stated, to our readers, that it would equal that of any two previous years, yet we had no conception of the rush that is to be witnessed by every steamboat that passes up the lake. Though few, if any, could have anticipated so early an opening of the navigation as we have experienced, and by many it was not thought there would be a passage through even at this date, in consequence of which, it is probable, that a great body of those designing to emigrate are not yet on the move, yet nearly every boat that goes up, (and there are generally three to five a day), is loaded down to the extent of its capacity. In addition to these, large numbers go by schooners and other craft, while the portion that move by land, is without a precedent.

On the 14th and 15th of March a great sale of the wines of the duke of Nassau took place at the castle of Eberbach, which yielded 231,905 florins (about £23,000). At this sale, which was only made in order to allow the wines of the last year and the preceding years to be placed in the cellars of the duke—wines of the most exquisite qualities of growths, from 1706 to 1731, were exhibited. The very old wines were sold at a price comparatively low, but those of a more recent growth sold very dear. A demi piece of the wine Steinberger, of the growth of 1823, was sold for the exorbitant price of 6,135 florins, which makes each bottle, on the spot, cost ten or twelve florins. The elector of Hesse was the purchaser.

A tale of terror! We learn from St. Louis, that not long since, a colored man was arrested on board a boat, by a deputy sheriff and constable; that another colored man assisted him to escape from the officers, whom they immediately arrested, when he killed the sheriff upon the spot, and so badly wounded the constable that he was not expected to live. The negro was then secured and committed to prison, but the people assembled in great force, with the determination of tearing down the prison, if he was not given up to them.

He was delivered to the mob, who conveyed him to the outskirts of the city, placed a chain round his neck and a rope round his body, and fastened him to a tree a few feet from the ground, when they then placed fire round the tree and literally roasted him alive! His shrieks, were most awful during the performance of this terrific tragedy.

On the 6th instant a breach occurred in the Erie canal near Utica, and during the four days which it required to repair it, the boats had accumulated along the breach, lying so as to touch one another, through a distance of seven miles, extending to Oriskany.

RETIREMENT OF MR. CLAY. Understanding that Mr. Clay had expressed his determination of retiring from public life, the citizens of Bolivar, Indiana, recently addressed him a letter expressive of their hope that he might find it compatible with his private inclinations to continue in the councils of the country. The following is an extract from his reply, and will be read with interest, as it discloses his designs: Few there are, who will not regret the determination expressed in the reply:

"This is the thirtieth year since I first entered the service of the federal government. My labors for the public have been various and often arduous. I think they give me some title to repose, which I feel to be necessary on many accounts. I believe with you that the present period in the affairs of our country is eminently critical. It requires all the wisdom, the virtue and the energy among us to avert impending danger. If I were persuaded that, by remaining longer in the public service, I could materially aid in arresting our downward progress, and in communicating additional security to civil liberty and our free institutions, I should feel it my duty not to quit it. But I am not sure that my warning voice has not been already too often raised. Perhaps that of my successors may be listened to with more effect. I sincerely hope it may be.

"These, gentlemen, are briefly my motives for retirement. It is my purpose, if my health will allow me, to remain in congress during the present session. I reserve for future consideration whether I shall serve out the term for which the legislature of my state did me the honor last to elect me; and your wishes will have due weight in any decision I may form. Beyond that term, I can conceive of no probable contingency which would reconcile me to a farther continuance in the senate.

"I request you, gentlemen, to communicate my grateful acknowledgments to the citizens of Bolivar, and to accept for yourselves assurances of the esteem and regard of your friend and obedient servant,

"HENRY CLAY."

FORCE OF MACHINERY. A late English paper relates a most disastrous occurrence which took place at the British iron company's works at Aberysthach. The fly wheel, propelling the machinery at the forge is upwards of 20 feet diameter, and revolves upwards of 70 times a minute: during this velocity, it is supposed that one of the cogs of the wheel gave way; the whole of the attached wheels, &c. were hurled through the roof into the air, upwards of 300 feet, and one piece weighing nearly 2 tons, descended within 10 feet of the forge, and was buried a considerable depth in the ground; fortunately, although some persons were within two or three yards of the place where this huge mass of iron fell, and nearly one hundred altogether in and about the works, not a single person was injured. The damage to the works is estimated to be about £5,000.

ITEMS.

A riot took place in Chestertown, Cecil county, Md. on Saturday, the 21st ult. among the laborers employed on the Wilmington and Susquehanna rail road, during which the proprietor of a house attacked by them discharged several volleys of fire arms among the assailants, by which five persons were killed and eight or ten wounded.

New York has also lately been the scene of two or three riots, in one of which, a man was so much injured that he died in the course of the day.

A second fine ship, the Julia Palmer, was launched at Buffalo on the 16th instant. This is a new fruit of the Erie canal.

A lamentable accident has occurred at Constantinople. About 450 persons were engaged in making fire works to celebrate the marriage of the daughter of the sultan, when the whole blew up; many persons were killed and wounded; eighty persons known to be in the building were missing.

A lot of French bricks, brought in the brig Emma, from Cherbourg, brought $11 per thousand—they are much smaller than those made here. The article is very scarce.

A "man trap" in Louisville, Ky. constructed after the manner of a three story warehouse, fell down with a tremendous crash on the 11th ult. and buried a clerk named Frederick Newton, and a negro boy beneath the ruins.

Mr. Kendall, post master general, recently visited New York to decide the dispute about the location of the post office in that city—and it is stated that he is in favor of its present location, viz: up town.

General Ashley, now a member of congress, has been nominated as a candidate for the gubernatorial chair of Missouri.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION. SENATE.

May 27. After the transaction of some preparatory business, the senate took up the bill to increase the marine staff of the army, which was considered and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate next, on motion of Mr. Benton, took up the expunging resolution, for the purpose, (as explained by Mr. B.) of allowing Mr. Hill to make a speech on the subject, that senator being obliged to leave the senate to-morrow. Mr. H. then addressed the senate in support of the resolution, and, having concluded, at about half past 2 o'clock, the resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The question being on the amendment of Mr. Wright.

Mr. Wright modified his amendment in that part which requires that seven millions shall be always kept in the treasury, by striking out the word "seven," so as to leave the blank to be filled by the senate.

Mr. Wright then addressed the senate in defence of his proposition.

After he had concluded,

Mr. Calhoun moved that the senate adjourn, when

Mr. Leigh put an inquiry to Mr. Wright, as to the meaning of a portion of the language in the 8th section of the amendment.

Mr. Porter then suggested the propriety of giving up to-morrow to private bills.

Mr. Calhoun moved that the senate adjourn; which was negatived—yeas 13. When, after other business, the senate adjourned.

May 28. A bill to provide for the increase of the medical staff was read a third time and passed.

Some time was occupied in the consideration of private bills, several of which were passed.

A communication was received and laid before the senate, from the hon. Isaac Hill, governor elect of New Hampshire, in which he tendered the resignation of his seat in the senate.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill to regulate deposits of the public money.

After some words from Mr. Wright, in explanation,

Mr. Calhoun addressed the senate at large in support of his own views on the subject.

Mr. Buchanan followed, in a few remarks; and,

On motion of Mr. Ewing, the senate adjourned.

May 30. Mr. Naudain, upon presenting the petition of 120 citizens of the state of Delaware, praying that the pension granted to Caleb P. Bennett as a revolutionary officer, be continued to his widow during her life, made the following remarks:

Mr. President: In presenting this petition, I cannot refrain from saying that this presents no ordinary case for the consideration of the senate. The late gov. Bennett entered the army of the revolution in the year 1776, as an ensign in the Delaware regiment; he continued in the service until the end of the war. Brandywine, Germantown, Long Island, Monmouth, Camden, and the well-fought fields of the South, attest the gallantry of the distinguished corps to which he belonged. Of that corps he was the last surviving officer, and, I believe, the last individual. Yes, sir, of nearly 5,000 men, furnished by the gallant little state I have the honor partly to represent on this floor, to the army of the revolution, all have been gathered to their fathers. The latter years of the veteran Bennett were cheered and solaced by the bounty of his country extended to him, and not one now remains to enjoy that bounty, extended to them by their grateful country, to cheer their declining years.

Among those who received this bounty none can be found more worthy than Bennett; none received it with more gratitude, for it enabled him the better to provide for his aged wife and orphan grandchildren; and their comfort was dear to him as the apple of his eye. He has been taken from them, and his widow, aged and infirm, and his portionless grandchildren, are thrown upon the cold charities of the world without any means of support.

Would it not, Mr. President, comport with the honor, the dignity, nay, even with the interest of the government, to provide for his widow, (for her who was the wife of his youth, the companion of his manhood, the nurse of his sicknesses and infirmities, and the solace of his latter days), who devoted his best days to your service in the time of your greatest peril? Sir, it is the result of the services and sacrifices of such men, that we are now enjoying the privileges of an independent nation. To them we owe all our political liberties. It is by the blessing of Providence upon their labors that we are this day deliberating upon the high destinies of this people. And in these "high and palmy" days of the republic, when our treasury is overflowing with money the fruits of their services and privations, shall we refuse to snatch from poverty and distress the relief of one of those gallant men to whom we owe every thing? Justice and gratitude forbid. Sir, let the poor old widow of your time-worn revolutionary officer enjoy, for the brief residue of her days, the pension you had extended to her husband, and the blessings of those ready to perish will follow us for good, and call down the approbation of that God who delighteth in charity, upon us and our children.

The memorial was referred.

Many private bills were reported and disposed of, after which the senate proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money—the question being on the amendment of Mr. Wright. Mr. Ewing addressed the senate at some length, when he had concluded Mr. Wright suggested that the best course, in his opinion, would be to refer the whole subject. In the mean time the discussion might proceed, so as to put the senate in possession of all the ideas of gentlemen in reference to this matter. He thought that course would be a saving of time to the senate, and the best mode of perfecting the bill.

Mr. Calhoun suggested that the bill might be laid on the table or postponed, until some senator should be prepared to go on with the discussion. Mr. Webster asked to what time it was proposed to postpone the discussion. Mr. Calhoun replied, until to-morrow, or whenever any senator might be prepared to proceed.

Mr. Walker said he had a few remarks to make, and he might as well make them this evening. He accordingly expressed his views at some length.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, it was agreed that the bill should be laid on the table, and taken up again at one o'clock to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. White, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after remaining some time with closed doors,

The senate adjourned.

May 31. After the transaction of other business of minor importance, on motion of Mr. Clay the senate considered the message from the house disagreeing to the amendment of the senate to the bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain.

This bill, as it came from the house, provided for the appointment of a board of commissioners for the division and distribution of the money obtained under the treaty. The senate amended the bill by striking out all the provisions regarding commissioners, and assigning the duties to the attorney general. The house disagreed to this amendment, and the question now before the senate was on concurring to that disagreement.

Mr. Clay moved that the senate insist on its amendment, and that a committee of conference, to consist of three senators, be appointed. The motion was agreed to.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of private bills, several of which were ordered to be engrossed, among them a bill to provide for the payment of the passage of gen. Lafayette from France to the United States, in the year 1824, and a bill to reward the captors of the Tripolitan frigate, late the frigate Philadelphia.

The following bill on being amended on motion of Mr. Porter by striking out the "first" Monday in the beginning of November and substituting the "third," was ordered to be engrossed—ayes 27.

"Be it enacted, &c. That hereafter the annual meeting of congress to be assembled in pursuance of the constitution, shall be on the first Monday of November of every year; and that the day of adjournment of the first session of every succeeding congress shall be the second Monday of May, after the commencement of such session, unless congress shall at any such session, by joint resolution of both houses, otherwise provide."

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money. Mr. Webster then addressed the senate at length; after which Mr. Calhoun, moved to refer the bill to a select committee—agreed to. It was then, on his motion, ordered to consist of nine senators to be chosen by ballot. A ballot was then had and the following members were chosen, viz: Mr. Wright, of N. Y. chairman, Mr. Calhoun, of S. C. Mr. Webster, of Mass. Mr. King, of Alab. Mr. Buchanan, of Penn. Mr. Shepley, of Maine, Mr. Leigh, of Va. Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, Mr. Ewing, of Ohio.*

*The Intelligencer of Thursday says—We learn that the deliberations of the committee have resulted in the adoption, substantially, of the plan proposed by Mr. Webster on Tuesday,

Mr. Webster then laid on the table an amendment which he had prepared and moved for its printing; which was ordered.

The rescinding resolution of Mr. White was called up, and on his motion was postponed and made the special order for Monday.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the special order, [the bill to re-charter certain banks in the District of Columbia], was postponed, and the senate proceeded to consider the bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States; and, after some remarks from Mr. B. it was on motion of Mr. Porter, laid on the table for the present.

On motion of Mr. Walker, the senate next proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after remaining for some time with closed doors, adjourned.

June 1. The following messages were received from the president of the United States, containing,

1st. A communication from B. F. Curry, in reply to charges made against him by a senator in congress;

2d. A response from Samuel Gwin to certain charges contained in evidence taken before the committee on public lands, in reference to alleged frauds, which charges had been officially communicated by the secretary of the treasury to Mr. Gwin.

Mr. Benton moved to print the last named communication, and read an extract from the instructions given by the chairman of the committee to those who are commissioned to take depositions.

Mr. Wall asked if these instructions were the act of a committee of the senate, or of an individual?

Mr. Benton read the instructions, signed by "George Poindexter," the chairman.

Mr. Calhoun moved to refer the communication to the committee on public lands, as the more proper course.

The motion to refer was opposed by Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, Mr. Benton, Mr. King, of Alabama, Mr. Shepley, Mr. Walker and Mr. Niles, and supported by Mr. Porter, Mr. Mangum, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Prentiss and Mr. Southard.

[It was said, on the one side, that the instructions given by Mr. Poindexter, as chairman of the committee on public lands in 1834, to the commissioners appointed to receive evidence in relation to frauds committed in the sales of public lands, were most arbitrary and outrageous in their character. That the senate, in authorising their committee to proceed in the manner they did, had placed itself in a wrong position; and by not permitting notice to be given those who were supposed to be implicated, of the time when and the place where testimony was to be received, they had violated the rights of citizens. The investigation was not general in its character, but was confined to registers of land offices and receivers of public moneys; some of whom were alluded to by name, as being parties in, or privy to, these alleged frauds. It was but an act of justice to Mr. Gwin to print this memorial or defence at once, and permit him to clear himself in the eyes of the public from the charges which had been made against him.

It was said, on the other side, that any other course than that pursued by the senate would have defeated the object which they had in view. That this body were fully impressed with the belief that frauds had been committed in the sales of the public lands; and that, in consequence of this belief, they directed the appropriate committee to make, not an inquiry into private character, but a general investigation in relation to the question of fraud. Such a course was sanctioned by the policy of all governments. That committee did not, because they could not, send notice to every individual supposed to be implicated. Nor was there any obligation upon them, either legal or moral, to take such a step. They were merely acting as a grand jury—acting in complete consonance with every principle of criminal jurisprudence. They were making a general inquiry into the state of the land offices; endeavoring to ascertain the truth of a fact; and getting evidence before them which might afterwards justify the adoption of measures against individuals. Inquiry was made for purposes of legislation, and for nothing else. It was proper that the whole matter should be referred to the committee on public lands, before the paper or memorial presented here by Mr. Gwin should be printed. Let the expense be what it might, the investigation in his amendment for the disposition of the surplus money of the government, which amendment was as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the treasury of the United States on the first day of January, 1837, reserving — millions, shall be divided among the several states in proportion to their respective amounts of population, as ascertained by the last census, and according to the provision of the second section of the first article of the constitution; and the secretary of the treasury shall pay the same to such persons as the several states may authorise to receive it, in the following proportions, and at the following times, viz: one-half on the first day of April, 1837, one-quarter part on the first day of July, 1837, and the remaining quarter on the first day of October, 1837; and all states which shall receive their several proportions according to the provisions of this act, shall be taken and understood thereby to pledge the public faith of such states to repay the same, or any part thereof, to the United States, whenever congress shall require the same to be repaid by any act or acts which shall require such payment, ratably, and in equal proportion, from all the states which had received the same."

ought to be re-opened, that justice might be done to Gwin, to the senate, and to a late member of that body—a distinguished, bold, and intrepid one—Mr. Poindexter. The senate were in honor bound to protect the character of their former colleague, if it was deserving of protection. It was due to him that the whole matter should be thoroughly re-examined. At present, gentlemen assumed the innocence of Gwin, and the guilt of the chairman of the committee on public lands in 1834. There was matter in this written defence presented by the former impeaching the character of the latter. But had Mr. Poindexter received notice of the time and place when and where evidence was to be taken implicating his reputation? or was it a mere ex parte proceeding? If, then, it was so improper on the part of the senate to give such extraordinary powers, as they had been accused of giving, to one of their committees, should the same body sanction the delegation by the executive of the like power to Mr. Gwin? This is an illegitimate mode of reasoning.

In the course of this debate, Mr. Walker stated that, from intelligence received by him yesterday, he was fearful that Mr. Gwin had gone to another and higher tribunal. He had been shot through the lungs in his late duel; and though his friends had indulged the hope of his final and complete recovery, yet a second hemorrhage had lately taken place, which had undoubtedly resulted in his death.]

Mr. Calhoun finally withdrew his motion to refer the message, for the present, stating that he never had objected to the printing.

After a few words from Mr. White, Mr. Calhoun moved to refer the motion to print and the documents to the committee on the judiciary. Mr. Leigh also expressed an opinion in favor of referring and printing the documents. Mr. Walker called for the yeas and nays on the question. Mr. Porter moved to lay the subject on the table—negative—yeas 15, noes 20. Mr. Ewing called for the reading of the papers, but soon after the reading was commenced, the senate adjourned.

June 2. After the reception of several reports from committees and the consideration of a few resolutions of minor importance, the senate proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the purchase of private stock in the Louisville and Portland canal, which was amended in several sections—the bill was then reported to the senate, the amendments concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate laid the unfinished business of yesterday on the table, and took up the bill prohibiting deputy postmasters from receiving or transmitting through the mail to any state, territory or district, certain papers therein mentioned, the circulation of which, by the laws of said state, territory or district, may be prohibited, and for other purposes.

Mr. Grundy modified the amendment he had submitted, so far as to restrict the punishment of deputy postmasters who may violate the provisions of this act to simple removal from office.

Mr. Calhoun then moved to amend the third section of the amendment so as to prevent the withdrawal of the prohibited papers, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. The question was then taken, and the motion lost.—Yeas 15, noes 15.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Grundy, on which the yeas and nays were ordered. There was some discussion on this amendment between Messrs. Morris, Calhoun, Grundy, King, of Georgia, and Walker, when

The amendment offered by Mr. Grundy was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the senate as amended.

Mr. Calhoun renewed his motion in the senate, and it was again lost—yeas 15, nays 15.

Mr. Morris then asked for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill; and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided as follows:
YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Grundy, King, of Alabama, King, of Geo. Moore, Nicholas, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Tallmage, Walker, White, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, Davis, Ewing, of Ill. Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, Inghard, Kent, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—18.

The vice president then took the chair, and gave the casting vote in the affirmative.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The bills ordered yesterday to be engrossed, were read a third time and passed.

Mr. Kent moved to take up the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

The question being on the third reading,

Mr. Benton opposed this motion, and moved to lay the bill on the table; which was negative.

Mr. Benton then moved to postpone the bill, and make it the order for Saturday. Negative.

Mr. Benton next asked the reading of the report, when,

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, May 27. On the reading of that part of the journal, which stated that Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, and Mr. Wise, "declined" to vote upon the first resolution reported by the select committee on the subject of petitions and memorials respecting slavery, it was stated that these gentlemen "refused" to vote, and the journal was amended accordingly.

The journal was subsequently corrected in two other places, so as to correspond with the above amendment.

Mr. Lewis stated to the chair that he had declined voting on either of the resolutions, for the reason that he did not think the house had any thing to do with the subject of slavery, any more than that of religion. Not wishing, however, to embarrass the house or delay its proceedings, he had not made any objections at the time. He believed that no petitions on the subject ought to be received, and, of course, no disposition could be made of them.

Mr. Adams submitted the following paper, with the motion that it be entered upon the journal of yesterday:

"And whilst the speaker was pronouncing his decision, Mr. Glascock offered to present a paper, in compliance with the request made by Mr. Adams, yesterday, which he alleged contained his reasons for asking to be excused for not voting on the day before."

Mr. Adams asked the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered. The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 111. So the house refused to amend the journal.

The clerk proceeded to read the journal.

Mr. Granger moved to amend the journal, by stating the fact that when he was called upon to vote on the second resolution, he refused to vote, and offered to read a paper stating the reasons for that refusal, when he was called to order by the chair.

After a very long debate, in which Messrs. Adams, Granger, Parks, Speight, Briggs, Mann, of New York, and E. Whittlesey took part,

Mr. Vanderpool demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the house—86 to 49.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative, by a vote of 60 to 96.

So the house refused to amend the journal.

After the proceedings upon the third resolution had been read, Mr. Adams asked if his name was entered upon the journal as one who had answered to the call of the yeas and nays upon that resolution; and, upon being told that it was not, he moved to amend the journal by inserting the answer which he made at the time his name was called, and which he had sent at the time to the chair, in writing, in the following words: "I hold the resolution to be a direct violation of the constitution of the United States, of the rules of this house, and of the rights of my constituents."

Mr. Adams proceeded to speak in support of the motion. The chair called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order, on the ground that his remarks were irrelevant. Mr. Adams appealed from this decision, and thereupon asked the yeas and nays; which were refused. Mr. Mann, of New York, asked the previous question on the appeal; which was seconded—ayes 95, noes not counted. The main question, "Shall the decision of the chair stand?" having been stated,

Mr. Wise said, the gentleman from Massachusetts is called to order for irrelevancy of remark. He was not able, in consequence of the confusion and noise in the hall, to hear what those remarks were.

The chair again stated the question. Mr. Anthony moved to lay the proceedings on the table, but withdrew it. Mr. Wise demanded that the words objected to as irrelevant be put in writing. The chair decided the motion to be out of order, and again put the question on the appeal when there appeared 97 in the affirmative, and 40 in the negative.

So the decision of the chair was affirmed.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Adams to amend the journal, it was decided in the affirmative, without a count.

The clerk proceeded to read the journal.

Mr. Adams asked the favor of the house that it be stated on the journal that his name was called, he was present, rose in his place and answered, but did not vote. He had demanded a right that this answer should be placed on the journal, that it stand to the latest posterity. The house having thought proper to refuse this, he now asked the minor favor to have the fact stated, that he was present and did answer. If this statement did not appear on the journal, it would not be a true record of the proceedings of this house.

After some remarks from Messrs. Adams, Anthony, Taliaferro, Hamer, Wise, Dromgoole and Vanderpool,

Mr. Vanderpool moved the previous question, which was seconded by the house, and the main question was ordered to be put. Mr. Adams demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 117.

So the house refused to amend the journal.

The questions involved in the desultory discussion which took place upon the motions to excuse members were of considerable interest, and may be stated, not exactly in the order in which they were alluded to, but as they naturally seem to arise. In the first place, it was questioned whether the house had power to compel a member to vote, notwithstanding the 28th rule of the house—"Every member, who shall be in the house when the question is put, shall give his vote, unless the house, for special reasons, shall excuse him." No case was cited, except in the instance of Mr. J. Q. Adams, who, in 1832, asked to be excused from voting on the resolution that Mr. Stanberry, of Ohio, had used words committing an indignity both to the speaker and to the house, and merited the censure of the house. Upon the vote passing the resolution, Mr. Adams asked to be excused from voting, and sent his reasons in writing, which were read by the clerk, and inserted on the journal. The house refused to excuse Mr. Adams, and, upon a second call of his name, he said, "I decline to answer." A motion was then made to reconsider the vote by which the house refused to excuse him; which was negatived. By direction of the speaker, Mr. Adams' name was called a third time, when he made no answer. Resolutions were then offered to the effect that Mr. Adams had committed a breach of a rule of the house, and asking for the appointment of a committee to report what ought to be done in the case; and these resolutions were subsequently laid on the table, so that no decision upon the power of the house was had in that case. Two points referred to were: 1st. That the consideration of the question of excusing a member, or compelling him to vote, was to be postponed till after the roll had been called; and, 2d, that the declaration of the vote of the house could not be arrested by the refusal to vote, or by the consideration of that question by the house. These two points were decided by the chair to be established by that precedent; and as much debate as the call to order would allow was had upon them. It was urged that the rule required special reasons to be assigned, in order that the member should be excused; and that the member had a right to have those reasons given and entered upon the journal; a right which was denied, as was alleged, by the decision of the first point mentioned. It was denied that a declaration of a vote could be made, or that any decision had been made by the house, so long as a member was present, declining to vote, and was not either compelled to vote under the rule, or excused by a vote of the house. It was further said, that by postponing the question, without excusing or compelling, and by declaring the vote as decided, the subject was gone from the possession of the house, and there was nothing for a member to vote upon; wherefore it would be impossible to act upon the excuse or refusal, so as to compel a member to vote, for members must either vote or be excused, while the question was pending.

To this it was replied, that, under the previous question, while taking the vote, no reasons could be received or discussed or acted upon; and that the contrary practice might prevent any question from being decided, for a member might refuse to vote, and upon a motion to excuse him, another might refuse, and so on, so that no question could be taken on the main question. It was decided by the chair, who was sustained by the house, that this construction was correct, and in accordance with the precedent.

The result was, that some of the motions to be excused, and some of the attempts to offer reasons, were omitted to be stated on the journal; and four hours of the morning were occupied in efforts and arguments to amend the journal, so as to supply that deficiency; but the motions were nearly all rejected; and no decision in this instance has been had upon the power of the house to compel a member to vote, or upon the mode by which the rule could be enforced.]

The clerk proceeded to read the journal. Mr. Lewis moved to insert the following in the journal; which was agreed to: "Mr. Lewis rose in his seat, and stated that he should decline to vote on any of the resolutions."

The clerk then proceeded to read the journal, and concluded the reading at half past one o'clock.

The chair presented two communications from the president of the United States, transmitting reports from the secretary of war, in answer to the resolution of the house calling for information in relation to the Seminole war; which were referred to the committee on Indian affairs.

The house then resumed the consideration of the "bill to change the organization of the post office department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof," which occupied it till the hour of adjournment.

Saturday, May 28. Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign relations, reported the following resolution; which was laid on the table on motion of Mr. Whittlesey.

Resolved, That the house will, on Saturday next at 11 o'clock, proceed to the consideration of bill No. 611, entitled a bill anticipating the payment of the indemnities accruing to citizens of the United States under the convention with France of the 4th July, 1831, and that of the Two Sicilies of Oct. 14, 1832, and that it shall take precedence at such hour of all the other business of the house.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng the rules were suspended for the purpose of taking up the motion to print 2,000 copies of the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States—which motion was amended so as to make the number of copies 10,000, and agreed to.

The house refused to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up the resolution making the bill to regulate the deposit of the public money in certain local banks the special order of the day for a certain day—but agreed, on motion of Mr. Bell, to suspend them to enable him to report the Indian appropriation bill, from the committee on Indian affairs. Mr. Bell then reported the bill and amendments, which were committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union. Mr. B. next moved to suspend the rules in order to proceed to the consideration of the bill. Lost.

On motion of Mr. Whittlesey the house proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, which were private bills, and after some time spent therein, the house adjourned.

Monday, May 30. The house refused to consider a resolution, offered by Mr. Heister, fixing a day for the adjournment of congress.

The house also refused to suspend the rules to enable Messrs. Storer and Harper to present memorials from citizens of Cincinnati and Philadelphia, respectively, praying congress to recognize the independence of Texas.

The remainder of the session was occupied in the consideration of some unimportant motions and appeals from the decision of the chair; after a decision was had, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, May 31. The resolution from the committee of ways and means setting apart a certain day for the consideration of the bill regulating the deposits of the public money in certain banks, was taken up as the order of the day, and postponed until to-morrow week.

After some private and local business had been disposed of, Mr. Lane, from the committee for the District of Columbia, made a report on the subject of imprisonment for debt, accompanied by the following resolution, which lies one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of state be requested to ascertain and report to this house the number of persons imprisoned for debt since 1820, in the District of Columbia; the times during which they were imprisoned; the amounts of their respective debts; the portions thereof paid in consequence of their imprisonment; the expenses to creditors of maintenance, &c. with such other facts as to allegations of fraud, age, sex, and condition of the parties as can be conveniently procured.

Mr. Boon, from the committee on public lands, reported a bill to amend an act granting lands to certain exiles from Poland—but before it was disposed of the house proceeded to the orders of the day and took up the bill to change the organization of the post office department, &c. The bill occasioned a protracted and desultory debate, during which various amendments were proposed—several of which were adopted and others rejected; but as it is our intention to insert the bill when passed, it is not necessary to notice them at present. Finally, pending an amendment relating to the salaries of clerks of the department, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, June 1. The message of the senate asking a conference on the disagreement of the two houses on the senate's amendment of the bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain, was taken up; when,

On motion of Mr. Adams, the house insisted on their disagreement to the senate's amendment, and agreed to appoint a committee of conference on their part.

After several resolutions had been received and referred, and an ineffectual attempt of Mr. Heister to induce the house to suspend the rules to take up the joint resolution from the senate, proposing to fix upon a day for the adjournment of congress, Mr. Hunt asked leave of the house to make a statement on a subject in which he was personally concerned, and which was of deep and vital importance to this country.

Objections being made,

Mr. Hunt moved the suspension of the rules, for the purpose indicated. He held in his hand, he said, a document which he had found on his table, since he came into the house this morning, and to which he wished to call the attention of the house.

[Cries of "order."]

The speaker put the question on the suspension of the rules; when, by the sound, it seemed to be lost. Before the result was announced, the yeas and nays were called for and refused.

Mr. Hardin asked if it was in order to amend the motion, so as to allow him to make an explanation. He had been represented, in a document now on the tables of members, as having voted for the emancipation of slaves in the states, which was utterly false.

Mr. Patton stated that no member of the house, after knowing the object of the request, would refuse it. The tables of the house had been covered with copies of a document, which members were unwarily circulating, containing foul misrepresentations of the course of members of this house on a most important question.

Mr. Clairborne corroborated the statement of Mr. Patton, and urged the house to give Mr. Hunt an opportunity to explain, &c. He concluded with a motion to suspend the rules—yeas 140, nays 36. Leave having been granted, Mr. H. proceeded to explain, and said—After taking my seat this morning, and after the business of the house had commenced, my attention was accidentally called to a publication from the office of the Globe in a pamphlet form, purporting to be the "report of the select committee upon the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, made by hon. H. L. Pinckney, to the house of representatives, May 18, 1836." To which is appended the votes in the house of representatives upon the several resolutions with which the report concludes." The first resolution is in the following words, viz: "Resolved, That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy;" and the pamphlet to which I allude, goes on to say, "the following are the votes on the resolutions at the conclusion of the report, viz: on the first resolution, Nays—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Bunch, G. Chambers, Clark, Everett, Gauger, Graves, Grennell, H. Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Hazletine, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Jones, Lawler, Lawrence, L. Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Lyon, S. Mason, McKennon, Patton, J. A. Pearce, Pickens, Rencher, Russell, A. H. Shepperd, Slade, Sprague, Standefer, Steele, Talaferro, Underwood, Vinton, Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams and Wise—46.

Now, sir, your journals show that, upon this first resolution, there were nine only in the negative, and that my name stands recorded in the affirmative. As regards the rank injustice done other gentlemen, it does not, perhaps, behoove me to speak; they are abundantly able to protect their own reputations; but as regards myself, I pronounce the publication in question to be either a gross misrepresentation, or a most palpable and inexcusable mistake, &c. When Mr. Hunt had concluded, Mr. Underwood asked whether the document had been received by order of the house; if so, he should propose a resolution, declaring it to be erroneous in its statements. Some one replied in the negative. Mr. A. H. Shepperd asked whether the clerk had furnished the list of yeas and nays for publication.

The speaker stated that the clerk, in reply, had informed him that he was not in the habit of furnishing lists to editors, but that editors had access to the book of yeas and nays, and took the lists for themselves.

Mr. Mercer asked to what date the printed journal had been brought down.

The speaker replied, to the 16th of May.

Mr. A. H. Shepperd and Mr. Mercer asked leave to make explanations on the subject; but it was objected to.

Mr. Gillett said, if the house would permit him, he would explain this matter; but objections were made.

Mr. Clairborne said he felt his reputation involved in this subject, and he claimed it as a right to make a statement to the house.

[Cries of "leave, leave," and "no, no."]

Mr. Clairborne moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose.

Mr. Mercer moved to amend the motion so as to permit others to make explanations; which motion was, after some confused proceedings, agreed to by a vote of 91 to 79.

Mr. Patton rose, and called the attention of the house to the fact that the Globe newspaper recently contained an editorial article making statements equally as gross and false as those which had been just brought to the notice of the house. Mr. P. was here interrupted by calls to order. The question on the motion to suspend the rules was taken by yeas and nays, and negatively—yeas 98, nays 82; not two-thirds. Mr. Underwood asked the consent of the house to offer a resolution directing the printer to the house to publish five thousand copies of the report on the slavery subject, with the yeas and nays on each of the resolutions annexed. Mr. Vanderpool objected, on the ground that it would create a debate. Mr. McKennon asked the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw the motion. He had no idea, he said, of paying the printer for his blunders. Mr. Underwood withdrew the proposition.

Mr. Wise rose simply to request the members who had received these pamphlets to prevent their circulation.

"Yes," "certainly," was responded from every part of the house.

On motion of Mr. Connor, the house then proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up the bill to change the organization of the post office department, &c. when, after considerable discussion on a variety of amendments, the previous question was called and sustained—after which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for third to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Connor, the house then took up the bill to establish certain post routes, and concurred in the amendments made in committee of the whole; and also adopted several other amendments proposed by the committee on the post office and post roads, and by several members of the house; after which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The house then adjourned.

Thursday, June 2. After two or three ineffectual attempts to suspend the rules, and the presentation of several resolutions of a private or local nature, the house proceeded to the order of the day, it being the engrossed bill to change the organization of the post office department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof. It was then read a third time, when Mr. Johnson moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole. This motion gave rise to an animated discussion in relation to the compensation allowed by the bill to deputy postmasters, clerks, &c. It was finally arrested by a call for the previous question, which was sustained. The main question was then put, Shall the bill pass? and carried in the affirmative without a division.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleg, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole house on the state of the union, (Mr. Smith in the chair), and took up the "bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities, and for other similar objects, for the year 1836." Several of the amendments were concurred in and others passed over for the present—the committee then rose.

Mr. Adams asked the consent of the house to take up, at this time, the resolution to print 5,000 extra copies of the report of the select committee on the subject of slavery.

A motion was made that the house adjourn. Mr. Adams asked the yeas and nays, but they were not granted, and the house then adjourned.

*The gentlemen who voted in the negative upon the first resolution were Messrs. Slade, Potts, Phillips, Jones, Jackson, of Mass. Everett, Denny, Clark and Adams.

INDIAN WAR IN FLORIDA.

GEN. CLINCH'S REPORT.

We publish the following report of brigadier gen. CLINCH's return march from Tampa Bay to Fort Drane, which shows that the entire cœ of the Wythlaocochee was a second time scoured by the troops, agreeably to the instructions of major general SCOTT, without, however, discovering any signs of Indians, or of the women and children.

*Head quarters, right wing, Florida army,
Fort Drane, April 27th, 1836.*

Major general Scott, commanding:

Sir: I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of this wing of the army, since marching from Tampa Bay, in obedience to your order of April 11th, No. 23.

On the 14th instant, the wing, composed of the following force, viz: artillery, 278; dismounted dragoons, 43; 4th infantry, 202; Augusta volunteers, 139; mounted men, 140; total, 802; marched on its return to Fort Cooper, making shorter distances than before, in consequence of the increased heat of the weather, and the debilitated condition of the horses. All the sick, to the number of 80, have been left in hospital at Fort Brooke. On the 17th, the fourth day of the march, arrived within three miles of Fort Cooper, and halted. On the morning of the 18th, despatched some light wagons, escorted by Maloney's and Campbell's companies of mounted men, with instructions to major Cooper to join me. Their escort companies had proceeded to within half a mile of his position, when, as they were passing a hammock, they were fired upon by the enemy, and lieutenant Dawson and private Howard severely wounded. This information being brought back to me, and apprehending that they might have encountered a large body of Indians, I sent out the commandant of the right column, col. Bankhead, with a battalion of artillery, to reinforce the detachment. Before his arrival, the enemy had retired. Major Cooper joined me in the course of the day. My reasons for halting were to give the horses a day's rest, and because near that point the trail, (which) according to my instructions, I was to proceed, diverged to the right and rear.

Major Cooper had been invested by the enemy from the 5th until the 17th April. In the course of daily skirmishing with them, he lost one killed and five wounded. With this you will find a copy of his report. His conduct and that of his officers and men deserves, and I have no doubt will receive, the highest gratitude of their country, as they displayed great coolness and firmness under the most trying circumstances. Major Cooper estimates the force around him at 250. There were probably more, though not in view.

On the 19th marched; and at the distance of four miles, came to the river—followed the course of the river seven miles, and encamped—20th, continued the march up the river seven miles to the Tampa road, at colonel Lindsay's position, and encamped.

The distance from the old Indian town, (my position on the 18th) three miles from Fort Cooper, on the trail to Camp Christolm, to the crossing of the Wythlaocochee, on the Tampa road, is 18 miles. The course for the first fourteen miles, southeast by south, and for the last four, northeast; at the distance of three miles above the old Indian town, the lake Hocklekaha, or range of ponds which we first struck on the 30th March, terminated.

The approaches toward the river between the ponds, if they be ponds, and not a lake, were narrowly searched with a view to ascertain whether any access to a position for operations between the ponds and the river could be observed. I am satisfied that there is none. The only trail, above the Indian town, leads across the river at a point which we discovered to be the upper termination of the ponds, by pursuing this trail. The course of my route corresponds very nearly with the course supposed given to the river by colonel Gadsden, in his draft. The bend of the river is more regularly curved than he has made it.

No ford practicable for wagons could be discovered, although there are several well worn trails leading across. I have every reason to believe, from the size which we observed in the route, that a considerable portion of the enemy inhabit this region of country, but in detached parties; and that their last place of retreat will be either between the forks of the river, or between the ponds and the river, and that the true plan of operations against them, will be that first designed by you; that is, by a force from Pelaklekaha, a force ascending by my route, and a corresponding one on the north side. The Indians can scour the river at various places, with such facility, that no single force can proceed against them with any certainty of success. I crossed both branches of the river by the Tampa road, having left with col. Lindsay the 4th infantry, and taken up the mounted escort and Nelson's company; 23d, on this day one of the flankers, Bostiek, was fired on, as he passed very near a hammock. His horse was wounded under him. Prompt pursuit was made, but without success. The Indians retreated through the thick undergrowth, too rapidly to be overtaken; 23d and 24th, continued the march to Fort King, capturing and driving along about 200 head of cattle; 25th, after having left a supply of ammunition at Fort King, marched to Fort Drane; men and horses much exhausted by sickness, and the heat of the weather—another day's march would have occasioned the abandoning a part of the train. Fifteen horses and mules died on the road, and eight were turned out, that could not be got along by leading.

I must be permitted to express my high approbation of the gallant feeling manifested on all occasions, by both officers and men, under the most trying circumstances, attendant on a long and fatiguing march, through a country almost unknown to the white man, and in charging through swamps and hammocks, whenever the track of the enemy was visible; all of which they bore without a murmur, and with the greatest firmness. I cannot close this communication, without expressing my high gratification at being able to say, that not the smallest difficulty occurred in the right wing, from the time we left Fort Drane, until the return to it, and that the best and kindest feelings existed between the different corps composing the wing, and the only rivalry who should occupy the post of danger.

I am sir, with the highest respect and regard, your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

D. L. CLINCH, brig. gen. U. S. A.

The following general order has been issued by major general Scott, commanding the army of Florida:

Head quarters, army of Florida, St. Augustine, May 17, 1836.

The panics which have recently possessed the good people of several large districts of this territory are infinitely humiliating.

Within a few days, just five Indians penetrated a neighborhood in the heart of Middle Florida, and committed a murder. Instead of giving pursuit, the inhabitants abandoned their plantations, and fled to Tallahassee.

A similar party had but a few days before thrown the Micanopy settlement into the utmost confusion. A gang of cow stealers adroitly added a report that an immense fresh Indian trail had been observed crossing the Tallahassee road, near the Santa Fe bridge. The whole country, from Micanopy to Black creek, instantly became wild with fear. The daring falsehood was immediately exposed by colonel Fitzpatrick and captain Shannon, of the army, who happened to pass that way, together with the motive of the propagators; but the inhabitants could see nothing but an Indian in every bush, and therefore continued to fly.

On this side of the St. John's, a keen susceptibility of the same kind prevails. A small party of the enemy lately ventured within the settlements. A company of regular foot was promptly mounted, sent in pursuit, beat the enemy, and secured most of the property the marauders had taken. Now, although it is known to all cool people that the greater number of the party were killed outright, and that a like fate awaits any body of the enemy that may follow, a panic is rife throughout the country; the inhabitants are still flying to St. Augustine, and from St. Augustine to Georgia and South Carolina.

It is evident that no general, even with extensive means, can cure a disease in the public mind, so general and so degrading, without some little effort on the part of the people themselves. Thus the planters in the recent case near Tallahassee, who fled without knowing whether they ran from squaws or warriors, ought first to have ascertained that material fact. If they had turned upon the enemy, they would have found the case within the easy compass of any three or four resolute masters, and half as many overseers. This was the simple and manly course. That adopted was, to fly, to spread the panic, and to throw execrations upon the general who has the misfortune to command a handful of brave troops in the midst of such a population.

Not a regular company has been sent out of the territory, except, possibly, three from Tampa Bay. Besides a strong garrison there, two companies were directed thence to occupy a post on the Suwanee; two are posted at Fort King; five at Fort Drane; one (mounted United States dragoons) at Oaklands, six miles off; one at Micanopy; and a twelfth at Garey's ferry.

These forces ought, in the opinion of the commanding general, to give reasonable security to the Alachua and Suwanee frontiers, particularly if one or two companies of mounted men can be obtained to aid the company of dragoons in scouring the country between the chain of fixed posts. Measures have been taken to encourage the enrolment of mounted men, and it is understood that the governor is exerting himself in the same way. His excellency will, moreover, to complete the means of defence, be requested to hire, on account of the United States, at Appalachicola or elsewhere, a suitable steamboat, to cruise from the mouth of the Suwanee up that river as far as practicable. One of the companies, supposed to be already on the river, will be instructed to embark, and remain on board the boat.

On this side of the St. John's, the means of defence, though much more limited, are deemed fully adequate, if aided by a single company of mounted volunteers; and one, it is hoped, will soon present itself for the service. Of the five regular companies, one has already been mounted on horses belonging to the wagon train, and in a few days another will be put on horseback by the same means. The commanding general has no power to purchase horses expressly for this purpose. The companies on foot will be posted, whilst the mounted will be kept constantly in movement; and it may be added that the little steamer, called The Essayons, belonging to the United States, will be kept daily cruising up and down the St. John's.

The post and steamboat on the Suwanee, Fort King, Oaklands, Micanopy and Garey's ferry, will all be under the immediate orders of the field officer, major Heilman, stationed at Fort Drane, and he will communicate freely with the governor of the territory.

Should the post ordered to be established at Watson's or Dabney's plantation, on the Suwanee, prove to be unhealthy, the commanding officer is authorised to remove higher up the river, in search of a better position, giving the preference to the left bank of the stream.

CAPTURE OF SANTA ANA.

From the New Orleans Bulletin.

The following are copies of letters and documents direct from Houston's camp, received yesterday by the steamer Levant, from Natchitoches. [The orders are copies of translations from the original Spanish.]

Santa Anna to general Philasola.

Army of operations, east division under my command.

Having yesterday had an unfortunate encounter, I have resolved to remain a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy. After having taken every precaution, I therefore hope that your excellency will cause the division under the command of gen. Parza to counter-march to Bexar, where he will wait for orders. Your excellency will also return to the same place, and order general Viesca, with his division, to Guadalupe Victoria. I have agreed on an armistice with gen. Houston, ad interim, until we can agree upon terms of lasting peace.

Your excellency will take such measures as may be necessary for the subsistence of the army, which will remain under your command. The money that has arrived at Matamoros, and the provisions of the place, and those at Victoria, will be subject to orders; also, 20,000 dollars that may be in the treasury are to be taken from Bexar. I trust that your excellency will, without fail, comply with those dispositions, advising me of same by return of couriers; as, also, if any should oppose its accomplishment. God and liberty.

EXCELLENT SIR: Inasmuch as I have ordered your excellency by official note of this day that you cause the troops to return to Bexar and Guadalupe Victoria, I charge you to instruct the commandants of the several divisions not to permit any damage to be done to the property of the country; hoping that these dispositions will be punctually complied with. Army of operations.

EXCELLENT SIR: You will immediately order the military command at Goliad to put all the prisoners made at Copana at liberty, and send them forthwith to San Felipe de Austin, and for which purpose your excellency will dictate such orders as may be conducive to the object. God and liberty.

All the troops on their march from the east will report at head quarters as early as possible, marching by way of Harrisburgh for the present—but all turn out. The enemy have been badly defeated, and are retreating precipitately, for the purpose of concentrating. One bold push now will drive them entirely out of the country, and secure liberty, independence and peace, to Texas. Let all turn out. Our standard is a victorious one, and waves beautifully under the smiles of a beneficent Providence.

San Jacinto, 25th April, 1836.

Tell our friends all the news, and that we have beaten the enemy, killed 630, and taken 570 prisoners. Generals Santa Ana and Cos are taken, and three generals slain. Vast amount of property taken, and about 1,500 stand of arms, many swords, and one nine pound brass cannon. Tell them to come on, and let the people plant corn.

OFFICIAL.—FRENCH INDEMNITY.

The agent of the United States in Paris, having received from the government of France the sum of francs 18,486,666 52, on account of the indemnity of 25 millions of francs, under the treaty July, 1831, the amount of which is now in the course of transmission to this country, the claimants holding certificates from the treasury department are hereby notified that the bank of America, in behalf of the United States, and by authority of the secretary of the treasury, will advance and pay, on the 15th of June next, a proportional part of their respective certificates, equal to at least the ratio of 50 cents on the dollar of the above-mentioned sum received by the agent in Paris, together with the same ratio of the sum there deducted, and to be repaid here out of the treasury of the United States, being 1,180,000 francs. The said certificates must be presented at the bank for that purpose, by the parties to whom they shall have been issued, or by their legal assignees, or duly constituted attorneys.

The residue of what has been received in Paris, and of the sum deducted there, will be paid out here, soon as the former arrives, and the net proceeds of the whole can be ascertained. Treasury department, May 25, 1836.

LAW CASES.

CIRCUIT COURT OF THE U. STATES, DISTRICT OF MARYLAND. Before the honorable R. B. Taney, chief justice, U. S. Heath, district judge.

The United States, }
vs. } Five indictments for forgery and fraud.
Arthur Dashiell.

These prosecutions commenced on the 16th, and terminated on the 26th May, ultimo. They were founded on the act of congress, of the 3rd of March, 1823, which provides for the punishment of frauds perpetrated, or attempted to be perpetrated on the United States, by the use of forged papers; and for the possession of such papers, with intent thereby to defraud the United States.

The prisoner was proved to have obtained the signature of a justice of the peace for Somerset county, upon a false pretence, to a forged affidavit; and, at another time, the signature of a justice of the peace for Dorchester county, to three blank papers, over which were afterwards written by him affidavits wholly different from what the parties authorised to be set down as their evidence. These papers, in regard to the first, he delivered to a respectable counsel in the District of Columbia, and, in respect to the other three, he transmitted by mail from this district, to his counsel there, and they were all presented at the office of the secretary of the treasury, in support of a claim for the half pay of a certain Jesse Cannon, who served as a lieutenant in the navy of Virginia, during the war of the revolution.

In the progress of the trial on the first indictment, the able and ingenious counsel for the prisoner took various legal objections, and insisted on numerous points, which occasioned a wide range of discussion and extended researches into the whole criminal code.

The result was, that some counts were quashed, because the forged instrument was not set out in them; one which charged the forgery and for variance in the recital of it, in mistaking the figures 10 for 18 and in inserting the words "their father and their uncle" for "their father and uncle," while another was sustained, where the word "that" was put for "the," and "they" for "thy," (both required by the sense), the court deeming these variances immaterial. Most of the other objections were overruled. But the court decided against the prosecution, the two following points, on which it mainly relied—that the offence for uttering as true the forged paper, and the offence of causing to be presented such forged paper at the office of the secretary of the treasury, having been consummated in the District of Columbia, the prisoner could not be convicted of either within this district. The facts were, that the forged paper was sent from Cambridge in this district, by the prisoner, through the mail, to his agent in the District of Columbia, with instructions to present it in support of the claim aforesaid, at the proper office, and they were accordingly so presented. The district attorney also insisted on the fact of a subsequent sale by the prisoner of the claim to another party in Somerset county, as further evidence in support of the count for uttering as true the false paper.

This indictment being no longer sustainable, as a matter of form, a verdict of not guilty was rendered for the prisoner.

Of the four remaining indictments two were drawn on the first section of the act of congress, treating the offences as felonies, and resembled the first, with the difference of the papers charged as forged, uttered, &c.; and the other two were drawn on the second section, which provides for punishing as a misdemeanor the knowingly having in possession forged papers, with intent to defraud the United States.

The prisoner pleaded guilty to the two last mentioned indictments; and the district attorney entered a nolle prosequi on the two others.

A consideration which led the district attorney to enter the nolle prosequi on the remaining indictments for felony, was the opinion which he held, that they were barred by limitations, by a single day, on the day the indictments were found by the grand jury; according to a recent decision of the circuit court of the U. States, for the eastern district of Virginia, in a prosecution under this same statute.

The indictments for misdemeanor came within the limitations, by one day, in one case, and two days in the other. And the indictment first tried was found only two days within the limitation.

The court sentenced the said Arthur Dashiell to be imprisoned in the jail of Baltimore county for two years and six months, and to pay a fine of $5, and costs, on each conviction—making in all five years imprisonment.

The court being satisfied of the prisoner's inability to pay, inflicted merely a nominal fine.

N. Williams, district attorney, for the United States—W. H. Collins and T. Yates Walsh, counsel for the prisoner.

Supreme court. Barrett P. Staats vs. John Thompson. This was an action brought by B. P. Staats, president of the Albany County Medical society, against John Thompson, a botanic physician, for practising medicine contrary to the laws of this state. Defendant produced a patent from the United States to his father, for the exclusive right and use of certain botanic medicines, and he as assignee of the patent, claimed a right under said patent to practice and prescribe for patients. The justices court of the city of Albany decided that he, Thompson, had no right to practice medicine for fee or reward, unless he had a diploma from some regular incorporated medical school or society, and fined him the sum of $25, from which decision Thompson appealed to the supreme court. The supreme court affirmed the decision; consequently botanic physicians have no right to recover for services. [Albany Argus.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

COMMERCIAL BANK INVESTIGATION.

The following is the letter of Messrs. Young and Van Schaick, resigning their seats in the senate of New York, in consequence of the decision of that body in the case of Isaac W. Bishop.

To the president of the senate:

Sir: The senate, by a resolution of the 20th instant, determined that it possessed the power of expulsion. It also pronounced by another resolution that Isaac W. Bishop, a member of this body, had been guilty of moral and official misconduct; and by a subsequent vote, on another resolution, it decided that it would not expel the said Isaac W. Bishop.

It results from the above decisions that Mr. Bishop is authorized to exercise the functions of senator and the office of judge in the court of last resort, during the period for which he was elected. Against him as an individual we have never entertained any hostile feeling and it is our earnest desire that he may so conduct hereafter as to merit the confidence of the community, and receive the forgiveness of both God and man. But we protest against the position assumed by the senate, that we must, at his option, mingle our official labors with his. If the fountain of law and of justice contains pollution, who will believe that its streams are pure?

He is clearly convicted of gross immorality and also aggravated official misconduct. For the truth of this assertion we confidently appeal to the unbiased judgment of every intelligent individual who will carefully examine the testimony. But the obvious deduction from the proceedings of the senate is, that such conduct does not call for expulsion, nor even merit a reprimand; and that moral and official misconduct may be ranked among the privileges of a senator of this state. Against such positions we strongly protest.

Having acted together on the committee of investigation, and entertaining corresponding views in regard to the soundness and importance of the principles contained in the report of that committee, we have deemed it proper to unite in this last expression of our sentiments.

Strongly impressed with the belief that the course adopted by the senate on this subject, is calculated to relax those moral principles which the author of our nature designed as the ligaments of society, and which law-givers and judges should ever regard and maintain as holy and inviolate, and also to weaken the bonds by which alone honorable men can be held together; we cannot, under such circumstances, longer retain our seats, and exercise our functions. We therefore hereby severally resign the office of senator.

S. YOUNG,

M. VAN SCHAICK.

May 22, 1836.

Mr. Bishop before tendering his resignation narrated the manner of his becoming acquainted with Mr. Henry Hone, and stated that the hon. Mr. Van Schaick, a man of honor and philanthropy, and who had given large sums as religious and charitable donations, was one of a party at which Mr. Hone and others played cards. Through that medium, Mr. B. said, he became acquainted with Mr. Hone, and as he had been censured for associating with him, he deemed it proper, at this time, to explain the origin of that association. Mr. B. then sent up his resignation, which was read, as follows:

To the hon. John Tracy, lieutenant governor:

I have retained my seat in the senate, only with a view that the judgment of my peers might be pronounced upon the charges made against me. My own knowledge that I had not sullied either my personal honor, or the high station to which I had been called by my constituents, has enabled me to meet my accusers and judges with unblushing confidence as to the result of my deliberations in my case.

The decision of the senate declaring that I had not been found unworthy of a seat, and that I had not done any act demanding my expulsion, justifies the course I had marked out for myself.

Surrounded by artful and designing accusers, whose love of gaining money from the fearful extremities for the purpose of extorting money from my apprehensions. They having failed in this, I, in the end, forced them to attempt my conviction by the vote of the senate. The political views of some, and the private hostility of others, having been rebuked, makes me willing to declare that my farther association with the senate is at an end. In tendering my resignation, I am guided solely by my own notions of personal honor, and what I believe to be my duty to my constituents of the fourth senate district. I sincerely hope they may fill my place with one who, under existing circumstances, can better serve them.

But permit me to say that I believe they will not find a representative that will serve them with a truer or more devoted heart than I have done. During this investigation, and under the most trying difficulties, I ask you, fellow senators, whether I have shrunk from any vote which was demanded by the will of those I represented? If I have obeyed the will of the people to my personal prejudice, am I not to be believed when I assert, as I now do before God and men, that I have been most falsely and maliciously assailed.

At a proper time and occasion I shall expose fully to my constituents the motives and objects of a corrupt combination to destroy me, and that one of my colleagues, Samuel Young, deserves their condemnation as he has deserved and received "the condemnation of the senate." I have only to declare in conclusion, that with the exception of those who are no longer senators, and who assuming the garb of hypocritical purity and sanctity, were actuated toward me by motives of malice and revenge, I entertain toward the senate and yourself personally, feelings of the greatest kindness and sentiments of the most profound respect.

I do therefore respectfully resign my seat in the senate.

ISAAC W. BISHOP.

The Albany Journal in speaking of Bishop's resignation says: Much of Mr. Bishop's statement we know to be wholly untrue. The manner in which he says he became acquainted with Mr. Hone is notoriously incorrect. Messrs. Bishop and Hone were members of the legislature two years ago, and were as well acquainted then as now. All of that part of his statement is a miserable fiction.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

In the house of representatives, February 8, 1836.

Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered or may hereafter be presented to this house, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and, also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, (Mr. Jarvis), with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia (Mr. Wise); together with every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to the subject, be referred to a select committee with instructions to report:

That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy; and

That, in the opinion of this house, congress ought not to interfere in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of public faith, unwise, impolitic and dangerous to the union. Assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to allay excitement, to repress agitation, to secure and maintain the just rights of the slaveholding states, and of the people of this District, and to restore harmony and tranquillity among the various sections of this union.

Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina; Mr. Hamer, of Ohio; Mr. Pierce, of New Hampshire; Mr. Hardin, of Kentucky; Mr. Jarvis, of Maine; Mr. Owens, of Georgia; Mr. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Dromgoole, of Virginia, and Mr. Terrill, of New York, were appointed a committee in pursuance of the resolution.

Attect:

W. S. FRANKLIN, clerk.

MR. PINCKNEY'S REPORT.

The select committee, appointed under the following resolution of the house of representatives of the United States, of the 8th of February, 1836, viz: "Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented to this house, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and also the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, (Mr. Jarvis), with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia (Mr. Wise); together with every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to this subject, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report: That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy; and that, in the opinion of this house, congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic and dangerous to the union: assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to allay excitement, to repress agitation, to secure and maintain the just rights of the slaveholding states, and of the people of this District, and to restore harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of this union:" respectfully submit the following report, in which they have unanimously concurred:

The subject referred is one of grave import. Your committee approach it with a deep sense of its magnitude and absorbing interest. They have long considered the movements in relation to this matter as fraught with incalculable evils, not only to the slaveholding states, but to every portion of our common country. They rejoice, therefore, that the great body of the people of the non-slaveholding states have come forward, as they have done, in the true spirit of American patriotism, to sustain their constitutional obligations to their southern brethren, and to arrest the disturbance of the public peace. They rejoice particularly, that the federal legislature, acting under a deep sense of its responsibility to the nation, has also interposed its warning voice, and given a solemn expression of its judgment upon this exciting subject; and they feel assured, that as the representatives have responded to the people, so the people will firmly and patriotically sustain the position now taken by their representatives.

As moderation is essential to the discovery of truth, your committee will carefully abstain from every thing that may cause offence, or inflame excitement, in any section of the union. But while they would make every allowance for the motives of individuals, where the objects contemplated are utterly destructive to society, they cannot too strongly express their condemnation of the conduct of the abolitionists, and their utter abhorrence of the consequences to which, if persisted in, it must inevitably lead. They feel assured that no man, or set of men, will be permitted to put the country and the government at defiance, by persevering in machinations which threaten to bring the citizens of the different states into collision, and to overthrow the whole system of civil society itself, in the slaveholding portions of the union. Your committee believe that the strength of the agitators has been greatly exaggerated, by themselves and others, but whether their number be small or great, there can be no doubt that they have done, and are doing, incalculable evils; and every true patriot must be aware that a crisis has now arrived in the political condition of the country, in which neutrality would be criminal, and in which he must determine between the suppression of abolition, and the destruction of the union, and take his stand accordingly, for or against his country.

Your committee have learned with surprise, that the reference of this subject has caused dissatisfaction in certain portions of the south. While they deeply regret this circumstance, they beg leave to remark, that it is not only abundantly justified by precedent, but in entire accordance with the established usage and invariable policy, in relation to matters of this character; memorials praying for the abolition of slavery in the states, or in the District of Columbia, having always been either referred or laid upon the table. On the present occasion, the subject was referred for the express purpose of having a report "calculated to sustain the just rights of the slaveholding states, and of the people of this District;" and by allaying excitement, and repressing agitation, to insure the future repose and permanent tranquillity of the country. The house was unwilling, on the one side, to invade what was believed to be the right of petition, [a right equally dear to every portion of our people, and which, it is thought, could not have been denied in this instance, without establishing a precedent at least as hazardous to the south, as to any other section of the union]; and it was desirous, on the other to accomplish for the south, what could not have been effected by refusing to receive the memorials, the union of an overwhelming majority, in a solemn and determined stand against the views and objects of the applicants. Whilst the denial of the right of petition could have produced none other than the most mischievous effects, your committee are thoroughly satisfied that the course adopted by the house will produce a state of public opinion and feeling in the non-slaveholding states, eminently favorable to the constitutional rights and interest of the slaveholding sections of the union.

The resolution under which your committee were appointed, naturally divides itself into several branches or propositions, each of which shall be considered in its order.

They are instructed to report in the first place—

That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery, in any of the states of this confederacy.

Your committee will merely allude to this proposition, in obedience to the express direction given them by the house, and not for the purpose of entering into any argument respecting it. Unquestionably, if there is any political or constitutional principle, which the people of the United States consider as settled beyond all possible dispute or controversy, it is that the institution of slavery, as it exists in the states of this confederacy, is municipal, not national, and that it belongs exclusively to the states, and can only be affected by state legislation. The power to regulate or act upon it, is one of the reserved powers of the states; a power which was not only not given, nor even intended to be given, by the framers of the constitution, to the general government, but which the states expressly and carefully guarded and retained to themselves, by that amendment of that instrument, (article 10), in which it is declared, that "all powers not delegated by the constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

The subject of slavery in the states, then, is not an open question or matter of debate. The fact that congress possesses no authority whatever to legislate respecting it, is one that can neither be strengthened by argument, nor made clearer by discussion. And your committee consider it most fortunate for the peace of the country, that it is so. He is indeed but little acquainted with the human heart, and has derived but little advantage from the lessons of history, who can imagine for a moment, if he knows any thing of the general character, or considers the political and physical strength of the people of the south, that even if the power of legislation on this subject had been expressly conferred on congress by the constitution, it could be exercised against the consent of the states interested, without the certainty of civil war, and the probable dissolution of the union. The declaration, however, which the house has so solemnly and decisively made upon this point, cannot fail, as your committee believe, to produce the most beneficial results. As the abolitionists care little for emancipation in the District, except as the precursor of a far more extended and general scheme, the presumption is, that having now no possible hope of governmental interference with the states, and seeing the more than probable consequences of the exercise of such a power, if it were possessed, they will discontinue their machinations in relation to the District; a consummation devoutly to be wished by every patriot, in every section of the union. But be the issue what it may, the house of representatives has done its duty by placing this solemn declaration upon record. It is not only peculiarly proper in itself, considering the present state of the abolition question, but, if any justification were necessary, it is amply justified by precedent.

In 1790, (and from that period to the present, the abolitionists have steadily aimed at general emancipation), several petitions, praying for the abolition of slavery in the states, having been presented and referred, the house finally adopted a resolution, amongst others, in which it announced to the petitioners, and to the country, that congress has no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them, in any of the states yet remaining with the several states alone to provide any regulations therein, which humanity or policy may require." Upon the whole, your committee consider the instruction given them by the house upon this point, rather as a decisive expression of a great fundamental principle of constitutional law, than as a call upon them to sustain a questionable position. They are aware that some members voted against the instruction upon this point, under the impression that whilst the principle asserted is unquestionable in itself, its assertion by the house, in this form, might seem to, imply doubt, and to countenance the idea that it is really debatable. In this view, the members who thus voted, may be joined perhaps by many intelligent and worthy citizens of the slaveholding states; but your committee cannot believe that the assertion, in any form, by the house of representatives, of a principle so important, and at the same time of so strong a local bearing, and particularly by a vote so nearly approaching unanimity as is recorded on its journal in favor of this instruction, can have a tendency to weaken that principle, or its binding and paramount influence upon congress and the country in all time to come. The precedent above quoted from the congress of 1790 shows that the house of representatives of that day, so far from fearing the effect of such action upon its part, sought to record its solemn conviction upon this question of power in themselves, and has handed down to us its judgment, in precise accordance with our own. That house was largely, if not entirely, composed of men of the revolution, and many of its members are known to have been also members of the convention which formed the federal constitution. Since that period nearly half a century has rolled away, and now that the successors of that house, acting under the same consideration, solemnly re-affirm the principle laid down by those great and good men, and avow it to be not only the settled opinion of this congress, but of the great body of the people of the United States, may we not hope, and indeed conclude that it will be hereafter deemed a solemn and deliberate exposition of the constitution, and that all attempts in future to violate those sacred compromises, which lie at the very foundation of our constitutional compact, or to excite apprehension on this subject, will be effectually counteracted and defeated. Your committee cannot but indulge a most confident and animated hope that these good effects will be produced by the present action of the house.

Your committee are instructed to report, in the second place,

That, in the opinion of this house, congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia.

1st. Because it would be a violation of the public faith.

To obey this instruction of the house in the manner pointed out by the resolution, it will be necessary to examine, to some extent, the relations between the federal government and the District of Columbia; the probable objects of the provision in the constitution, authorising the cession of the District to the United States; and the consequent expectations which may have been rationally entertained by the states that made the cession, as to the exercise, by congress, of the powers granted to it over the ceded territory. Before entering upon this examination, however, it may be well to remark that the powers of congress over this District involved in this discussion, are wholly independent of, and derived from a source entirely separate from, the general legislative powers granted to congress by the constitution. As the legislature of confederated states, the powers of congress are equal, and of universal application, throughout all the states, and they were given to congress before the cession of the District, and were held and exercised independently thereof. This will be made manifest by a brief statement of facts. The first congress, under the constitution, assembled on the 4th of March, 1789, and the government provided for by the constitution was organized on that day. The general powers conferred on the different branches of the federal government were exercised from that day forward; and the union of the states, under constitutional government, was then perfected and put in practical operation.

The cession from Virginia, of that portion of the District of Columbia that belonged to her, was not made until the 3d of December of that year—nine months after the federal government had been in operation;* and the cession by Maryland of that portion of the District that belonged to her, (and in which the seat of government is in fact located), was not made until the 19th day of December, 1791,†—more than two years and nine months after the existence of the government in its present constitutional form. Congress did not in fact, remove to the District thus ceded nor did the District thus ceded become practically the seat of government until the year 1800; and the laws of the states by which, the District was ceded were declared, by an act of congress of the 16th July, 1790,‡ “to be in force within the District until the removal of the government to it, and until congress shall otherwise by law direct.”

It appears, then, that the federal government was in operation under the constitution nearly a year before congress possessed any power of local legislation over any portion of the District of Columbia, and nearly three years before that power became as extensive as the present bounds of the District, or included that portion of the ten miles square in which the seat of government is in fact located. It also appears, that the first act of the federal legislature in reference to its jurisdiction then partly acquired, and partly to be acquired, was to provide for the continuance, in all their force, and in every particular, within the District, of the laws of the states that made the cession, until December, 1800; a period of nine years after the time when the powers of congress, as a local legislature for the District, were perfected by the state of Maryland. Nor is this all: by the act of 1790 it was declared, as has been already shown, that the laws of Maryland and Virginia should be the laws of the District, not only “until the time fixed for the removal of the government thereto,” but also “until congress shall otherwise provide by law.” No alteration, however, to any considerable extent has yet been made, and the laws of Virginia and Maryland which were in force at the time of their respective, cessions, and in force respectively in the portions of the District ceded by each, still continue to be, in almost every particular, the local laws of the District of Columbia.

Such are the relations at present existing between the federal government and the District, so far as local legislation is concerned. The powers of congress, as the local legislature of the District, were derived from the cessions by Virginia and Maryland, and the special grant of exclusive legislation, and not from the general powers conferred upon it by the constitution; and these special and local powers which congress has now possessed for nearly half a century, have been exercised only to the extent above described; and, from the best information your committee have been able to obtain, to no other or greater extent.

The right of congress to accept the cession of this territory from the states of Virginia and Maryland, is found in the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of the United States, which gives it power “to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District, not exceeding ten miles square, as may by cession of particular states and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of government of the U. States;” and the purpose for which the cession was to be made and received, is declared in the language of the constitution itself, “such District as may become the seat of government of the United States.” The cession, therefore, was to be made for this purpose, and for no other; and as regards its use by the federal government, the object of this provision evidently was simply to authorise congress to accept the grant, and to exercise the powers of legislation therein provided for.

It will be conceded by the committee, for the purpose of this report, that the cession was made in conformity with the power of congress to receive, and that, therefore, by the cession from Virginia and Maryland, congress is in possession of the powers which the constitution intended it should possess over the district intended to be ceded.

This brings us to the inquiry, as to the probable objects of the grant of “exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever,” over the territory which was to constitute the seat of government of the United States. In consulting the commentators upon the constitution, it will be found that the old congress encountered inconveniences and even dangers, from holding their sessions where state legislatures had exclusive local jurisdiction, and where state authorities alone were to be depended on in matters of police and personal protection. Indeed, an adjournment of that congress from the state of Pennsylvania to New Jersey, for a cause of this description, which occurred at the close of the revolutionary war, no doubt contributed greatly to the introduction of this clause into the constitution of the union. The proceedings of the old congress show distinctly, that the acquirement of a territory for the seat of the federal legislature, over which it should have exclusive or special jurisdiction, was a favorite idea with that body, as early as the year 1783, and that it continued up to the time of the formation of the constitution.

Upon this point your committee will only detain the house with a few of the resolutions adopted by the old congress that go to establish it. On the 7th of October, 1783, a resolution was passed, “that buildings for the use of congress be erected on or near the banks of the Delaware,* provided a suitable district can be procured on or near the banks of the said river for a federal town, and that the right of soil, and exclusive, or such other jurisdiction as congress may direct, shall be vested in the United States.” On the 21st of the same month (October, 1783), another resolution was passed, preceded by a preamble as follows: “Whereas there is reason to expect that the providing buildings for the alternate residence of congress in two places will be productive of the most salutary effects, by securing the mutual confidence and affections of the states, Resolved, that buildings be provided for the use of congress at or near the lower falls of the Potomac,† or Georgetown, provided a suitable district on the banks of the river can be procured for a federal town, and the right of soil, and an exclusive jurisdiction, or such other as congress may direct shall be vested in the United States.”

On the 20th of December, 1784, the old congress passed, among others, the following resolutions:

“Resolved, That it is expedient that congress proceed to take measures for procuring suitable buildings to be erected for their accommodation.

These resolutions by the continental congress, as to the expediency and necessity for a territory for the seat of the federal government, over which it should have peculiar if not exclusive jurisdiction, are produced to show the origin of the provision in the constitution upon that subject, and the object for which the acquisition of such a territory was desired. That object, beyond all question was to secure a seat for the federal government, where the power of self-protection should be ample and complete, and where it might be exercised without collision or conflict with the legislative powers of any of the states, so far as its exercise should be required for the great national purposes for which the peculiar or exclusive jurisdiction was sought to be obtained. The jurisdiction was made exclusive, not as your committee believe, and as they think every considerate citizen will admit, to change the object of the grant of the jurisdiction when it should be made, but to secure that object more effectually by making the federal government independent of state interference, and of state protection, within the district where it was to be located, and where its deliberations should be held.

Had the legislative power of congress over this District not been made exclusive, one of the great and wise objects intended to be secured, the prevention of conflict between federal and state legislation, would have been necessarily defeated. Every statesman will admit the extreme inconvenience and danger of granting powers of legislation of the same character, and to be exercised within the same territory (powers of local and municipal legislation), to two distinct and independent legislative bodies; and the extreme difficulty, if not impossibility, of so defining the portions of power to be exercised by each, as to prevent constant conflict and collision. This must have been the result, if any division of the powers of local legislation, within the District of Columbia, had been made between congress and the states by which the territory was ceded to the United States. Congress required all that power which, through all time, would be indispensably necessary for its own protection, and also to render all the departments of the federal government independent of state authority, and entirely dependent on, and obedient to, the federal legislature, and it alone, in all matters of police or municipal legislation. The adoption of the federal constitution by the people of the several states with this provision in it, shows that the attainment of these objects was considered of paramount importance; and hence, in the judgment of your committee, the power in question was made exclusive.

Assuming the correctness of these premises, the next inquiry is, what expectations were the states by which the District was ceded, as well as their sister states, authorised to entertain as to the exercise by congress of the legislative powers derived from these cessions? The cessions included not only a portion of the territory of those states, but also a portion of their citizens. To secure the great national objects intended by the cession, the jurisdiction of the states over those citizens, as well as over the territory of the District, was transferred to the federal legislature. This transfer, from the necessity of the case, abridged the rights of the citizens within the territory, who had been formerly entitled to vote for their legislators and other rulers, by subjecting them to a government composed of persons in whose election they were to have no choice. Their governance, however, was confided to those entrusted with the common government of all the states; and when we reflect upon the confidence reposed in congress by the states that made the transfer, and by the citizens transferred, it accounts at once for the readiness with which the cession was effected. Still, the question recurs, what expectations might reasonably be entertained by the states making the cession, by the other states of the confederacy, so far as their interests were directly or indirectly involved, and by the citizens thus placed under the peculiar care of congress, as to its exercise of the powers conferred upon it by this cession of territories for a seat of the federal government?

Your committee have no hesitation to say, in answer to this inquiry, that those expectations, by all the parties interested, not only might, but must have been, that congress would exercise the powers conferred, so far as their exercise should be found necessary for the great national objects of the cession, with strict reference to the accomplishment of those objects, and that all other powers conferred by the cession would be exercised with an equally strict reference to the interests and welfare of the inhabitants of the District—those citizens of two free states who had been made dependent on congress for their local legislation, for the protection of life, liberty and property—rights guaranteed by the constitution to all the citizens of the confederacy—in order that a seat for the federal government, subject to the exclusive control of congress, might be granted to it. If these positions are correct, it follows necessarily that the institutions, the customs, the rights, the property, and every other incident pertaining to those citizens, and municipal in its character, which they enjoyed as citizens of the states to which they belonged before the cession of the District, and which did not then, and have not yet, interfered with the great national rights and privileges intended to be secured by the cession, should have been hitherto, and should be in all time to come, guarded and preserved with the same paternal care and kindness with which the legislatures of the states, to which they belonged would have guarded and protected them if they had continued to be intrusted to their respective jurisdictions.

Your committee rely confidently upon this as the great reason for the faithful action of congress in reference to this subject. They feel assured that no rational man will differ with them. Two questions, then, remain to be considered, to determine whether congress should or should not attempt to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, viz:

1. Do the great national objects which were intended to be secured to the federal government by the cession of the territory require such action on the part of congress?

Your committee will make no argument upon so plain a proposition. No individual within their knowledge, not even the most deluded fanatic, has ever asked, or attempted to justify, a measure of this description upon such a pretext. The security and independence of congress, from the moment of its removal to this District to the present hour, have been as perfect as the framers of the constitution could have desired. No intimation has ever been heard that the existence of slavery in the District of Columbia has ever produced the slightest danger or inconvenience either to the interests or to the officers of the federal government within it. Surely, then, congress cannot be called upon to interfere with that institution within the District as one of its duties growing out of the national objects connected with the cession; and if such interference is demanded from it, the demand must grow out of its relations to the District as a local legislature. This brings the committee to the remaining question.

2. Would the states of Maryland and Virginia, if the cession of this territory to the federal government had not been made, from any thing which has been shown to congress, be induced to interfere with, or abolish, the institution of domestic slavery within it?

At the time of the cession from those states, slavery existed in every portion of their territory, in the same degree, and subject to the same laws and regulations by which it was authorised and regulated in the territory ceded to the federal government. It still exists in those states, without any material variation or modification of their laws respecting it. As those states, then, have not abolished it within the territories remaining under their jurisdiction, it is reasonable to suppose that they would have abolished it in the territory comprising the District, had they continued to retain their original jurisdiction over it? Can any reason whatever be given for the abolition of slavery in this particular District, which does not apply with equal force to every other slaveholding section of the country? Can any cause be shown why the states of Maryland and Virginia would have abolished, or would now abolish, slavery in this District, had it continued to form a part of those states respectively, which would not have warranted or produced general abolition throughout those states? Most unquestionably not! As those states, then, have not abolished slavery in the residue of their territory, it is evident that they would not have abolished it in the District of Columbia, if it had continued subject to their action. It follows conclusively, therefore, that congress, as the local legislature of the District, and acting independently of the national considerations connected with its powers over it, is bound, for the preservation of the public faith, and the rights of all the parties interested, to act upon the same reasons, and to exercise the same paternal regard, which would have governed the states by which the District was ceded to the federal government. And it is unnecessary to add, that congress has acted wisely in treating the institutions found in existence at the time of the cession, as the institutions of the people of the District; in continuing their laws and customs, as the laws and customs to which they had been used, and which should never be altered, or interfered with, except where the people themselves may be desirous of a change.

Your committee must go farther, and express their full conviction, that any interference by congress with the private interests or rights of the citizens of this District without their consent, would be a breach of the faith reposed in the federal government by the states that made the cession, and as violent an infraction of private rights as it would have been if those states themselves, supposing their jurisdiction had remained unimpaired over their territory, had abolished slavery within those portions of their respective limits, and had continued its existence, upon its present basis, in every other portion of them. And surely there is no citizen in any quarter of the country, who has the smallest regard for our laws and institutions, state and national, or for equal justice, and an equality of rights and privileges among citizens entitled to it, who would attempt to justify such an outrage on the part of those states. The question then is, are the citizens of the District desirous of a change themselves? Has any request or movement been made by them that would justify an interference with their private rights on the part of congress? None, whatever! The citizens of the District not only have not solicited any action on the part of congress, but it is well known that they earnestly deprecate such action, and regard, with abhorrence, the efforts that are made by others, who have no interest whatever in the District, to effect it. It is impossible, therefore, that any such interference on the part of congress could be justified or even palliated, on the ground that it was sought or desired by those who are alone interested in the subject. If, therefore, congress were to interfere with this description of property against the consent of the people of the District, your committee feel bound to say, that it would be as gross a breach of the public faith, and as outrageous an infraction of private rights, as it would have been if such an interference had been committed by the states of which the District was formerly a part, supposing that it never had been ceded to the United States.

Your committee will here anticipate an objection which may be urged against this reasoning and these conclusions. They have shown that the powers of congress over this District divide themselves into two classes, national and local; that in reference to the former, the action of congress should be governed by the interest of the whole country, so far as they are connected with the branches of the federal government located within the District; that in reference to the latter, its powers are and its action should be, those of a local and municipal legislature, extending its paternal care and protection over the citizens dependent upon, and subjected to, this branch of its authority; that in the exercise of its powers, the safest stand in reference to slavery is, what would the states to which the District originally belonged, and of which its citizens were originally citizens, have done in case their jurisdiction had never been transferred to congress; and that those states would certainly not have interfered with the institution of slavery in the District, had the power to do so remained with them. The objection anticipated is, that the states in question have pursued an unwise policy as to themselves, and that their having done so should not have bound congress, as the local legislature of the District, to a similar policy in relation to its government. To this, however, your committee consider it perfectly conclusive to reply, that under our institutions, that people is the best governed, which is governed most in accordance with its own habits, interests and wishes, that the policy hitherto pursued by congress in reference to slavery within the District, your committee have every reason to believe, has been in perfect conformity with the wishes and interests of the citizens concerned; and that it will be time enough for congress, acting as the local legislature of the District, and in that capacity bound to consult the governed, as the regulator of its action, to move in any matter relating to their private interests and rights when they themselves shall ask such movement.

There is another consideration connected with this part of the argument, which your committee think worthy of attention. It is this: that there is no law in the District prohibiting the master from manumitting his slaves, which he may do at his own discretion, and without incurring any responsibility whatever. Certain it is that no such law has been passed by congress. The citizens of the District, therefore, have no necessity for the aid of congress, should they wish the abolition of slavery among them. They have only to exercise an existing right, and their wish will be accomplished. Can their be more decisive evidence, then, that they do not wish the abolition of slavery, than that it continues to exist among them? or can any one desire more conclusive proof that any attempt by congress to effect this object by the force of law would be an interference with the rights of private property, against the wishes and consent of those concerned, and for none of the purposes for which congress is authorised by the constitution to take private property for public use?

Hence, your committee believe they have proved, beyond the power of contradiction, that an interference by congress with slavery in the District of Columbia would be a violation of the public faith—of the faith reposed in congress by the states which ceded the territory to the federal government, so far as the rights and interests of those citizens residing within the ceded territory are concerned.

Your committee will now consider this proposition in reference to the interests of the states of Maryland and Virginia. They were slaveholding states at the time they made their cession, and they are so still. They entirely surround this District, from which they are only separated upon all sides by imaginary lines. They made the cession for the great national objects which have been already pointed out, and they made it from motives of patriotism alone, and without any compensation from the federal government for the surrender of jurisdiction over commanding positions in both states. The surrender was made for purposes deemed sufficiently important by all the original states, to be provided for in the constitution of the United States; and it was made in conformity with that provision of the constitution. It is surely unnecessary, after this statement of facts, to undertake to show that those patriotic states made this cession, for the purpose of good to the union, and consequently to themselves, and not for purposes of evil to themselves, and consequently to the union, and that the government of the United States accepted the cession for the same good and not for evil, purposes.

If, then, it can be demonstrated that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would produce evil, and not good to the states that made the cession, the conclusion is inevitable that such an act on the part of congress would be a violation of the faith reposed in it by those states. To all to whom this is not perfectly palpable without an argument, the following considerations are presented:

It has been already stated that the states of Maryland and Virginia surround the District. It has also been showed that, in reference to slavery within the District, the relations of congress are entirely those of a local legislature, and that its action therefore, in this capacity, should be governed by the same reasons which would have governed those states themselves in relation to this subject, if their jurisdiction over this territory had never been surrendered. Let us suppose, then, that this jurisdiction had never been surrendered by Maryland and Virginia, and that it was now proposed that they should abolish slavery, and relinquish all power of legislation over free blacks, within the portions of those states which constitute the District of Columbia, retaining their respective institutions of slavery in all the remaining portions of their territory. Who is there that would not be amazed at the folly of such an act? Who does not see that such a step would necessarily produce discontent and insurrections in the remaining portions of those states?

Who does not perceive that under such circumstance the District would constitute at once a neutral ground, upon which hosts of free blacks, fugitive slaves and incendiaries, would be assembled in the work of general abolitionism; and that from such a magazine of evil, every conceivable mischief would be spread through the surrounding country, with almost the rapidity of the movements of the atmosphere? Surely no one can doubt the certainty of the consequential evils in the case supposed. How then can any doubt or deny the dangers in the case before us? The territory is the same; it is surrounded by the same portions of slaveholding states, and the only difference is, that in the case supposed, the abolition would be the work of state authorities, while, in the other, it is sought to accomplish it by the authority of congress. The condition of things before and after it is done, is the same in both cases, and the opportunities for mischief, in case the work be accomplished, are equal in both. Can it be necessary to say more, to establish the position, that any interference with slavery in the District of Columbia, on the part of congress, would be a violation of the public faith, the faith reposed in congress by those states, and without which they never could have been induced to have made that cession?

It only remains under this head to show that congress could not interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, without a violation of the public faith, in reference to the slaveholding states generally, as well as to the states of Virginia and Maryland. The provision in the constitution authorising congress to accept the cession of a territory for a seat of the federal government, and to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over it, was as general and universal as any other provision in that instrument. In its national objects all the states were equally interested, and so far as there was any danger that the powers of local legislation conferred on congress might interfere with, or injuriously affect, the institutions of the various states, each state possessed an interest proportioned to the probable danger to itself. As far as your committee know or believe, however, no apprehension of an interference on the subject of domestic slavery was entertained in any quarter, or expressed by any statesman of the day. An examination of the commentaries on the constitution will show that various apprehensions were entertained as to the powers conferred on congress, by this clause, such as that privileged classes of society might be created within the District; that a standing army, dangerous to the liberties of the country, might be organized and sustained within it, and the like; but not a suggestion can be found that, under the local powers to be conferred, any attempt would be made to interfere with the private rights of the citizens who might be embraced within the District, or to disturb, or change, directly, or by consequence, the municipal institutions of the states, or that the subject of domestic slavery, as it existed in the states, could be in any way involved in the proposed cession. At that time, all the states held slaves. Many of them have since, by their own independent action, without influence or interference from the federal government, or from their sister states, effected, in their own time and way, the work of emancipation; others of the original states, remain as they were at the time of the adoption of the constitution, in reference to this description of property, and several new members have been admitted into the union as slaveholding states. All the states which have held, or now hold, slave property, have invariably considered the institution as one exclusively subject to state authority, and not to be affected, directly or indirectly, by federal interference. The practice of the government, as well as its theory, has established this doctrine, and the action of the states, in retaining or abolishing the institution at pleasure, has conformed entirely to this principle—now the subject of federal interference has become one of some agitation, and congress is solicited to adopt measures in relation to the District of Columbia, which have been shown to be most dangerous and destructive to the security and interests of the two slaveholding states by which it was ceded to the federal government. Your committee will not trouble the house to prove that any measure of the federal legislature which would have this tendency in those two states, would, from the very necessity of the case and the unity of the interest wherever it exists, have the same tendency, measurably, in all the other slaveholding members of the union. This position is too plain for argument. If, then, all the states were equally interested in the national objects for which this territory was ceded as the seat of the federal government; if that cession was designed by the framers of the constitution, to enure to the benefit of the whole confederacy, and was made in furtherance of that design; and if congress, contrary to the obvious intent and spirit of the cession, shall do an act not required by the national objects contemplated by it, but directly repugnant to the interests and wishes of the citizens of the ceded territory, and calculated to disturb the peace, and endanger the interest, of the slaveholding members of the union, such an act must be in violation of the public faith; of the faith reposed in congress by the states that made the cession, and which would be deeply injured by such an exercise of power under it, and also of the faith reposed in that body by all the states, inasmuch as no independent state in the union can be injured in its peace, or its rightful interests, by the action of the federal government, without a corresponding injury to every member of the confederate states.

Your committee have already shown that an interference with slavery in the District of Columbia, would involve a violation of the public faith, as regards the rights and interests of the citizens thereof. They recur to this topic, however, on account of its importance, and for the purpose of putting it in another light, and, as they consider, upon unanswerable ground. They are aware that, under the constitution,* congress possesses "exclusive legislation" over the aforesaid District; but the power of legislation was given to be exercised for beneficial purposes only, and cannot, therefore, be exercised, consistently with public faith, for any object that is at war with the great principles upon which the government itself is founded. The constitution, to be properly understood, must be taken as a whole. Wherever a particular power is granted, the extent to which it may be carried, can only be inferred from other provisions by which it may be regulated or restrained. The constitution, while it confers upon congress exclusive legislation within this District, does not, and could not, confer unlimited or despotic authority over it. It could confer no power contrary to the fundamental principles of the constitution itself, and the essential and unalienable rights of American citizens. The right to legislate, therefore, (to make the constitution consistent with itself), is evidently qualified by the provision that "no man shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law,"† and various others of a similar character.

We lay it down as a rule, that no government can do any thing directly repugnant to the principles of natural justice and of the social compact. It would be totally subversive of all the purposes for which government is instituted. Vattel says: "The great end of civil society is, whatever constitutes happiness with the peaceful possession of property." No republican would tolerate that a man should be punished, by a special statute, for an act not legally punishable at the time of its commission. No republican could approve any system of legislation by which private contracts, lawfully made, should be declared null and void, or by which the property of an individual, lawfully acquired, should be arbitrarily wrested from him by the high hand of power. But these great principles are not left for their support to the natural feelings of the human heart, or the mere general spirit of republican government. They are expressly incorporated in the constitution, and they have also been recognised, and insisted on, by the supreme court of the United States, which lays down the following sound and incontrovertible doctrine: "There are acts which the federal or state legislatures cannot, do, without exceeding their authority."

There are certain vital principles in our free republican government, which will determine and overrule an apparent and flagrant abuse of legislative power; as to authorise manifest injustice by positive law; or to take away that security for personal liberty or private property, for the protection whereof the government was established. An act of the legislature, contrary to the great first principles of the social compact, cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority. The obligation of a law, in governments established on express compact, and on republican principles, must be determined by the nature of the power on which it is founded. A few instances will suffice to explain. A law that punished a citizen for an innocent action, or that was in violation of an existing law; a law that destroys or impairs the obligation of the lawful private contracts of citizens; a law that makes a man a judge in his own case; or a law that takes property from A, and gives it to B. It is against all reason and justice for a people to entrust a legislature with such powers, and therefore it cannot be presumed that they have done it. The legislature may enjoin or permit, forbid or punish; they may declare new crimes, and establish rules of conduct for future cases; but they cannot change innocence into guilt, or punish innocence as a crime or violate the rights of an antecedent lawful private contract, or the rights of private property. To maintain that our federal or state legislatures possess such powers, even if they had not been expressly restrained, would be a political heresy, altogether inadmissible in our free republican government. Now, every principle here affirmed by the court, applies to, and protects, the people of this District, as well as the people of the states. The inhabitants of this District are a part of the people of the United States. Every right and interest secured by the constitution to the people of the states, is equally secured to the people of the District. Congress can therefore do no act affecting property or person, in relation to this District, which it is prohibited to do in relation to the citizens of the states, without a direct violation of the public faith. For instance, it is a well settled constitutional principle, that "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation." Now, the true meaning of this provision obviously is, that private property shall be taken only for public use, but shall not be taken, even then, without adequate remuneration.

It is evident, however, in reference to slavery, either that the government would use the slaves, or that it would not. If it would use them, then they would not be emancipated; and it would be an idle mockery to talk of the freedom of those who would only cease to be private, to become public slaves. If it would not use them, then how could it be said that they were taken for the public use, consistently with the provision just recited? But even if they could be taken without reference to public use, they could not be taken without just compensation. It is exceedingly questionable, however, whether congress could legally apply the public revenue to such an object, even with the consent of the owners of the slaves. As to emancipation without their consent, and without just compensation, your committee will not stop to consider it. It could not bear examination. Honor, humanity, policy, all forbid it. It is manifest, then, from all the considerations herein stated, (and there are others equally forcible that might be urged) that congress could not abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, without a violation of the public faith.

Your committee will only add one or two reflections upon this interesting point.

What is the meaning of the declaration adopted by the house, in relation to the District of Columbia? Is it not, that congress cannot, and will not, do an act which it has solemnly proclaimed to involve a violation of the public faith? Does it not afford every security to the south which it is in the power of the federal government to afford? Is it not tantamount in its binding obligation upon the government, to a positive declaration, that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be unconstitutional? Nay, is it not even more efficacious in point of fact? Constitutional provisions are matters of construction. The opinion of one house, upon an abstract controverted point may be overruled and reversed by another. But when congress has solemnly declared that a particular act would be a violation of the public faith, is it to be supposed that it would ever violate a pledge thus given to the country? Can any abolitionist expect it? Need any citizen of a slave state fear it? What is public faith but the honor of the government? Why are treaties regarded as sacred and inviolable? Why but because they involve the pledge, and depend upon the sanctity of the national faith? Why are all compacts or promises made by governments held to be irrevocably binding? Why, but because they cannot break them without committing perjury, and destroying all confidence in their justice and integrity? Surely then, your committee may say with the utmost confidence, (and the sentiments will be ratified by every American heart) that the declaration now promulgated in relation to this subject, will not be departed from by any succeeding legislature, except under circumstances (should any such ever arise in the progress of our country) in which a departure from it would not be regarded by the slaveholding states themselves, as a wanton or arbitrary infringement of the public faith!

Your committee are further instructed to report, that, in the opinion of this house, congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia—

2dly. Because it would be unwise and impolitic!

It will be palpable to the minds of all, that if the committee have succeeded in establishing, as they think they have, that any such interference on the part of congress would be a violation of the public faith, it would be a work of supererogation to attempt to show, that such an act would be unwise and impolitic; as there may be some, however, who may not agree with them in their arguments or conclusions upon that point, they feel bound, under the instruction of the house, to offer a few suggestions under this head.

The federal government was the creation of the states of the confederacy, and the great objects of its creation and organization "were to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity and provide for the common defence and general welfare."

Apply these principles, then, to an interference by congress with slavery in the District of Columbia. Such action, to be politic, must be in accordance with some one of those great objects; and it will be the duty of the committee, in as concise a manner as possible, to show that it would not be in accordance with either of them.

First, then, as to the District itself.

It has already been shown, that any interference, unsolicited by the inhabitants of the District, cannot "establish justice," or promote the cause of justice within it, but directly the reverse. No greater degree of slavery exists here now, than did exist when the constitution was adopted, and then the inhabitants of the District were citizens of the states of Maryland and Virginia, and had a voice in the adoption of that instrument. Surely their subsequent transfer to the jurisdiction of congress, made in conformity with that constitution, could not deprive them of the protection to which they were entitled by these great leading principles of it. On the contrary, they had every right to expect that congress would "establish justice," as to them, in strict compliance with the great charter under which it acted, and by which it is forbidden to interfere with the rights of private property, without their consent, or in any way to affect, injuriously, their domestic institutions. Of those institutions, slavery was, and is, the most important; and any attempt on the part of congress, acting as the local legislature of the District, to abolish it, would not only be impolitic, but an act of gross injustice and oppression.

Secondly, as to the states of the union. Here again your committee have but to refer to their former remarks, to show that the abolition of slavery in the District would not establish justice, but work great injustice to the surrounding states in particular, and to all the slave states in general, and in a degree proportioned to their proximity to the District, and to the influence upon the institution of slavery in the union of such action on the part of congress. They have also shown that the abolition of slavery here, so far from tending to "ensure domestic tranquillity," would have a direct tendency to produce domestic discord and violence, and service war, in all the slaveholding states. As those consequences, then, would follow such action, in reference to the states, your committee need not say, that, instead of providing for "the common defence by it," congress would be called upon to provide for the "common defence," in consequence of it, and to an extent which cannot now be foreseen. Seeing, then, that the American confederacy was formed for the great objects of providing for "the common defence and general welfare," it follows, necessarily that congress is not only restrained from the commission of any act by which these objects may be frustrated, but that it is bound to sustain and promote them. The same provision of the constitution which requires it to call out the militia to "suppress insurrections," unquestionably imposes the corresponding obligation upon it, to commit no act by which an insurrectionary spirit may be excited. The same provision which enjoins it on the federal government to "guaranty to each state a republican form of government, and to aid and protect each state against domestic violence," evidently implies the correlative obligation to take no step of which the direct and inevitable tendency would be to overthrow the state governments, and to involve them in wide spread scenes of misery and desolation. In one word if it be the duty of congress, as it most clearly is, to support and preserve the constitution and the union, then it is manifest, that it is bound to avoid the adoption of any legislation which may lead to their destruction. Your committee consider these positions too obvious to require argument or illustration. They consider it equally manifest, that any attempt to abolish slavery in the District, would necessarily tend to the deplorable consequences to which they have adverted. Congress, therefore, is bound, by every principle of duty which forbids it to interfere with slavery in any of the states, to abstain from any similar interference in the District of Columbia.

Your committee have already adverted to the evils that would necessarily result to the surrounding states and to the slave states generally, from any interference by congress with the institution of slavery in the District of Columbia. The nature and magnitude of those evils, however, require that they should be exhibited more fully and distinctly. The question is, whether slavery ought to be abolished in the District of Columbia? Now suppose the affirmative of this proposition were sustained by congress, what would it be but indirect legislation, or rather direct interference, as regards the rights and property of the southern states. And can any one imagine that such a state of things would be patiently borne! But this is not all; nay, it is not half the evil that would follow. Could slavery be abolished in the District without leading directly and inevitably to insubordination and revolt throughout the south? And can any one desire to produce such results? Is there a man who has forgotten the history of St. Domingo, or the insurgent attempt at Charleston, or the tragical scenes at Southampton! or the recent and lamentable occurrences in the states of Louisiana and Mississippi? or is there an individual who would wish them repeated and extended throughout the entire region of the south? Why, then, will infuriated individuals persist in pressing a scheme, which is not only impracticable, as regards the states, but fraught with evil to the very objects it is proposed to benefit? True philanthropy would avoid this subject, seeing the distraction it creates, and the dreadful consequences it involves.

It would leave it to those whom it most concerns, and who alone are competent to act upon it. It would trust to time and to the gradual operation of causes which may arise of themselves, but which can neither be produced nor hastened by foreign interference, or the power of this government. Why, then, your committee earnestly repeat, why urge a measure which is clearly impracticable in itself, which none but the slaveholding states have a right to act on, and which has increased, and will always increase, the hardships and restraints of those for whose imaginary benefit they are waging this cruel and fanatical crusade?

We have said that the scheme of general emancipation is impracticable. The slightest reflection must satisfy every candid mind of the truth of this assertion.

Admitting that the federal government had a right to act upon this matter, which it clearly has not, it certainly never could achieve such an operation without full compensation to the owners. And what would probably be the amount required! The aggregate value of all that species of property is not less probably than four hundred millions of dollars! And how could such an amount be raised? Will the people of this country ever consent to the imposition of oppressive taxes, that the proceeds may be applied to the purchase of slaves? The idea is preposterous; and not only that, but it is susceptible of demonstration, that even if an annual appropriation of ten millions were actually applied to the purchase and transportation of slaves, the whole number would not be sensibly diminished at the expiration of half a century, from the natural growth and multiplication of the race. Burthen the treasury as we might, it would still be an endless expense and an interminable work. And this view of the subject surely is sufficient of itself to prove, that of all the schemes ever projected by fanaticism, the idea of universal emancipation is the most visionary and impracticable.

But even if the scheme were practicable, what would be gained by effecting it? Suppose that congress could emancipate all the slaves in the union, is such a result desirable? This question is addressed to the sober sense of the people of America. Would it be politic or advantageous? Would it contribute to the wealth or grandeur or happiness of our country? On the contrary, would it not produce consequences directly the reverse? Are not the slaves unfit for freedom; notoriously ignorant, servile and depraved? and would any rational man have them instantaneously transformed into freemen, with all the rights and privileges of American citizens? Are they capable of understanding correctly the nature of our government, or exercising judiciously a single political right or privilege. Nay, would they even be capable of earning their own livelihood, or rearing their families independently by their own ingenuity and industry! What then would follow from their liberation, but the most deplorable state of society with which any civilized country was ever cursed?

How would vice and immorality and licentiousness overrun the land? How many jails and penitentiaries, that now seldom hold a prisoner, would be crowded to suffocation? How many fertile fields, that now yield regular and abundant harvests, would lie unoccupied and desolate? How would the foreign commerce of the south decline and disappear? How many thousands of seamen, of whom southern agriculture is the very life, would be driven for support to foreign countries? And how large a portion of the federal revenue, derived from foreign commodities exchanged for southern products, would be lost forever to this government? And, in addition to all this, what would be the condition of southern society, were all the slaves emancipated? Would the whites consent that the blacks should be placed upon a full footing of equality with them? Unquestionably not! Either the one class or the other would be forced to emigrate, and, in either case, the whole region of the south would be a scene of poverty and ruin. Or, what is still more probable, the blacks would every where be driven before the whites, as the Indians have been, until they were exterminated from the earth. And surely it is unnecessary to remark, that decay and desolation could not break down the south, without producing a corresponding depression upon the wealth and enterprise of the northern states. And here let us ask, too, what would be the condition of the non-slaveholding states, themselves, as regards the blacks? Are they prepared to receive myriads of negroes, and place them upon an equality with the free white laborers and mechanics, who constitute their pride and strength? Will the new states consent that their territory shall be occupied by negroes, instead of the enterprising, intelligent and patriotic white population, which is daily seeking their borders from other portions of the union? Shall the yeomanry of those states be surrounded by thousands of such beings, and the white laborer forced into competition and association with them? Are they to enjoy the same civil and political privileges as the free white citizen of the north and west, and to be admitted into the social circle as their friends and companions? Nothing less than all this will constitute perfect freedom, and the principles now maintained by those who advocate emancipation would, if carried out, necessarily produce this state of things. Yet, who believes that it would be tolerated for a moment? Already have laws been passed in several of the non-slaveholding states to exclude free blacks from a settlement within their limits, and a prospect of general and immediate abolition would compel them, in self-defence to resort to a system of measures much more rigorous and effective than any which have yet been adopted. Driven from the south then, the black would find no place of refuge in the north; and as before remarked, utter extermination would be the probable, if not the inevitable, fate of the whole race. Where is the citizen, then, that can desire such results? Where the American who can contemplate them without emotion? Where the abolitionist that will not pause, in view of the direful consequences of his scheme, both to the whites and the blacks, to the north and the south, and to the whole union at large?

Your committee deem it their duty to say that, in their opinion, the people of the south have been very unjustly censured in reference to slavery. It is not their purpose, however, to defend them. Their character, as men and citizens, needs no vindication from us. Wherever it is known it speaks for itself, nor would any wantonly traduce it, but those assassins of reputation, who are also willing to be the destroyers of life. Exaggerated pictures have been drawn of the hardships of the slave, and every effort made to malign the south, and to enlist against it both the religious and political feeling of the north. Your committee cannot too strongly express their unanimous and unqualified disapprobation of all such movements. The constitution, under which we live, was framed by our common ancestors, to preserve the liberty and independence achieved by their united efforts in the council and the field. In all our contests with foreign enemies, the south has exhibited an unwavering attachment to the common cause. Where is the spot of which Americans are prouder than the plains of Yorktown? Or, when was Britain more humbled, or America more honored, than by the victory of New Orleans! All our history, from the revolution down, attests the high and uniform and devoted patriotism of the south. Her domestic institutions are her own. They were brought into the union with her, and secured by the compact which makes us one people, and he who would sow dissensions among members of the same great political family, by assailing the institutions, and impugning the character of the citizens of the south, should be regarded as an enemy to the peace and prosperity of our common country.

If there is a feature by which the present age may be said to be characterized, it is that sickly sentimentality which, disregarding the pressing claims and wants of its own immediate neighborhood or town or state, wastes and dissipates itself in visionary, and often very mischievous, enterprises, for the imaginary benefit of remote communities. True philanthropy, rightly understood and properly applied, is one of the purest and most ennobling principles of our nature; but, misdirected or perverted, it degenerates into that fell spirit of fanaticism which disregards all ties, and tramples on all obstacles however sacred or venerable, in the relentless prosecution of its horrid purposes. Experience proves, however, that, when individuals in one place, mistaking the true character of benevolence, rashly undertake, at the imminent hazard of conflict and convulsion, to remedy what they are pleased to consider evils and distresses in another, it is naturally regarded by those who are thus injured, either as a species of madness which may be repelled or resisted, as any other madness may, or as manifesting a feeling of hostility on the one side, which must necessarily produce corresponding alienation on the other. It is all important, therefore, that the spirit of abolition, or in other words, of illegal and officious interference with the domestic institutions of the south, should be arrested and put down; and men of intelligence and influence at the north should endeavor to produce that sound and rational state of public opinion which is equally due to the south and to the preservation of the union.

And this brings your committee to the last position they have been instructed to sustain; and that is, that, in the opinion of this house, congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia.

ably. Because it would be dangerous to the union.

The first great object enumerated in the constitution, as an inducement to its adoption, was to "form a more perfect union." At that time all the states held slaves, to a greater or less extent; and slavery in the states was fully recognized and provided for, in many particulars, in that instrument itself. It was recognized, however, and all the provisions upon the subject so regarded it, as a state, and not a national institution. At that time, too, as has been before remarked, the District of Columbia constituted an integral part of two of the independent states which became parties to the confederacy and to the constitution itself. Since that time an entire emancipation of slaves has taken place in several of the old states; but in all cases this has been the work of the states themselves, without any interference whatever by the federal government. New states have also been admitted into the union, with an interdiction in their constitutions against involuntary servitude. In this way, the slave states have become a minority in representation in the federal legislature. Their interests, however, as states, in the institution of domestic slavery, as it exists within their limits, have not diminished, nor has their right to perfect security under the constitution, in reference to this description of property, been in any way, or to any degree, surrendered or impaired, since the adoption of that instrument by themselves and their sister states.

The operation of causes to a great extent natural, and proceeding from climate, soil and consequent production has rendered slavery a local and sectional institution, and has thus aided another to the most alarming apprehensions of patriots for the perpetuity of this union—the apprehension of local and geographical interests and distinctions. How immensely important is it then, that congress should do no act, and assume no jurisdiction, in reference to this great interest by which it shall ever appear to place itself in the attitude of a local instead of a national tribunal—a partial agent, providing for peculiar and sectional objects and feelings, instead of a general and paternal legislature equally and impartially promoting the general welfare of all the states. No one can fail to see that any other course on the part of congress, must weaken the confidence of the injured states, in the federal authority, and, to the same extent, prove "dangerous to the union."

Since the adoption of the federal constitution, the District of Columbia has been ceded to the United States as a seat of the federal government; but not only many eminent statesmen of the country, but all of the slaveholding states, speaking through their legislative assemblies, firmly believe and insist that the cession so made has conferred upon congress no constitutional power to abolish slavery within the ceded territory. Your committee have abstained from an examination of this question, because they were not instructed to discuss it. But they have no hesitation to say, that in the view they have taken of the whole question the obligations of congress not to act on this subject are as fully binding and inseparable as a positive constitutional interdiction, or an open acknowledgment of want of power.

Considering the subject in this light, your committee have already proved, that any interference by congress with the subject of slavery, would be evidently calculated to injure the interests and disturb the peace of the slaveholding states; and if they have succeeded in establishing this position, no argument is necessary to show, that such consequences, springing from the action of congress as the local legislature of the District, would eminently endanger the existence of this union. It has also been shown, that congress, as the legislature of the union, can have no constitutional power over this subject; and that its powers, as a local legislature of the District, were granted for the mere purpose of rendering its general powers perfect and free from conflict and collision with state authorities. It has also been shown that these local powers should be so exercised as to confer the greatest benefits upon the citizens residing within the District, with the least possible injury to the peculiar interest of any state, or the general interests of all the states.

Your committee have also shown, as they think successfully, that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be a deep injury to the citizens of the District, and, therefore, a violation of the trust reposed in congress as the local legislature of the District; and also, that it would inflict an incurable injury upon all the slaveholding states, and would, therefore, be an equal violation of the trust reposed in that body as the legislature of the union. If, then, they have established these positions, as they think they have, can any one doubt that the action contemplated would be "dangerous to the union?" being directly calculated, as it would be, to weaken the confidence of the District in congress as a safe and faithful local legislature, and the confidence of the slaveholding states as an impartial guardian of their interests.

Important as the union is to each state, and to the whole American people, every one will admit that, as far as possible, strict impartiality and kind feelings to all the interests and all the sections of the country should characterize the action of the federal government. The union was formed for the common and equal benefit of all the states, and for the perfect and equal protection of the rights and interests of all the citizens of all the states. Its only strength is in the confidence of the states, and of the people, that these great benefits will continue to be secured to them, and that these great purposes will be accomplished by its preservation. Any action, therefore, on the part of congress, which shall weaken or destroy that confidence in any portion of our citizens, or in any state of the union, must inevitably, to that extent, endanger the union itself! Who can doubt this reasoning?—Who does not know that the agitation of any question connected with domestic slavery, as it exists in this country, among any portion of our citizens, creates apprehension and excitement in the slaveholding states? Who does not know that the agitation of any such question in either branch of congress, shakes their confidence in the security of their most important interests, and consequently, in the continuance to them of those great benefits, to secure which they became parties to the union? Who then does not believe that any action by congress, having for its object the abolition of slavery in any portion of the union, however narrow or limited it may be, would necessarily impair the confidence of the slaveholding states in their security in relation to this description of property, put an end to all their hope of benefits to be derived to them from the further continuance of the union, and alienate their affections from it?

Were congress, in a single instance, to suffer itself to be impelled by mere feeling in one portion of the union, to attempt a gratification of that feeling at the sacrifice of the dearest interests and most sacred rights of another portion, who can doubt that the union would be seriously endangered, if not destroyed? But this conclusion does not depend upon reasoning alone. The evidences of public sentiment on this point, are equally abundant and decisive. Your committee having already extended their report beyond the limits to which they could have wished to confine it, will enter into no details upon this portion of their duty. Suffice it to say that the legislatures of several, if not all, the slaveholding states, have solemnly resolved that "congress has no constitutional authority to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia."

It would be utterly impossible, therefore, that any such attempt should be made by congress, without producing an excitement, and involving consequences, which no patriot can contemplate without the most painful emotions. It would be regarded by the slaveholding states as an entering wedge to a scheme of general emancipation, and therefore, tend to produce the same results, in relation to the federal government and the union, that would be produced by the adoption of any measure directly affecting the domestic institutions of the states themselves. Your committee will not dwell upon the picture that is thus presented to their minds. The reflection it excites is one of mingled bitterness and horror. It is one, they trust, which is never to be realized.

Looking upon their beloved country, as it now stands, the envy and admiration of the world, contemplating, as they do, that unrivalled constitution, by which a beauteous family of confederated states, each independent in its own separated sphere, revolve around a federal head with all the harmony and regularity of the planetary system; and knowing as they do, that under the beneficent influence of our free institutions, the people of this country enjoy a degree of liberty, prosperity and happiness, not only unpossessed, and scarcely imagined, by any other upon earth; they cannot and will not advert to the horrors, or depict the consequences of that most awful day, when the sun of American freedom shall go down in blood, and nothing remain of this glorious republic but the bleeding, scattered and dishonored fragments. It would, indeed, be the extinction of the world's last hope and the jubilee of tyranny over all the earth!

But your committee feel, that with these painful impressions on their minds, they would but imperfectly discharge their duty if they did not make an earnest appeal to the patriotism of the American people to sustain the resolution adopted by the house. And they would also appeal to the good sense and good feelings of that portion of the abolitionists, who, acting under a mistaken sense of moral and religious duty, have embarked in this crusade against the south, solemnly invoking them in the name of our common country, to abstain from a system of agitation which has not only failed, and will always fail, to attain its objects, but has even brought the union itself into a state of imminent and fearful peril.

It is confidently believed that this appeal will not be made in vain, and that hereafter all who truly love their country will manifest their patriotism by avoiding this unhappy cause of discord and disunion; and that they will make no further exertions upon a subject, from the continued agitation of which nothing but augmented evils can result.

Your committee conclude by reporting the following resolutions, conformably to the instructions given them by the house.

Resolved, That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy.

Resolved, That congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia.

And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation on this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquillity to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating, in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 15—VOL. XIV.] BALTIMORE, JUNE 11, 1836. [VOL. L. WHOLE No. 1,290

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

We this week publish the yeas and nays upon the resolutions which accompanied Mr. Pinckney's report upon slavery in the District of Columbia. They complete our history of the proceedings on this subject in the house, and will be useful in future.

It will be seen, by reference to page 252, that the bill before the senate prohibiting deputy postmasters from receiving or transmitting incendiary publications through the mail, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the casting vote of the vice president on the 2d instant, was, on Wednesday last, rejected by a vote of 19 to 25.

The great Maryland internal improvement bill, which provides for the subscription on the part of the state of three millions of dollars towards the completion of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and the like sum to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road—one million for a rail road on the Eastern Shore of the state, and five hundred thousand dollars, respectively, to the Annapolis and Potomac canal and a cross cut canal to connect the Chesapeake and Ohio canal with Baltimore, passed the house of delegates on Friday the 3d inst. and the senate on the following day—and is published, with the votes upon it, and the proceedings which its passage called forth in Baltimore, in the present sheet, for general reference.

This event is warmly greeted by the people of Baltimore as an earnest of the rapid advancement of the monumental city to wealth and greatness; and it will, doubtless, realize even their most pleasant anticipations of the future. For nothing can prevent her from receiving into her lap that vast trade of the west which has heretofore been diverted from her by other channels, and the inexhaustible treasures of the mineral region of the Alleghanies, which will, of themselves, create a degree of public and private prosperity, that must speedily repay ten-fold, the amount that will be expended in making the works. But there are other and higher considerations associated with this wise and munificent act of the legislature, before which local and individual considerations dwindle into naught—We mean the new bonds of attachment which it will create between the interior of our country and the seaboard, by those delightful associations of which free intercourse and mutual benefits are the parents. Those are ties which politics or politicians cannot sever, and hence all should regard this act as an additional guaranty of union and strength.

General Houston, accompanied by several officers of his army, arrived at New Orleans on the 23d ult. and is said to be in bad health. Some further particulars confirming the capture of Santa Ana, will be found in a subsequent page. A report is in circulation that there is a plan on foot to deprive gen. Houston of the command of the army and to place gen. James Hamilton of South Carolina at its head. Such an event would be a singular requital for the victories achieved over the Mexicans!

Our notices of events in Florida and on the Georgia and Alabama frontier, are made up to the latest dates. They were selected from a great mass of articles, but disclose nothing particularly important, except the disposition manifested by the Creeks and Uchees to unite with the Seminoles in Florida. This junction they will, probably, effect before they can be reached by the troops which have been sent against them; and if so, the scenes which have been witnessed in Florida will be repeated with additional horrors.

A young clerk named Robinson, residing in New York, was recently indicted by the grand jury of that city for the murder of a "woman of the town" named Helen Jewett. The circumstances attending the murder evinced a most deliberate determination on the part of the perpetrator, and, with the sickly sentimentalities of the press, created a morbid excitement in the public mind—which greedily swallowed the most absurd and ridiculous stories, in which the strumpet was excused for her immoralities, and though vulgar, ignorant and unable to write, converted into an accomplished and highly gifted female, respectably connected—whilst Robinson was magnified into a cold blooded fiend who delighted in evil-doings. In this state of feeling the trial commenced and occupied the court from Thursday the 2d inst. until Tuesday last, when at about 10 o'clock the jury retired, and in fifteen minutes returned a verdict of not guilty! The result was received with cheers, and appears to accord with the public sentiment.

We have given this much space to the affair, chiefly with the view of saying, that the testimony delivered on the trial exhibits a most revolting picture of public morals and a toleration of vile and filthy practices that are highly discreditable—and to express our regret that it has been so broadly laid before the public on the questionable ground that it may prove admonitory to the young and inexperienced. Vice to be hated, according to the adage, needs only to be seen, but the mind's eye cannot always control appeals to the passions.

THE WEATHER. The protracted "spell" of wet weather has caused many speculations as to its probable cause. Mr. Henry Schrader of Baltimore attributes it to the spots on the sun's disk, it having been remarked, he says, that whenever many of these spots have made their appearance "the weather has been more changeable than usual and inclined to rain, and cool even in summer." The sun is now marked with spots, and has been for some months past; a drawing of its appearance on the 16th of April last has been made by Mr. S. which has been lithographed. In the explanatory paper accompanying the lithograph, he says—

"For the last four months many spots have appeared in the sun, sometimes as many as thirty or forty and more; they change their appearance frequently, they appear and disappear, some remain stationary for a month or more; and as the sun has a rotation round its axis in about twenty-six days, those spots which appear on the lower or eastern edge of the sun at its rising, will be seen on its upper edge in about thirteen days; all which may be observed through a good telescope, if the glass nearest the eye be blackened over a candle."

UPPER CANADA. Sir Francis Head, the new governor, who has been at variance with the assembly ever since his arrival in the country, has issued his proclamation dissolving the parliament and summoning a new one to meet on the 16th day of July next. The affairs of this province are in a very disturbed condition, and the disposition manifested by the "mother country" to force the popular will, is daily severing the ties of feeling, and must soon eventuate in an outbreak that will bring the people and authorities into serious collision. Experience is not always admonitory to nations and individuals.

Since the above was written we have seen it stated that the parliament was dissolved for refusing to vote supplies to the government.

PATERSON, N. J. This great manufacturing town is one of the most prosperous in the United States, and among the best evidences of the effects of employment in creating wealth and adding to the comforts of the people. We not long since noticed the rapid increase of its population and the general prosperity that prevailed there—and we now see it stated in the New York Star, that a new bridge is to be erected that will bring a large quantity of land, suitable for building, situated on the northern side of the Passaic Falls, within three minutes walk of the manufactories and of the centre of the business of the town. In addition it is proposed to build a large and spacious hotel, and the foundations are now being laid of a large cutlery establishment, that will employ at least five hundred operatives during the first year of its existence. There are also, in progress of building, four very large paper mills, which will be completed during this season, and employ at least two thousand additional mechanics.

ZINC IN NEW JERSEY. It appears by an article in the Newark Daily Advertiser, made up it seems from information furnished by Dr. Fowler, one of the representatives in congress from that state, that there is an abundant quantity of this valuable mineral in New Jersey. The largest mass is found at Sterling in Sussex county, where there is actually a zinc mountain 200 feet high. Many unsuccessful attempts have been made heretofore to make this ore available, but latter experiments have been made with perfect success. Thirty tons of it have been recently sent to the furnace in Washington city, and beautiful specimens obtained. The metal imported under the name of spelter is of much inferior quality to the pure zinc found in New Jersey; the latter being malleable, while the other is not. Excellent brass is made of the New Jersey ore.

Professor Rogers thus expresses himself on this subject, in a late report on the geology of the state. "The enormous quantities of it, and the facilities it would present to mining, are calculated to invite attention and enterprise, as soon as its existence and value becomes more generally known."

ABOLITION. The general assembly of the Presbyterian church is now in session at Pittsburgh. Dr. Miller, from the committee on the slavery question, has made the following report to that body.

The committee to whom were referred, by the last general assembly, sundry memorials and other papers, touching the subject of slavery, with directions to report thereon to the general assembly of 1836, beg leave to report:

That after the most mature deliberation which they had been able to bestow on the interesting and important subject referred to them, they would most respectfully recommend to the general assembly the adoption of the following preamble and resolutions, viz:

Whereas the subject of slavery is inseparably connected with the laws of many of the states of this union, with which it is by no means proper for an ecclesiastical judicatory to interfere, and involves many considerations in regard to which great diversity of opinion and intensity of feeling are known to exist in the churches represented in this assembly; and whereas there is every reason to believe that any action on the part of the assembly in reference to this subject would tend to distract and divide our churches, and would probably in no wise promote the benefit of those persons whose welfare is immediately contemplated in the memorials in question, therefore,

1. Resolved, That it is not expedient for the assembly to take any further order in relation to this subject.

2. Resolved, That as the notes which have been expunged from our public formularies, and which some of the memorials referred to the committee request to have restored, were introduced irregularly, never had the sanction of the church, and therefore possess no authority, the general assembly has no power to assign them a place in the authorised standards of the church.

BOSTON MONEY MARKET. The tone of the following paragraph, considering where it appears, argues a very unusual pressure in the money market of the city of Boston:

Boston, June 4, 1836.

A prospect of relief. We are authorised to state that the banks of this city, with a view to do all in their power for the accommodation and relief of the mercantile community, will make liberal discounts in the early part of next week to an amount exceeding one million dollars. This arrangement has already been entered into by nearly all the banks, and those which have declined giving a pledge have signified their intention not to be backward in rendering all the facilities to the merchants they can command, in a time of such severe pressure.

GENERAL SCOTT. The Globe, in speaking of general Scott, says very justly:

"We observe with extreme regret the unmerited censure, which some of the southern presses are casting upon this gallant officer. Without examining into the causes of the failure of the campaign against the Seminoles, without knowing the difficulties against which he contended, they heap invective upon a brave man, because success does not always crown his efforts. They should remember that this is the first time his countrymen have witnessed his failure, and gratitude for his past services should prevent inconsiderate reproach. They should consider the late period when he was called into the field, the innumerable delays which the inclemency of the season at the north offered to the transportation of the troops, and the indispensable supplies for the army; the interference of others, by which his plans were defeated, and his movements retarded; the unknown and impracticable country in which he had to operate."

THE MAILS. From the Globe. We are informed that the failure of the New York mail on Saturday evening was caused by the breaking down of the mail wagon near Holmesburgh, in Pennsylvania, which prevented its arrival at Philadelphia on Saturday morning in time to connect with the steamboat.

The New Orleans mails of the 14th and 15th ultimo have been received by the way of Wheeling, showing that the postmaster at New Orleans commenced sending the eastern mails up the Mississippi as soon as he heard of the interruption of the mails by the Creek Indians. This course was one of prudence, as mails so valuable ought not to be exposed to hazard for the prospect of a few days greater expedition, and the arrangement to convey them to the Florida line could not have been known in that city.

The failure of the Georgia mails for the last few days, which seem to have occurred between Augusta, Georgia, and Fayetteville, North Carolina, are not yet accounted for.

An agent of the department is in Georgia, clothed with plenary powers to make all arrangements within the legal authority of the department, for the safe conveyance of the mails. He has been assured by generals Scott and Jesup that in a couple of weeks the communication shall be opened and made secure on the ordinary route, from Columbus, Georgia, to Montgomery, Alabama; and little doubt is entertained that it will be accomplished.

ITEMS.

Tea Plant. Mr. John Platt of Marietta, Ohio, has informed the public that he has for ten years past, successfully cultivated the tea plant of China, and discovered the art of drying and manufacturing the leaves, so as to produce tea equal to the imported young hyson. He also offers to furnish, gratis, fresh seed of last year's crop, with instructions for planting it, to those desirous of raising it.

The marine corps. The detachments of the marine corps stationed at the different navy yards, &c. have proceeded to the scene of hostilities. The detachment, under col. Henderson, which was stationed at Washington navy yard, very handsomely volunteered its services to go against the Creeks as soon as their barbarities were known, and without even an intimation that its services would be acceptable. This is not the first evidence of the patriotism of this much neglected and abused arm of the national defence, and, with our friends of the National Intelligencer, we hope it may hereafter find that favor in the eyes of the constituted authorities of the nation to which it is entitled. The marine force, when embodied, will amount to about 500 men, and be commanded by col. Miller.

Of the 200,000,000 lbs. of sugar consumed by France annually beet-root already supplies 80,000,000 lbs. whereas in the year 1828, beet-root supplied not more than 16,000,000 lbs.

Lekigh coal trade. Three hundred boats, laden with 13,646 tons of coal were despatched from Mauch Chunk, in the week ending on the 19th ult.

Population of Lynn, Mass. The increase of population in this town is truly surprising. A census by vote of the town has just been completed. A census of the town was taken last July, by private enterprise. In 1820 it was 4,515; in 1830 6,138; in 1835 in July 8,419; in 1836 in May 9,847. Gain in 10 months 1,068, or about 107 per month—1,282 per year—150 per cent. in 10 years! Lynn is the largest town (not a city) in New England. [Lynn Record.

Great mortality on ship-board. The whaling ship Richmond, of New Bedford, capt. Tucker, had arrived at St. Simons on the 26th of March, from Madagascar, where she had put in to recruit. A few days after leaving port, several of the crew complained of sickness, and in ten days, ten had died and five more remained sick until the arrival of the ship at Simon's bay, after which another man died—the others recovered.

The Connecticut house of representatives have rejected the bill authorising any number of persons not less than five, to organize themselves together into a joint stock company, with a capital of not less than 10,000 dollars nor more than $200,000. For the bill 94; against it, 104.

Shocking accident. A shocking accident happened on the Worcester rail road a day or two ago. A poor fellow in at-

John C. Halsey, esq. of New York has presented to the United States naval lyceum a bust of Washington, executed in Florence by our distinguished countryman Greenough.

The appropriations made by the legislature of New York, at its late session, in aid of various works of internal improvement, amount to six millions and a half of dollars. Of this large sum, three millions are appropriated to the New York and Erie rail road, one million to the Black river canal, and two millions to the Genesee valley canal.

Most of the notes or due bills heretofore issued by the corporation of Washington have been withdrawn from circulation and destroyed. It appears from an official report that the whole issue was $379,256, and that the amount withdrawn and burnt was $354,102, leaving a balance outstanding of $25,074. Of this last amount it is estimated that $13,000 have been lost in the course of circulation, and will not be brought in.

The Girard bank of Philadelphia has issued notes of $5,000 and $10,000. They are said to be beautifully executed.

We have already mentioned the departure of a corps of marines from Washington to act against the Creeks. The story is, that the secretary of the navy was not pleased with the order, and intimated to the president that these men were only educated for sea service. The president, with his usual sang froid, replied, "they shall go to see service, and act on the (creeks) Creeks."

Mr. Burden, of Troy, the well known ingenious mechanic and inventor of the patent horse shoes, returned yesterday to this country, after six months absence in England. We learn that he has made very advantageous arrangements for the sale of his horse shoes, which are highly approved of, and for which he had already received a patent from the British government, as well as from our own.

A lively spectacle was presented in Boston harbor on the 1st inst. The weather being clear, although the wind continued east, a large fleet of vessels, detained for eight or ten days by adverse winds and stormy weather, got under weigh soon after the ebb tide set down, and commenced beating out. The fleet included nearly twenty sail of square-rigged vessels; and Mr. J. R. Parker counted from the telegraph station, eighty-seven sail outside the light, and two hundred and fifty-nine inside; a considerable portion of which got to sea, the rest coming to at the different anchorages. Not a single accident occurred among the vast fleet in all their crossings of each others tracks!

Nathaniel Pitcher, a distinguished citizen of the state of New York, died at his residence at Sandy Hill, on the 25th ultimo. He was for several years a member of the senate, and also of the house of assembly of the state of New York, and was also several times a member of congress from that state. Upon the death of governor Clinton, in February, 1827, Mr. Pitcher, then being lieutenant governor, succeeded to the office of governor of that state, which office he filled with great credit and usefulness during the residue of the term for which gov. Clinton had been elected.

The Philadelphia Herald states that an agency has been established in New York by the United States bank, for the purchase and sale of foreign and domestic exchange, where from three to five millions will be employed. The office is under the direction of Morris Robinson, esq. the cashier of the late branch bank. The rate at which the office purchases domestic exchange on Alabama and Louisiana is two and a half per cent. The Daily Advertiser remarks that "although this is more than double what it was a year ago, it is lower than it has recently been taken at. This arrangement will be of great benefit to the merchants who have recently found it utterly impossible to use their southern funds at any rate. We have no doubt it will give very considerable relief to the city."

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 3. A message was received from the president of the United States, accompanied by a report from the secretary of war, relative to improvements in the ordnance corps. Referred.

Mr. Goldsborough, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill from the house, authorising the employment of boys in the vessels of the United States, with amendments, and a report accompanied by the correspondence with the chambers of commerce. On motion of Mr. G. the bill as amended, and the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

Several bills of minor importance were ordered to be engrossed, when the bill to reorganize the general land office was taken up on motion of Mr. Ewing, who advocated its passage. After he had concluded, the bill was reported with amendments and ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Hubbard asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to audit and settle the claims of gen. Ripley. The bill was then read a first and second time and referred to the committee on pensions.

The senate next proceeded to consider the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia—the question being on the engrossment of the bill. Messrs. Benton and Niles made some remarks in opposition to the bill and Messrs. Kent and King, of Ala. spoke in favor of it. It was then laid on the table to give Mr. Wright an opportunity to make a report.

Mr. Wright, from the select committee to which was referred the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money, reported a substitute for the bill, part of the provisions of which were unanimously adopted, and some of the important amendments only agreed to by a majority. The amendments were then ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster said he did not often trouble the senate with anything personal to himself, but a friend had pointed out to him a paragraph in the Globe of this morning, which was so flagitiously false, and which so directly affected his conduct as the head of an important committee of the senate, that he thought it due even to the senate itself to refute the calumny. The paragraph is in these words:

"It is a most remarkable thing that, while the opposition in the senate every day parade before the public the seven millions in the stock of the bank of the United States as a part of the surplus in the treasury, they so contrive it that not a dollar of it can reach the treasury. Judge White, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster are ever and anon pointing to the seven millions of bank stock as a fund for distribution, while Mr. Webster, as chairman of the committee on finance, holds back for months, from the action of the senate, the bills passed by the house of representatives to provide against the notorious conversion by Biddle of the means of the old bank to the purposes of the new."

Now sir, (said Mr. W.) the journals show that neither I nor the committee have held back any thing from the action of the senate. All bills in any way respecting the late bank of the United States, which have been referred to the committee, have been reported to the senate long ago, and are now on the list of orders, to be taken up in their turn. If this libeller had not been willing even to traduce and injure friends, rather than to lose an opportunity of injuring opponents, he would have remembered that a majority of the members of the committee on finance are supporters and friends of the administration. I am happy to bear my humble testimony to the diligence and promptitude with which these gentlemen discharge their duties, and every body knows that it is in their power at any time to report any measure they may choose to report, or to call up any business which they may desire to call up.

The bill to which the foregoing paragraph refers was referred to the committee April 14, and was reported by the committee, without any amendment, April 21, as appears by the secretary's minutes, endorsed on the bill: "Act repealing the 14th section of the act to incorporate the bank of the United States. April 14. Read twice, and referred to the committee on finance April 21. Reported without amendment."

I will only add, sir, that this is not the first time that I have been obliged to take notice of statements in this paper respecting my conduct as chairman of the committee, which were in direct contradiction of the printed journal of our proceedings, and of its own diurnal report of them.

On motion of Mr. Kent, the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia was again taken up:

The senate then adjourned.

June 4. A large number of bills for the relief of individuals were ordered to be engrossed.

The resolution authorising the joint committee on the library to purchase the library of the late count Boutourlin, at Rome, was rejected—yeas 15, nays 17. [The vote was subsequently reconsidered on motion of Mr. Clay, and the resolution laid on the table.]

Mr. Clay, from the committee of conference appointed on the subject of the bill to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain, made a report, recommending to the two houses so to modify the bill as to appoint one commissioner instead of three commissioners, to execute the duties, and to reduce the time allowed for the performance of the duties from eighteen months to one year. Mr. Clay having explained the amendments, the report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

The various bills ordered yesterday to a third reading, were read a third time and passed.

The senate again proceeded to consider the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia—when Mr. Benton opposed the bill and moved its recommittal with instructions. This motion gave rise to a debate, after which the senate rejected it—yeas 10, nays 25. Mr. Benton then moved to strike out certain provisions of the bill—but the motions were also rejected by about the same vote. The question was finally taken on the engrossment of the bill and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Ewing, of Ill., Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Ala., Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, King, of Georgia, Niles, Robinson, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—8.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. The senate then adjourned.

June 6. After the presentation of reports, the resolution offered by Mr. Wright on Saturday, calling on the secretary of the treasury to communicate what amount of money in the treasury is subject to draft, what is the amount of revenue from the lands and customs during the first quarter of the present year, &c. was considered and agreed to.

The resolution offered by Mr. Preston, on the subject of four historical paintings to fill the vacant niches in the Rotundo, was considered, and agreed to.

The bill to extend the time for receiving the proof of certain pre-emption claims, under the act of the 19th of June, 1834, was taken up in committee of the whole—when Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, moved that it be indefinitely postponed. On this motion Mr. Walker asked for the yeas and nays.

It was contended that this bill gave an improper encouragement to squatters on the public lands, and that they are too numerous already. On the other side, it was insisted that the settlers on the public lands were a most meritorious class, and deserving of the countenance of the government. It was stated by Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, that speculators had fallen upon the practice of putting families on lands previous to the surveys, that they might be prepared and qualified to obtain rights of pre-emption; in one case, in Illinois, about forty families were thus disposed of. The senators who participated in the discussion were, Messrs. Walker, Black, Ewing, of Ohio, Porter, Moore, Crittenden, King, of Alabama, and King, of Georgia.

The question was then taken on the motion of indefinite postponement, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King, of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Southard, Tomlinson, Webster—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—22.

The question being on the amendment reported by the committee on private land claims.

Mr. Crittenden moved various amendments; which were agreed to. The bill was further amended, on motion of Mr. King, of Georgia, by introducing a provision that the act shall not extend to any lands the Indian title to which had not been extinguished on the 1st of January, 1832. Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, moved to amend by adding a proviso that all assignments be void; which was agreed to. Mr. Porter moved to amend by inserting a clause that no witness should be allowed to give evidence in more than one claim; which was agreed to. The amendment was then agreed to as amended, and the bill, as amended, was reported to the senate. The question was then taken on the amendments, and they were concurred in. The yeas and nays were ordered on the question of engrossment, on motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, the vote being as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Ewing, of Ill., Grundy, Hendricks, King, of Alabama, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King, of Geo., Knight, Leigh, McKean, Naudain, Prentiss, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—18.

The senate then proceeded to read the several bills on the table for the third time. On reaching the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, Mr. Benton signified an intention to oppose the bill, but wished the senate, at this time, to go into the consideration of executive business. On motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after remaining some time with doors closed, the senate adjourned.

June 7. After the reception of petitions, reports, &c. the senate proceeded to consider, as in committee of the whole, the bill to extend the time for providing and establishing certain pre-emption claims suspended by the contingent location of certain alleged Choctaw reservations.

[This bill, as introduced on leave by Mr. Walker, contained a single section, and provided that any person entitled to pre-emption, but prevented from establishing his claim in consequence of the opposition of a Choctaw location, set up under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, shall be authorised to establish their claims by proof at any period not exceeding six months, and shall be placed on the same footing as if proved and established under the act of 1834.

The committee on private land claims amended this bill by inserting a provision that the contingent locations of the Choctaws which come in conflict with the claimant, must be reservations "which have been since disallowed, and ordered to be sold." Also, by adding a second section, enacting that where any such claimant so entitled has been deprived, by the location of any Indian reservation, of his pre-emption right to a tract, he shall be permitted "to locate elsewhere within the same district, 160 acres, at the minimum price.]

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill having been reported as amended, the amendment was concurred in by the senate.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, called for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill, whereupon a debate ensued in which the merits of the bill were discussed. Mr. King, of Georgia moved to strike out the first section of the bill, being the whole of the original bill, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The question was then taken, and the motion carried—yeas 22, nays 16.

The question was then about to be taken on the bill as amended, when, after a brief discussion, the bill was laid on the table.

The bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia was taken up; and the question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. Wright spoke against the passage of the bill. Mr. Knight made a few remarks in reply. The discussion was further continued by Messrs. Niles, Benton, King, of Ala. and Walker. The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Rives, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Ewing, of Illinois, King, of Georgia, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Wall, White, Wright—14.

The senate took up the amendments made by the house to the bill making appropriations for Indian expenditures, annuities, &c. and they were referred to the committee on Indian affairs.

The bill to extend the time for receiving proof of pre-emption claims was read a third time; but before any question was taken, on motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, the senate adjourned.

June 8. Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the post office and the post roads, reported the bill from the house of representatives, to reorganize the post office department with amendments.

Mr. White, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported the amendments of the house to the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities, &c. Several of the amendments of the house were concurred in.

One of the amendments of the house was an increase of the appropriation for the removal of the Creeks, so as to embrace the whole of them, being about 21,000, at $30 a head. The first estimate was for 12,000, at a lower rate. It was asked of the chairman of the committee if it was possible to effect this operation of removing the Creeks during the present year, and the reply was, that if they could be got into the humor, their removal might be effected before the next meeting of congress.

While this amendment was pending, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, the further consideration of the subject was arrested, by a motion made by Mr. Calhoun to lay the whole matter on the table; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate then proceeded to consider the bill to prohibit deputy postmasters from receiving and transmitting certain papers described therein, in the states in which they are, or may be, prohibited by law.

The question being on the passage of the bill, a discussion took place, in which Messrs. Webster, Buchanan, Davis, Grundy, Clay, Calhoun, Walker, Cuthbert, Morris and Ewing, of Ohio, engaged.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Grundy, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Mangum, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Morris, Naudain, Niles, Prentiss, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—25.

So the bill was rejected.

The chair laid before the senate a report from the secretary of the treasury on the subject of domestic exchanges.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

Mr. Wright obtained the floor, and indicated his intention to move the senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business. The deposit bill was then postponed, and made the special order for to-morrow. The senate proceeded to consider the bill to extend the time for receiving proof of pre-emption claims where there are opposing Indian reservations; when, on motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, the bill was postponed, and made the special order for to-morrow. On motion of Mr. Benton, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time the doors were re-opened, and the senate adjourned.

June 9. A number of petitions and resolutions were presented and several bills referred, after which the senate, on motion of Mr. Wright, took up the bill supplementary to the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan into the union, with the amendment thereto proposed by him.

After some remarks from Mr. Ewing of Ohio, in explanation of the bill and amendment, and from Mr. Benton in favor of the principles of the bill, Mr. Clay moved to amend it by inserting a provision exempting from taxation for five years all lands sold by the United States. [This is the period for which lands are usually exempted from taxation when sold by the United States to individuals, but such an exemption was not contained in the provision of the bill which recognizes the right of the United States to dispose of vacant lands, &c.] After a debate, in which Messrs. Wright and Ewing, opposed Mr. Clay's amendment and Messrs. Walker, Grundy, Webster and Clay advocated it, the latter at some length, the question was taken and the amendment lost, by the following vote.

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Goldsborough, Grundy, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Linn, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—24.

After the disposal of several private bills, the senate proceeded to the further consideration of the amendments made in the house to the senate's amendments of the bill making appropriations for the Indian department, and concurred in the amendment relative to the appropriation for the removal of the Creek Indians.

On motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, the bill in relation to pre-emption rights was taken up and considered.

Mr. Ewing continued his remarks in relation to the operation the bill would have upon the public lands in Wisconsin, Michigan and Indiana. When Mr. Ewing had concluded, Mr. Calhoun moved to lay the bill on the table; but, at the request of several gentlemen, he withdrew the motion. Mr. Walker then addressed the senate in defence of the reputation of the western settlers, and in relation to the general character of the bill, which he approved. Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, made some further remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Clay stated a fact or two to show the abuses which had existed under the pre-emption laws, and his conviction when he came here that congress was disposed to put an end to the system. Mr. King, of Georgia, made some remarks on the subject of the character and operations of the squatters who had been so eulogized by the senator from Mississippi, (Mr. Walker), and whom he represented as a set of men who cared for no laws, of God or man, except a pre-emption law. He stated that the settlers on the lands had settled in express violation of the Choctaw treaty. Mr. Black defended the squatters from the imputations which had been cast upon them.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill and decided as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Ewing, of Ill. Grundy, Hendricks, King, of Ala. Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King, of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—23.

The senate next proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money. The question being on the amendment proposed by the committee,

Mr. Wright made some remarks on the bill, and stated it to be his intention to move an amendment providing that the deposit banks shall render all those services to the United States which were rendered by the late bank of the United States.

This proposition was reduced to the form of an amendment, and in that form was agreed to.

Some remarks were then made on the bill by Messrs. Robinson, Hendricks, Porter, Webster, Ewing, of Ohio, Benton, Walker and Black.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, June 3. The resolution offered by Mr. Larn on the 31st ult. relative to persons who have been imprisoned for debt in the District of Columbia since 1820 was taken up and agreed to.

After other business, the following bill from the senate proposing a change in the time for the meeting and adjournment of congress was read twice. A debate now arose during which motions were made and rejected, to commit the bill to the committee on the judiciary, and to lay it on the table. The orders of the day were now called for, but were postponed, on motion of Mr. Vanderpoel, till 12 o'clock, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill. The question now being upon the passage of the bill, Mr. Patton briefly opposed it, and Mr. Hardin said a few words in favor of it—when Mr. Vanderpoel moved the previous question, which being seconded, the main question was ordered and put, and being taken the bill was ordered to a third reading—yeas 119, nays 66.

Mr. Adams moved that the bill be recommitted to the committee of the whole, with instructions to strike out that part of it which proposes to fix a time for the adjournment of congress. That part of the bill he regarded as unconstitutional. Mr. Bell objected to fixing the first of November for each annual meeting of congress, and moved to amend the instructions, so as to direct the committee to fix that time of meeting on each alternate session. That much he was willing to concede to the public convenience; but to all the members from the planting states it would be extremely inconvenient to leave home in October, in order to attend here on the first Monday in November.

Messrs. Toucey and Speight coincided with Mr. Adams in his views, and supported the motion to recommit. The chair announced the expiration of the hour assigned to the consideration of the subject.

On motion of Mr. R. M. Johnson, the rules were suspended, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the subject for one hour. Mr. Speight said the bill was a palpable violation of the constitution, and spoke briefly in support of that position. Mr. Williams, of Ky. said he was opposed to the bill, but it was evident that a large majority of the house was in favor of it. In order, therefore to save time, he moved the previous question.

The previous question being seconded, the main question was ordered, and being put, the bill was PASSED—yeas 101, nays 81.

A message was received from the president, transmitting a report from the secretary of the treasury in relation to the injuries sustained by the bridge across the Potomac river during the recent extraordinary rise of water—which were read; whereupon Mr. W. B. Shepard asked and obtained leave to introduce a resolution authorising the secretary of the treasury to have the necessary repairs made to the bridge, which resolution was read twice and ordered to be engrossed. [Passed next day.—The principal injury the bridge sustained was near the southwestern draw, which can be easily repaired and at a trifling expense.]

The house resumed, as in committee of the whole, Mr. Smith in the chair, the bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, annuities, &c. The amendment proposed by the committee on Indian affairs, making an appropriation for the removal of the hostile Creeks, being under consideration.

Mr. Horace Everett addressed the committee at great length, on the subject of the relations between this government and the Creek and Seminole Indians. Mr. White, of Florida, followed, in reply to Mr. E. and in support of the amendment. After some further debate the committee arose.

Mr. White, by leave, offered a resolution calling for information from the war department, concerning the granting of licenses to any persons to trade with the Creek Indians for negroes, and all correspondence connected therewith; which was agreed to.

Mr. Bell, also by leave, offered a resolution that the secretary of war be requested to communicate such information, relative to the Indian hostilities, and the causes thereof, as may be indicated by the committee on Indian affairs; which was agreed to.

The house then adjourned.

Saturday, June 4. Several motions were made and rejected to suspend the rules, with the view to the consideration of special business.

Mr. Jarvis, from the committee on naval affairs, reported the senate's bill to reward the captors of the Tripolitan frigate Philadelphia; which was committed.

Mr. Jarvis, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the senate to provide for the payment of the passage of General Lafayette to this country from France, in the year 1824, reported the same, with the recommendation that it do not pass, and moved that it be laid on the table. Agreed to. Mr. Cambreleng moved to reconsider the vote. Mr. Storor then moved to lay the vote to reconsider on the table—agreed to.

The house next proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, and took up the bill to authorize a compromise and to secure to the United States the title to the Pea Patch island in the river Delaware—which was, on motion of Mr. Milligan, laid on the table.

Mr. Cumbrerling moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up the bill making appropriations for fortifications—motions were made to amend this motion by including the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, the bill for the continuation of the national road in Missouri and the bill for the admission of Arkansas and Michigan—but the amendments and original motion were lost. The bill for the relief of Thomas McClelland and James Smith was taken up, and, after considerable debate, passed.

Mr. Adams, on leave, from the committee of conference, on the part of the house, upon the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the "act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain," made a report thereon, which was concurred in by the house, (the said report having previously been concurred in by the senate).

The bill for the relief of John M. Carroll, &c. was read a third time, and the question being on its passage, a debate arose which occupied the attention of the house for a considerable time, but before the bill was disposed of the house adjourned.

Monday, June 6. The house refused to take up the joint resolution from the senate fixing a period for the adjournment of congress—yeas 90, nays 63. [It requires two-thirds to suspend the rules.]

The joint resolutions of the legislature of Maryland in favor of the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands, and in opposition to the expunging resolutions, were taken up in course; and after some remarks from Messrs. Thomas and Jenifer, the resolutions were, on motion of the latter, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Several memorials from inhabitants of Michigan in relation to the boundary line in dispute between Michigan and Ohio, heretofore presented, were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A number of resolutions of enquiry were presented and referred, and will be noticed in their progress.

Mr. Laurence presented the remonstrance of Bement Ford and 106 other male inhabitants of Boston, in the state of Massachusetts, against the admission of the territory of Arkansas into the union as a slaveholding state; also, of William B. Lovejoy and 44 other male inhabitants of Boston; of Elizabeth Hayward and 105 other female inhabitants of Boston; and of Lucy A. II. Peterson and 179 other female inhabitants of Boston, upon the same subject.

Mr. Russell also presented a remonstrance purporting to be signed by Gerrit Smith, Alvan Stewart, Beriah Green, Samuel Lightbody, and others, executive committee of the anti-slavery society of the state of New York, against the admission of the territory of Arkansas as a state into the union upon an equal footing with the original states under the constitution, which prohibits the legislature from abolishing slavery in said state.

Mr. Slade also presented a large number of petitions signed by males and females in the state of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, &c. praying to the same effect. Many memorials, on other subjects, were also presented.

Mr. Sevier, of Arkansas, moved the suspension of the rules in order to enable him to offer a resolution making the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and the bills for the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the union, the special order of the day for Wednesday next, and each day thereafter, Fridays and Saturdays excepted, until the same be disposed of; and, upon this motion, he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, the leave was granted—yeas 137, nays 45.

Mr. Sevier then offered the resolution above indicated—which was, after an ineffectual attempt on the part of Mr. C. Allan to amend it by adding the bill for the extension of the provisions of the pension act of 1832, agreed to.

After other business, the house, on motion of Mr. Cumbrerling, in further execution of the special order of the day, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Smith in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the payment of the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities, and for other similar purposes.

After some remarks from several members on the question whether it was expedient further to postpone the consideration of the bill? Mr. Glascok took the floor, and went at large into an examination of the subject, in reply to the remarks of Mr. Everett, made on Friday last, and to the argument of Mr. Adams, delivered on a former day, upon the subject of furnishing rations to the people who are driven from their homes in Alabama and Georgia by the Indian hostilities.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. Everett, and decided in the negative—yeas 28, nays 93.

The bill was further amended, when the committee rose and reported it to the house. The amendments were then severally concurred in.

On the amendment making appropriations for the removal and subsistence of the Creek and Seminole Indians, a division was called for, and the yeas and nays being ordered, the clause in relation to the Creeks was concurred in, yeas 160, nays 50.

The second branch in relation to the Seminoles was then also concurred in, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The joint resolution providing for the distribution of weights and measures was read three times and passed.

The house again went into committee of the whole, at about 6 o'clock, and took up the bill providing for the salaries of the officers of the revenue cutters—which has amended, reported to the house and passed.

On motion of Mr. Mason, of Va. the house went in committee of the whole for the purpose of considering the bill for the payment of Messrs. Moore and Letchler, members of the last congress.

After some discussion, and several ineffectual attempts to amend, the committee rose, and reported the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The house then adjourned.

Tuesday, June 7. Several bills were reported and committed, which will be noted when they come before the house—among them was a bill from the select committee on mileage to establish a new uniform rule of computing the mileage and per diem compensation of members, which was, after a brief discussion, postponed to Saturday next.

The house again refused to suspend the rules to take up the joint resolution from the senate fixing a day for the termination of the present session. Yeas 123, nays 71; not two-thirds.

The bill from the senate providing for the distribution amongst the several states, for a limited time, of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and the motions pending on the reference of the same, were taken up.

The question was first taken on the motion of Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, to commit the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union; when there appeared yeas 97, nays 96.

The speaker said that, under the ninth rule of the house, he was entitled to vote in this case; and he accordingly voted in the negative. So the motion was lost.

The question being next on the motion of Mr. Carr to refer the bill to the committee on public lands, a debate arose, in which Messrs. Mercer, Lane, Vinton, Toucey, Denny and Bouldin took part. Mr. Bouldin's remarks were arrested by the arrival of one o'clock, when the special order was announced.

In further execution of the special order of the day of the 26th of January, the house resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the year 1836." The question being on the concurrence in the several amendments reported from the committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, spoke at great length on topics connected with the foreign and domestic policy of the country, heretofore adverted to in the debate on this subject.

After some remarks by Mr. Toucey in opposition to the principles of the bill, and by Mr. Denny in favor of its passage, Mr. Bouldin was proceeding with some remarks, but the debate was cut off by the expiration of the morning hour.

The land bill was next taken up—

Mr. Mercer made some remarks in opposition to retaining so much money in the treasury, as he considered it dangerous to the safety of the money, and to the integrity of the government.

Mr. Lane hoped the bill would not be committed to the committee on the public lands, because the proper committee to consider it was the committee of ways and means. He alluded to the charge that the chairman of the last named committee was hostile to the bill, and said he, for himself, was ready and willing to act. He did not intend to debate the merits of the bill, and he thought no one could believe it ever could become a law.

Mr. Vinton made some remarks in opposition to the commitment of the bill either to the committee of ways and means or to the committee on the public lands, from neither of whom its friends could expect any favor. The bill was of the greatest importance to the country, and for that reason he wanted a direct vote upon its merits; and if gentlemen resorted to this method of avoiding such a vote, and killed it by reference, he hoped the people would understand it, and who it was that did it.

The fortification bill was then taken up. Mr. Waddy Thompson expressed his disapprobation of the manner of doing business in the house, by crowding in amendments for extravagant expenditures, and hurrying them through without time or opportunity for discussion and consideration. He was opposed to the bill, because he believed that one-half of the appropriations were not only not necessary, but that they could not be expended within the year; and he thought the bill was designed to effect another purpose not disclosed in the bill. He alluded to a report which stated that, last year, $150,000 could not be expended in New York, because, although every effort was made in New England and elsewhere, sufficient laborers could not be found; and he inferred that the bill would have little effect but to keep the public money in the hands of the deposite banks.

Mr. T. then went on to reply to some remarks of Mr. Adams, made some days since, in relation to the annexation of Texas to this union, and he thought England would not interfere, as that gentleman had supposed, because that nation was preparing for a conflict with Russia, and would have enough else to do. He then went on to reply to some portions of the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Towns), about a month since.

Mr. Hunt examined the principles of the party in power, to show that the professions made previous to the election of the present chief magistrate had been abandoned; and he contrasted ed the conduct and principles of the administration party with that of the old federal party, in the time of Washington. He was opposed to the extravagant appropriations proposed and made by the government now, which were entirely the reverse of all the promises of retrenchment which had been held out to the people.

He then went into an examination at length of the condition and sources of the public revenue, especially as regarded the public lands, the proceeds of the sales of which he was in favor of distributing among the states; and spoke of the insecurity of the public money in its present condition, and earnestly hoped, before the adjournment of congress, some measure would be adopted to provide for its safety, and to afford some assurances that the money could be obtained when it should be called for. He wished to know what answer the representatives could give to the people, if, from neglect, or party views, the public treasure, now scattered among irresponsible banks, to the amount of near forty millions, should be lost, or even if a half or a quarter of it should be lost; and he compared the state of the United States bank, when it was alleged by the president of the United States to be unsafe, with that of the deposit banks now, as shown by the official returns, concluding that they had not sufficient means to meet their liabilities, and that there was sufficient cause of alarm to induce men to lay aside party considerations, and to act so as to secure the public money, without damage to the banks themselves.

Mr. Storer moved to amend the bill so as to reduce all the appropriations, except that for Fort McHenry, one-half the amount specified in the bill; and argued at length against so large appropriations, and in favor of the reduction. After some remarks from Mr. Howard, in reply, Mr. Kimard called for the previous question; which was not sustained. The debate was then continued by Messrs. Kimard, Lane, Hardin, Hawes and Briggs. After Mr. Briggs had concluded, Mr. Hard, at about seven o'clock, moved an adjournment. Lost. The motion was renewed by Mr. Bell. Mr. Cambreleng, then, by consent, moved to make the bill the special order for Friday; which was carried.

The bill from the senate, to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, was taken up, and pending several motions to commit the same to the committee for the District of Columbia, or to the select committee on the same subject heretofore appointed, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, June 8. The bill to repeal so much of the act of March 2d, 1799, as requires the issuing of certificates upon the importation of wines, was taken up by general consent, and, after some explanatory statements from Mr. Lawrence, which were confirmed by Mr. McKim, read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Sutherland the bill to increase the compensation of the officers of the vessels employed in the revenue service was taken up. The question being on its passage, after debate, the yeas and nays were taken and the bill passed—yeas 146, nays 52.

The house, by general consent, received a resolution offered by Mr. Reed, instructing the committee on the District of Columbia to examine the situation of the prisoners in the jails of the District, and especially those imprisoned for debt—which was also agreed to.

The house then proceeded to the special orders of the day, being the bills for the establishment of the northern boundary of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the union, and took up the first mentioned bill.

The question being on the third reading of the bill, Mr. Thomas moved that the bill be laid on the table. Mr. Vinton requested that the gentlemen would withdraw his motion till he could show that the provision of the bill for the admission of Michigan did not dispense with the necessity of passing the bill to settle the boundary of Ohio. Mr. Thomas declined to withdraw his motion. Mr. Vinton said that if the state of Ohio was to be cut off by the guillotine, he wanted the people of the state to know who were the executioners. He, therefore, called for the yeas and noes; which were ordered. The question being taken, there appeared, yeas 103, nays 103—a tie. The chair voted in the affirmative.

So the bill was laid on the table. The bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the union on certain conditions, was next taken up.

Mr. Wise moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday next, in order first to consider the bill to provide for the admission of Arkansas into the union. After a long debate, in which Messrs. Wise, Thomas, Lewis, Cushing, Anthony, Patton, Sutherland, Bouldin, Speight, Williams, of Ky. Sevier, A. Mann, Hardin and Vanderpoel participated. Mr. Boon moved the previous question. The house refused to second the motion, 69 to 102.

The debate was continued by Messrs. Adams and Wise. Mr. Wise modified his motion so as to commit both the bill for the admission of Michigan, and the bill for the admission of Arkansas, to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, with instructions to incorporate the same in one bill. The debate was continued by Messrs. Patton, Lewis, Vinton, Bynum, Thomas, Mercer and Briggs. Mr. Briggs asked a division of the question, and said he was in favor of committing both these bills. Some further remarks were made by Messrs. Bell and Anthony, when Mr. Hawes asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. Mr. Patton asked the opinion of the chair as to the necessity of committing the bills. The chair decided that the bill for the admission of Arkansas must, in conformity with the rules, as it contained an appropriation for the judges, be committed; and that the bill for the admission of Michigan, although it contained no express appropriation, created a charge upon the treasury, and, therefore, came within the spirit of the rules and of former decisions, though he was not clear as to the necessity of committing it.

After some remarks from Messrs. Speight, Vanderpoel, Mann, of New York, Reed, Patton, Briggs and Boon, on the point of order.

The chair stated the question of order, and pronounced his decision thereon. He decided, in substance, that under the decision of 1832, on the bill providing for a reporter of the decisions of the supreme court, it was necessary to commit both of these bills. It was for the house to determine whether the decision of 1832 should be considered as the law of the house or not. He was of opinion that, if one bill required commitment, both bills required it.

[The debate upon the motions made by Mr. Wise was of considerable interest. The object of the motions was to get the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the union up for consideration before the bill for the admission of Michigan, with the view that, if the house should choose to restrict the people of Arkansas from holding slaves, an attempt would be made to have Michigan admitted without any restriction, so that slavery could be introduced into the heart of the frontier of the northern states. It was desired to have it ascertained, before the vote on the Michigan bill, what would be the fate of the slaveholding states, and whether the members from the north would violate the old Missouri compromise, and restrain Arkansas, as a southern state, from holding slaves.]

The motions were objected to, as implying a distrust of the fairness and honor of northern men, for which no cause had been given. It was stated that throughout the session, upon this subject, the members from the north had shown a magnanimous desire to go with the south in settling the question, and securing the rights of the slaveholding states; and that it would be as just for northern men to suspect the members from the south of a desire to break faith upon the Missouri compromise as the suspicion already thrown out. It was urged that no fears could be entertained upon the subject. It was impossible to conceive that northern men would vote for the admission of Michigan as a non-slaveholding state, and then turn round, without regard to good faith towards the south, and oppose the admission of Arkansas, leaving the right to hold slaves unrestricted.

It was stated that this question divided the house into two parties, not political, but according to Mason and Dixon's line, and that no man nor any party ought to be trusted, upon assurances. The compromises of the constitution and the faith of the country ought to be held on upon by all that section of the country which had an interest at stake. After considerable discussion of this character, during which members were repeatedly called to order for entering into the merits of the bills, Mr. Adams gave notice that he considered himself bound by no compromise, and that, if nobody else made the motion, he would move to insert a clause prohibiting slavery in Arkansas.

The discussion then changed to the subject of the rules and orders of the house, upon the point, whether it was necessary that bills of this character should be committed to a committee of the whole, and several hours were spent in discussing points of order raised in the course of the debate.]

No appeal being taken from the decision of the chair, Mr. Wise withdrew his motion to commit with instructions, and, on his motion, the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union (Mr. Speight in the chair) on the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and to admit Michigan into the union on certain conditions, and the bill to admit Arkansas as a state into the union.

The first named bill having been read through, Mr. Taylor of N. Y. offered an amendment changing the boundary line, which was lost. Several other amendments were offered—but without coming to a decision upon them the committee rose.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, the bill from the senate supplementary to the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the union, was included in the special order.

The house refused to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union on the bills for the admission of Arkansas and Michigan into the union—and then adjourned.

Thursday, June 9. After several ineffectual attempts to suspend the rules, a number of bills, chiefly of a private character, were reported, read twice and committed.

The house then, in further execution of the special order, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Speight in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan into the union, the following amendment offered by Mr. Vinton being under consideration.

"And provided, also, and it is hereby further expressly declared, that if the convention provided for in the 3d section of this act, shall not give the assent therein required, the boundaries of the states of Ohio and Indiana shall nevertheless be, and forever remain, fixed and established between them and Michigan, as the same are in this act above specified and described." A protracted debate now ensued, (which had not terminated when the Intelligencer of yesterday went to press), during which the committee was addressed by Messrs. Everett, Howard, Bond, Harper, Adams, Corwin, Vinton, &c. &c.

[Pending this discussion, the committee temporarily rose, and the house considered and concurred in the amendment of the senate to the Indian appropriation and annuity bill.]

VOTES ON MR. PINCKNEY'S RESOLUTIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—MAY 25.

The report of Mr. Pinckney, from the select committee to whom was referred the abolition memorials, concluded with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy.

Resolved, That congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia.

And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation of this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquillity to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions or papers, relating, in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

After this report was made, and on incidental questions concerning it, speeches were made by Mr. Pinckney, Mr. Bynum, and Mr. Robertson. As soon as the latter gentleman had concluded, the previous question was demanded by Mr. Owens, of Georgia. That question, after various intermediate proceedings already noted, was taken in this form, viz: "Shall the main question be now put?" and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. *Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, French, Fry, Wm. So it was determined that the main question be now put: and the speaker decided that the main question was upon agreeing to the above resolutions.

The question was taken separately on agreeing to each of them.

On agreeing to the first of them, the vote was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. *C. Allen, H. Allen, Anthony, Ash, Bailey, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, W. B. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Clark, Denny, Everett, W. Jackson, James, Phillips, Potts, Slade—9.

So the first resolution was agreed to.

The vote on agreeing to the second of the above resolutions was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. *Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. The question on agreeing to the third of the above resolutions was determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. *Chilton Allan, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. So the third resolution was agreed to.

In reference to the above votes the Intelligencer of Tuesday last, say—In publishing the yeas and nays in the house of representatives on Mr. Pinckney's resolutions, to give a complete view of the votes, it ought to have been repeated (as had been before stated) that Mr. Glascock, Mr. Pickens, Mr. Wady Thompson, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Wise and Mr. Chambers, of Ky. declined voting at all upon the resolutions, and that Mr. Granger declined voting upon the second resolution; which facts, as well as the yeas and nays, were ordered to be recorded on the journal of the house.

To the editors of the Intelligencer.

GENTLEMEN: Having reason to believe that the negative vote recently given by me on the resolution declaring "that congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy," may be understood as implying that I hold the opinion that congress may abolish slavery in the states, I deem it proper to say that I entertain no such opinion. My vote was given on other grounds. The resolution declared, not merely that congress has "no constitutional authority" to abolish slavery in the states, but that it has "no authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery," within their jurisdiction. I was not prepared to vote in favor of such a proposition, because I was not prepared to say that congress might not abolish the slave trade between the states. This is an "interference with the institution of slavery in the states," which, I am inclined to think, is within the constitutional competency of congress. The reasons for this opinion I should have given, if I had not been prevented by the extraordinary and oppressive application of the "previous question," which left me no alternative which I was willing to adopt, but that of giving a silent vote in the negative. The peculiar liability of that vote to misconstruction induces me to make this explanation.

I deem it proper to add, that I voted against the next resolution, which declares "that congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia," not only because it denies the right of congress to abolish slavery here, but for the additional reason, that it also manifestly denies, and was, no doubt, intended to deny, the power of congress to abolish the slave trade in this District—a trade carried on in sight of the capitol, where this resolution was adopted, to as great an extent, probably, as in any other portion of the United States. Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM SLADE.

THE CREEK WAR.

The Georgia and Alabama papers are filled with accounts of outrages committed by the Creeks and their allies, the Uchees and Hitchatees, who are in no way deterred by the preparations which has been made to suppress them. A greater number of cold-blooded outrages have never been perpetrated on the frontier and the property destroyed was worth many millions of dollars. The war, however, must be speedily terminated, as Georgia and Alabama appear to be roused to a sense of their danger and the necessity of checking the savages, who, we fear, have been goaded to revenge by real or supposed injuries. The governor of Georgia has taken the field in person and established his head quarters at Columbus, and in all sections of that state volunteer companies are forming. Great efforts were also making to intercept any body of Indians that might attempt to join the Seminoles in Florida, whither it was feared the Creeks would retreat if hotly pursued. Indeed it was rumored that they had already penetrated that territory, and were destroying lives and property in all directions.

General Scott has been charged with the command of the Creek war, as will be seen by his letter published below, and at the last advices he and general Jesup were at Columbus organizing the troops, which were to march immediately upon the Creek nation.

The Charleston Courier of Friday the 3d inst. gives the following extract from a letter from Columbus, of May 30th—the latest news from that point:—no apprehension was entertained for the safety of that town, as there are about 1,500 militia in and about it:

"Since I wrote you, yesterday, nothing of importance has occurred. The Indians, however, last night burnt some farm houses on the Georgia side of the river, about fifteen miles below this. Several Indians came in yesterday, accompanied by a white man, and reported that they were from the camp of Ne-ha-Micho, the principal chief of the nation, and that Ne-ha-Micho and those with him, wished to be considered friendly, and were now willing to come in. They are still here, no steps having been taken or decision made in reference to them."

The latest. The Charleston Patriot of Saturday afternoon says:—

A passenger, arrived last evening by the rail road, states that a detachment of eighteen Creeks had reached Columbus, last Monday evening from Neamicho, the head of the tribe, supposed to be the messengers of peace, and that they had been detained there to await the arrival of general Scott and col. Jesup, but as our informant left Tuesday morning early, he did not know the result of the conference.

Some of the negroes which the Creeks had captured and who had escaped, state that the hostile portion of the tribe had made several attempts to cross the Chattahoochee for the purpose of getting into Florida, but that they had been prevented from effecting their design, in consequence of the high state of the river from the recent rains. They represent the force of the Creeks to be 1,200 warriors; this, however, is deemed an exaggeration by well informed persons in Columbus, who do not estimate their force at more than half this number. Provisions were very scarce in all that region of country.

From the Mobile Register of May 21.

Reports from the Creek nation crowd upon us from various quarters. They are in a high degree alarming, and give reason to apprehend a more extensive and daring combination than was thought possible. An urgent occasion has evidently risen for the embodying of a large force, and the subjugation of a dangerous and wide-spread rising among the Lower Creeks. They are reported, to with every reason for belief in the accuracy of the reports, to be spreading destruction along the banks of the Chattahoochee, and to have reached Marianna.

The following articles are derived from various sources.

The heavy rains which have fallen on the Georgia frontier have so completely filled the swamps that the Indians have been compelled to remain on the high grounds, and will be more easily subdued by the forces sent against them.

Augusta, May 31—evening.

A letter from Columbus, dated 20th inst. states that "Mr. Hallett, of New York, who was reported to have been killed by the Creek Indians, between Montgomery and Columbus, escaped with his life, and had arrived at Tuscegee, after having wandered about the nation for four or five days.

"Governor Clay is at Montgomery very ill, confined to his room. Twenty men, under the command of general Patterson, were on the eve of leaving Montgomery for the nation. Alabama will have in the field about 6,000 men in the course of this week. Col. J. B. Hogan is with the Alabama troops, and will be at Fort Mitchell in a few days. Troops are coming in rapidly, and this evening major general McDougald will take his forces across the river and encamp on the Alabama side."

[Constitutionalist.

The Creeks are said to be encouraged in their war upon the whites by the lamentable issue of the campaign against the Seminoles.

We copy the following letter from gen. Scott, and the accompanying editorial remarks from the Richmond Enquirer:

Postscript. Since writing the above, we have received information which we deem so interesting to our readers, that we cannot withhold it from them:

First, we have been favored with the sight of a private letter from gen. Scott himself. It was never intended for the press—it was written so hastily that we can scarcely decypher it—besides, we have no time to ask the consent of his correspondent to its publication. But, for once, we must take the responsibility; and throw ourselves upon the kindness of his correspondent for our apology. It is certainly a letter that does credit to gen. Scott—and clears up some uneasy doubts, which old dame Gossip Rumor had thrown into circulation.

From gen. Scott, dated Savannah, May 22.

"I have just landed here from St. Augustine, which place I left suddenly yesterday morning. On the night of the 20th a letter reached me from the secretary of war, requiring me to hasten to the Creek country. The letter went by mistake with many others to a small town (Newnansville) in the interior of Florida, 35 miles north of Fort Drane. It was heard of accidentally, and an express sent, &c. Its date is April 15th. I go in the morning, by steam, to Augusta, and thence, without delay, via Milledgeville, to the Creek nation. Thank God! here an enemy may be reached, perhaps 10,000 strong! Nothing is wanted but a sufficient force; and the Georgians and Alabamians are assembling. I may have every thing to create, in regard to subsistence, and every thing to organize. So much the better—I like difficulties, and I hope to know how to conquer them. One of these difficulties is to conquer the prejudice excited against me by the publication of my letter of the 30th ultimo, in which I ask for 3,000 good troops not volunteers. Very well—I will, by the truth, conquer that difficulty—and conquer the Creeks too. I think the thing is in me—I feel so—it shall be done."

"Thank God again! I am nearly well. By the time I arrive at Augusta, I shall be able to ride 40, or march 30 miles a day on foot. Thank God! for a good constitution and a cheerful mind. Both shall be devoted to the country—body and soul.

"I have not a staff officer with me—save paymaster Kirby, and he is a good quartermaster general, inspector general and adjutant general. I am also without money to establish depots of subsistence, &c. &c. Some regulars are coming from the north! I could not take one from Florida."

In addition to this rapid sketch from general Scott's pen, we have understood, since perusing it, that further despatches have been sent to him at St. Augustine, which had not reached there before he left it—and that the orders of the secretary to gen. Jesup were, that he was to take command against the Creeks; if Scott was not there—and if Scott was there to command, he (Jesup) was to serve under him—that the secretary has every confidence that Scott will promptly and successfully terminate the Creek war. Measures have been taken to meet anticipated consequences. Troops to be stationed at Fort Gaines to cut off the Creeks from the Seminoles—arms, &c. are to be deposited at Highwasse, to meet any outbreak on the part of the Cherokees, though it was not seriously apprehended at Washington. As soon as the Creek war shall be ended, the Creeks, both friend and foe, (for who could satisfactorily distinguish between them?) are to be removed beyond the Mississippi—and orders have been given to gen. Scott to this effect.

We understand that despatches have gone on for general Call to take command in Florida, in case both generals Scott and Clinch should have left it; that gen. Call, as the governor of Florida, will be empowered to command one thousand of the volunteer troops, which are authorised to be raised under the late act of congress—and in case he declines the command, that gen. Parish, lately commissioned as a brigadier general of the territory may then take it. Hopes are entertained that with the judicious arrangements which Scott has made of the regular force, and with other measures, a summer campaign may be carried on in the more open country, and the Indians kept in check. Had gen. Scott had the advantage of procuring guides, as gen. Wayne, &c. possessed, to lead him to the enemy's encampment, the war would before this time have been over. But he could not obtain them in the time he had before him, and hence the failure he has experienced, which no courage or skill on his part could have prevented.

We learn with great pleasure that Scott enjoys the confidence of the administration. We are satisfied that he will deserve it.

WAR IN FLORIDA.

Our accounts from Florida are to the 27th ultimo, and represent the country as in a most calamitous condition, the people being completely at the mercy of the savages, who are spreading death and desolation in all directions. A letter dated Jacksonville, May 27, says—

"The sufferings and distresses of the inhabitants of East Florida are beyond description. The Indians have carried off Humphrey's negroes burnt Sparkman's house, fired on the men, and stole all the cattle in that neighborhood. Mrs. Monroe's house is also burnt. The road on each side of Gary's ferry is alive with people in rude huts and tents, protected from neither sun nor rain. It is heart-tending to see their melancholy condition. They look sickly, and are sick from exposure; their homes and provisions burnt and destroyed, their negroes captured, and they in daily expectation of seeing their wives and children butchered. There are not sufficient troops for adequate protection. No man has a dollar to leave his wife and children to get bread with whilst he goes into service. These people had no agency in this war, and their sufferings are referred to with indifference and derision at Washington, and with contempt by the officers of the government here. The people are too poor, and have not physical strength to go to Black Creek for a soldier's ration. The congress have voted two millions, and the Indians are neither chastised, nor the country protected. The money is gone to five thousand militia, who did nothing."

Another letter, dated on the 25th ultimo, represents the condition of the friendly Indians as equally distressing, and says that the Apalachola Indians are starving!

It is also stated that all the troops have been called to the north and west of the Creek country, and that the U. States have not a soldier between the Creeks and Florida; and further, that there are not two hundred men, all told, between the Creek country and Tallahassee. This extraordinary state of affairs has necessarily caused great alarm in Florida, and earnest appeals have been addressed to the government for protection. In reply to which, as we see it stated in the Tallahassee Floridian of the 21st, letters have been received by the governor of Florida from the war department, assuring him that the most active measures would be taken for the defence of the frontier, and perhaps, to carry the war into the enemy's country, and at least drive him beyond the Wythlacoochee; that 1,000 stand of arms and 50,000 cartridges are on the way from Mobile, and that 700 stand from Tampa, and also 200 United States soldiers had already arrived. The same paper says that a proposition has been lately made to introduce the Cuba Bloodhound to aid in the war against the Indians.

The following letter from lieutenant Walker gives the particulars of the death of captain Holloman and the attack upon the block house, which were briefly alluded to in our last. It evinces a most heroic spirit of resistance on the part of the gallant lieutenant, and his brave followers, concerning whom much interest was felt, as, at the last date, the boat they had been seen at the mouth of the river cut in two and a very large number of Indian fires in the neighborhood. The inference to be drawn is that the Indians are in great force in the neighborhood, and have either massacred the poor fellows, or have them in complete check. The commanding officer at Fort Drane had been advised of their exposed condition by the governor of Florida, who recommended him to proceed to their aid—provided he could do so with a large force. But he has not sufficient number of men for the purpose.

Camp McLemore, May 10.

Major McLemore: Dear sir: We have remained here the whole time since you left us, and were attacked on the 12th April, at the dawn of day, by a large body of Indians; since which time, we have been surrounded by them, almost continually, and have had upwards of 20 fights with them, and have had only two of our men killed, Eli Sely, on the 13th of April, and captain Holloman, on the 3d of May, and five others slightly wounded. The loss of the Indians, I think, is 15 or 20 killed. On the 15th April we had an engagement with 400 or 500 Indians, which lasted 2 hours and 45 minutes, during which time, they got possession of our flat, which drifted down the river, and was destroyed by them. So we have no means of getting away from here, without relief from some source, as we have not a man who knows the geography of this country.

We are entirely out of every necessary of life, except corn and water, and know not when to look for relief, as the time which you appointed has elapsed, by 10 or 12 days, and we have not heard or seen any thing of the army; or any other person, except Powell's yelling devils, and their yells would have been silenced long ago if we had men enough, for you may rest assured, dear sir, that there are some fighting souls here. Poor fellows, it is a great pity that they should ever starve—for they have fought well.

The sending this express is full of danger, and has been delayed on that account, hoping that the boat might come to our relief, till we have given it out. I am under the belief that general Scott wrote to you that he would come and get the corn which you brought here for the army, and relieve us himself; this is perhaps the cause of the long delay of the boat; but, sir, we are here suffering, and hope you will come or send some person to our assistance as soon as possible. Yours, very respectfully, L. B. WALKER, lieut. com. company A.

Major McLemore.

St. Augustine, May 26.

Pursuant to the orders of the governor, the militia of the territory, east of the St. Johns river, have been called out, and nearly all volunteered themselves to serve for a period of four months. A company of mounted men, and one of foot, have been formed, consisting of 60 men each. They go out with a spirit and determination to wipe away the foul aspersions that have been cast upon them.

Captain Dmick and lieut. Ervin's companies of U. States troops, were sent out to scour the country around St. Joseph's last week—they returned on the 19th, having scoured the country for twelve miles on the Volusia road, without having discovered any fresh trails. A negro man who had been taken a prisoner by the Indians, made his escape from them, and was found in the woods by the troops. He states that the Indians were well provided with every thing they required, ammunition, pork, bread, rice, beef, &c. The main body of the Indians east of the St. Johns, were encamped about 20 miles south of Spring Garden, and a party of 30 were at Tomoka.

The St. Augustine Herald of the 28th ult. says—

"We learn that every building between Black creek and Newnansville has been destroyed by the Indians; the posts of Fort King, Fort Drane and the settlements of Micanopy and Newnansville will have to be abandoned, because it will be impossible to maintain them."

From the Savannah Georgian, May 31.

The steam packet Florida, capt. Hebbard, arrived here yesterday morning from Picolata via Jacksonville. We learn that a few days since a large force of Indians, (some say 200), appeared near the Fort at Micanopy, and fired upon the fort. A man formerly of capt. Merchant's company, U. S. artillery; was it is said killed and scalped last week, near Micanopy. He has been engaged, of late, as a wagoner.

We understand that Picolata will be retained as a post so as to inspire confidence in the planters below that place, and not compel them to leave their plantations to the unsparing savage. Mr. Hickman, it is now said, has not abandoned his place, a few miles from Jacksonville, as stated in the Charleston papers.

A few tracks of Indians have been lately seen on the road from Picolata to St. Augustine, with some tracks of cattle, which it is supposed they have been engaged in driving off.

Since the above was in type we learn that the fort (as stated above) fired upon by the Indians, is the court house at Newnansville which is fortified and contains a large number of women and children.

TEXAS.

Gen. Houston, who is said to be in bad health, accompanied by a number of Texian officers, arrived at New Orleans on the 23d ult. He brings official information of the capture of Santa Ana, and also of the battle of the 21st of April. According to a statement in the True American Santa Ana was at Velasco under a strong guard, and had offered an armistice, which had been refused. It is also said that he had made further offers to acknowledge the independence of Texas, making the Rio Grande the boundary, and remaining a hostage until the United States government should consent to guaranty the treaty, and it be approved of by the senate of Mexico.

The Texian army was left under the command of gen. Rusk, secretary of war, and has accumulated, according to the same authority, to 1,800 men, and was crossing the Brassos flushed with victory.

The Mexican army under Sesyna, and others, had all concentrated, and amounted to 2,500 men, the remnant of 7,000 that had entered Texas; they were crossing the Colorado by rafts and swimming, and were in the utmost confusion; those that escaped having reported that the late battle was fought by 5,000 Texians. Col. Burlinson was close to the enemy with 200 cavalry, and they were retreating before him; 250 Mexicans had surrendered (burying a piece of cannon) to two officers and 50 Texian soldiers, and all was panic and confusion in the Mexican army.

Texas was considered safe, and the war at an end, as the Mexican army would probably be totally destroyed.

General Santa Ana has presented to gen. Houston his cane and saddle; he was recognized by gen. Zavala, and hundreds of others had identified him; the Mexican prisoners also shouted, when he was brought in, viva Santa Ana.

MEXICO.

The ship congress, at New York, from Vera Cruz, brings papers from Mexico to the 7th of May. The recent report of a revolutionary movement in the republic, was without foundation. News of the defeat and capture of Santa Ana had not been received at the capital—or, if received, had been suppressed. Meantime their journals are boasting of the triumphs their arms are to achieve in Texas. Official accounts had been published of the capture and slaughter of Gotland. The massacres are justified on the ground that a nest of serpents which they have received into their territory must be exterminated. It appears, moreover, that the putting to death of prisoners were done in consequence of a circular addressed to the officers by the Mexican government. The Mexican revenue was falling short. Mr. Ellis, the new American charge, arrived at Mexico on the 28th of April, and was well received by the Americans.

OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS.

As an act of justice to major general Scott, we publish the following official report, recently received at the war department, from that officer: [Globe.]

Head quarters, army of Florida, St. Augustine, May 11, 1836.

Sir: Much indispensed, I have been waiting for the arrival of a steamer in order to write to you, for I have much to report and to explain. After a long delay the boat is come, and yet I am scarcely able to hold up my head for twenty minutes at a time. With this you will receive a copy of brigadier general Clinch's report of his march from Tampa Bay, and copies of several other letters from the same source.

It will be seen, from the latter of those communications, that the Indians have already recommenced their depredations and murders in the Fort Drane vicinity, and that there is but little hope of embodying any respectable number of the inhabitants, as mounted men, to aid in their own defence. I had, under the circumstances, authorised Clinch to raise, in the usual form, and to muster into service, eighty or one hundred. Such addition to the nine companies of United States troops there would, I suppose, be sufficient to scour and free that frontier of the enemy, an order having been given by me to remount Wharton's detachment of United States dragoons from the spare horses of the wagon train. I learn that about sixty mounts can be furnished him in all.

I have consented to retain Fort King, and many days ago approved of the reinforcement of an additional company being sent there.

The resignation of brigadier general Clinch was forwarded a week ago. The army will lose in this officer one of its best commanders. In the same package a like tender on the part of capt. Thurston was forwarded. On the earnest solicitation of each, founded on private interests of the utmost importance, they were allowed to retire (about this time) from the army, and to await the decision of the war department. I soon afterwards learned that captain Thurston would much have preferred a leave of absence. If his resignation has not been accepted I trust that such indulgence may be accorded. He is highly gifted for any kind of war, but, from his knowledge of this country and the enemy, he would be of the greatest value on the recommencement of hostilities. Perhaps, with handsome promotion, he may be permanently retained in the army. He is worthy of a lieutenant colonelcy.

When Clinch shall retire, the command in that quarter will devolve on lieutenant Colonel Bankhead, every way capable, if his health were better. He is very infirm, from extreme fatigue, and I learn, can scarcely walk or mount his horse. Brigadier gen. Clinch recommends him for leave of absence for the recovery of his health, and as soon as I can spare major Gates or major Heileman, I shall send a leave to the lieutenant colonel, whose recent services, independent of all former claims, entitle him to high consideration.

I enclose a copy of my order, No. 45. Gen. Eustis is engaged in mounting two companies of his regiment, using the horses of his baggage train with wagon saddles. Some few common saddles will be purchased to complete the number wanted.—About 85 mounted men may thus be obtained with very little cost to the United States, for the horses will be wanted on the return of cold weather, and in the mean time they could not be sold this side of Tallahassee for ten per centum of their value.

The two mounted regular companies will be worth more than twice the number of foot. The men are now a little awkward in the saddle. In a week they will be quite respectable, and after two months, twice as effective as mounted volunteers.—Forty men of Dimmick's company, the only one here at the time, was hastily mounted on the 7th, and sent to pursue a trail seen about five miles from this place. The citizens who went out as guides after travelling some eight miles, declared that the signs were simply those of the country cattle, and the captain returned.

On the morning of the 8th, we received a report that a party of Indians were at the Matanzas; had captured the slaves of Hernandez and Dupont; and would no doubt destroy the fixtures of both plantations. Capt. Dimmick was again hastily mounted and despatched. At a little distance from Dupont's place, a small party of the enemy were overtaken; at least three killed and seven wounded. Dimmick lost a private killed, and had a sergeant and three privates wounded. Two of his horses were also killed. The Indians, as usual, availed themselves of a near hammock, and fought better than they have commonly done. They lost their horses and packs, of which they had robbed the plantations. All Dupont's negroes escaped, but the enemy had secured three belonging to Hernandez. It is hoped they will also escape on being next approached by the horse.—Lieut. Irwin, with Saunders's company, which it is proposed to keep mounted, will march out to-morrow to Dupont's place, where a company of foot will be placed in garrison. The families and negroes I hope will be soon reassured. Every thing south has been long destroyed.

The handsome check given to the enemy on the 8th, will render him more cautious. Without horses, snecor would not have arrived till the neighborhood had been desolated.

Both on the 7th and 8th, application was made for volunteers from the South Carolina foot. One man marched with Dimmick the first day; the same man and six others the second.—The time of these troops being out between the 8th and the 20th, no more would volunteer, either to go by water, on foot, or horseback. On inquiry it was found useless to issue an order, as col. Brisbane could not pledge himself that it would be obeyed. He was, on the contrary, certain that it would be disregarded. Goodwin's regiment of horse was already across the St. John's at Jacksonville, and the remaining companies of regulars (four) were at Picolata, engaged in handling and securing the public property at that depot. Merchant's company had a few days before gone to Gary's ferry, where it will establish itself for the summer, &c.

I have been using every measure in my power to cause a company of mounted volunteers to be raised on this side the St. Johns, to aid the inhabitants to defend the country. I would prefer that the company should consist of at least sixty-four privates, but have offered to accept one with forty, and give it three officers. It is very doubtful whether that minimum can be engaged. With such company, under tolerable officers, the two companies of mounted regulars, and the three of foot, I do not doubt that entire security may be given to the whole of the remaining settlements.

The little United States steamer, the Essayons, will be useful in effecting the same object. By frequently passing up the river as far as Lake George, it will be rendered very hazardous for parties of Indians to cross the river to join in depredations in the Alachua frontier, or on this side of the St. John's. The parties which infest those districts cannot, I think exceed one hundred and fifty in the whole. Sixty Indians, however, but for the presence of regulars, would depopulate this part of the territory in a season.

I have received no report from colonel Smith, who from Tampa, went up the Peas creek; none has been received from colonel Lindsay, who was left on the 20th ult. on the big Wythlacochee, preparing a fortified camp for his wagons, before scouring the forks. From the bad dispositions of the Alabama regiment, his principal force, I expect to hear that the duty of that column has been slurred over.

But the most extraordinary and disgraceful delinquency committed by any corps has occurred in the expedition entrusted to major Reed. He has not condescended to report to me; but from governor Call's letter that was forwarded to Washington, I infer that the major scarcely looked into the Wythlacochee.

His written orders, drawn up by col. Gadsden, directed him to "penetrate as far into the interior as may be found practicable, and consistent with the security of your command." And I said to him on each of the two following days, in the strongest and most precise terms, that he would ascend the river to the first impediment in its navigation, which was understood to be 12 miles up. I desired him to sketch the windings and the banks of the river, and particularly to note a site, with wood at hand, and as near the fall as practicable, for a military post, the importance of which I fully explained. This man has at Tallahassee, caused a statement to be made, declaring that I had refused him permission to ascend the Wythlacochee; and again presuming the statement to have been furnished by him, he denies having ever heard that possibly he might find a block-house and garrison established near the falls of the river. Now, I affirm, that it was generally known throughout the right wing of the army, that it was just possible that major McLe-more (a highly meritorious Floridian) had made such establishment. The possibility was mentioned to major Reed; and although col. Gadsden by accident omitted the subject in the letter of instructions, yet when the major saw half of a flat rudely cut in two, that which was extremely doubtful before became a matter of the most perfect certainty; and if the major had been bound home without other orders, it immediately became his imperative duty to go instantly to the relief of his countrymen. The flat could never have belonged to the Indian; and it would not have been destroyed, if the garrison had returned by water to the Suwanee, and major Reed knew it could only have returned by water.

Associated with such officers and men, no man's honor is safe. An act of sheer cowardice is supported by at least two distinct falsehoods.

I must again repeat, that although I believe that 800 or fewer regulars might easily beat the whole of the Seminole warriors, if they would stand, yet at least 3,000 of the best troops are required to flush this war.

I have written the foregoing, sick and in haste. In a few days I hope to be well again, when I shall attempt to give succinctly the causes which have defeated my operations, the first of which is the late day on which I was ordered to Florida. I remain with respect, your obedient servant.

(Signed)

WINFIELD SCOTT.

Brig. gen. Jones, adjutant general U. States army.

The following documents, which accompanied major general Scott's recent official report to the war department, show what measures, at the date of that despatch, had been taken by the commanding general for the defence of Florida.

Head quarters, right wing, Florida army,
Fort Drane, 27th April, 1836.

SIR: My report of this date will inform you of the operations of the right wing since we left Tampa Bay. The four companies of mounted volunteers from Georgia have been ordered to return to their homes. The two companies from Augusta, commanded by captains Robinson and Bones, took up the line of march this morning for Augusta, via Picolata; and the Louisiana volunteers left sick at this post when that gallant regiment left this, will march in the morning under the command of lieutenant Wright, with the wagon train, for Gary's ferry, there to await your orders and transportation. There will be upwards of one hundred men who will leave in the morning, that will require transportation on their arrival at Gary's ferry. The disposition of the regular troops, so as to give the greatest protection and security to the inhabitants and their property, is one of much difficulty, and owing to my peculiar situation is one of great delicacy, but it must be met. As it is generally considered that occupancy and defence of this post is one of much importance to the military operations against the Indians, I have deemed it necessary to garrison it with five companies of artillery and captain Wharton's company of dragoons, from which a strong detachment will be sent to protect the property and provisions at Oakland, about fourteen miles northeast from this post.

I would strongly recommend the remounting of the whole of captain Wharton's company with the least possible delay, as I consider it impossible to give quiet and protection to the country, without this species of force to aid and assist the troops acting as infantry. I shall order one company to take post at or near Micanopy, and the remaining company to Fort King, and I do not think this force sufficient to keep the Indians within their former limits, without the aid of one hundred and fifty or two hundred mounted men from the adjacent counties. It is believed, that if proper encouragement is given, that two or three companies of mounted volunteers can be raised for the period of six months, as many of the inhabitants will be prevented from making crops this year, and will, of course, be out of employment; and if not employed by the government, will be compelled to leave the country with their families. These men are well acquainted with the country, and could, with the assistance of the regular troops, scour that part of it lying between the settlements and the enemy, so as to deter them, except in very small parties, from harassing the settlements. These men should be permitted to subsist themselves and horses as far as practicable, should they prefer doing so, as it is believed this plan would be most convenient to themselves and less expensive to the government, as their horses could do with very little corn when well grazed.

I would, therefore, respectfully, but strongly recommend the raising of this force as soon as practicable, and of stationing it at some point that will give the greatest protection to the country. About 2 o'clock on the morning of the 20th instant the Indians made an attack on this place, but were met and repulsed by the garrison, commanded by captain Lendrum. They succeeded, however, in carrying off three of my negroes and seventeen public horses. On the night of the 25th inst. the cotton and gin-house belonging to col. McIntosh, was burnt, and the loss estimated at about five thousand dollars. The accompanying letter contains all the information received from the command established on the Wythlacoochee, and unless relieved by major Reed, I am fearful their situation will be a critical one. The major must, however, have reached that point ere this. I am sir, with high respect, your obedient servant, (Signed) D. S. CLINCH, brig. gen. U. S. A.

Head quarters, army of Fla., St. Augustine, May 7, 1836.

SIR: I have had no intelligence from the vicinity of Fort Drane. The last was orally received by captain Brane.

On reflection, I am now willing to receive into the service of the United States, for six months, unless sooner discharged, one company of mounted Floridians, to aid in the defence of the Alachua settlements. This force to be accepted, must be strictly organized according to the act of 1792, viz: 64 privates, four corporals, four sergeants, two musicians, one captain, one first and one second lieutenants and one ensign or cornet. The two musicians are not indispensable, and more than 64 privates, say 70 or 80, would be received with the four officers. My meaning is that the number of officers must not exceed four to sixty-four privates. If a force of that extent can be raised in the Alachua settlements, let it be done as soon as practicable, and let application be made to the governor for the commissions of the officers. Without waiting for the instructions of the war department, I will instantly cause the company to be mustered into the service of the United States.

With Wharton's detachment of the United States dragoons, light companies of the United States foot, and the proposed company of mounted men, I am persuaded that the Alachua settlements may be easily defended till the return of the season for recommencing active operations against the enemy.

Please cause a copy of this letter to be sent to the governor of Florida, and let it be generally known, in the neighboring settlements, that a company of mounted men are wanted and will be accepted. Correspond with such individuals as may be known to be willing to aid in raising that force, and give all the encouragement in your power.

I have acted on but few applications for leave of absence which have reached me from the neighborhood of Fort Drane. A few only of the officers, who have obtained certificates of disability, may be permitted, in extreme cases, to retire, and to make their application to me at this place.

A steamer, (the Cherokee), is now at Picolata, to receive discharged troops there or at Gary's ferry; she will be detained a few days longer, to await the arrival of major Cooper's battalion. I remain, with great respect, your most obedient servant. (Signed) WINFIELD SCOTT.

Head quarters, army of Florida, St. Augustine, May 11, 1836. [Order No. 46.]

The commander of the left wing will immediately cause to be mounted two of the companies of the United States artillery of this wing, using for that purpose the horses of the baggage train.

The companies under a system of instructions which will be framed, will be immediately employed in patrolling and scouring the frontiers and other exposed settlements this side of the St. Johns.

The three remaining companies of the same regiment will be placed in such positions as to afford the best points of support for the mounted companies.

By command of major general Scott.

A. D. C. and A. A. adjutant general.

GEN. SCOTT AND THE VOLUNTEERS.

Augusta, May 26th, 1836.

SIR: Every officer must be aware of the jealousy with which a soldier regards his reputation. You have, no doubt been informed of the impression which has been produced by your official communication of the 30th ult. in which the expression "good troops (not volunteers)" is used.

I have never thought, for a moment, that you intended to cast, by that expression, the slightest imputation of a want of patriotism or bravery upon the volunteers during the late campaign—from what repeatedly occurred in our intercourse during our trying and arduous service in Florida, I feel satisfied that you will be happy in being afforded an opportunity to correct any misrepresentations which may have gone abroad.

I have thought it due to myself, and the battalion which I had the honor to command during the campaign, to place the subject before you. I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

E. M. ROBERTSON, capt. com. the Augusta battalion of volunteers in the late Seminole campaign.
Maj. gen. Scott, U. S. A.

Head quarters, army of the south, Augusta, May 26, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I am very greatly obliged to you for your kind and manly letter of this date. It gives me a direct opportunity of doing justice to the brave men, generally, whom I have recently had the honor to command, as well as myself.

The letter to the government which by an easy mistake, has given so much offence, was written at Picolata, under the sound of the call, that hastened the fine battalion of Augusta volunteers, under your command, on board the steamer which was to take them to their homes. Writing by that opportunity, and in the midst of other occupations, I had not even time to read what I had wrote. Hence the very careless, and inaccurate phrase quoted by you.

At that moment, the volunteers who were then, or who had recently been in Florida were scarcely in my thoughts. My mind was intensely fixed on a plan and the means of renewed operations against the Seminole Indians—modified according to my then better knowledge of them and their country. Having become satisfied that it would continue, as we had found, to be the policy of that enemy to remain scattered in small parties and to avoid a general battle—thereby protracting the war almost indefinitely, that it would be extremely difficult, even with three thousand veteran troops, in a country abounding in fastnesses, to put an end to the war in a single season; learning that a bill was before congress raising a large body of volunteers—(I knew not for what time)—and feeling confident that in such a war, three months' men, six months men, or even men engaged for twelve months, would not suffice, I was in haste to give my suggestions to the secretary of war; in order that, if approved, the necessary bills might be asked for of congress at once.

Following out the idea that old troops, or troops with a long term of service, were indispensable, I added, in the next paragraph, that regiments of recruits, although regulars, would not do, but if recruits, in sufficient numbers, were mixed with old soldiers in June or July, they would become efficient by the following December.

I can truly say that it was strongly on my mind, when in the act of writing the unfortunate letter, that it would be unreasonable to call on the gallant and patriotic to volunteer for another campaign in Florida, where nothing but hardship and suffering can be expected, unrelieved by the hope of battle and the glory consequent upon victory.

The latter is the only incentive that can long cheer and animate volunteers in a war not immediately connected with the defence of their homes and liberties.

As to the general proposition whether disciplined or undisciplined troops be the best for war in general it was not my purpose at that moment either to discuss or state. A body of volunteers kept long in the camp and field will be better disciplined, and therefore more valuable for any kind of war, than regiments of regular recruits. For example, that is, in general, the eldest, corps whether regular or volunteer, will always be found the best instructed or the best disciplined; and of course the best prepared for the ordinary purposes of war. The exceptions are only found in wars which put homes and liberties in danger, and in these militia, suddenly embodied, and even regiments of recruits hastily raised, have in a very great number of cases, been found an over-match for science and disciplined valor.

In conclusion, allow me to repeat from the heart, what I have substantially said to the war department, no man can have for the volunteers from South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Louisiana, whom I have lately had the honor to command, a more cordial esteem than I entertain. There are hundreds and hundreds, of them, whom I should be most happy to call friends; for I know them to be generally men of high honor, patriotism, intelligence and individual courage.

Such are my honest sentiments, and I have great pleasure in communicating them to one whose courtesies to me on the present occasion, alike command the high respect and esteem, With which I am sir, your obedient servant,

WINFIELD SCOTT.

To capt. E. M. Robertson, late commander of the Augusta battalion of volunteers.

OFFICIAL—FRENCH INDEMNITY.

From the Globe.

The agent of the United States in Paris having received from the government of France the sum of 18,486,666 52 francs, on account of the indemnity of 25,000,000 francs, under the treaty of July, 1831, the amount of which is now in the course of transmission to this country, the claimants holding certificates from the treasury department are hereby notified that the bank of America, in behalf of the United States, and by authority of the secretary of the treasury, will advance and pay on the 15th June next, a proportional part of their respective certificates, equal to at least the ratio of 50 cents on the dollar of the above mentioned sum received by the agent in Paris, together with the same ratio of the sum there deducted, and to be repaid here out of the treasury of the United States; being 1,180,000 francs. The said certificates must be presented at the bank for that purpose, by the parties to whom they shall have been issued, or by their legal assignees or duly constituted attorneys.

The residue of what has been received in Paris, and of the sum deducted there, will be paid out here, as soon as the former arrives, and the net proceeds of the whole can be ascertained.

TRANSLATION.

For the Globe.

Chamber of peers of France, Thursday April 7, 1836.

COUNT DE TASCHER: An extraordinary appropriation of seven millions of francs is asked to meet the extraordinary expenses of the marine department. Among the circumstances which, according to the report of your committee, rendered these expenses necessary, were considerable armaments, judged requisite for maintaining the honor and dignity of France. Thank God, wisdom has triumphed over national susceptibility, and harmony appears to be restored between two nations which have every reason for esteeming each other.

Imitating your committee in its reserve, I shall not examine whether it be necessary to keep up the increase of our maritime armament; but another subject, which indeed occasioned those armaments, seems to me worthy of the attention of the chamber.

The law of June 14, 1835, says:

"Article 1. The minister of finance is authorised to take the necessary measures for the execution of the first and second articles of the treaty signed on the 4th of July, 1831, according to which the sum of 25,000,000 francs is to be paid by France. The payments of the said sum cannot be made until the government shall have received satisfactory explanations with regard to the message of the president of the union, dated December 2d, 1834."

Gentlemen, I am, as you are, confident that the government has received such explanations as it should have received, since the first payment has been made, by virtue of a royal ordinance. Does it not however, appear to you, gentlemen, proper to request the ministers to enlighten the chamber of peers as to the nature of the explanations which, by the terms of the law, were to be given before payment could be made?

The minister of foreign affairs, M. Thiers. It is true that the first payment of the indemnification consented to by the chambers in favor of the United States of America, has been made, and that a royal ordinance, contained in the Bulletin des Lois, authorises the payment of 18,400,000 francs.

The honorable M. Tascher asks whether the government has received the satisfaction provided for by the law, adopted during the last session. The satisfaction is well known to all France—I may say to the whole world. It is contained in a document which is celebrated, because it has terminated a deplorable quarrel. This document contains the explanation of a disagreeable misunderstanding which might have divided two nations made for esteeming each other. The chambers themselves have appeared to consider this document in the sense in which it is understood by the government; they have appeared to see from it, that the honor of France had been by no means stained by a preceding message. They have understood that the satisfaction could only have come through the same channel by which the offence came, if offence there were; and that the satisfaction given was the most honorable and proper which could have been expected.

In this sense the government interpreted the message. There was but one ground for fear; which was in the uncertainty as to the answer which our government might make to this message; the new message might retract what was said in the former.

The payment was therefore suspended. As the last message respecting the measures proposed to the congress of the United States contained nothing of which France could complain, the French government could not but pay the instalments due.

The viscount Dubouché was not satisfied with the explanations given by the minister. The message was known in France when the king made his speech at the opening of the session of the chambers; the chambers did not consider the explanation satisfactory, and in their replies expressed a hope that the government would obtain other explanations. Moreover, while waiting for the explanations, the minister, on the 27th January last, proposed an appropriation of 7,500,000 francs to meet, not only the expenses already occasioned by the misunderstanding between the two governments, but also to prepare for the chances of a possible war between them.

[This speech is very long and diffuse, merely intended to impress upon the chambers the unsatisfactory nature of the explanations, and to charge the ministry with yielding too much to the interests and influence of Great Britain.]

The minister of foreign affairs replied:

If I have completely understood the objection made by the last speaker, it consists in this: that when the message of 2d of December last was made known, it gave such slight indications of the termination of the quarrel, that the expressions used by the chambers were dubious, and the language of the government very reserved. Nothing, indeed, showed that the quarrel was at an end. Well, I will now tell you the motives for this reserve.

If, on the said 2d of December, when the message appeared, it could have been believed that it was impossible for a new message to be sent, I think that the government as well as the chambers would not have failed to declare itself perfectly satisfied. What prevented it from doing so was, that Mr. Barton had not yet arrived in the United States, and that a new misunderstanding might yet take place. As soon, however, as it was known that Mr. Barton's arrival had not been misinterpreted, that no new difficulty had arisen, and that the mediation had been accepted by both parties, then France declared herself completely satisfied, and in so doing showed her wisdom, her honesty and her sense of propriety. I know that some objections might be raised; we are accustomed to them; but I think that the great mass of good citizens will applaud the termination of so deplorable an affair. These were the motives of the government. (Great applause.)

BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS, 15th MARCH.

Occupation of Cracow. Sir Stratford Canning addressed the commons in a speech of considerable length on the occupation of Cracow by the three protecting powers, as they were called. He contended that this proceeding was in direct violation of the treaty of Vienna; and though in this instance the victim was but a small state, it behoved England to see to the due performance of treaties to which she was an influential party. There was not the slightest pretence for this outrage on a dependent state; and there was reason to believe that it was deliberately resolved upon as far back as 1833, though no notice of such an intention had been given either to this country or to Cracow.

Lord Palmerston said, that the original sweeping demand of the three powers for the expulsion of all Polish residents in Cracow, who could be claimed as their subjects, had been mitigated. The terms of the treaty of Vienna justified them in demanding the expulsion of persons from Cracow whose names were given and whose offence was proved. But in this case no sufficient justification had been offered for the violent measures adopted towards Cracow. He had received no official communication on this subject from either of the three powers. He had written to English ministers abroad for information, but had not yet had time to consider their answers, so as to enable him to take any steps on the subject. He could not avoid observation, that the selection of Austrian troops for the occupation showed good feeling and discretion on the part of the three powers.

Mr. O'Connell said, the three protecting powers were three plundering powers, who had been guilty of the grossest violation of treaties.

It had indeed been suggested by the noble lord as a circumstance in mitigation, that Austrian troops had been marched into Cracow instead of Russian. This reminded him of the story of a Spanish nobleman who, having been sentenced to be hanged, complained that to carry such a sentence into execution on his person would be a violation of the rights of nobility; whereupon it was decreed that he should be hung by a silk rope instead of a hempen one.

This country felt deeply with respect to Poland—

A feeling for the sufferings of Poland was working in the mind of the public all over Europe; and the despots with their armed power little knew what might be the consequences of the wrongs they were perpetrating. A moral effect was in operation from city to city and town to town; and it would be found that this power of Russia, which resembled a monster with its arms of steel and its front of brass, but its feet of clay, along with other despotic powers which were attached to it, would meet with a fate which would serve as an example to the rest of the world.

Mr. Hume asked what was the use of having ministers at Berlin and Vienna, if the moment they heard of this transaction they had not sent information of it to Lord Palmerston, who said he could not act for want of information. He hoped that when the papers were laid on the table, the house would declare in the plainest manner its sense of the conduct of the guilty parties.

Lord John Russell did not agree with Mr. Hume. He thought it impolitic to pass a strong resolution, unless the house was prepared to go farther. Declarations, not followed up by distinct acts, did not add to the dignity or reputation of a public assembly.

The discussion was soon after closed.

MARYLAND.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT BILL.

A bill entitled an act for the promotion of internal improvement.

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of Maryland, That if the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, in general meeting of said corporations respectively assembled, shall approve, assent and agree to the several provisions of this act, so far as they are applicable to said corporations respectively, and shall severally communicate said approval, assent and agreement under their corporate seals and the signatures of their presidents, to the governor of this state on or before the first day of August next, the treasurer of the Western Shore of Maryland shall subscribe to the capital stock of each of said corporations the sum of three millions of dollars, and pay for the same in the manner and upon the conditions hereinafter mentioned, and from the date of said subscription the stipulation heretofore made by the act Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, and so much of the act of assembly heretofore passed, restricting the said company from proceeding with the constructing of its rail road in the valley of the Potomac river, above Harper's Ferry, until after the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company shall have finished its canal to Cumberland, or otherwise, or the time limited by law for its being completed to said town shall have elapsed, as imposes said restrictions or is inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be null and void, and the said rail road company may thenceforth proceed with the construction of its work part passu with, but without preceding, the construction of the said canal or its works in the said valley where the said rail road and canal or their works will be in juxta position: and at all the passes of said river where the said canal and rail road must, from the nature of the ground, be brought into contact, the construction of said canal and rail road shall proceed jointly upon such plan and for such a distance as the commissioners whose appointment is hereinafter provided for, shall determine: Provided, That if either of said companies shall neglect or refuse to proceed with its portion of said joint construction, for the space of sixty days after the plan thereof shall have been so determined, and notice thereof given to them by said commissioners, it shall be lawful for the other of said companies to proceed independently to construct its work upon the site designated by said commissioners: Provided, That in no instance shall the plan adopted by said commissioners for the joint construction of the two works, require a reduction of the width of the canal below the minimum width required by the charter of said Chesapeake and Ohio canal company.

Sec. 2. And be it enacted, That in the joint construction of said two works at the difficult passes aforesaid, the commissioners shall provide that the said canal and its works shall be constructed securely and in no case at any more expense to said company than such part or parts of its works would have cost if the same had been separately or independently constructed; and such cost shall be determined by the estimates of said commissioners.

Sec. 3. And be it enacted, That there shall be a board of commissioners appointed immediately upon said companies assenting as aforesaid to the provisions of this act, to consist of two engineers, one to be appointed by each of said companies; and in any case of disagreement of said engineers, they shall have power to select and appoint a third person or engineer, and in the event of their not concurring in a selection, they shall report the fact to their respective companies, and such third person shall then be appointed by the governor of Maryland, at the request of said companies, or one of them, if the other shall neglect or refuse to unite in such request, and the majority of said three persons shall, in the matter of disagreement aforesaid, have all the power and authority by this act given to said two engineers; and said commissioners shall perform the duties hereinafter indicated, and shall act as arbitrators, under oath or affirmation, truly and impartially to decide between the parties in all differences that may arise between the said companies, in carrying into operation the plan here contemplated for the construction of said canal and rail road and their respective appurtenances; and the decision of said commissioners upon all points submitted to them, shall be final between the said companies, and in the case of the death, resignation, disqualification or refusal to act of any one or more of such commissioners, the vacancy so occurring shall be filled by the authority by whom the appointment was originally made; and it shall be the duty of said commissioners, as soon after their appointment and qualification as practicable, to ascertain all the passes of said river where the canal and rail road must, from the nature of the grounds, be brought into contact, and the length of such contact at such passes, respectively and forthwith to determine upon the plan and mode of the joint construction of said works at said passes, of which plan and mode they shall give notice to the said companies respectively; and if the said commissioners shall determine that it would be best to have said two works constructed at such passes or any of them, exclusive of the laying of the rails on said rail road by the same contractor or contractors, and under the same contract, the said commissioners shall have the power and are hereby required to determine the proportions of the contract price or prices to be paid by the said companies respectively, under such contract or contracts, and their decision, after notice thereof given to said companies, shall bind them respectively; and whenever it shall become necessary in construction of the said rail road to erect permanent bridges across the said canal, and the said companies cannot agree upon the height and mode of construction thereof, the said commissioners are hereby authorised and required to determine the same, and their decision shall be binding on said companies respectively.

Sec. 4. And be it enacted, That the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company be and hereby is discharged from all obligation to erect and keep in repair at any place or places within or upon the margin of the said rail road next to the canal aforesaid, a fence of boards or other materials: Provided, however, That the said rail road company shall pay or tender to the said canal company such sum of money as in the opinion of the said commissioners or a majority of them will fully provide for the erection and maintenance of good and sufficient post and rail fence along the river line of the tow-path where its side may be precipitous, and the said rail road to be so near to the said canal that horses and mules when tracing canal boats might be alarmed by the use of locomotive engines on such parts of the said rail road, and that said rail road company shall give such convenient and appropriate notice of the approach of its locomotive engines, on each of such parts of the said rail road, as may be agreed upon by the president and directors of the said companies, or in default of such agreement then such notice as shall be prescribed by the commissioners aforesaid, or by a majority of them; or for any damage or injury which may result or happen to any person by reason of any neglect to give the notice which may be agreed upon, or be prescribed as aforesaid, the said rail road company shall be responsible to the full extent of the damage or injury that may be done to the person or property of any one sustaining the same.

Sec. 5. And be it enacted, That the said treasurer shall be and he is hereby authorised and directed to pay from time to time upon the requisition of the president and directors of said companies respectively, after six months notice, not exceeding one million of dollars to each of said companies in any year, and in the whole not more than three millions of dollars to each of them, out of the money which he shall receive as the par or sum of the state's stocks or bonds that may be issued or disposed of, for the purpose of providing the amount of subscriptions aforesaid to the stocks of said companies; and that the said several subscriptions and payments for the said stock of each of the said companies are hereby authorised and directed only upon the condition that none of the rights and remedies of this state under any contract now subsisting between the state and either of said companies shall be in any wise impaired, waived, relinquished or affected by reason of this act or any thing that may be done by either of said companies in consequence thereof; and the said treasurer shall not make any payment aforesaid for subscription to the stock of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, until after a majority of the directors appointed therein on behalf of this state shall have certified to the treasurer, in writing, supported by the oath or affirmation of a majority of said directors, that they sincerely believe in their certificate and statement that, with the subscription by this act authorised to be made to said company's stock, and with the subscriptions which the city of Baltimore may have made by virtue of an act passed at December session of the year eighteen hundred and thirty-five of this assembly, or that independently of any subscription by any other public authority than the city of Baltimore as aforesaid, and of the cities of Pittsburgh and Wheeling, and exclusive of any loan on interest, the said rail road company in their opinion have funds sufficient secured to it exclusive of all future profits and debts due by the company, to complete the said rail road from the Ohio river by way of and through Cumberland, Hagerstown and Boonsborough to its present tract near Harper's Ferry, and it is hereby declared to be and made the duty of said company to, and they shall, so locate and construct the said road as to pass through each of said places; which certificate of said directors shall be accompanied by an estimate or estimates of one or more skillful and competent engineers, made out after a particular and minute survey of the route of said road by him or them, and verified by his or their affidavit shewing that the whole cost of said work will not be greater than the amount of funds the said directors shall certify to have been secured by said company, and applicable to the construction of the said road: Provided, That if the said Baltimore and Ohio rail road company shall not locate the road in the manner provided for in this act, then and in that case, they shall forfeit one million of dollars to the state of Maryland for the use of Washington county.

Sec. 6. And be it enacted, That for each five thousand shares of the stock of said rail road company for which, under this act the said treasurer shall subscribe and which the state may continue to own, at the time of making any annual election or appointment of directors of said company, this state shall be entitled to have and appoint one director, over and above the number of those who may be appointed by reason of the interest which she now has, in the property or capital stock of said company.

Sec. 7. And be it enacted, That before any subscription shall be made to the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, under and by virtue of this act, the stockholders of the said company shall, in general meeting assembled, stipulate, agree, and bind the said company by a proper instrument of writing, signed by the president, and under the corporate seal thereof, lodged with the treasurer of the Western Shore, to guarantee the state of Maryland the payment, out of the profits of the work, of six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually, on the whole amount of money which shall be paid to the said company, under and by virtue of this act, until the clear annual profits of the said canal shall be more than sufficient to discharge the sums of money which it shall be liable annually to pay to the state of Maryland, and shall be adequate to a dividend of six per centum per annum among its stockholders, except the holders of stock subscribed in virtue of the stock and debt of the Potomac company; and thereafter the state shall in reference to the stock subscribed for on its behalf, be entitled to have and receive a proportional dividend upon the profits of the work as declared from time to time and no more.

Sec. 8. And be it enacted, That as soon as it shall appear to the governor, by estimates to be severally and respectively prepared and adopted by the Eastern Shore rail road company, and the Maryland canal company, and the Annapolis and Potomac canal company or either of them, and approved by the governor of this state, that the subscriptions to the capital stock of all or either of said companies, including the subscription hereby authorised on the part of the state to the stock of such company or companies respectively, at the value thereof will be adequate to the construction of the rail road or canals respectively, or either of them, as the case may be, which said company or companies may be respectively authorised to make, the said treasurer shall be and he is hereby, on the governor's certificate to him in the premises, authorised and directed in the name and behalf of the state of Maryland, in the case of the Eastern Shore rail road company, to subscribe for ten thousand shares or one million of dollars of the capital stock of said company, and in the case of the Annapolis and Potomac canal company, five thousand shares or five hundred thousand dollars of the capital stock of said company; and in the case of the Maryland canal company five thousand shares or five hundred thousand dollars of the capital stock of said company: Provided, That no subscription shall be made by the said treasurer to either of the said companies last mentioned, until such company shall have been organized agreeably to law, and the said treasurer shall pay the instalments on each share of the capital stock of either or each of the said companies herein mentioned, for which he may subscribe as aforesaid as the same shall be called for, agreeably to the provisions of the acts incorporating the said companies and the supplements thereto respectively: Provided, that no instalment on any of the stock of the companies mentioned in this act shall be paid by him, until after an equal proportional payment shall have been made by the other stockholders on their shares of the capital stock of such company, and the said treasurer shall make said payments on the stock so subscribed by him, out of the money which he shall receive as the par or sum of the stock or bonds of the state, that may be issued or disposed of under this act, for the purposes thereof; and as to said subscription to the stock of the Maryland canal company, it is provided, that before the subscription shall be made, it shall upon reports and estimates to be submitted to the governor and council, after an actual survey of the said routes by engineers to be appointed as is hereinafter prescribed, be by their judgment ascertained, whether and at what expense the construction of said company's canal, with due supply of water, be practicable, from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to the city of Baltimore, by the valleys of the Monocacy and Patapsco, or by a route diverging from the said Chesapeake and Ohio canal at the mouth of Seneca river, exclusively within the limits of this state, and that if the construction of such canal be decided by the governor and council to be practicable by either of said routes, and if in that case the said company, by certificate to the governor and council, under its corporate seal, and signed by its president, shall after such decision, testify its agreement to locate and construct its canal upon the most northern and practicable route of these routes, said subscription shall be and is hereby authorised to be made, and in order to said decision, the governor and council may act upon any report and estimates of any engineer or engineers of said company, and of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, and upon those of any, that, by the governor and council, may for the purpose, at the expense of the said company, be appointed, who are hereby authorised and directed to appoint an engineer for that purpose, and it is hereby further declared, that it shall be the duty of the governor and council within sixty days after a report and estimate, or reports and estimates, by an engineer or engineers as aforesaid, shall have been submitted by them to the governor and council, or filed with the clerk of the council, to decide upon the practicability of said route, and in case the said governor and council shall not decide upon the practicability of said route within sixty days after a report and estimates shall have been submitted to them, as aforesaid, then the president and directors of said Maryland canal company shall have power to make the said decision, and their decision shall have the same effect as if such decision had been made by the governor and council as aforesaid. And be it further enacted, That the subscription hereby authorised to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, and to the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, shall not be made until the Maryland canal company, shall, by their president and directors, have certified to the treasurer of the Western Shore, that a sufficient amount has been subscribed to the stock of said company, to justify the commencement of the construction of their canal, and to insure its completion by the most northern practicable route.

And be it further provided, That in the event that the said stock of the Eastern Shore rail road shall not be subscribed to an amount sufficient to commence the said road, by individuals or corporations, as is provided for by this act, then and in that case the million of dollars set apart for, and intended to be applied to said work shall be held sacred, and the faith of the state is hereby pledged, that the said million of dollars shall be applied to the exclusive purpose of internal improvements on the Eastern Shore, and for no other purpose whatever, and shall be subject to disposition by any future legislature for this purpose, after the time shall have expired for commencing the work, as proposed in the charter for the Eastern Shore rail road company.

Sec. 9. And be it enacted, That before any subscription shall be made to the capital stock of the said Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, under and by virtue of this act, the stockholders of said company shall, in general meeting assembled, stipulate, agree and bind the said company by a proper instrument of writing, signed by the president and under the corporate seal thereof, to be lodged with the treasurer of the Western Shore, to guarantee to the state of Maryland (after the expiration of three years from the payment by the state of each of the instalments on the stock hereby authorised to be made to the stock of said company) the payment from that time, out of the profits of the work of six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually, on the amount of money which shall be paid to the said company under and by virtue of this act, until the clear annual profits of the said rail road shall be more than sufficient to discharge the interest, which it shall be liable so to pay to the state of Maryland, and shall be adequate to a dividend of six per centum per annum among its stockholders, and thereafter the state shall, in reference to the stock so subscribed for, and on so much thereof as the state may hold, be entitled to have and receive a perpetual dividend of six per centum per annum out of the profits of the work as declared from time to time and no more, and all and so much of such annual profits, as shall exceed six per centum shall be distributed to the other stockholders according to their several interests in the said companies respectively, and in consideration of the interest so to be secured to the state, the said Baltimore and Ohio rail road company shall be, and they are hereby authorised in addition to the charge now authorised to be made by said company, for the transportation of passengers, to increase the price or charge for such transportation to any amount, not exceeding one cent per mile, for each person passing on said road; and the Eastern Shore rail road company, the Maryland canal company, and the Annapolis and Potomac canal company are hereby respectively required as a condition precedent to the subscriptions by this act authorised to said companies respectively, to enter into covenants with the state of Maryland, under the corporate seal of each of said companies respectively, to pay to the state of Maryland semi-annually, by each of said companies respectively, out of the profits of the said respective works, a sum equal in amount to the sum of six per cent. per annum on the subscription by this act authorised to be made, on certain conditions, to the capital stock of the said respective companies; such payments of interest not to be made to the state, until after the expiration of three years from the payment of each instalment on the subscriptions to the respective companies aforesaid, and any excess of dividends on the capital stock of the state in either of said companies above six per centum per annum, shall be distributed to the other stockholders of the company, declaring such excess of dividend.

Sec. 10. And be it enacted, That the mayor and city council of Baltimore may subscribe for and acquire such part of the capital stock of the Maryland canal company, and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, as shall not be subscribed by individuals after books shall have been opened for that purpose, as directed by their charters, and also to require at any time by purchase from individuals, such stock as may have been taken or subscribed for, or at any time owned by individuals, and to pay for the same by money procured on loan or otherwise, and provide for the payment of the principal and interest on such loan or loans as they shall find necessary, and deem proper: Provided, that neither the president and directors of the said Maryland canal company, or stockholders therein, shall so reduce the tolls on said canal as to prevent the payment to the state of Maryland of six per cent. per annum, upon the state's stock in said canal.

Sec. 11. And be it enacted, That so soon as the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company shall have respectively communicated to the governor of Maryland, their assent to the terms of this act in the manner hereinbefore provided, the governor shall be and he hereby is authorised to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the council to appoint and commission, three discreet, competent and suitable persons who, or a majority (or in case the suit of the party aggrieved, to be recovered by action on the case, in which this act and the special matter may be given in evidence.

Sec. 15. And be it enacted, That in case it shall become necessary at any time hereafter to levy a direct tax for the support of government, or to sustain the public credit, the same shall be laid according to the thirteenth article of the declaration of rights, including all goods, wares and merchandise belonging to citizens of this state, ships and vessels in or out of port, moneys at interest, on mortgage, bond or any chose in action, stock and public securities of every description and all income derived from shares of every incorporated institution, or otherwise, as well as every other description of property, real, personal or mixed, which escapes taxation under existing laws; and the faith of the state is hereby pledged to lay the same accordingly in consideration hereof, and to provide for the payment of interest, and the reimbursement of principal of debts to be created in virtue of this act, or of debts which may be created at any subsequent legislature, and all acts or parts of acts in contravention of the constitutional and equitable principles herein contained, shall thenceforward be repealed, abrogated and annulled.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 16—VOL. XIV.] BALTIMORE, JUNE 18, 1836. [VOL. L. WHOLE No. 1,291

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

—The space occupied by Mr. Adams' speech and the abstract of congressional news, which we were compelled to give more in detail than usual that all the important business considered might be fully understood, has prevented us from imparting the usual variety to the present sheet; but we believe it will not be found less interesting on that account.

We give a few additional particulars relative to the Creek war, and an extract from a late despatch from general Scott to the adjutant general at Washington; from which it will be seen that the most active efforts have been made and are making to check the enemy and to prevent a junction with the Seminoles. Our next accounts will, no doubt, furnish something definite; for unless the Creeks and the Euchees enter Florida they must soon be encountered by our troops.

The marines which have been employed in this campaign are commanded by col. Archibald Henderson, the senior officer of the corps, and not by col. Miller, as was erroneously stated in our last, on the authority of an eastern paper.

From Florida we have the gratifying intelligence that the gallant band under the command of lieut. Walker, who occupied the block-house on the Wythlacoochee, has been relieved by a body of about eighty volunteers, from the Florida militia, under the command of col. Read, who brought them all off in safety. The garrison was in a state of extreme suffering; the officers and men having lived for nearly a month on corn, without salt or meat.

—In consequence of a misunderstanding that occurred in the house of representatives on Thursday night, last week, between Messrs. Jenifer, of Md. and Bynum, of N. C. a challenge ensued, and the parties met on Tuesday last at Rock creek, near Washington, and after exchanging six shots, without injury to either party, the dispute was satisfactorily adjusted.

Mr. Jenifer was accompanied by Messrs. Peyton and Pickens, and Mr. Bynum by Messrs. Seveir and Hannegan.

—NEW STATES. On Monday last, the bills for the admission of the territories of Michigan and Arkansas, passed the house of representatives, having previously passed the senate, and, being now signed by the president, have become laws.

—A joint resolution has been adopted by both houses of congress fixing on the 4th of July next as the day of adjournment.

—TREATY WITH THE CHEROKEES. The treaty lately concluded with the headmen and chiefs of the Cherokee Indians, by Wm. Carroll and John P. Schermerhorn, on behalf of the United States, for the purchase of all the lands owned, claimed or possessed by the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, as ratified by the president and senate of the United States, has been officially published. The treaty at large is too long for our present limits, and we must therefore content ourselves with stating its leading provisions. The sum stipulated to be paid by the United States, in consideration of this cession, is five millions of dollars. The Indians are to be transported by the United States to the west of the Mississippi, and settled on lands specified in the treaty, &c. Of the five millions of dollars purchase money, the following sums are to be invested by the United States, "in some safe and most productive stocks of the country," for the benefit of the whole emigrant Cherokee nation:

For a general national fund.....$200,000
For an orphan's fund.....50,000
For addition to the school fund.....150,000

The annuity of $10,000 a year, to which the nation is now entitled, is to be commuted for a sum of $214,000, to be invested by the president of the United States as a part of the national fund.

A supplementary article stipulates for the payment of an additional sum of $600,000 by the United States to defray the expense of removing the Cherokees, and to cover all claims for "spoliations," by which indefinite phrase we do not very well know what is meant; and adds $100,000 more to the general national fund.

Receipts 1st quarter, 1836, as reported by the secretary of the treasury, 5,439,640.

The government lands already sold, amount to 540,000,000 of acres. The amount surveyed and offered but not yet sold, is 119,259,728 acres. In addition to the above, the Indian title has been extinguished to more than 100,000,000 of acres not yet surveyed.

Whole amount of unsold lands to which the Indian title had been extinguished previous to 1832, 227,593,384 acres. Since, the additions to that amount have exceeded the sales.

From the report made to the senate by Mr. Ewing, the amount received for sales of the public domain in each state and territory, since 1776, has been as follows, up to 1st of Jan. last—Ohio $16,780,177, Indiana 9,510,481, Illinois 5,355,612, Missouri 3,866,284, Alabama 10,097,347, Mississippi 6,837,770, Louisiana 999,087, Michigan 3,956,896, Arkansas 636,642, Florida 556,283. Total—$56,619,523.

NEW YORK BANKING CAPITAL. The capital of the new banks created by the late legislature amounts to $5,250,000. Add to this the sum of $420,000, for the increased capital of two banks previously in operation, and the aggregate amount is $5,670,000—of which only one million is west of Cayuga lake.

CURRENCY OF GREAT BRITAIN. An official return has been published, bearing very materially upon the amount of the circulation of the country—viz a return of the amount of notes circulated in England and Wales by private banks, joint stock banks and their branches, in the quarter ending on the 26th of December last. It appears from this statement, that the circulation of notes by these establishments has been increased in the last quarter to the extent of £713,791.

The present circulation of the private banks is stated at £8,334,836, in the same previous quarter it was £7,912,587. The circulation of the joint stock banks, in the quarter ending on the 26th September last, was £2,503,036 but in the quarter ending on the 26th December it was £2,799,551. Taking the increase of the circulation of the bank of England, of the private banks, and joint stock companies, it appears that in the last quarter there has been altogether an augmentation in the circulation of the country of near one million sterling.

ITEMS.

Gen. Wm. H. Harrison, of Ohio, and Francis Granger, of New York, have been unanimously nominated as candidates for president and vice president by the whig state convention of New Jersey, which assembled at Trenton on the 1st instant. Upwards of 200 delegates were in attendance from all parts of the state.

It appears from the Cincinnati papers that Dr. Harrison, a son of Gen. W. H. Harrison, who was reported to have been murdered and brutally mangled by the Mexicans, is alive and safe on board a Texian vessel, having been slightly wounded only. This news he has communicated to his friends by letter.

The packet ship Independence, which sailed from New York on the 8th ult arrived in Liverpool in a passage of fourteen days and eighteen hours!

The Providence (R. I.) Journal states that there are now living four brothers and one sister, born in North Providence, whose united ages number four hundred and five years!

Seven thousand chairs are exported from Boston every week.

A just law.—The Massachusetts revised statutes make it imprisonment for one year and a fine of $100, on every person who shall cut or injure a tree not his own.

Iron.—In a foundry in Germany, it has lately been discovered that by producing an evaporation of the chlorine, in making cast iron of the second or third quality, an iron of the first quality is produced. This new process has been tried in the forges of the Bes Rhin with complete success. The value and importance of this discovery cannot fail to be appreciated by all iron masters.

The amount of the capital of rail road companies in New York was, before the recent session of the legislature, thirty-five millions of dollars. It has been increased to nearly fifty millions.

The real and personal estate in the state of New York is estimated at five hundred and thirty millions of dollars.

There are fifty-six daily newspapers in the state of New York. Their circulation is equal to about 30,000 daily.

The receipts of the Pennsylvania hospital for 1836 were nearly $84,000.

Of 1,005 persons admitted into the Pennsylvania hospital in 1836, 461 were foreigners.

Rain. According to a statement in the Baltimore American, seven inches of rain have fallen from the commencement of the late wet weather up to Wednesday the 8th inst. at 1 o'clock, A. M.

The Winchester Virginian states that at Harper's Ferry the late rains had swollen the Potomac and Shenandoah rivers about sixteen feet above the low water level. It is added that the damages done to the canal by the freshet will require two months to repair them.

The navigation of all the N. York canals had been suspended by the late rains. The Albany Argus of Monday has the following paragraph on the subject:

The canals. The floods produced by the rains the 20th and 30th of May, have interrupted the navigation of the Erie, Oswego, Cayuga and Seneca, and Crooked lake canals. Within the space of 40 days two floods have occurred at the west, which are without precedent, and which have very seriously affected the operation of the canals. No similar interruptions have been experienced from the same cause since the canals were navigable.

It is also stated that one of the locks on the Welland canal had given way and that a schooner had sunk in the ruins.

Overflow of the Juniata.—The Bellefont Patriot of the 4th inst. says, "We have received no papers from the east for several days, on account of the swollen condition of the Juniata river. The extraordinary wet weather which we have had for the last fortnight, has caused it to overflow its banks, and we learn that in the long narrows below Lewistown, it covers the canal and turnpike—one vast waste of rapid and turbulent waters—leaving no means for either boat, stage, or even pack-horse, to bring the mail. The damage to the public works will be immense."

A New York paper says that there are in that city about three hundred young lawyers who do not earn $300 per annum. Few mechanics, it is presumed, make less than double that amount, and yet it is not as fashionable to be a mechanic as it is to be a lawyer.

By a late census of the city of Louisville, Ky. it appears that that place now contains 23,000 inhabitants—increased within the last year 4,000.

A slight shock of an earthquake was felt at Kingston, Jamaica, on the 7th May. A similar shock, it may be recollected, was experienced at Knoxville, Tenn. on the same day.

On the 18th ult. fifty houses were destroyed by fire in the lower municipality of New Orleans. The council appropriated $10,000 for the relief of the sufferers.

An individual has sent commodore Downs, commanding the navy yard, at Charlestown, Massachusetts, the sum of twelve dollars, as restitution for injuries or injustice supposed to be done some time ago to the United States, in the navy yard in Charlestown. The money has been deposited to the credit of the treasurer of the United States.

By the ship Hindoo, which arrived in Boston last week, from Liverpool, were received 2,309 packages and 150 half packages of lard, and by the Montpelier, arrived at the same place from London, 2,920 sacks of oats.

Certain lots in East Boston were recently sold at auction to the amount of $218,145 81. Some of the lots were sold at from 10 to 50 cents per foot—and others at prices ranging from 25 to 45 cents.

The New York Gazette states that there is a great rage for speculation in real estate at Oswego, arising, no doubt, says the Gazette, from the projected construction of a ship canal between that place and Utica. Among other recent sales there, we learn from good authority, that the vice president has within a few weeks past, disposed of one-half of his property there for the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, the purchaser being the attorney general of the United States. We have also understood that eleven acres, (principally wharf lots) were recently disposed of, to a company, for one million of dollars.

Consumption. Dr. Draper, who is delivering a course of lectures before the Franklin institute of Philadelphia on the subject of coughs, consumption, &c. recently stated that from the year 1807, until the year 1835, inclusive, there had been in the city and liberties of Philadelphia, thirteen thousand seven hundred and thirty-two deaths from consumption!!!

THE CREEK WAR.

The following late and official intelligence from the seat of the Creek Indian war is extracted from a letter from major general Scott addressed to the adjutant general at Washington. It will be seen that the dispositions for the defence of Georgia and Alabama against the outrages of the Indians, and for carrying the war into the nation, are being made as rapidly as circumstances will permit. The prevention of the escape of the Indians towards Florida is especially aimed at. Major general Jesup was about to pass through the hostile ground to the Alabama side of the field of contest.

Extract from a letter of gen. Winfield Scott, to the adjutant general, dated Head quarters, army of the south, Columbus, Geo. June 3, 1836.

I have the honor to report for the information of the secretary and general-in-chief, that I arrived here three days ago, in company with his excellency governor Schley and major gen. Jesup.

No event of importance has occurred in or about the Creek country, for a week or two. A small party of the enemy crossed into Georgia the day before I arrived, murdered a few individuals, and burnt some houses.

Until the troops are mustered into the service of the United States, they are not under my command. This ceremony commenced yesterday, and will proceed as rapidly as possible. In the meantime, the governor, whose own military views are excellent, and who has the best possible disposition towards the general government and its officers, makes me the compliment to consult me on all points of importance. He has already taken measures to guard the frontier of Georgia, above and below this place, against incursions, and particularly to prevent parties of the enemy from escaping across the river, in the direction of Florida. Additional measures shall be immediately adopted to effect this great object; first, by the employment of a steamer, hourly expected, with a company on board, and by pushing some companies of mounted men, to points fifty and sixty miles below. It is not thought here, that there is any danger of the Indians attempting to cross the river lower down.

The strength of the enemy is variously estimated by well informed persons, from 2,500 to 5,000. Capt. Page thinks that there are at least 3,000 hostile warriors.

I suppose there may have arrived on this frontier about 1,500 Georgians, mostly, I think, volunteers. As they are distributed over a line of more than forty miles on the river, the governor has not been able, as yet, to obtain returns of the detachments. He expects as many more, and companies almost daily arrive, but it is not expected that all will be up before the 12th, perhaps the 15th instant.

The governor of Alabama will probably have in the field about an equal number of men. By his letter of the 23th ult. a copy of which is enclosed, it will be seen, that he thinks he will be ready to march upon the enemy the 5th inst. I doubt, however, whether he has been able to secure subsistence for his men, in advance, for eight or even five days. On this side, there are no magazines. The troops have not suffered, but the supplies have been rather precarious. This state of things must continue at least eight days longer, when the one hundred thousand rations, and other indispensable stores shipped from Picolata, St. Augustine, Savannah and Charleston, may begin to arrive from Macon and Hawkinsville, on the Oak Mulgee, by wagons. The supplies ordered from New Orleans cannot be expected before 18th or 20th inst. Late, long, and heavy rains in this quarter, have greatly injured the roads, but improved the navigation of the rivers.

I enclose copies of my two letters to governor Clay, and a copy of my instructions to major general Jesup, who will probably set out to-morrow for Montgomery. He will require a good escort to Tuskegee, forty miles. Beyond that point, the communication is understood to be perfectly free.

The following accounts from the scene of troubles in the Creek Indian country are copied from the Columbus (Geo.) Herald, of the 7th instant. In the same paper, the number of the hostile Creek Indians capable of bearing arms is put down at about six thousand.

Troops continue to pour in from different counties, many of which are well mounted and armed, and all will be fully equipped in a day or two, and ready for service, when they will be immediately detailed, and put to the all important work of subduing the hostile Creeks. The chivalry and prowess of the Georgia troops was perhaps on no occasion better displayed than on the present—and the alacrity with which volunteers from distant counties have repaired to the scene of danger, speaks volumes of praise for the spirited and patriotic sons of Georgia, and gives hearty assurance of their readiness at all times to battle for their beloved country and her rights.

Gen. Sanford with promptitude, equal to the emergency, immediately on organizing his staff removed his head-quarters to Fort Ingersoll, a fortress which has been thrown up since the present excitement, and is planted upon Alabama soil. To "cross the river" and "pitch tent," under all the circumstances of the times—were, agreeable to our notions, good moves, and precisely corresponded with our preconceived opinions of gen. Sanford's character as an officer. Nothing delays him from a march to the enemy's strong hold, but the want of more provisions.

On Wednesday last the troops, as many as had then arrived, were collected at Fort Ingersoll, and regularly mustered into the service of the United States. Gov. Schley was present on the occasion, and addressed the troops. In the course of his remarks, he took occasion to advert to the many objections (which had been made by volunteers to being mustered into the regular service) set forth in a clear view the reasons why this muster should take place, the necessity for it, and the utter confusion that would prevail in attempting to conduct an army upon any other principle. He exhorted them to fidelity to their country, and portrayed in accurate and eloquent language, the high and honorable character of the soldier.

On Saturday morning maj. gen. Jesup took his departure for Tuskegee, a town located in the nation, midway from Columbus to Montgomery—he was escorted by the Bibb and Talbot Cavalry and a number of volunteer citizens, in all amounting to about 200 men. Gen. J. will take command of the Alabama forces.

A battalion of cavalry, 220 strong, under the command of major Howard, left on Saturday morning for the vicinity of Mr. Boykin's plantation about 20 miles below this place, where it was understood that a large party of Indians were endeavoring to cross the river, supposed to be on their way to Florida. We presume this to have been Jim Henry's band, and we invoke all the good fortunes of war upon the head of Howard, that he may fall upon the path of Henry, and literally "use him up." We await news from this detachment with a great deal of interest.

The entire force now on the Chattahoochee is not less than 2,000 effective men.

The steamboat Metamora on her passage from Apalachicola was fired on by the Indians about 8 miles above Roanoke; The Metamora was pressed at Irwinton by capt. Wood, who had under his command two volunteer companies from Randolph county, Ga. and the "volunteer guards," commanded by capt. Booth, from Pike county, Alabama, in all about 130 men. Their object was to run up to Columbus in the steamboat, with a view to pick up a fight with the Indians if possible; and as they desired, so they had it. About 20 hostiles appeared on the west bank of the river, and pulled trigger on the boat: three individuals were wounded among the whites—Messrs. Owens, Smith and Butler; Mr. Owens dangerously; capt. Booth was smoothly shaved by an Indian bullet, it passing over, the surface of his chin, and leaving not a whit of beard behind. In this "sharp shooting," there were from 10 to 15 Indians killed.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Bank of the United States, May 31st, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have submitted to the board of directors the memorial signed by yourselves, and other citizens of New York, in which it is stated that "circumstances unconnected with the business operations of the country but which it is unnecessary to detail, have produced a scarcity of money embarrassing to trade and highly injurious to the interests of the commercial community at large"—that "it is believed by many to be in the power of the bank of the United States to restore the money market to a more sound and healthy state"—and requesting the bank to resume its purchases of domestic exchange, which, if carried to the amount of two millions of dollars, "would give all the relief which the commercial community requires."

It gives me great satisfaction to inform you that the board of directors have cheerfully acceded to your wishes. Instructions have accordingly been this day given to purchase in N. York bills of exchange on the points most connected with the commerce of your city, which will be multiplied as soon as the necessary arrangements can be completed.

The bank of the United States, as you are aware, is no longer responsible for the state of the currency and the exchanges. But the board of directors are not the less anxious to protect the country from any embarrassment which may threaten it. They therefore willingly adopt the suggestion of so respectable a body of their fellow citizens as to the best mode in which they can be useful and shall deem themselves fortunate if they can thus contribute to relieve the existing pressure on your community.

You will have the goodness to communicate this result to the gentlemen interested in it, and believe me with great respect, yours,

N. BIDDLE, president,
Messrs. Shepherd Knapp, P. & J. S. Cray, Grinnell, Minturn, & Co. Suptam, Jackson, & Co. New York.

Having requested a friend to furnish for the columns of this paper, a copy of the foregoing letter—to which the reader may recollect, we made a special reference the other day—and having succeeded in the application, we have at once laid it before the public. We also learn from the Boston papers, that the merchants of that city have likewise applied to the bank of the United States to establish an agency there, and that an answer complying with their request has been returned by Mr. Biddle. We likewise farther learn, that within the last two weeks the agent of the bank of the United States in this city has purchased for cash domestic exchange to the amount of one million two hundred and ten thousand dollars, and foreign exchange to the amount of six hundred and sixty thousand dollars, and that during the same period he has sold foreign exchange for promissory notes to the amount of one million four hundred thousand dollars. The wishes of our merchants have thus far been liberally and promptly met, and at a moment, too, and in a manner, which cannot fail to make the relief extended, sensibly felt. The bank is certainly in the enjoyment of a proud triumph on this occasion.

THE INDIAN DEPUTATIONS.

Washington, May 26th.

There arrived in the city a day or two ago, under the conduct of Mr. McKnight, of Michigan, a deputation of the Chippewa tribe of Indians, who have come to the seat of government for the purpose of treating for the cession of all their remaining lands within the limits of Michigan. Since their arrival, they have had an interview with the two deputations of Cherokees, who have been here for some time on the subject of their treaty of cession, when Macoonse, the head chief of the Chippewas, made a speech to the Cherokees, of which the following is a copy, as dictated by himself:

To the gentlemen composing the two delegations from the Cherokee nation;

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: It has been ordered by the Great Spirit for us to meet, and we have been permitted to extend to each other the hand of friendship. I can truly say I am very happy that I have been one of the number who have held a friendly intercourse with you, while many of my people have been denied the pleasure.

My friendship for you is so great that I cannot refrain from saying that I hope you will all look above for happiness; and while you have a place on earth, may you never neglect doing every thing in your power which is calculated to benefit the rising generation; I, for one, am determined to leave nothing undone which may conduce to the welfare of my people, and I would hope that I am not alone in this resolution in the Chippewa nation.

I have visited our father, the president of the United States; I have given him my hand, and I have told him that I and my people would always consider him our friend. I hope you, too, have done the same, and will ever regard him as your friend.

My friends, I hear there is a war among the Creeks, your neighbors; perhaps when you reach your homes, there will be those who will give you bad advice. Open not your ears to their talk! Why should you bring destruction to yourselves and to your children? I consider you men, and I need not say any more on this subject; but I must tell you that if I shall hear, after I have returned to my people, that you have not listened to good advice, but have attended to the talk of those who would bring ruin to your nation, I shall think the Cherokees are not men, but they are like children; they know not what is good for them.

Allow me to add, I am of the opinion that the best thing we could do for the good of our children is to turn our attention to the cultivation of our lands.

I shall not say more.

I am your friend and the friend of your nation.

MACOONSE, or ES TON-QUET.

Washington city, May 23, 1836.

Copy of a letter from the Cherokee delegation to the Chippewa chief:

Washington, 23th May, 1836.

Macoonse, one of the Chippewa nation:

DEAR FRIEND: We have received your letter of yesterday, which has been read and explained to the delegation. Your talk is good, and we reciprocate your friendship, and feel gratified that, by the Providence of God, we who live so far apart, are enabled to form so interesting an acquaintance with each other.

We agree with you that it would be folly to wage a war with the United States, in a fit of desperation, to revenge the injuries inflicted by the whites, which can never be avenged but with the entire destruction of the Indian race. But the war which is now raging in the Creek and Seminole nations of Indians arises not from the foolishness of the young men, but from the accumulation of injuries heaped upon them by the whites, and from the want of correct policy in the chiefs, in not leading their people out of the white population. Treaties which consign the Indians to live among the whites without the enjoyment of their own laws, and without a boundary to keep the white people at a distance, must, as a necessary consequence, produce irritations and conflicts. When the Indians starve, they will lay their hands upon the white man's provisions, who will resent it, kill the Indians, and the Indians will retaliate, and hence arises the war which will destroy the Indian tribe which raises the hatchet.

The condition of our people is now wretched to the last degree. Language would fail us to express their sufferings. They have no government, they have no laws, they have no country; they are compelled to live under the laws of the whites, but with no rights under those laws. For four years past we have advocated a removal to the west as the only alternative to preserve our people from extinction. Some of the chiefs of our nation viewed the matter otherwise, and encouraged the mass of the tribe to die on the land of their forefathers and bury their bones with them. If we had listened to this talk, would we have been faithful to the welfare of our race? Could they be preserved in this abject condition? No! You might as well throw your seed-corn to the hungry hogs for your summer's crop, as to expect that the Indians can prosper in the midst of a white population, under such circumstances. If you wish to increase your stock of sheep, would you drive them where the wolves range, unprotected? Would you turn a flock of doves to the hungry hawks for safety? No, you would not.

It is a great mistake for an Indian nation to expect to prosper under the laws of the states. They may, if permitted to cultivate their lands, finger away a miserable existence, but they would eventually melt away as the snow melts before the sun. Have we not experience enough to convince us of this awful truth? Look at this great country, where hundreds of council fires blazed in brightness! There is no green spot where the Indian can say "Here is the home of the free and brave of my people." If any Indians are permitted to live among the whites, you will find them in a state of pupilage—as children under the laws of the states. They live without hope—without the rich heritage of freemen. And thus it is that they try to stimulate their drooping spirits with intoxicating drinks, which only plunge them deeper into the mire of their wretchedness.

These considerations have impelled us to treat for a removal to the country out of the limits of the states and territories, where we intend to cultivate our lands, enjoy our own laws and educate our children. It is our purpose to cultivate peaceable relations with the United States, and induce, by the civilization of our people, the prejudiced whites to respect our race. In that region the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, Seminoles, Cherokees, Shawnees, Quapaw, Senecas and Osages reside. We will smoke the pipe of peace together, and with the remote tribes of the west towards the Rocky Mountains cultivate friendship and peace. We know that the God of the white man is the God of the Indian, and, if they are true to themselves, that he will bless them. May he prosper our undertaking, heal our afflictions, and render us happy and a great people.

Do you not feel that we have spoken the truth? Does not the heart of the chief of the Chippewa kindle in holy aspirations? Oh, may you accept our talk, and gather together your people and form them a great nation by our side. It is the only way which is practicable. You cannot prosper among the whites.

Our brother, you must not think hard of what we have said to you. We have spoken the feelings of our hearts. Now we shake hands with you and wish you and your chiefs a safe return to your nation. We are your friends and brothers.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 10. After the usual morning business, the senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, proceeded to consider the bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States. Mr. B. then made some observations on the necessity of increasing the army in consequence of the attitude and disposition of the Indians on our south western frontier and in other parts of the country. After Mr. B. had concluded, Mr. Nicholas moved to recommit the bill with instructions to report an organization precisely similar to that which was adopted for the peace establishment in 1815.

After a few words from Mr. Benton in opposition to the motion, Mr. Preston took a view of the altered condition of the country within a few years. In consequence of the progress made in the manufacture of arms, and in the knowledge of their use, we have become an armed population. The extraordinary concentration of Indian forces on our frontier has, indeed, rendered it necessary that the government of the United States should adopt a system of preparation corresponding with this aspect of things. But our Indian frontier is not now as exposed and as difficult of defence as it was fifty years ago. The increase of population, of a population abounding in arms and provisions, and having all the facilities which can be obtained from the application of steam to our roads and rivers, and also the additions made to our military strength, have placed all our western frontier in a state of comparative security. He went on to speak of the degeneracy of the Indian character, and the numerical diminution of the tribes; but at the same time admitted that the provident care of the government ought to be exhibited in extending to the frontier a proper degree of protection. He inferred, from a general survey of the facts, that an increase of the army is necessary; and the only difficulty was as to the extent of such increase. At present, we have thirteen regiments in service, amounting to about 6,000 men. There are 40 or 50 in each company. The present bill increases the number of the company to between 80 and 90. It was his opinion that the companies ought to be so increased as to make an aggregate of about 9,000. The object had been to increase the efficiency of the army, without disturbing its organization.

There had been found to be a great deficiency in the staff, which was totally inadequate to the performance of the duties required of it. Much had been done to make the staff more efficient, and more was in progress. The staff of the inspectors and the quartermaster's departments demand an increase. He was willing that there should be a general recommitment of the bill, so as to obtain the sense of the senate as to an increase of the army.

Mr. Calhoun called for a division of the question so as to take the question first on the recommitment and afterwards on the instructions. He was in favor of an increase of the army but opposed to a new organization; and thought there was nothing in the character of our foreign relations to shake the belief that it would depend on our own prudence to remain at peace with all nations. It was only in relation to our Indian relations that any additional force was required, and he was willing to place the country in a state of defence—but not a man more than was necessary for that purpose.

Mr. Porter coincided in opinion with Mr. Calhoun, that there was just grounds for an increase of the army. The ability of the country to bear the expense of a standing army was undoubted, and he dreaded no danger from such an army to our liberties whilst it was kept to a minimum of thrice the amount of men now asked for. He admitted that the Indian tribes were incompetent to carry on a prolonged warfare against the United States, but we ought to be prepared to meet those outbreaks which cause so much destruction before they are met and repelled. This much is due to the people exposed to their outrages—for the Indians now to be removed, burning with indignation and a sense of wrong, will go to their new homes fired with a desire for vengeance—and it only needed a man of commanding genius to bring the entire race along our frontier, in the field against the United States—the power and energies of the Camanches alone are sufficient to send them as formidable enemy, &c. He was therefore in favor of the commitment with instructions.

Mr. Preston repeated what he had before stated as to the extent of the Indian frontier, and went more minutely into detail, in order to show that he had under-estimated the extent rather than gone beyond it. It was necessary to give a fair defence to that frontier, not by drawing a line of river fortresses, but by giving a sufficient force. Two regiments of dragoons have been given to the gentlemen from the west. Do they want another regiment, let them take it. It was useless to carry on a war in the swamps, where the army might as well be sent to hunt a deer or a racoon as an Indian. But, in the western prairies, it is different. The Camanches are mounted Tartars, and strike from a distance, and they must be encountered by dragoons. He would not oppose any measure to give the utmost defence to the frontier settlements; but it was not in the power of government to give them full and perfect defence. He touched on the situation of our south western frontier, and expressed a hope that the day was not distant when, instead of calling Fort Towson our south west post, we should have our forts on the Rio del Norte.

Mr. Porter said a few words in explanation of his former remarks.

Mr. Benton protested against the recommitment, which must be entirely useless without the instructions, so as to put the committee in possession of the sense of the senate. The bill was then ordered to be recommitment.

The question being then on the instructions to the committee, Mr. Calhoun moved to lay the subject on the table, in order to take up the special order. He withdrew his motion, and Mr. Porter expressed his hope that the question would be taken, as the bill was already committed and it was important to take the question on the instructions.

Mr. Buchanan asked what was the strength of the army in 1815. Mr. Benton replied that the total of the army in 1815 was 12,356. Mr. Preston said that, if the senator from Louisiana would withdraw his instructions, he would move to fill up the rank and file of the companies to a specific amount, without touching the organization. Mr. Calhoun was against any instructions. Mr. Porter called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Benton made some observations on the increased extent of our boundary, and ridiculed the idea of transporting by steamboats a sufficient force to protect that frontier. He adverted to the destruction of life and property which had been already perpetrated, and stated that the west must have the defence to which it was entitled.

Mr. Linn read an extract from the report of the secretary of war, in which it was estimated that when the whole of the Indians intended to be removed shall be concentrated on the western shore of the Mississippi, they will amount to 250,000. He added a few words in favor of the concentration of a military force on the frontier to protect it against the danger to be apprehended from this larger force.

Mr. Calhoun took a view of the present force of the country, and indicated in what manner the regiments we now have might be stationed, in order to effect an efficient defence of our frontier. He was disposed to fill up the companies, so as to render the regiments more competent.

Mr. Clay thought it unnecessary to go into a general discussion of the necessity of increasing the army. No senator would hold himself committed by instructions, when the whole question of the policy of any increase shall come up for discussion. He smiled at the picture which had been drawn of our danger. One would have supposed that all at once a gallant nation of some millions had been suddenly precipitated on our frontier, instead of a few miserable Indians. He saw no necessity for any increase of the army.

The question was then taken on the instructions, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Grundy, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Porter, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—25.

The following message was received from the president of the United States:

To the senate of the United States:

The act of congress "to appoint a day for the annual meeting of congress," which originated in the senate, has not received my signature. The power of congress to fix, by law, a day for the regular annual meeting of congress is undoubted; but the concluding part of this act, which is intended to fix the adjournment of every succeeding congress to the second Monday in May, after the commencement of the first session, does not appear to me in accordance with the provisions of the constitution of the United States.

The constitution provides—

1st article, 5th section—"That neither house, during the session of congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting."

1st article, 6th section—"That every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the senate and house of representatives may be necessary, (except on the question of adjournment), shall be presented to the president of the United States, and, before the same shall take effect, shall be approved of by him," &c.

2d article, 2d section—"That he (the president) may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both houses of congress, or either of them; and, in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such times as he thinks proper," &c.

According to these provisions, the day of the adjournment of congress is not the subject of legislative enactment. Except in the event of disagreement between the senate and house of representatives, the president has no right to meddle with the question, and, in that event, his power is exclusive, but confined to fixing the adjournment of the congress whose branches have disagreed. The question of adjournment is obviously to be decided by each congress for itself, by the separate action of each house for the time being, and is one of those subjects upon which the framers of that instrument did not intend one congress should act, with or without the executive aid, for its successors. As a substitute for the present rule, which requires the two houses by consent to fix the day of adjournment, and, in the event of disagreement, the president to decide, it is proposed to fix the day by law, to be binding in all future time, unless changed by consent of both houses of congress, and to take away the contingent power of the executive, which, in anticipated cases of disagreement, is vested in him. This substitute is to apply, not to the present congress and executive, but to our successors. Considering, therefore, that this subject exclusively belongs to the two houses of congress, whose day of adjournment is to be fixed, and that each has at that time the right to maintain and insist upon its own opinion, and to require the president to decide in the event of disagreement with the other, I am constrained to deny my sanction to the act herewith respectfully returned to the senate. I do so with greater reluctance, as, apart from this constitutional difficulty, the other provisions of it do not appear to me objectionable.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, June 9, 1836.

The message was ordered to be printed, and made the order for Wednesday next.

The senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

Mr. Wright moved several amendments, which were agreed to.

Mr. Leigh moved an amendment providing that each bank shall have on the — day of —, and thenceforth to keep in its vaults specie to the amount of one-fourth of its business capital. [The object of the amendment is to impose on every bank desirous to become a deposit bank, the condition specified, that it must have within its vaults, previous to the day named, the proportion of specie, in order to qualify it to become a deposit bank.]

It is optional with the bank to accept or reject the deposits under this condition.]

Mr. Webster pointed to a state of circumstances, contingent but not improbable, when it would be found that our specie basis is not sufficiently broad; and inasmuch as this bill would have the effect of coercing banks to keep a certain amount of specie in their vaults, it would be a restraint on exportation, and beneficial to the country.

Some discussion took place between Messrs. Ewing, of Ohio, Buchanan, Grundy, Crittenden, Morris, Walker and Calhoun; and before any question was taken, the senate adjourned.

June 11. The senate, having disposed of a number of petitions, reports, &c. on motion of Mr. Ewing took up the bill to change the mode of conducting the sales of public lands, which was postponed till Wednesday next and made the special order for that day.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to consider the bill repealing the 14th section of the act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States, &c. and it was ordered to a third reading. [Passed the next day.]

On motion of Mr. Davis, the senate proceeded to consider the bill in addition to an act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen; and it was ordered to a third reading. [Passed next day.]

A number of private bills were considered as in committee of the whole and variously disposed of.

On motion of Mr. Crittenden the senate agreed to reconsider the vote by which the bill in addition to an act for the relief of sick and disabled seamen was ordered to be engrossed. This object was to exempt the navigators of flats and rafts from the tax of twenty cents per month, whom he thought ought to have the benefit of the hospital fund without such an imposition upon them. It was melancholy, he said, to see the decay in this mode of navigation. The time was when the flat boat moved in stately grandeur down the Ohio, the monarch of the stream—now, the few that were left were glad to sink out of the way of the steamboats which had usurped their sovereignty. It was a melancholy illustration of the mode in which old things give way to the new.

After some remarks from Mr. Davis, who stated that the whole proceeds furnished by the west towards the hospital fund in the last year were only $4,000, whilst there were facts to prove that the collector at Louisville had received between $5,000 and $8,000 for the fund, of which he had rendered no account whatever, and thought that all persons who participated in the benefits of the funds should contribute, in some measure, in support of it, Mr. Crittenden moved an amendment to accomplish his object, which, after some remarks from Messrs. Davis, Hendricks and Linn, was agreed to.

Mr. Linn then moved an amendment providing an appropriation for the erection of hospitals at such points in the west as may be designated by the secretary of the treasury—but he withdrew it at the suggestion of Mr. Davis, and at the same time disclaimed any intention of embarrassing the bill, which he would vote for with or without the amendment. Mr. Clay concurred in the propriety of the amendment offered by Mr. L, and thought that the western waters had a strong claim upon the liberality of the government—but as it was suggested that the desired object might be accomplished in another way he would not press the proposition.

The bill was then reported as amended, and the amendment was concurred in—and, after some further discussion, the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill supplementary to the act to establish the northern boundary of Ohio and to provide for the admission of Michigan was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Benton, (1 o'clock), the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after remaining for some time with closed doors, on reopening them, the senate adjourned.

June 13. Mr. Hubbard presented the credentials of John Page, elected a senator from New Hampshire, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Isaac Hill. The credentials were read, and Mr. Page, having appeared, was sworn and took his seat.

Mr. Clay presented a memorial from sundry citizens of Shelby county, in the state of Kentucky, praying for the recognition of the independence of Texas. This memorial was subscribed by many citizens, several of whom were personally known to him as among the most respectable in the highly respectable community to which they belonged. As a committee, of which he had the honor of being a member, was now deliberating upon the subject of the memorial, he would now not say more than to move the reference of the memorial to the committee on foreign relations; which was accordingly ordered.

Mr. Wright presented a similar petition from a number of citizens of Albany, N. Y. which was referred to the same committee.

Mr. Niles presented the joint resolution of the legislature of Connecticut recommending the recognition of Texas, and accompanied it by some remarks, in the course of which he said he would be willing to declare the independence of Texas whenever it should be ascertained that the people of Mexico should so will it—but he did not consider the capture of Santa Ana as decisive of the conflict, and though the action of the legislature of Connecticut premature, though the object was desirable. Mr. Walker, in reply, stated as his conviction, that the action of the legislature of Connecticut would form one of the brightest pages in the history of that state, and expressed an opinion that unless we promptly acknowledge the independence of Texas, England would for the purpose of obtaining commercial advantages. The petition was then referred.

After several bills had been reported and resolutions received, (among the latter one offered by Mr. Benton calling on the president to ascertain on what terms the deposit banks will agree to discontinue all paper currency in notes of less value than twenty dollars), the senate proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money. The question being on the motion of Mr. Leigh to amend by inserting a provision that the banks receiving the public deposits shall, upon a day fixed, show that they have in their vaults a specified proportion of specie.

After a few words from Mr. Leigh, the amendment was agreed to. Mr. Calhoun moved to strike out the whole of the amendment. The amendment was agreed to. The bill was further amended, on motions of Mr. Leigh, Mr. Wright and Mr. Walker.

Mr. Wright moved an amendment rendering it necessary that the banks should have in their vaults as much specie as the secretary of the treasury may think necessary to insure the safety of the public deposits therein. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Benton moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision that the surplus public deposits shall be sent to the U. States mint, for the purpose of coining or for safe keeping.

Some discussion ensued on this proposition, in which Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, Mr. Leigh and Mr. Benton took part.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the question was divided, and the yeas and nays were ordered on the first branch of the question. The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Webster—17.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the amendment, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Ewing, of Illinois, Grundy, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Robinson, Ruggles, Walker, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Shepley, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—23.

Mr. Benton moved to amend the bill in the fifth section, so as to have a preference given to such banks, in the selection of deposit banks, as will engage to issue no notes of less than $20 denomination, and be able to restore a gold circulation, and asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Grundy, King, of Geo. McKean, Morris, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Walker, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ill. Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, King, of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Shepley, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—23.

Mr. Porter moved to amend the 13th section, so as to exempt from division at the banks the sum received under the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the public lands. Mr. Calhoun moved to amend this amendment, by adding the words "provided said bill shall become a law." The yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, the question was taken on the motion of Mr. Calhoun, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Grundy, Hubbard, Morris, Naudain, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—16.

The question was then taken on Mr. Benton's amendment as amended, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Georgia, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Shepley, Walker, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—25.

Mr. Calhoun moved to fill the blank for the amount of money to be left in the treasury with "two millions."

Before any question was taken, after a few words from Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Webster, the senate adjourned.

June 14. Several bills were received from various committees, read and disposed of. About eighty individual pension bills received from the other house, were read twice and referred to the committee on pensions.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate proceeded to consider the bill to reorganize the post office department. Various amendments to the bill reported by the committee, having been agreed to, considerable time was spent in considering that section of it relating to private boxes, in post offices, when, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, the bill was laid on the table.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The question pending being on filling the blank for the amount reserved in the treasury with "two millions," to which Mr. Wright had moved an amendment to insert "after the outstanding appropriations have been satisfied;" a debate ensued in which Messrs. Wright, Webster, Walker, Ewing, Buchanan, Calhoun, Morris and Tallmadge, participated.

Mr. Wright then waived his motion, and Mr. Tallmadge moved a substitute; which was agreed to.

Mr. Calhoun moved to fill the blank for the amount to be received in the treasury, with "five millions." Mr. Webster said he should propose "three millions." The question was taken on five millions, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 18.

Mr. Wright moved a recommitment, with instructions to divide the two branches into two separate bills, so as to make the distribution of the surplus the subject of one bill, and the regulation of the deposits in the banks the subject of the other. Mr. W. stated that he was willing to vote for that relative to the regulation of the deposits, but he did not think he could vote for the distribution.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the yeas and nays were ordered on this motion, and the question being taken, it was decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—20.

Mr. Buchanan offered a resolution instructing the committee on finance to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to the senators and representative from Michigan; which lies one day on the table. Mr. White moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill to regulate the deposits had been recommitted. On motion of Mr. Webster the senate adjourned.

June 15. A message was received from the president of the United States, in reply to a call on the secretary of state for information as to the Mexican depredations committed on the property of Choteau and De Mun; which was referred to the committee on foreign relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, reported, with amendments, the bill from the house of representatives to regulate the compensation of certain officers of the revenue, (officers of revenue cutters.)

Mr. Walker, from the select committee on the subject, made a report at length on the subject of the sales of the public lands, which he read from the secretary's table, occupying nearly three-quarters of an hour, accompanied by a bill prohibiting sales of the public lands by action, &c.

The bill was read, and ordered to a second reading, and 5,000 extra copies of the report were ordered to be printed.

A message was received from the president of the United States communicating a correspondence with the British government on the subject of the north eastern boundary. The message referred it to the senate to decide as to the propriety of publishing the correspondence.

The message having been read,

Mr. Clay stated that he had not been able to look into the correspondence, and was not at present able to say whether it ought to be published or not. The president had left it to the judgment of the senate. This was not according to his usual course, as he had in this instance refused to take responsibility upon himself. It would be improper to order the printing without some examination, as it might afterwards turn out that, by the publication of something which it might be improper to lay before the world, the senate might have committed themselves. The senators from Maine and Massachusetts ought to be consulted on this matter. The proper course, as it appeared to him, would be to refer the message to the committee on foreign relations, where the documents would be accessible to those senators, and he for one would be happy to avail himself of their advice. He moved to refer the message and documents to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Shepley said that if there was anything unusual in the message, there was something also unusual in the resolution calling for this information. He did not object to the motion of reference. Mr. Clay explained that he had only said that the president had departed from his usual course of evading responsibility when he transferred to the senate the responsibility of deciding on the publication of these documents.

Mr. Webster said he was quite satisfied with the direction proposed to be given to the documents. The resolution calling for this information was offered by him, and the terms suggested the alternative of a confidential reply, if deemed necessary. The information had not been communicated confidentially, but it was left to the senate to determine whether the correspondence shall be published or not. This was all right and proper, he was bound to presume, and that there are good reasons for it. He was perfectly willing to refer the message to the committee on foreign relations, in order that, if there be any doubtful matter in reference to its publication, the doubt may be settled on the safe side.

The message was then referred to the committee on foreign relations.

Mr. Preston laid on the table a resolution calling on the president for information touching the political condition of Texas, the organization of a government in that country, &c. and any correspondence which may have taken place between the government of the United States and the government of Texas, or any of the commissioners of that government.

Mr. Webster offered a resolution calling on the secretary of the treasury, early next session, to inform the senate as to the most suitable places and plans, where and how hospitals for sick and disabled seamen may be erected—which, after some explanatory remarks, was agreed to.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Buchanan, instructing the committee on finance to inquire into the expediency of paying the senators and representative from Michigan, was taken up for consideration. Mr. Buchanan stated that this resolution was adopted in conformity with the practice established on the admission of Missouri. The resolution was agreed to. On motion of Mr. Webster, the joint resolution fixing the day for the adjournment of the two houses for the 4th of July next, was taken up, considered, and concurred in.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. White to reconsider the vote by which the bill had been recommitted with instructions to report separate bills, a discussion ensued between Mr. White, Mr. Wright, (who asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered), Mr. Webster, Mr. Benton, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Black and Mr. Morris, when the question was taken on the motion to reconsider, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 23—nays 21.

Mr. Wright then moved to amend the instructions: when, on motion of Mr. Webster, the further consideration of the bill was postponed and it was made the order of the day for tomorrow.

On motion of Mr. Ewing, the senate took up, for consideration, the bill to change the mode of conducting the sales of public lands, which was discussed and then laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Wright the senate proceeded to consider the act authorising the secretary of the treasury to act as agent of the United States in all matters relating to the stock of the bank of the United States, which was ordered to be engrossed. Some time was spent in considering the bill to promote the useful arts, when it was laid on the table; and on motion of Mr. Hubbard, the senate went into the consideration of executive business, and after remaining a short time with closed doors, adjourned.

June 16. The chair laid before the senate a communication from the department of war, enclosing reports of the commissioner of Indian affairs, the commissary general, and the second auditor, concerning the enrolment, organization, and emigration of the Cherokee Indians; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster, from the committee on finance, to whom was referred a resolution to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to the senators and representative from Michigan, and also a report made by the secretary of the senate, reported a bill in addition to the act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the United States for the year 1836; which was read twice, considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. Wright asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to pay in advance the amount of the indemnity under the French and Neapolitan treaties; which was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

After a number of private bills had been reported and disposed of, and some time spent in considering the report of the committee on pensions adverse to the claim of Humphrey Marshall, which was laid on the table, the senate, on motion of Mr. King, of Alabama, took up the bill authorising the governor and legislative council of Florida to sell the lands heretofore reserved for a seminary of learning—which was amended so as to limit the extent of the sales to one-half of the land, and then ordered to a third reading.

The senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the house of representatives to the bill supplementary to the bill to provide for the admission of Arkansas into the union, and concurred therein.

The senate also concurred in the amendment of the house to the bill supplementary to the bill to establish the northern boundary line of Ohio.

On the amendment of the house to the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws in the state of Michigan, a motion was made by Mr. Buchanan to disagree with the amendment. Some discussion being about to ensue, the bill, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, was laid on the table.

An act authorising the secretary of the treasury to act as agent of the United States in all matters relating to their stock in the bank of the United States, was read a third time, and passed.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Wright to recommend the bill, all the amendments, and the substitutes reported by the committee on finance, to the committee on finance, with instructions to report two bills, &c. Mr. Calhoun objected to the latter part of this motion as out of order, and referred to the annual to sustain his objection. The chair (Mr. King, of Alabama) taking a different view of the question, the objection was not pressed.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Wright, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Morris, Naudain, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—25.

Mr. Walker moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision that the distribution of the surplus revenue shall be made in the ratio of the representative federal apportionment, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

After a few words from Messrs. Webster, Calhoun, Walker and Benton, the question was taken on the motion of Mr. Walker, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—22.

Mr. Wall moved so to amend the bill as to provide that there shall be one deposit bank in each state; which was agreed to.

Mr. Wright moved to amend the bill by striking out the 13th section, and inserting the 13th and 14th sections of the substitute which he had originally offered, which provided for the purchase of stocks. On this motion he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was taken and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cuthbert, Rives, Tallmadge, Wright—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Knight, Linn, McKean, Mangum, Moore, Naudain, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White—39.

Mr. Hendricks moved an amendment which was negatived.

Mr. Clay moved to strike out the exemption of the amount of one-fourth of the capital of the deposit banks from paying interest on the public deposits, and to raise the interest on all the public deposits in the banks from two to four per cent.

Mr. Clay, after some debate, withdrew his proposition. Mr. Benton moved an amendment to substitute "loaned to" the states, instead of "deposited with." His object was to have things expressed by their right names. His proposition was negatived—yeas 5. Mr. Walker moved an amendment in reference to the bank of Mississippi, which was lost—yeas 15, nays 26. Mr. Wall moved a proposition that the amount of deposits in each state should be as nearly as practicable in proportion to the ratio of federal representation, but the motion was not sustained. The bill was then reported as amended.

Mr. Webster moved to strike out the amendment adopted in committee, on motion of Mr. Walker, and to insert the provision which was stricken out.

The question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, McKean, Mangum, Morris, Naudain, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Webster, Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Linn, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White—23.

So the motion was lost, there being a tie.

Mr. Tipton moved to amend the bill by striking out the 11th section, which provides for interest on the deposits, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. The motion was decided in the negative—yeas 7, nays 39.

Mr. Walker renewed his motion made in committee, to exempt from interest the deposits in the bank of Mississippi. He stated that the constitution of the state would not permit her to take the deposits on interest. The motion was negatived—yeas 21, nays 24. Mr. Black moved to strike out the 13th and 14th sections of the bill, relating to deposits in the state treasury; which was negatived—yeas 7, nays 39.

The amendments of the committee were then all concurred in.

The question on the engrossment of the bill was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Grundy, Walker, Wright—6.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed. The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, June 9. (In conclusion.) After Mr. Finton, who was speaking at the date of our last abstract, had concluded, the debate was continued by Messrs. Hamer, Storer, Hamegan, Wise, Huntsman and McKeon. The question was then taken on Mr. Finton's amendment, (see page 255), and rejected. Several other amendments offered by Messrs. Love and Robertson were also rejected.

Mr. Adams said that he wanted to offer an amendment, which he had not had time to prepare; and he wished a further opportunity. His desire was to admit the state of Michigan by a bill for that purpose alone, separate from all questions of boundary. He believed the people of Michigan had a right to admission, but he wanted the question of disputed boundary to be left for future adjustment. Mr. Thomas suggested that it would be better to let the bill be reported, and offer it in the house. Mr. Adams said he would if the screws would not be applied. Mr. Thomas said he could make no pledges for the house; but if he could make no difference to the question. Mr. Adams said it would make a difference, for in committee he could argue the propriety of the amendment, without being cut off by the previous question. He moved that the committee rise. Mr. Russell moved to amend the bill, so as to provide that none but free white male citizens should be voters; which was lost. The bill was then laid aside, and the bill for the admission of Arkansas was taken up.

It being now past midnight, it was moved that the committee rise—year 17, nays 92—not a quorum.

Mr. Sevier requested Mr. Phillips to withdraw his motion. Mr. Phillips said that if, with a knowledge of the fact that a quorum was not present, he could be persuaded to withdraw his motion, or to refrain from insisting that the chairman rise and report the fact to the house, according to its rules, for the purpose of acting upon a bill to ADMIT A STATE INTO THE UNION, he should feel himself unworthy of the place he held.

The committee then rose, and reported the fact that they were without a quorum.

Mr. Reed moved an adjournment, on which question the yeas and nays were ordered on motion of Mr. Sevier. At the request of Mr. Adams, the hour (near 1 o'clock, A. M.) was noted on the journal. The question was then taken on the motion, which was rejected—yeas 24, nays 98.

There being a quorum, the house again went into committee upon the bill for the admission of Arkansas.

Mr. L. Williams moved to amend the bill, so as to reduce the judge's salary for that district to fifteen hundred dollars. A motion was again made that the committee rise, and the vote was, yeas 15, nays 95—not a quorum; and the members having been counted, 112 were reported present. Mr. Sevier said he did not wish to press the bill at that late hour of the night. When the committee had risen, he said, he should be satisfied if the house would make the bill the special order for to-morrow (yesterday) at 10 o'clock. Loud cries of no, no. The committee rose, and reported that they were without a quorum. A motion was made to adjourn, which was lost.

A call of the house was ordered, at near half past one o'clock, and was proceeded in, till, at about half past four, 112 members having answered, and several absentees having been sent for, and brought up in custody of the sergeant-at-arms, a motion to excuse all the absentees prevailed, and the doors were opened.

The house again went into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the Arkansas bill. Mr. Adams moved to insert a similar provision in the bill, to that included in the acts of several of the new states, respecting the emancipation of slaves. Mr. Adams also moved to amend the bill by introducing a clause "that nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by congress to the article in the constitution of the said state in relation to slavery and the emancipation of slaves."

This motion was debated at some extent by Messrs. Adams, Cushing, Hard and Briggs in favor of it, and Mr. Wise; and was negatived, at about four o'clock in the morning, by a vote of 98 to 32. Mr. Adams moved that the committee rise. Lost —44 to 93. Amendments moved by Mr. Adams and Mr. Harlan, (the latter of which went to reduce the salaries of the judges from $2,000 to $1,500), were rejected.

The Arkansas bill was then laid aside, and the committee took up the "bill supplementary to the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the union, and for other purposes." Mr. Mason, of Virginia, moved that the committee rise, and report the two Michigan and Arkansas bills to the house. After some confusion, which arose from a question whether the Michigan bill was still open to amendment, Mr. Mason withdrew his motion, and Mr. Underwood moved an amendment prescribing certain other conditions on which Michigan should be admitted. Lost. Mr. Mason, of Virginia, renewed the motion that the committee rise, and report the bills to the house. [This was about 7 o'clock.]

Mr. Slade moved to amend the bill by inserting therein the following:

"After the words in the first section, 'that the state of Arkansas shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the union on an equal footing with the original states in all respects; add, '(whenever the people of said state shall, by a convention, duly elected, expunge from its present constitution so much thereof as prohibits the general assembly from passing laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners; and shall also provide in and by said constitution that no negro or mulatto, born in, or brought into said state after its admission in the union, shall be held or transferred as property, or in any way subjected to slavery or involuntary servitude, unless in punishment for crimes committed against the laws of said state, whereof the party accused shall be duly convicted.'"

Mr. Cave Johnson made a question of order. The Arkansas bill having been laid aside, it was not open to amendment. After some conversation and considerable confusion, Mr. E. Whittlesey appealed to the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw the amendment, one of the same tenor having been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), and rejected. Mr. Slade declined and addressed the house in support of the motion. Mr. Jenifer rose to reply, and proceeded to make some general remarks on the subject of the abolition movements, when he was called to order by Mr. Byrum and others, on the ground that his remarks were irrelevant. After some words between Messrs. Jenifer and Byrum, the motion of Mr. Slade was rejected.

Mr. Wise then rose and addressed the house, at length, in opposition to the course of the majority, in pressing this question upon a house, sleepy, tired and drunk. He was opposed to the motion that the committee report the bills, and said he would speak till 10 o'clock, when the house would be under the necessity of dropping the subject, as it was not a special order for Friday. Mr. Wise several times gave way to motions that the committee rise, which were lost, without a count. At half past nine, Mr. Wise having yielded the floor, Mr. McKennan suggested that, as the members were much exhausted, the committee should rise with the understanding that the house should then adjourn till to-morrow, when the gentleman from Virginia would resume his remarks. Mr. Wise said that it was true that he was in an unfit condition to continue his remarks; but it was near ten o'clock, and he had it in his power to have his will over this subject, and, so help him God, he would persevere, if he died by it. Mr. Wise proceeded in his remarks till ten o'clock. Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, then rose, Mr. Wise having temporarily yielded the floor, and called upon the chair to decide whether the committee could continue to sit, it now being ten o'clock, the hour assigned by the rules for the house to meet, and the speaker to take the chair. Mr. Wise said he would ask the sergeant-at-arms, where now is the SPEAKER of the house? "In his room," was answered by some one.

Mr. Denny called for the reading of the rules of the house respecting the daily adjournment and meeting of the house. Mr. Whittlesey suggested to the chair, whether, in the case of bills made the order of the day for a particular portion of the day, it had not been the uniform practice, when the limited time expired, for the chairman of the committee to leave the chair, to allow the house to proceed on its other business. Mr. Wise called for the reading of the resolution by which the bills now before the committee were made the special order of the day.

The resolution was read, "making the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and the bills for the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the union, the special order of the day for Wednesday next, and each day thereafter, Fridays and Saturdays excepted, until the same be disposed of." Mr. McKennan called for the reading of a resolution, passed some weeks ago, (and it was read), providing that, after a certain day, the daily sittings of the house shall commence at ten o'clock in the morning. Mr. Whittlesey called for the reading of one of the standing rules of the house, and it was read as follows:

"Touching the duties of the speaker. He shall take the chair every day precisely at the hour to which the house shall have adjourned on the preceding day; shall immediately call the members to order; and, on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the journal of the preceding day to be read.

Mr. Love said he would, with permission of the chair, ask the question, whether, if the committee refused to rise, and sat on until to-morrow, the members of this house would be considered as entitled to pay for two days' or for one day's service? Mr. McKennan asked of the chair, as a question of order, whether it was not the duty of the speaker to take the chair every day, on the arrival of the hour of 10 o'clock? The chairman said that he should not undertake, in his present place, (of chairman of the committee of the whole) to decide any question in reference to the duty of the speaker of the house. Mr. McKennan then moved that the committee rise, for the purpose of deciding in the house that question. Mr. Pickens called for the reading of the 105th and 106th rules of the house; and they were read as follows:

"The rules of proceedings in the house shall be observed in a committee of the whole house, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the time of speaking; but no member shall speak twice to any question, until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

"No standing rule or order of the house shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor. Nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present. Nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules of the house, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present."

Mr. Bell said he did not know, nor was it material to what he rose to say, what object could be accomplished by prolonging the present sitting; but it was in his opinion, the duty of the committee to rise, in order to decide the question of order now raised. A majority of the committee might indeed oblige the committee to continue in session; but they would do it in defiance of the express rules of the house. There was no alternative in the present case, under the rules, but for the committee to rise. It would be in the power of the majority, when in the house, to direct the continuation of the discussion; to which, for his part, (Mr. B. said), he should not object. But he begged of gentlemen to respect not the parliamentary law, but the positive written rules of the house.

Mr. Glascock said that there had in the present case been no adjournment from yesterday's sitting; and that the practice of courts of justice in similar cases would be a proper rule for this house, viz: that the day's sitting should be considered to extend to the time of adjournment. The principle contended for by gentlemen could not apply in the present case, because there had been no adjournment. Mr. Mason, of Virginia, suggested, as a mode of freeing the house from its present embarrassment, that the committee should now rise, and let these bills be made the special order for to-day; so that they would come up again as a matter of course, on the house resuming its sitting after an adjournment.

The question was taken on the motion which had been made for the committee to rise, and determined in the negative.

Mr. Wise then resumed the thread of his remarks on the bill, and concluded at a little after eleven o'clock. When Mr. McKennan obtained the floor. The members of the house were, he said, evidently all worn out by this protracted sitting; many had not slept, and others had not broken their fast. All had need of repose. We have, (said he), fought the bill manfully, and done our best to stave off the decision upon it. My friend from Virginia, (especially) has fought it hard and long, and has, in fact, verified the old adage, a lean dog, for a long chase. I hope, sir, the committee will rise, and report the bills, and that we shall adjourn over till to-morrow. Mr. McK. made a motion to this effect.

The motion was carried. The committee rose and reported the two bills, and the house then adjourned over to meet on Saturday, at the usual hour (10 o'clock.)

[We are requested to state that Mr. Peyton, who was not in his seat during the call of the house, last night, was detained therefrom, as he has been for most of the time for two or three weeks, by indisposition. Nat. Int.]

Saturday, June 11. During the reading of the journal, some disturbance was made by two individuals within the precincts of the house. Cries of "order!" "order!" were heard from every quarter, and the speaker commanded the sergeant-at-arms to preserve order. On motion of a member, the party, who appeared to be the assailant, was taken into custody, and after some explanations from Messrs. Granger, Connor and others, the other party was also ordered to be arrested. The clerk proceeded to read the journal, when Mr. Adams moved to amend it by correcting its statement as to the excuse made by Mr. Haves, at the last setting for his temporary absence from the house. This motion gave rise to some discussion; during which the previous question was called and taken and Mr. Adams' motion lost—yeas 32—nays 133. An amendment was then made by general consent, on motion of Mr. Mercer. The reading of the journal having been concluded,

Mr. Judson offered the following resolution on the subject: "Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to consist of five members, whose duty it shall be forthwith to inquire into an assault committed within the hall of the house of representatives this morning, while the house was in session, for and on account of which two persons are now in custody of the sergeant-at-arms, and said committee are to make their report to this house, and be authorised to administer oaths, and cause the attendance of witnesses."

Some discussion took place on this proposition, in which Messrs. Adams, Bell, Mann, of N. Y. Vanderpoel, Miller, C. Allan, Craig and Bouldin took part.

In the course of the discussion, Mr. Bell, moved the following resolution as a substitute for that under consideration:

Resolved, That the two reporters, Henry G. Wheeler and Robert Codd, who are now in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, upon a charge of disorderly conduct, in the presence of the house, be delivered over to the civil authorities, to be dealt with according to law.

Resolved, That, in adopting the preceding resolution, the house are not influenced by an opinion of any deficiency of authority in the house to punish for disorderly conduct committed in their presence.

Mr. Bell explained his object to be to get rid of the difficulty without waiving the authority of the house in such cases, after which Mr. Heister called the previous question, which call was sustained, and then Mr. Judson's resolution was adopted without a count.

The following members were appointed as the select committee: Messrs. Judson, Bell, Williams, of N. C. Mann, of N. Y. Mason, of Va.

On motion of Mr. Wardwell, the rules were suspended for the purpose of appropriating the rest of the day to the consideration of the bills reported from the committees of revolutionary and invalid pensions.

The house went into committee of the whole (Mr. Craig in the chair) on the whole bills.

The bill extending the provisions of the act entitled "an act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution," was first taken up. Some time was spent in its consideration and the bill finished and laid aside.

Mr. Judson, from the select committee on the subject of the disturbance which occurred in the house this morning, made a report in part, concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That Robert Codd, having done no act in violation of the privilege or order of the house, be forthwith discharged from custody."

The motion was agreed to.

It was suggested that, in order to justify the detention of the other person, the speaker should issue a warrant.

The speaker said he considered it necessary to have the authority of the house for issuing a warrant.

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, moved that the speaker be authorised to issue his warrant to the sergeant-at-arms for the arrest and detention of Henry G. Wheeler, for a contempt and breach of privilege of the house by committing an assault on the body of Robert Codd, in the presence of the house; which motion was agreed to.

Two resolutions, of a private character, were then received by common consent, after which the house adjourned.

Monday, June 13. The pension bills ordered to be engrossed on Saturday were severally read a third time and passed. Some business of minor importance, which will be noticed in its further progress, was next transacted, after which the house took up the northern boundary of Ohio and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the union.

Mr. Vinton then renewed the motion made by him unsuccessfully in committee of the whole and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, when the amendment was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Ashley, Bailey, Bond, Boon, Bunch, John Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carr, Carter, G. Chambers, J. Chambers, Childs, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Darlington, Deberry, Denny, Evans, Everett, Philo C. T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams—136.

Mr. Adams moved to amend the bill by striking out the 1st, 2d and 3d sections, and inserting as a substitute certain provisions reserving to Michigan the rights and limits secured to the territory by the ordinance of 1787, and addressed the house for three hours in opposition to the boundary as described in the bill. He examined the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, which, he contended, settled the boundaries of the states of Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, with that of the territories north of those states, definitively and forever; and that the several boundaries could not be altered, unless by the common consent of congress, the states and territories interested and the state of Virginia. He contended that the bill before the house altered the boundary between Michigan and Ohio, to the injury of the former state, and in violation of the original compact.

When Mr. Adams had concluded his remarks, several gentlemen addressed the chair, and the floor was obtained by Mr. Cushman, who said, that, believing the previous question to be one of the most salutary rules of the house, and believing this to be a fit occasion for its application, he now moved it. Mr. Adams remarked that he hoped the yeas and nays would be taken on his motion to amend. Mr. Vanderpoel moved a call of the house, and thereupon asked the yeas and nays, which were taken; and the motion was agreed to—yeas 109, nays 43. The call was commenced, and proceeded in for some time, when, on motion of Mr. Huntsman, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with. The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was put on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 153, nays 45.

The bill to provide for the admission of Arkansas into the union was taken up, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading,

Mr. Mann, of New York, asked the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. Adams offered an amendment to the bill providing that Arkansas should be admitted upon the express condition that the state should not interfere with the disposal of the public lands, nor impose any tax upon them, and also providing some restriction in relation to slavery and the emancipation of slaves; which amendment being read, Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, moved the previous question. Mr. Adams claimed the floor, not having yielded it to any one, and the chair gave him the floor. Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, insisted upon his right to the floor, and the chair decided that he was entitled to it, if he insisted upon the claim. Mr. Adams appealed from this decision, and stated that, having offered an amendment, and retaining the floor, he waited for the reading of the amendment in order to address the house. Mr. Phillips expressed an opinion that Mr. Adams was entitled to the floor. Mr. Boulgin, after some remarks in reply, moved the previous question on the appeal, which was being seconded and the main question being ordered, it was put as follows:

"Shall the decision of the chair stand as the judgment of the house?" and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 87.

The question recurring on the motion for the previous question, on ordering the bill to a third reading, it was seconded, and the yeas and nays were ordered on the main question, and being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 127, nays 67.

Mr. Reed asked the yeas and nays on the main question, and it being taken, it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 147, nays 52. It was then ordered that the bill be read a third time this day. The Michigan bill was then read a third time. Mr. Vanderpoel moved the previous question on the passage of the bill, and it was seconded. The main question was ordered to be put, and the bill was passed. The Arkansas bill was then read a third time. Mr. Huntsman moved the previous question on the passage of the bill, which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put. Mr. Heman Allen asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The bill was then passed, yeas 143, nays 50. On motion of Mr. Connor, the house, at a quarter after six, adjourned.

Tuesday, June 14. On motion of Mr. Haynes the house suspended the rules for the purpose of taking up and considering the joint resolution from the senate fixing a day of adjournment of the present congress. [The joint resolution specifies the 23d of May as the day of adjournment.]

Mr. Haynes moved to strike out the 23d of May and insert the 27th of June. Mr. Mann, of N. Y. moved the 4th of July. These motions to amend gave rise to a desultory debate and to many other motions. Finally the question was taken on the motion to amend by striking out the 23d of May, and inserting the 4th of July, which was agreed to without a count, and the joint resolution, as amended, was agreed to, and sent to the senate for concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. Judson, by general consent, presented the report of the select committee of privilege, in the case of an assault recently committed within the hall, in the presence of the house, which, without reading, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The bill from the senate supplementary to the act for the establishment of the northern boundary line of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Arkansas into the union, &c. was read twice, and committed to a committee of the whole on the state of the union.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Pierce, of New Hampshire, in the chair), and took up for consideration the bill from the senate "supplementary to the act for the admission of Arkansas into the union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes."

The bill having been read through, Mr. Vinton moved to amend it by adding a section for securing to the Choctaw tribe of Indians certain rights reserved to them under a treaty with the United States.

Mr. Vinton spoke at some length in support of this motion. A debate followed, in which Messrs. Sevier, Parker, Love, Patton, Cushing, Cambreleng, Howard, Huntsman, Everett, Standefer, McKay, Toucey and Chambers, of Pa. took part; after which, Mr. Vinton withdrew the amendment. The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. Vinton, and laid aside. The bill supplementary to the act for the admission of Michigan was taken up. After some remarks from Messrs. Vinton, Gardland, of La. Sevier, Robertson, Lane and Huntsman,

Mr. Robertson moved to amend the bill by inserting a proviso repealing so much of the act to which the bill is supplementary as sanctions the late election of senators and representatives in congress from Michigan, and providing that a new election shall be held. Lost, 53 to 77. The bill was then laid aside, and the committee took up the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States in Michigan, and for other purposes.

Mr. Lane moved to amend the bill so as to provide that the salary of the district judge shall be 1,500 dollars, instead of 2,000, as proposed in the bill; and that the like salary be allowed to the district judges of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana and Missouri. After some remarks from Messrs. Lane, Toucey and E. Whittlesey, the motion was lost.

Mr. Hardin moved to reduce the salary of the district judge from 2,000 to 1,500 dollars; which was agreed to. The committee then rose, and reported the above bills, as amended, and the amendments were severally concurred in, with the exception of the amendment of Mr. Robertson to the supplementary Michigan bill, which was non-concurred in. Mr. Toucey moved an amendment to the supplementary Michigan bill, directing the manner in which the school lands shall be located.

After some remarks from Messrs. Toucey, E. Whittlesey, Storer and Vinton, the motion of Mr. Toucey was rejected.

On motion of Mr. E. Whittlesey, an amendment was adopted, securing the rights of those persons who bought school lands. The several amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bills to be read a third time.

After an ineffectual attempt to induce the house to set apart Monday next for the consideration of the light house bill, &c. on motion of Mr. Speight it adjourned.

Wednesday, June 15. Mr. Adams moved to amend the statement made in the journal of Monday's proceedings in relation to his claiming the floor on that day, after Mr. Williams, of Ky. had moved the previous question. Mr. A. contended that the statement did not give correctly the ground upon which he claimed the floor. After some conversation which occupied the house nearly an hour, the previous question was called and seconded, and the question being taken, Mr. Adams' motion was rejected—yeas 51, nays 110.

Several bills were reported, severally read twice and committed. Mr. Whittlesey made unfavorable reports upon a large number of cases referred to the committee on claims. Some private and unimportant business consumed the remainder of the hour.

The bills from the senate supplementary to the bills for the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the union were read a third time, and passed.

The bill from the senate to provide for the execution of the laws of the United States in Michigan was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Mann, of New York, moved that the house do now take up the senate bill to settle and establish the northern boundary line of Ohio; which was agreed to.

The bill was then taken up, and gave rise to a discussion between Messrs. Adams, Mann, Craig and E. Whittlesey. The question being on ordering the bill to a third reading, after some remarks from Messrs. Huntsman and Bouldin—Mr. Miller called the previous question, which was sustained; and the main question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 42.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time to-day.

The question being now on the passage of the bill, the debate was renewed—during which Mr. Reynolds moved the previous question, when it appeared that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. Chapin moved a call of the house, which was agreed to; but during the call the further proceedings were dispensed with. The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was taken and the bill passed.

The bill making appropriations for fortifications for the year 1836, reported to the house with amendments, was taken up for consideration.

The question being stated on concurring in the amendment increasing the appropriation for the fortifications in Charleston harbor to $200,000, some debate followed, in which Messrs. Hardin, Pinckney, Cambreleng, Parker, Grayson and Hall, of Vermont, &c. &c. when on motion of Mr. Mauvy, the house, without taking any question, at about 8 o'clock adjourned.

[In the course of the day, the bill from the senate entitled "an act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the state of Michigan," was read the third time, when a motion was made by Mr. Bond that the vote of yesterday, by which the said bill was ordered to a third reading, be reconsidered. The question being put, it passed in the affirmative.

The said bill having been amended in the committee of the whole yesterday, but by mistake the amendment not having been entered on the proceedings of that day, the said amendment, reducing the salary of the district judge to $1,500, was taken up, read, confirmed and agreed to. And, on motion of Mr. Bond, the said bill was then further amended by adding to it the following proviso: "Provided, however, that this act shall not take effect until the state of Michigan shall be admitted into the union, according to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of the state of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the state of Michigan into the union on certain conditions." And thus amended the bill passed.]

Thursday, June 16. The house having refused to suspend the rules to permit Mr. Dickerson to offer certain proceedings of numerous public meetings held at Fort Gibson on the subject of the acknowledgment by congress of the independence of Texas, on motion of Mr. Judson it proceeded to the consideration of the report of the select committee on the subject of the assault committed by Henry G. Wheeler, in the hall of the house of representatives on Saturday last. The report concludes with the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That Henry G. Wheeler has been guilty of a contempt and breach of the privileges of this house, by committing the said assault in the hall of the house of representatives, while the house was in session.

2. Resolved, That the said Henry G. Wheeler shall be excluded from any place on the floor or elsewhere in the hall, as a stenographer, to take down the debates of this house;

3. Resolved, That the said Henry G. Wheeler be securely imprisoned by the sergeant-at-arms of this house for the remainder of this session; and that the speaker of this house do issue his warrant to carry into effect this resolution.

Mr. Hawes moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "resolved" in the first resolution and inserting "that Henry G. Wheeler be discharged from the custody of the officers of the house."

After some suggestions from Messrs. Adams, Evans and Hammer, Mr. Hawes modified his motion so as to offer his amendment as a substitute for the third resolution. Mr. Mason, of Virginia, called for a division of the question; which was ordered. On motion of Mr. Heister, Henry G. Wheeler was then brought to the bar of the house. Mr. Craig moved that the interrogatory, "if he had any thing to say why the resolution should not be passed?" should be put to the accused by the speaker. A few words of discussion upon the propriety of putting the question ensued, when Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, said he would end it, by saying, at the request of Mr. Wheeler, that he had nothing farther to say than is contained in the report.

The question upon the first resolution having been put, Mr. Robertson moved to amend it by striking out the whole, and inserting, "that H. G. Wheeler be discharged from the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, and be excluded from the hall of the house during the residue of the session, for an indignity to the house;" which motion, after some remarks, was withdrawn, and the first resolution was agreed to, without a division.

The question being upon the second resolution, it was amended on motion of Mr. Judson, chairman of the select committee, by adding at the end thereof the words "during the residue of the session," and was also agreed to. The question then being on the third resolution, the amendment offered by Mr. Hawes, as above given, was adopted—yeas 123, nays 31; and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The speaker then directed the sergeant-at-arms to discharge Henry G. Wheeler from custody, and the house proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up the bill from the senate entitled "an act to appropriate for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of public lands of the United States and for granting lands to certain states," which occupied its attention till the expiration of the hour.

The house then in pursuance of the special order of the 26th of January, resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1836—and having rejected the amendment reported from the committee of the whole, increasing the appropriations for forts in the harbor of Charleston, S. C. and also a motion to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was rejected, the rules were suspended to permit Mr. Speight to offer a resolution that the house take a recess this day and each day hereafter from half past two o'clock till four—which resolution was agreed to, yeas 114.

In the evening session the fortification bill was again considered, and had not been disposed of, when the last messenger from the office of the Intelligencer left the capital.

[On Saturday last, Mr. Judson, from the select committee appointed under a resolution of the house of representatives to inquire into an assault committed within the hall of the house of representatives, on the morning of the 11th of June, 1836, while the house was in session, reported, in part, that Robert Codd, one of the persons arrested by the order of the house, has done no act which calls for either censure or punishment on the part of the house. The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Robert Codd, now under arrest, and in custody of the sergeant-at-arms, be and he is hereby discharged." Which resolution was agreed to.]

LAW CASES.

Three day's grace. Many banks, both in this state and elsewhere, have immemorially followed the practice, in discounting notes, of charging interest for four days more than the time specified on the face of the instrument. This was done by allowing three day's grace, and by counting both the day on which the note was drawn and that on which it fell due. In the case of McNeely, assignee of the state bank at Trenton, vs. the heirs of Drake, this point was raised by the counsel for the defendants; and the supreme court decided that the practice was an usurious one, and vitiated all contracts it entered into. In other words, that it is usury to estimate both the day of the date, and of the maturity, in discounting a note or bill.

Another point raised by the counsel in the same case, says the Trenton Emporium, was, that the practice of taking discount out of notes drawn at ninety days, as though they were drawn at three months, or one fourth of a year, was also usurious. Although no express opinion was given by the court on this point, a sufficient intimation fell from two of the justices to put the community on their guard following this custom.

The court determined, in the case before them, that the usury not having been between the parties in court, the verdict for the plaintiff must be sustained. [Newark Advertiser.

Law of the road. An action of trespass on the case, brought by Eliza Wilson vs. the Rockland manufacturing company, was tried in the superior court of Newcastle county, Delaware, recently, under the following circumstances: Miss Wilson was riding in a gig with her brother on the Kennet turnpike road near Wilmington, on the right summer road; as they were passing, they were met by a Dearborn wagon belonging to the company, and driven by a person in its regular employment. The dearborn, from the negligence of its driver, ran against the gig, by which the plaintiff was thrown out of it, and considerably hurt, and the horse ran away with the gig. The Rockland company is an incorporated manufacturing company on the Brandywine. The case was argued by Edward W. Gilpin and Richard H. Bayard, esqs. for the plaintiff and James A. Bayard, esq. for the defendants. The facts being fully proved, the court charged the jury that the action was good against the corporation, which was liable for the negligence of its servants or agents, under such circumstances, and that it was immaterial whether such servant was appointed by deed or sealed instrument or otherwise. The jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff; damages $150.

In the circuit court—United States vs. A. M. Laub. The defendant in this action, who most of our readers remember, was a disbursing clerk in the treasury department, up to the time of its being destroyed by fire, on the 3d of April, 1833, was sued by the government, for a deficit in his accounts of eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty-five dollars eighty-six cents. We cannot pretend to give even an outline of the evidence, arguments of counsel, decisions of the court or their instructions to the jury, in this very intricate and important case, which occupied four days. We notice the case principally for the purpose of stating, that in the course of the trial it was stated by the defendant's counsel for the United States, that, the foul and cruel suspicion under which the defendant rested for nearly three years of having been concerned in causing that dreadful conflagration, for the purpose of destroying the proofs of his delinquencies, was totally unfounded, evidence having been lately discovered, which goes to implicate another person, who would in due time be tried for that heinous offence.

We are sure that the defendant's friends, who are highly respectable, as well as the friends of innocence generally, will rejoice at these public declarations made in favor of Mr. A. M. Laub in open court. The fact cannot be too generally made known as an act of justice to a man who has been cruelly injured in public opinion. The jury after retiring about an hour, returned into court, on last Thursday evening, with a verdict for the defendant. It is understood that the only difficulty in the case was occasioned by the loss of Mr. Laub's vouchers which were proved to have been destroyed in the burning of the treasury office. No doubt, however, was entertained that Mr. Laub had supplied all the proof on his part that could be required under such circumstances. [Georgetown Metropolitan.

Important decision. The court of appeals on Friday granted a motion for a new trial, in the case of Charles Jarvis, vs. H. L. Pinckney and Wm. K. Knight. The action was brought by Plaintiff, as salvor in possession, to recover damages, in behalf of himself and all concerned, for the destruction, under the order of the city council of Charleston, of the cargo of the brig Amelia, wrecked on Folly Island, in Nov. 1831. The principal ground of defence was that the council had a right to destroy the cargo in question, to prevent the extension of Asiatic cholera to the city, that disease having broken out and raged to a fearful extent among the crew and passengers of the wrecked vessel. The jury below had rendered a verdict of $136 for the plaintiff as a compensation for his individual loss on the occasion. The court of appeals, however, decided, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages, in behalf of all concerned as well owners as salvors, for the destruction of the portion of the cargo saved from the wreck and landed on the beach of the Island, and accordingly ordered a new trial on the ground of inadequate damages. SPEECH OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,

On the joint resolution for distributing rations to the distressed fugitives from Indian hostilities in the states of Alabama and Georgia.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 25, 1836.

The joint resolution from the senate authorising the president of the United States to cause rations to be distributed to suffering fugitives from Indian hostilities in Alabama and Georgia, being under debate—

Mr. Adams asked that the resolution should be read; it was accordingly read, and was as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the U. States of America in congress assembled, That the president of the United States be authorised to cause rations to be delivered from the public stores to the unfortunate sufferers, who are unable to provide for themselves, and who have been driven from their homes by Indian depredations, in Alabama and Georgia, until they can be re-established in their possessious, or so long as the president shall consider it necessary.

Mr. Adams, after observing that there was no appropriation annexed to the resolution, which, if there had been, the resolution must, by the constitution of the United States, have been made to assume the form of a bill, proceeded to address the chairman of the committee of the whole on the state of the union, in substance, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: There is no appropriation annexed to this resolution. We are called to vote upon it without knowing how deep it will dive into the public purse. We have no estimate from any executive department; no statement of the numbers of the distressed and unfortunate persons whom we are called upon to relieve, not with our own moneys, but with the moneys of our constituents. By an exception to the ordinary rules of the house, especially established to guard the public treasury against the danger of rash and inconsiderate expenditures, we are to drive this resolution through all its stages in a single day. And it is, I believe, the first example of a system of gratuitous donations to our own countrymen, infinitely more formidable by its consequences as a precedent, than from any thing appealing upon its face. I shall, nevertheless, vote for it. But answerable to my constituents, as I am in this as in all other cases for voting away their money, I seek for a principle which may justify me, to their judgment and my own, in this lavish disposal of the public funds.

It is but one, sir, of a class of legislative enactments now upon the pages of our statute book, introduced first, I believe during the present session of congress; but with which we are already becoming familiar, and which I greatly fear will, ere long, grow voluminous. I shall take the liberty to denominate them the scalping knife and tomahawk laws. They are all urged through by the terror of those instruments of death, under the most affecting and pathetic appeals from the constituents of the sufferers, to all the tender and benevolent sympathies of our nature. It is impossible for me to withhold from those appeals a responsive and yielding voice. I have voted for all those bills devoting million after million from the public chest, for the relief and defence of these suffering fellow citizens of my constituents. I will vote for this resolution. I will vote again and again for drafts from the treasury for the same purpose, should they become necessary, till the treasury itself shall be drained; but, for so doing, I must seek for a principle which may be satisfactory, first, to my own mind, and secondly, to my constituents.

And here, sir, the gentlemen who call upon us for these bountiful contributions from the public treasure, are compelled to resort to that common defence and general welfare declared by the constitution of the U. States to be among the purposes for which the constitution itself was ordained by the people. I admit their claim. There are, indeed, two grounds upon which some of them think their claim sustainable. One of them produces precedent for this exercise of power, and yet disclaims the authority of the precedent itself. You have already, by a resolution in the same words with those of the resolution now before this committee, extended this same relief to the inhabitants of Florida. But Florida is one of your territories, and you are under obligations of protection more comprehensive to its inhabitants than those which bind you to the people of the states. These receive and are entitled to the protection of their state government, and you are bound to extend that species of protection to the inhabitants of the territories, besides the protection which the inhabitants of the several states are entitled to, as members of the great confederation. The precedent, therefore, of the resolution of relief to the inhabitants of Florida, does not cover the case. We are reminded, however, that some twenty years or more ago, the people of Caracas were visited at once with a tremendous earthquake, with famine, and with the still more heavy misfortune of a civil war. The convulsions of nature by earthquakes, the ravages of famine, and the raging passions of man in the desolations of civil war, are as destructive to human life, and as calamitous to multitudes whom they do not absolutely destroy as the tomahawk and scalping knife. But whatever may have been the motives or the justifying authority of congress, more than twenty years ago, for appropriating any portion of the public moneys to the relief of the inhabitants of Caracas, it could not establish the principle that congress have the constitutional power to appropriate money for the relief of all human suffering, whether by earthquake, famine, civil war, or Indian ferocity. And the gentleman from Alabama himself, who so ar dently urges the adoption of this resolution, tells you that he should have voted against that measure of relief to the wretched sufferers in Caracacas. Mere commiseration, though one of the most amiable impulses of our nature, gives us no power to drain the treasury of the people for the relief of the suffering object. You must, therefore, seek another, an additional source of power, for authority to pass this resolution; and where will you, where can you, find it but in the war power, and its limitation, not its enlargement, in that very declaration of the transcendent purposes for which the people of the United States ordained their constitution—the common defence and general welfare. Step one hair's breadth out of the circle bounding the true intent and meaning of these words, and you have no more authority to pass this resolution, than you have, by an act of congress, to saddle the people of the United States with the insupportable burden of the whole system of the poor laws of England.

Sir, in the authority given to congress by the constitution of the United States to declare war, all the powers incidental to war are, by necessary implication, conferred upon the government of the United States. Now, the powers incidental to war, are derived, not from the internal municipal sources, but from the laws and usages of nations. In your relations with the Indian tribes, you never declare war, though you do make and break treaties with them, whenever either to make or to break treaties with them, happens to suit the purposes of the president and a majority of both houses of congress. For, in this matter, you have set aside the judiciary department of the government as effectually as if there were none such in the constitution.

There are, then, Mr. Chairman, in the authority of congress and of the executive two classes of powers, altogether different in their nature, and often incompatible with each other—the war power and the peace power. The peace power is limited by regulations, and restricted by provisions, prescribed within the constitution itself. The war power is limited only by the laws and usages of nations. The power is tremendous; it is strictly constitutional, but it breaks down every barrier so anxiously erected for the protection of liberty, of property, and of life. This, sir, is the power which authorises you to pass the resolution now before you, and, in my opinion, there is no other.

And this, sir, is the reason which I was not permitted to give this morning for voting with only eight associates against the first resolution reported by the committee on the abolition petitions; not one word of discussion had been permitted on either of those resolutions. When called to vote upon the first of them, I asked only five minutes of the time of the house to prove that it was utterly unfounded. It was not the pleasure of the house to grant me those five minutes. Sir, I must say that, in all the proceedings of the house upon that report, from the previous question, moved and inflexibly persisted in by a member of the committee itself which reported the resolutions, (Mr. Owens, of Georgia), to the refusal of the speaker, sustained by the majority of the house, to permit the other gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Glascock), to record upon the journal his reasons for asking to be excused from voting on that same resolution, the freedom of debate has been stifled in this house to a degree far beyond anything that ever has happened since the existence of the constitution of the United States; nor is it a consolatory reflection to me how intensely we have been made to feel, in the process of that operation, that the speaker of this house is a slaveholder. And, sir, as I was not then permitted to assign my reasons for voting against that resolution before I gave the vote, I rejoice that the reason for which I shall vote for the resolution now before the committee is identically the same with that for which I voted against that.

Mr. Adams at this, and at many other passages of this speech, was interrupted by calls to order. The chairman of the committee, (Mr. A. H. Shepperd, of North Carolina), in every instance decided that he was not out of order, but at this passage intimated that he was approaching very close upon its borders; upon which Mr. Adams said, then I am to understand, sir, that I am yet within the bounds of order, but that I may transcend them hereafter.

Mr. Chairman, I claim the privilege of speech accorded to every other member of this house. I will not advert to the latitude in which that privilege has been, throughout this session, enjoyed in committee of the whole by every member of the house who has chosen to exercise it. I will appeal only to what happened no longer ago than the sitting of yesterday and of this morning, when, at the hour of one, the speaker adjourned the house, not in the usual form of ten o'clock to-morrow morning, but to ten o'clock of Wednesday morning, that is, of this day. Is it not within the recollection of every one who hears me, that two gentlemen, both distinguished members of the house, from the state of Maryland, from the hour of seven to that of ten, or little short of that time, last evening, entertained and instructed the committee of the whole house with a controversial disquisition upon the constitution of the state of Maryland, and upon the very important question whether the voice of the legislature of that state was or was not an exponent of the popular will? Is it not remembered that this disquisition was held in the form of a dialogue so animated, that the retort courteous, the quip modest, the counter-check quarrelsome, and almost the lie circumstantial, passed between those gentlemen, without interruption from the chairman, and without call to order, till at last an honorable member from Tennessee proposed that the difference between the two members should be settled by arbitration? And what was the question before the committee, sir, upon which this spirited and eloquent conference was held? Was it upon an appropriation of seven hundred thousand dollars for arming the fortifications of the United States? or upon an amendment to that proposal, by a reduction of the salaries of all your principal executive officers, and of the compensation of members of congress? Sir, it was upon one of these two propositions, so exceedingly relevant to each other, that the colloquy between the two gentlemen from Maryland, upon the constitution, legislature and people of that highly respectable state, was held, for hours, without interruption or call to order. And now, sir, am I to be disconcerted and silenced, or admonished by the chair that I am approaching to irrelevant matter, which may warrant him to arrest me in my argument, because I say that the reason for which I shall vote for the resolution now before the committee, levying a heavy contribution upon the property of my constituents, is identically the same with the reason for which I voted against the resolution reported by the slavery committee, that congress has no authority to interfere in any way, with slavery in any of the states of this union? Sir, I was not allowed to give my reasons for that vote, and a majority of my constituents, perhaps proportionably as large as that of this house, in favor of that resolution, may, and probably will, disapprove of my vote against it, unless my reasons for so voting should be explained to them. I asked but five minutes of the house to give those reasons, and was refused. I shall, therefore, take the liberty to give them now, as they are strictly applicable to the measure now before the committee, and are my only justification for voting in favor of this resolution.

I return, then, to my first position, that there are two classes of powers vested by the constitution of the United States in their congress and executive government: the powers to be exercised in time of peace, and the powers incidental to war.—That the powers of peace are limited by provisions within the body of the constitution itself; but that the powers of war are limited and regulated only by the laws and usages of nations. There are, indeed, powers of peace conferred upon congress which also come within the scope and jurisdiction of the laws of nations, such as the negotiation of treaties of amity and commerce, the interchange of public ministers and consuls, and all the personal and social intercourse between the individual inhabitants of the United States and foreign nations, and the Indian tribes, which require the interposition of any law. But the powers of war are all regulated by the laws of nations, and are subject to no other limitation. It is by this power that I am justified in voting the money of my constituents for the immediate relief of their fellow citizens suffering with extreme necessity even for subsistence, by the direct consequence of an Indian war. Upon the same principle, your consuls in foreign ports are authorised to provide for the subsistence of seamen in distress, and even for their passage to their own country.

And it was upon that same principle that I voted against the resolution reported by the slavery committee, "that congress possess no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the states of this confederacy," to which resolution most of those with whom I usually concur, and even my own colleagues in this house, gave their assent. I do not admit that there is, even among the peace powers of congress, no such authority; but in war there are many ways by which congress not only have the authority, but are bound to interfere with the institution of slavery in the states. The existing law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States from foreign countries, is itself an interference with the institution of slavery in the states. It was so considered by the founders of the constitution of the U. States, in which it was stipulated that congress should not interfere, in that way, with the institution, prior to the year 1808.

During the late war with Great Britain, the military and naval commanders of that nation issued proclamations inviting the slaves to repair to their standards, with promises of freedom and of settlement in some of the British colonial establishments. This, surely, was an interference with the institution of slavery in the states. By the treaty of peace, Great Britain stipulated to evacuate all the forts and places in the U. States, without carrying away any slaves. If the government of the United States had no authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in the states, they would not have had the authority to require this stipulation. It is well known that this engagement was not fulfilled by the British naval and military commanders; that, on the contrary, they did carry away all the slaves whom they had induced to join them, and that the British government inflexibly refused to restore any of them to their masters; that a claim of indemnity was consequently instituted in behalf of the owners of the slaves, and was successfully maintained. All that series of transactions was an interference by congress with the institution of slavery in the states in one way—in the way of protection and support. It was by the institution of slavery alone that the restitution of slaves enticed by proclamations into the British service could be claimed as property. But for the institution of slavery, the British commanders could neither have allured them to their standard, nor restored them otherwise than as liberated prisoners of war. But for the institution of slavery, there could have been no stipulation that they should not be carried away as property, nor any claim of indemnity for the violation of that engagement.

But the war power of Congress over the institution of slavery in the states is yet far more extensive. Suppose the case of a servile war, complicated; as to some extent it is even now with an Indian war; suppose Congress were called to raise armies, to supply money from the whole union to suppress a servile insurrection: would they have no authority to interfere with the institution of slavery? The issue of a servile war may be disastrous. By war the slave may emancipate himself; it may become necessary for the master to recognize his emancipation by a treaty of peace; can it for an instant be pretended that Congress, in such a contingency, would have no authority to interfere with the institution of slavery, in any way, in the states? Why, it would be equivalent to saying that Congress have no constitutional authority to make peace.

I suppose a more portentous case, certainly within the bounds of possibility—I would have I could say not within the bounds of probability. You have been, if you are not now, at the very point of a war with Mexico—a war, I am sorry to say, so far as public rumor may be credited, stimulated by provocations on our part from the very commencement of this administration down to the recent authority given to General Gaines to invade the Mexican territory. It is said that one of the earliest acts of this administration was a proposal, made at a time when there was already much ill-humor in Mexico against the United States, that she should cede to the United States a very large portion of her territory—large enough to constitute nine states equal in extent to Kentucky. It must be confessed that a device better calculated to produce jealousy, suspicion, ill-will and hatred, could not have been contrived. It is further affirmed that this overture, offensive in itself, was made precisely at the time when a swarm of colonists from these United States were covering the Mexican border with land-jobbing, and with slaves, introduced in defiance of the Mexican laws, by which slavery had been abolished throughout that republic. The war now raging in Texas is a Mexican civil war, and a war for the re-establishment of slavery where it was abolished. It is not a servile war, but a war between slavery and emancipation, and every possible effort has been made to drive us into the war, on the side of slavery.

It is, indeed, a circumstance eminently fortunate for us that this monster, Santa Ana, has been defeated and taken, though I cannot participate in that exquisite joy with which we have been told that every one having Anglo-Saxon blood in his veins must have been delighted on hearing that this ruffian has been shot, in cold blood, when a prisoner of war, by the Anglo-Saxon leader of the victorious Texian army. Sir, I hope there is no member of this house, of other than Anglo-Saxon origin, who will deem it unbecomingly that I, being myself in part Anglo-Saxon, must, of course, hold that for the best blood that ever circulated in human veins. Oh! yes, sir! far be it from me to depreciate the glories of the Anglo-Saxon race; although there have been times when they bowed their necks and submitted to the law of conquest, beneath the ascendancy of the Norman race. But, sir, it has struck me as no inconsiderable evidence of the spirit which is spurting us into this war of aggression, of conquest and of slave-making, that all the fires of ancient, hereditary national hatred are to be kindled, to familiarize us with the ferocious spirit of rejoicing at the massacre of prisoners in cold blood. Sir, is there not yet hatred enough between the races which compose your southern population and the population of Mexico, their next neighbor, but you must go back eight hundred or a thousand years, and to another hemisphere, for the fountains of bitterness between you and them? What is the temper of feeling between the component parts of your own southern population, between your Anglo-Saxon, Norman, French and Moorish Spanish inhabitants of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Missouri? between them all and the Indian savage, the original possessor of the land from which you are scourging him already back to the foot of the Rocky Mountains? What between them all and the native American negro, of African origin, whom they are holding in cruel bondage? Are these elements of harmony, concord and patriotism between the component parts of a nation starting upon a crusade of conquest? And what are the feelings of all this motley compound of your southern population towards the compound equally heterogeneous of the Mexican population? Do not you, an Anglo-Saxon, slaveholding exterminator of Indians, from the bottom of your soul, hate the Mexican-Spaniard-Indian, emancipator of slaves and abolisher of slavery? And do you think that your hatred is not with equal cordiality returned? Go to the city of Mexico, ask any of your fellow-citizens who have been there for the last three or four years, whether they scarcely dare show their faces, as Anglo-Americans, in the streets. Be assured, sir, that, however heartily you detest the Mexican, his bosom burns with an equally deep-seated detestation of you.

And this is the nation with which, at the instigation of your executive government, you are now rushing into war—into a war of conquest; commenced by aggression on your part, and for the re-establishment of slavery, where it has been abolished throughout the Mexican republic. For your war will be with Mexico—with a republic of twenty-four states, and a population of eight or nine millions of souls. It seems to be considered that this victory over twelve hundred men, with the capture of their commander, the president of the Mexican republic, has already achieved the conquest of the whole republic. That it may have achieved the independence of Texas, is not impossible. But Texas is to the Mexican republic not more nor so much as the state of Michigan is to yours. That state of Michigan, the people of which are in vain claiming of you the performance of that sacred promise you made them, of admitting her as a state into the union; that state of Michigan, which has greater grievances and heavier wrongs to allege against you for a declaration of her independence, if she were disposed to declare it, than the people of Texas have for breaking off their union with the republic of Mexico. Texas is an extreme boundary portion of the republic of Mexico; a wilderness inhabited only by Indians until after the revolution which separated Mexico from Spain; not sufficiently populous at the organization of the Mexican confederacy to form a state by itself, and therefore united with Coahuila, where the greatest part of the indigenous part of the population reside. Sir, the history of all the emancipated Spanish American colonies has been, ever since their separation from Spain, a history of convulsions; wars; or revolutions, accomplished by single, and often very insignificant battles; of chieftains, whose title to power has been the murder of their immediate predecessors. They have all partaken of the character of the first conquest of Mexico by Cortez, and of Peru by Pizarro; and this, sir, makes me shudder at the thought of connecting our destinies indissolubly with theirs. It may be that a new revolution in Mexico will follow upon this captivity or death of their president and commanding general; we have rumors, indeed, that such a revolution had happened even before his defeat; but I cannot yet see my way clear to the conclusion that either the independence of Texas, or the capture and military execution of Santa Ana, will save you from war with Mexico. Santa Ana was but one of a breed of which Spanish America for the last twenty-five years has been a teeming mother—soldiers of fortune, who, by the sword or the musket ball, have risen to supreme power, and by the sword or the musket ball have fallen from it. That breed is not extinct; the very last intelligence from Peru tells of one who has fallen there as Yturbe, and Mina, and Guercero, and Santa Ana have fallen in Mexico. The same soil which produced them is yet fertile to produce others. They reproduce themselves, with nothing but a change of the name and of the man. Your war, sir, is to be a war of races—the Anglo-Saxon American pitted against the Moorish-Spanish-Mexican American; a war between the northern and southern halves of North America; from Passamaquoddy to Panama. Are you prepared for such a war?

And again I ask what will be your cause in such a war! Aggression, conquest and the re-establishment of slavery where it has been abolished. In that war, sir, the banners of freedom will be the banners of Mexico; and your banners, I blush to speak the word, will be the banners of slavery.

Sir, in considering these United States and the United Mexican States as mere masses of power coming to collision against each other, I cannot doubt that Mexico will be the greatest sufferer by the shock. The conquest of all Mexico would seem to be no improbable result of the conflict, especially if the war should extend no farther than to the two mighty combatants. But will it be so confined? Mexico is clearly the weakest of the two powers; but she is not the least prepared for action. She has the more recent experience of war. She has the greatest number of veteran warriors; and although her highest chief has just suffered a fatal and ignominious defeat, yet that has happened often before to leaders of armies too confident of success and contemptuous of their enemy. Even now, Mexico is better prepared for a war of invasion upon you, than you are for a war of invasion upon her. There may be found a successor to Santa Ana, inflamed with the desire, not only of avenging his disaster, but what he and his nation will consider your perfidious hostility. The national spirit may go with him. He may not only turn the tables upon the Texian conquerors, but drive them for refuge within your borders, and pursue them into the heart of your own territories. Are you in a condition to resist him? Is the success of your whole army, and all your veteran generals, and all your militia-calls, and all your mutinous volunteers against a miserable band of five or six hundred invisible Seminole Indians, in your late campaign, an earnest of the energy and vigor with which you are ready to carry on that far otherwise formidable and complicated war—complicated, did I say? And how complicated? Your Seminole war is already spreading to the Creeks, and, in their march of desolation, they sweep along with them your negro slaves, and put arms into their hands to make common cause with them against you; and how far will it spread, sir, should a Mexican invader, with the torch of liberty in his hand, and the standard of freedom floating over his head, proclaiming emancipation to the slave and revenge to the native Indian, as he goes, invade your soil? What will be the condition of your states of Louisiana, of Mississippi, of Alabama, of Arkansas, of Missouri, and of Georgia? Where will be your negroes? Where will be that combined and concentrated mass of Indian tribes, whom, by an inconceivable policy, you have expelled from their widely distant habitations, to embody them within a small compass on the very borders of Mexico, as if on purpose to give that country a nation of natural allies in their hostilities against you? Sir, you have a Mexican, an Indian and a negro war upon your hands, and you are plunging yourself into it blindfold; you are talking about acknowledging the independence of the republic of Texas, and you are thirsting to annex Texas, aye, and Coahuila, and Tamaulipas, and Santa Fe, from the source to the mouth of the Rio Bravo, to your already over-distended dominions. Five hundred thousand square miles of the territory of Mexico would not even now quench your burning thirst for aggrandizement.

But will your foreign war for this be with Mexico alone? No, sir. As the weaker party, Mexico, when the contest shall have once begun, will look abroad, as well as among your negroes and your Indians, for assistance. Neither Great Britain nor France will suffer you to make such a conquest from Mexico; no, nor even to annex the independent state of Texas to your confederation, without their interposition. You will have an Anglo-Saxon intertwined with a Mexican war to wage. Great Britain may have no serious objection to the independence of Texas, and may be willing enough to take her under her protection, as a barrier both against Mexico and against you, But, as aggrandizement to you, she will not readily suffer it; and, above all, she will not suffer you to acquire it by conquest and the re-establishment of slavery. Urged on by the irresistible, overwhelming torrent of public opinion, Great Britain has recently, at a cost of one hundred millions of dollars, which her people has joyfully paid, abolished slavery throughout all her colonies in the West Indies. After setting such an example, she will not—it is impossible that she should—stand by and witness a war for the re-establishment of slavery, where it had been for years abolished, and situated thus in the immediate neighborhood of her islands. She will tell you, that if you must have Texas as a member of your confederacy, it must be without the taint or the trammels of slavery; and if you will wage a war to handcuff and fetter your fellow-man, she will wage the war against you to break his chains. Sir, what a figure, in the eyes of mankind, would you make, in deadly conflict with Great Britain: she fighting the battles of emancipation, and you the battles of slavery; she the benefactress, and you the oppressor of human kind! In such a war, the enthusiasm of emancipation, too, would unite vast numbers of her people in aid of the national rivalry, and her natural jealousy against our aggrandizement. No war was ever so popular in England as that war would be against slavery, the slave-trade and the Anglo-Saxon descendant from her own loins.

As to the annexation of Texas to your confederation, for what do you want it? Are you not large and unwieldy enough already? Do not two millions of square miles cover surface enough for the insatiable rapacity of your land jobbers? I hope there is none of them within the sound of my voice. Have you not Indians enough to expel from the land of their fathers' sepulchres, and to exterminate? What, in a prudent and military point of view, would the addition of Texas to your domain? It would be weakness, and not power. Is your southern and south western frontier not sufficiently extensive? not sufficiently feeble? not sufficiently defenceless? Why are you adding regiment after regiment of dragoons to your standing army? Why are you struggling, by direction and indirection, to raise up a salutem that army from less than six to more than twenty thousand men? Your commanding general, now returning from his excursion to Florida, openly recommends the increase of your army to that number. Sir, the extension of your sea coast frontier from the Sabine to the Rio Bravo would add to your weakness tenfold; for it is now only weakness with reference to Mexico. It would then be weakness with reference to Great Britain, to France, even perhaps to Russia, to every naval European power, which might make a quarrel with us for the sake of settling a colony; but above all, to Great Britain. She, by her naval power, and by her American colonies, holds the keys of the Gulf of Mexico. What would be the condition of your frontier from the mouth of the Mississippi to that of the Rio del Norte, in the event of a war with Great Britain? Sir, the reasons of Mr. Monroe for accepting the Sabine as the boundary were three. First, he had no confidence in the strength of our claim as far as the Rio Bravo; secondly, he thought it would make our union so heavy that it would break into fragments by its own weight; thirdly, he thought it would protrude a long line of sea coast, which, in our first war with Great Britain, she might take into her own possession, and which we should be able neither to defend nor to recover. At that time there was no question of slavery or of abolition involved in the controversy. The country belonged to Spain; it was a wilderness, and slavery was the established law of the land. There was then no project for carving out nine slave states, to hold eighteen seats in the other wing of this capital, in the triangle between the mouths and the sources of the Mississippi and Bravo rivers. But what was our claim? Why it was that La Salle, having discovered the mouth of the Mississippi, and France, having made a settlement at New Orleans, France had a right to one-half the sea coast from the mouth of the Mississippi to the next Spanish settlement, which was Vera Cruz. The mouth of the Rio Bravo was about half way from the Balize to Vera Cruz; and so as grantees, from France of Louisiana, we claimed to the Rio del Norte, though the Spanish settlement of the Santa Fe was at the head of that river. France from whom we had received Louisiana, utterly disclaimed ever having even raised such a pretension. Still we made the best of the claim that we could, and finally yielded it for the Floridas, and for the line of the 32d degree of latitude from the source of the Arkansas river to the South sea. Such was our claim; and you may judge how much confidence Mr. Monroe could have in its validity. The great object and desire of the country then was to obtain the Floridas. It was gen. Jackson's desire; and in that conference with me to which I have heretofore alluded, and which it is said he does not recollect, he said to me that so long as the Florida rivers were not in our possession, there could be no safety for our whole southern country.

But, sir, suppose you should annex Texas to these United States; another year would not pass before you would have to engage in a war for the conquest of the island of Cuba. What is now the condition of that island? Still under the nominal protection of Spain. And what is the condition of Spain herself? Consuming her own vitals in a civil war for the succession to the crown. Do you expect, that whatever may be the issue of that war, she can retain even the nominal possession of Cuba? After having lost all her continental colonies in North and South America, Cuba will stand in need of more efficient protection; and above all, the protection of a naval power. Suppose that naval power should be Great Britain. There is Cuba at your very door; and if you spread yourself along a naked coast, from the Sabine to the Rio Bravo, what will be your relative position towards Great Britain, with not only Jamaica, but Cuba, and Porto Rico in her hands, and abolition for the motto to her union cross of St. George and Saint Andrew? Mr. Chairman, do you think I am treading on fantastic grounds? Let me tell you a piece of history, not far remote. Sir, many years have not passed away since an internal revolution in Spain subjected that country and her king for a short time to the momentary government of the cortes. That revolution was followed by another, by which, under the auspices of a French army with the duke d'Angoulême at their head, Ferdinand the seventh was restored to a despotic throne; Cuba had followed the fortunes of the cortes when they were crowned with victory; and when the counter revolution came, the inhabitants of the island, uncertain what was to be their destination, were for some time in great perplexity what to do for themselves. Two considerable parties arose in the island, one of which was for placing it under the protection of Great Britain, and another was for annexing it to the confederation of these United States. By one of these parties I have reason to believe that overtures were made to the government of Great Britain. By the other I know that overtures were made to the government of the United States. And I further know that secret, though irresponsible assurances were communicated to the then president of the United States, as coming from the French government, that they were secretly informed that the British government had determined to take possession of Cuba. Whether similar overtures were made to France herself, I do not undertake to say; but that Mr. George Canning, then the British secretary of state for foreign affairs, was under no inconsiderable alarm, lest under the pupillage of the duke d'Angoulême, Ferdinand the seventh might commit to the commander of a French naval squadron the custody of the Moro Castle, is a circumstance also well known to me. It happened that just about that time a French squadron of considerable force was fitted out and received sailing orders for the West Indies, without formal communication of the fact to the British government; and that as soon as it was made known to him, he gave orders to the British ambassador at Paris to demand, in the most peremptory tone, what was the destination of that squadron, and a special and positive disclaimer that it was intended even to visit the Havana; and this was made the occasion of mutual explanations, by which Great Britain, France and the United States, not by the formal solemnity of a treaty, but by the implied engagement of mutual assurances of intention, gave pledges of honor to each other, that neither of them should in the then condition of the island take it, or the Moro Castle, as its citadel, from the possession of Spain. This engagement was on all sides faithfully performed; but, without it, who doubts that from that day to this either of the three powers might have taken the island and held it in undisputed possession?

At this time circumstances have changed—popular revolutions both in France and Great Britain have perhaps curbed the spirit of conquest in Great Britain, and France may have enough to do to govern her kingdom of Algiers. But Spain is again convulsed with a civil war for the succession to her crown; she has irrevocably lost all her colonies on both continents of America. It is impossible that she should hold much longer a shadow of dominion over the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico; nor can those islands, in their present condition, form independent nations, capable of protecting themselves. They must for ages remain at the mercy of Great Britain or of these United States, or of both; Great Britain is even now about to interfere in this war for the Spanish succession. If by the utter imbecility of the Mexican confederacy this revolt of Texas should lead immediately to its separation from that republic, and its annexation to the U. States, I believe it impossible that Great Britain should look on while this operation is performing with indifference. She will see that it must shake her own whole colonial power on this continent, in the Gulf of Mexico and in the Caribbean seas, like an earthquake; she will see, too, that it endangers her own abolition of slavery in her own colonies. A war for the restoration of slavery where it has been abolished, if successful in Texas, must extend over all Mexico; and the example will threaten her with imminent danger of a war of colors in her own islands. She will take possession of Cuba and of Porto Rico, by cession from Spain or by the batteries from her wooden walls; and if you ask her by what authority she has done it; she will ask you, in return, by what authority you have extended your sea coast from the Sabine to the Rio Bravo. She will ask you a question more perplexing, namely—by what authority you, with freedom, independence and democracy upon your lips, are waging a war of extermination to forge new insinuations and letters, instead of those which are falling from the hands and feet of man. She will carry emancipation and abolition with her in every fold of her flag; while your stars, as they increase in numbers, will be overcast with the murky vapors of oppression, and the only portion of your banners visible to the eye will be the blood-stained stripes of the task master.

Mr. Chairman, are you ready for all these wars? A Mexican war? a war with Great Britain, if not with France? a general Indian war? a servile war? and, as an inevitable consequence of them all, a civil war? For it must ultimately terminate in a war of colors as well as of races. And do you imagine that while with your eyes open you are wilfully kindling, and then closing your eyes and blindly rushing into them; do you imagine that while, in the very nature of things, your own southern and south western states must be the Flanders of these complicated wars, the battle field upon which the last great conflict must be fought between slavery and emancipation; do you imagine that your congress will have no constitutional authority to interfere with the institution of slavery in any way in the states of this confederacy? Sir, they must and will interfere with it—perhaps to sustain it by war; perhaps to abolish it by treaties of peace; and they will not only possess the constitutional power so to interfere, but they will be bound in duty to do it by the express provisions of the constitution itself. From the instant that your slaveholding states become the theatre of war, civil, servile or foreign, from that instant the war powers of congress extend to interference with the institution of slavery in every way by which it can be interfered with, from a claim of indemnity for slaves taken or destroyed, to the cession of the state burdened with slavery to a foreign power.

Sir, it is by virtue of this same war power, as now brought into exercise by this Indian war in Florida, Alabama and Georgia, that I vote for the resolution before the committee. By virtue of this, I have already voted in the course of this session to increase your standing army by a second regiment of dragoons, to authorise your president to accept the services of ten thousand volunteers, and to appropriate millions of the public money to suppress these Indian hostilities—all for the common defence, all for the general welfare. And if, on this occasion, I have been compelled to avail myself of the opportunity to assign my reasons for voting against the first resolution reported by the slavery committee, it is because it was the pleasure of the majority of the house this morning to refuse me the permission to assign my reasons for my vote, when the question was put upon those resolutions themselves.

Sir, it is a melancholy contemplation to me, and raises fearful forebodings in my mind when I consider the manner in which that report and those resolutions have been disposed of by the house. I have twice asked permission of this house to offer two resolutions calling for information from the president upon subjects of infinite importance to this question of slavery, to our relations with Mexico, and to the peace of the country. When I last made the attempt, a majority of the house voted by yeas and nays to suspend the rules to enable me to offer one of the two resolutions—but the majority not amounting to two-thirds, my resolution has not yet obtained from the house the favor of being considered. Had it been the pleasure of the house to indulge the call, or to allow me the privilege of assigning my reasons for my vote on the resolution this morning, the remarks that I have now made might have been deemed more appropriate to those topics of discussion, than to the question now immediately now before the committee. They are reflections, however, which I deem it not less indispensable to make than they are painful to be made—extorted from me by a condition of public affairs unexampled in the history of this country. Heretofore, calls upon the executive department for information, such as that which I have proposed to make, were considered as among the rights of the members of this house, which it was scarcely deemed decent to resist. A previous question, smothering all discussion upon resolutions reported by a committee, affecting the vital principles of the constitution, moved by one of the members who reported the resolutions, and sustained by the members of that committee itself, is an occurrence which never before happened in the annals of this government. The adoption of those resolutions of the house had not even been moved. Upon the mere question whether an extra number of the report of the committee should be printed, a member moves the recommitment of the report, with instructions to report a new resolution. On this motion the previous question is moved, and the speaker declares that the main question is not on the motion to recommit, not on the motion to print an extra number of copies of the report, but upon the adoption of three resolutions, reported, but never even moved in the house. If this is to be the sample of our future legislation, it is time to awake from the delusion that freedom of speech is among the rights of the members of the minority of this house.

To return, Mr. Chairman, to the resolution before the committee. I shall vote for this application of moneys, levied by taxation upon my constituents, to feed the suffering and starving fugitives from Indian desperation and revenge. How deeply searching in the coffers of your treasury this operation will ultimately be, no man can at this time foretell. The expenditure authorised by this resolution may be not in itself very considerable; but in its progress it has already stretched from Ala-hama to Georgia—how much further it may extend, will be seen hereafter. I turn my eyes away from the project of it now; but am prepared to meet the emergency, if it should come, with all the resources of the treasury.

But, sir, I shall not vote for this relief to the suffering inhabitants of Alabama and of Georgia, upon the ground on which the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. Lewis) and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson) have been disposed to place it. Little reason have the inhabitants of Georgia and of Alabama to complain that the government of the United States has been remiss or neglectful in protecting them from Indian hostilities: the fact is directly the reverse. The people of Alabama and Georgia are now suffering the recoil of their own unlawful weapons. Georgia, sir, Georgia, by trampling upon the faith of our national treaties with the Indian tribes and by subjecting them to her state laws, first set the example of that policy which is now in the process of consummation by this Indian war. In setting this example, she bade defiance to the authority of the government of the nation; she nullified your laws: she set at naught your executive and judicial guardians of the common constitution of the land. To what extent she carried this policy, the dungeons of her prisons and the records of the supreme judicial court of the United States can tell. To those prisons she committed inoffensive, innocent, pious ministers of the gospel of truth, for carrying the light, the comforts, and the consolations of that gospel to the hearts and minds of these unhappy Indians. A solemn decision of the supreme court of the United States pronounced that act a violation of your treaties and of your laws. Georgia defied that decision: your executive government never carried it into execution: the imprisoned missionaries of the gospel were compelled to purchase their ransom from perpetual captivity by sacrificing their rights as freemen to the meekness of their principles as Christians; and you have sanctioned all these outrages upon justice, law and humanity, by succumbing to the power and the policy of Georgia, by accommodating your legislation to her arbitrary will; by tearing to tatters your old treaties with the Indians, and by constraining them, under petite forte et dure, to the mockery of signing other treaties with you, which, at the first moment when it shall suit your purpose, you will again tear to tatters and scatter to the four winds of heaven, till the Indian race shall be extinct upon this continent, and it shall become a problem beyond the solution of antiquaries and historical societies what the red man of the forest was.

This, sir, is the remote and primitive cause of the present Indian war: your own injustice, sanctioning and sustaining that of Georgia and Alabama. This system of policy was first introduced by the present administration of your national government. It is directly the reverse of that system which had been pursued by all the preceding administrations of this government under the present constitution. That system consisted in the most anxious and persevering efforts to civilize the Indians; to attach them to the soil upon which they lived; to enlighten their minds; to soften and humanize their hearts; to fix in permanency their habitations; and to turn them from the wandering and precarious pursuits of the hunter, to the tillage of the ground; to the cultivation of corn and cotton; to the comforts of the fire-side; to the delights of home. This was the system of Washington and of Jefferson, steadily pursued by all their successors, and to which all your treaties and all your laws of intercourse with the Indian tribes were accommodated. The whole system is now broken up; and instead of it you have adopted that of expelling by force or by compact, all the Indian tribes from their own territories and dwellings, to a region beyond the Mississippi, beyond the Missouri, beyond the Arkansas, bordering upon Mexico; and there you have deluded them with the hope that they will find a permanent abode—a final resting-place from your never-ending rapacity and persecution. There you have undertaken to lead the willing and to drive the reluctant, by fraud or by force; by treaty, or by the sword and the rifle; all the remnants of the Seminoles, of the Creeks, of the Cherokees, of the Choctaws, and of how many other tribes I cannot now stop to enumerate. In the process of this violent and heartless operation, you have met with all the resistance which men in so helpless a condition as that of the Indian tribes could make. Of the immediate causes of the war we are not yet fully informed; but I fear you will find them, like the remote causes, all attributable to yourselves. It is in the last agonies of a people, forcibly torn and driven from the soil which they had inherited from their fathers, and which your own example, and exhortations, and instructions, and treaties, had riveted more closely to their hearts; it is in the last convulsive struggles of their despair, that this war has originated; and if it brings with it some portion of the retributive justice of heaven upon our own people, it is our melancholy duty to mitigate, as far as the public resources of the national treasury will permit, the distresses of the innocent of our own kindred and blood, suffering under the necessary consequences of our own wrong. I shall vote for the resolution.

[Note.—This speech was delivered without premeditation or notes. No report of it was made by any of the usual reporters for the newspapers. Mr. Adams has written it out, himself from recollection, at the request of several of his friends, for publication. It is, of course, not in the precise language used by him in the house. There is some amplification of the arguments which he used, and, perhaps, some omissions which have escaped his recollection. The substance of the speech is the same.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

U. S. SENATOR. On Friday the 17th inst. Richard H. Bayard, esq. was elected a senator of the U. States from Delaware, in place of the hon. Arnold Naudain, resigned. For Bayard 17, for James Booth 6; scattering 4.

In the senate on Friday the 17th inst. the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money, which had been ordered to be engrossed on the previous day, was passed by a vote of 38 yeas to 6 nays. On Monday last it was taken up in the house of representatives, and, after an ineffectual attempt to commit it to a committee of the whole with instructions to separate it into two bills, one to regulate the deposits, the other to provide for the distribution of the surplus revenue among the states, made the order of the day for the following day and every day thereafter, until disposed of. On Tuesday it was taken up and debated from 12 o'clock M. (excepting during the daily recess), to nearly nine, P. M. and, the 13th section having been stricken out, on motion of Mr. Anthony, and another substituted making the states mere depositories of the surplus revenue, was ordered to a third reading by a vote of 163 to 43, and read a third time and passed by a vote of 155 to 38. It was then returned to the senate—which promptly concurred in the amendment. The yeas and nays, and all important particulars, are given in subsequent pages. On Thursday last the bill was signed by the president, the amendment of Mr. Anthony having, as will be seen by the official statement of the Globe, published below, removed the constitutional objections which he entertained in relation to it as it passed the senate.

This is settled one of the most important questions which has for a long time agitated the public mind, and in a manner, we hope, that will forever allay those heart burnings and jealousies which have produced so much dissension among the states, and caused some of them to view the government as an unkind step-mother who distributes her favors with a partial hand. But the manner and the effect are not more commendable than was the necessity apparent, of making some disposition of the vast amount of money, (nearly forty millions) which is in charge of the deposit banks; for with all the vigilance the treasury department has used or could exert, it is not fair to suppose, from the nature of things, that that vast sum can be kept by so many agents, admitting they are honestly disposed to do their duty to the government, without considerable loss to the people. And, indeed, we will be agreeably disappointed if the "experiment," when tested in January next by a settlement of balances in the deposit banks, preparatory to a division of the surplus revenue, will not cause a "panic" founded upon real causes: for a great portion of the payments into the treasury must come from the borrowers from the deposit banks, which must have exercised great foresight if able to refund the deposits without pressing their creditors. The pressure may only be temporary, but will necessarily produce great derangement in the money market, and be destructive to many worthy individuals.

The Washington "Globe" of yesterday contains the following article, which it says it is warranted in saying embraces the views of the president on this interesting subject; and may therefore be regarded as an official exposition in advance of the detailed statement which it is intimated the president may hereafter lay before the people.

From the Washington Globe of yesterday.

The deposit bill has been approved by the president. The most important feature in this act is that which makes the several states the depositories of all the public moneys which may be in the treasury on the first of January next, over the sum of five millions of dollars, on their passing laws, pledging the faith of the states respectively to pay the warrants of the treasury in the manner prescribed. By an amendment introduced by an overwhelming majority of the house of representatives, all the features of the bill which went to make the proposed transfer of the money to the states a loan or gift, were struck out, and as the act now stands, they are to be mere depositories, like the banks in which the public moneys are now kept.

We hazard nothing in saying, that had the bill passed as it went from the senate, as anxious as the president was to see the public deposits regulated by law, and as painful as it would have been to separate on any subject from many of his most valued friends, it would have received his decisive veto. We have been surprised that any one who has read his annual message of 1829, and his veto messages on the Maysville road bill, and Mr. Clay's land bill, would for a moment anticipate any other result.

We are equally warranted in saying that the president has approved the amended bill, not because he thinks it judicious to make the states the depositories of the moneys of the United States, but because the plan is not obnoxious to constitutional objections; because it has been presented by a majority of the people's representatives, to whom the question of expediency on this subject peculiarly belongs; and because, by settling the question in relation to the public deposits, it disarms faction, and renders it more difficult for the money power to reorganize itself under the charter of a new national bank.

He thinks it impolitic and unsafe to mix up the affairs of the United States with those of the several states, and that the chances of perpetuity for our admirable system of government are increased in proportion to the clearness with which the lines which separate their several powers, duties and interests, are defined and maintained. It is probable he will take some fitting occasion to make known to his countrymen, in detail, the views he entertains on this vital subject. It is only necessary now that they should know, that in approving the deposit bill he does not intend to countenance, in the least degree, the idea of raising money by the general government for distribution among the states, thus lessening the responsibility of the state governments in taxing the people, and at the same time encouraging extravagant expenditures; making the states, instead of independent sovereignties, the mere stipendiaries of the general government; perverting the power of taxation given in the constitution to purposes never thought of by its framers; corrupting the sources of legislation; tending to consolidation; and ultimately destroying all that is pure and valuable in the structure and administration of our political system.

The president believes that it is bad policy, as well as unconstitutional, to raise money from the people for the purpose of distributing it among the states. He believes that when the revenues of the general government shall produce more than enough to supply its legitimate wants, it is the duty of congress forthwith to reduce the taxes upon the people. To collect for the purposes of distribution, is neither politic or economical. It is not politic, because it necessarily increases the corps of public officers, and consequently the influence of the government. It is not economical, because the people have to pay the salaries of those who manage the process and guaranty their integrity. Is it not better that the farmer's dollar should be left in his own pocket, than that it should be taken out by taxes, direct or indirect, and, after a year's detention, be handed back to him or to his state legislature, with a deduction of twenty cents to pay collectors and clerks who have been employed to take it away and bring it back? The same principles apply to all classes of society and to society itself, with the exception of those only who profit by high taxes.

INDIAN NEWS. We have a vast mass of articles before us in relation to the progress of the Indian war—but the accounts are so vague and contradictory that it is almost impossible to arrive at the truth. The only event in Florida, we see stated, that can be relied on, is an account of an attack by the troops under major Heilman, upon a body of 150 Indians near Micanopy, in which the latter were defeated with the loss of several warriors. Maj. H. had four men wounded but none killed.

Gen. Clinch, recently appointed to the command of all the forces, was expected daily at St. Augustine. A company of mounted volunteers had arrived, under the command of captain Curry, and had been mustered into the service for six months. The Indians had captured a considerable number of cattle.

It was reported at Augusta on the 17th, that, on the 14th, a body of two thousand Indians had crossed the Chatahoochee, near Roanoke, on their way to Florida, and had killed some white men in Stewart county.

The Mobile Chronicle, of the 8th, states that the 21 Indians, taken prisoners of war and lodged in jail at Montgomery, had made their escape. The jail is described as a miserable old building without any guard.

Several of the Georgia papers speak very incredulously of the reported Indian massacres, and intimate pretty broadly that the war is carried on rather against than by them. There was quite a distressing account, setting forth how the Gwinnett troop had been attacked by a large body of the savages, and all killed except three—but it was afterward said, with more appearance of truth, that only three had been killed. A well-written letter, dated at Dahlonega, Lumpkin county, June 11, says that the Cherokees are indeed restless, but not more so than they have been for years, and scouts the idea of their proceeding to hostilities. The deputation from that nation, now at Washington, has also denied the existence of a hostile feeling to the whites among the Cherokees.

Gen. Scott was indisposed at the last accounts.

Major Gates was recently stricken from the rolls of the army of the United States by the president, on the reception of the proceedings of the court of inquiry, called at the instance of major Gates, to investigate his conduct subsequent to the attack on Volusia, on the St. Johns' river in Florida, in April last. We will publish the proceedings of the court, &c. in our next.

The "Intelligencer" of Thursday says—In the brief debate yesterday in the senate upon the amendment made by the house to the senate bill, Mr. Clay took occasion to express his approbation of the amendment, upon its merits, as an improvement of the bill. But, were he less satisfied, he intimated he should yet vote for it out of his tenderness for constitutional scruples entertained elsewhere, which it was supposed the amendment would have the effect to remove.

Col. Wharton, one of the Texian commissioners, has, over his own signature, contradicted the rumor that there was a project on foot to deprive gen. Houston of the command of the army and place gen. Hamilton, of S. C. at the head of it. Gen. Hamilton has, also, in a letter to the editor of the Charleston Mercury, indignantly repelled the imputation that he had knowledge of or sanctioned such a plot.

Albion K. Parris, of Maine, has been appointed second comptroller of the treasury, in the place of Mr. Thornton, appointed charge to Peru.

A duel was fought near Washington on Thursday last between two officers of the navy, in which one of them was killed at the second fire.

ARMY GENERAL ORDER.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, May 26, 1836.

Should major general Scott and brigadier general Clinch not continue on duty in Florida, governor Call, under instructions from the war department, is, in such event, authorised to take command of the regular troops of the United States, and of the militia serving in Florida. The orders of the governor of Florida will be obeyed accordingly; and his requisitions on the several departments of the general staff will be promptly complied with. By order: R. JONES, adjutant general.

The absence of major general Scott from Florida, who is now commanding in the Creek nation, and the resignation of general Clinch, which, we understand, has been accepted by the president, places the conduct of the campaign with the governor of the territory, as seen by the above "general order." [Globe.]

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL. Our readers will perceive by the legislative proceedings in our paper of to-day that the bill to authorise the final settlement of the controversy between the Chesapeake and Delaware canal company, John Randel, Junior, and its other creditors, passed both houses of the legislature by a unanimous vote. The bill carries out all the suggestions of the governor's message, a perusal of which will make any one acquainted with the details of the law. All parties, whether stockholders or creditors, are now fully satisfied.

The controversy has terminated in a settlement upon just and equitable principles. What is best of all, the public will rejoice to learn, that this canal, which is one of the most splendid and useful of all the works of internal improvement in this country, is now open for vessels drawing from six to seven feet water; and by this arrangement, is now free for ever from any obstruction to the navigation. The trade of the canal is said to have doubled beyond any thing known, before this arrangement was made. [Newcastle Gaz.]

Mr. Brooks, in one of his late letters from Europe, thus speaks:

"Newspapers are precious and scarce. The postage is immense. A stray Galgiani (an English newspaper printed in Paris), may now and then be seen, and the sight of one is a precious treasure; but almost all I learn from the United States is in the little journals of Italy, which are about as large as one-eighth part of the National Intelligencer of Washington. They tell me the union is breaking up; that riots and rows are desolating the whole land; that the slaves are rebelling, and that a servile war is threatened. And they rejoice loudly, as they hold up this admonition of the folly of men attempting to govern themselves. Nothing so much delights them as this last demonstration, as they call it, of the impossibility of a republic, even when founded under the most favorable circumstances. The Lynch laws particularly delight them. The Mississippi gamblers, lynched as they were, are nevertheless compensated with an immortality in every despot's journal in Europe. The slave missionaries are wearing a crown of glory here, as martyrs of a mad democracy. How true all these things are, I have no means of telling; for all I see is in the little Italian journals, which are particularly occupied with such of our affairs as tend to discredit all republican institutions. And, perhaps, one of the greatest pleasures of travelling is to read such news of one's own country in a foreign land, particularly when it is probable that all is at least founded on fact. The emperor of Austria, it is said, has seized this occasion to inspire his Italian subjects with a horror of all republican institutions, by making it optional with some state prisoners in Italy—whether they will choose the punishment of death at home, or banishment to the United States!"

THE GREAT CARVER CLAIM. It is well known that a claim exists to an immense tract of country, partly within the limits of the United States, situated mostly on the upper waters of the Mississippi. The foundation of the claim, we believe, is this: In the years 1766 and 1767, Jonathan Carver, a native of Connecticut, a man of enterprise and of a speculative disposition undertook to explore the vast unknown territory then recently acquired by the English from the French, by the conquest of Canada. He spent a year or two in examining the country around the upper branches of the Mississippi, Lake Superior, &c. and in becoming acquainted with the customs and manners of the savage inhabitants. He had hoped to discover and establish a line of communication between Hudson's bay and the Pacific ocean, and thus open a shorter and safer route for the English trade to China and the East India settlements. He was obliged to return, however, without effecting his object. During his stay he purchased of the Indian chiefs residing near the falls of St. Anthony, on the Mississippi, a tract of land, the boundary line of which commenced at the falls of St. Anthony and went down to Lake Pepin; thence five days journey west, to another specified limit; thence six days journey north to another specified limit, and thence back to the starting point. A day's journey was understood to mean about twenty miles. After obtaining this grant from the Indians, it is said that Carver went to England and obtained a confirmation from the English government. The tract, so easily obtained by Carver, is large enough for the basis of an independent state, comprising, as it does, thousands of square miles of fertile territory, watered by noble streams. It lies near the greatest mining district in the world, and is supposed to contain inexhaustible mineral treasures. Notwithstanding the possession of this vast estate, with an area larger than that of many European kingdoms, Carver died in England, in the year 1780, in a state of the utmost destitution. He left a wife and six or seven children in this country.

Some of his descendants reside in Deerfield and Montague, in the state of Massachusetts. Deeds of portions of this tract have been repeatedly given during the last fifty years by heirs in Deerfield and elsewhere, and a number of townships on the tract have lately been settled by persons claiming under these deeds. The utmost confidence is felt by many in the validity of the title; and at any rate the prize is sufficiently splendid to be well worth a contest. The Greenfield Mercury, from which we glean most of these particulars, states that some excitement exists in some parts of that county and elsewhere, in respect to this great land claim, which the recent rapid settlement of the west has brought into notice and importance.

[Boston Times.]

.. NIAGARA FALLS FOR SALE. Mr. Rathburn and the other proprietors of the village of Niagara Falls, offer for sale in the Black Rock Advocate, this valuable property with its admirable water facilities. The water and manufacturing facilities of this tremendous torrent of all the contents of the great lakes above falling down a precipice of 150 feet, are no doubt immense enough to satisfy the ambition of the most ultra-tariff man. Combining also a scenery which for grandeur and sublimity, is unequalled in the world, and which would make a paradise for a Shakspeare, a Goethe, or a Byron, if poets unfortunately were not all too miserably poor to purchase even the meanest garret, much less such a home as this.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 16. Some errors having occurred in the Intelligencer's report of this day's proceedings, in consequence of the situation of the reporter, which places it out of his power to state, at all times, with desirable precision, motions made for amendments, &c. the editors have published an account of the proceedings on the deposit bill, made up from the official journal of the senate—which we also publish that our abstract of the proceedings, which was copied from the Intelligencer, may stand corrected, viz:

The senate resumed, as in committee of the whole, (Mr. King, of Alabama, in the chair), the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

On motion of Mr. Wright, that the bill, the substitute reported by the select committee, and all the amendments made to the same in committee of the whole, be recommitted to the committee on finance, with instructions to separate those portions of the bill which regulate the deposits of the public money in the banks from those portions which propose a distribution of the public money to the states, or a deposit of that surplus with the states, and to bring in two bills embracing each class of the provisions separated from each other, the vote was, as already stated, yeas 21, nays 25. So the motion was lost.

On motion by Mr. Walker, to amend the reported amendment by striking out the words "amounts of population as ascertained by the last census, according to the provision of the second section of the first article of the constitution," and inserting "representation in the senate and house of representatives of the congress of the United States," it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 22.

On motion by Mr. Wright, to amend the reported amendment by striking out the 13th and 14th sections thereof, and inserting the following:

"Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners of the sinking fund be hereby authorised and directed, at the commencement of every quarter of the year, to examine into the condition of the treasury, and the probable amount of receipts and expenditures during that quarter; and if, in their opinion, the money in treasury during the quarter will generally exceed ——— millions of dollars, it shall be their duty to cause the sum equal to the supposed excess to be drawn out of the treasury and invested, in the name and on the behalf of the United States, in stocks or other securities issued by or on behalf of some one of the states of this union, bearing upon their face the guaranty of the faith and credit of the state issuing the same for the payment of the interest and the final redemption of the principal of the said stocks or other securities; and being also upon their face transferable by assignment, or in some other manner, at the pleasure of the holder; and in case the said commissioners, upon any such examination into the condition of the treasury at the commencement of any quarter, shall be satisfied that the money in the treasury, for that quarter, will generally fall short of the sum above specified, then it shall be their duty to order a sale or sales of such part or portion of any such stocks or other securities owned by the United States, as will produce a sufficient sum to make up the supposed deficiency, the proceeds whereof shall be paid into the treasury.

"Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners of the sinking fund shall be governed, in making such investments or sales, by the current and customary prices of stocks in the commercial cities of the United States. And, at the commencement of every year, said commissioners shall make a detailed report to congress of all their doings and proceedings under the provisions of this act."

The question on this proposed amendment was determined in the negative—yeas 4, nays 39.

On motion by Mr. Benton, to amend the reported amendment by striking out (Sec. 13, line 5), the words "deposited with," and inserting "loaned to," it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 37.

The amendment reported by the committee having been agreed to by the committee of the whole, and reported to the house—

On motion by Mr. Webster, to amend the reported amendment by striking out of Sec. 13, line 6, the words "representation in the senate and house of representatives of the congress of the United States," and inserting, in lieu thereof, "amounts of population as ascertained by the last census," it was determined in the negative—yeas 23, nays 23.

On motion by Mr. Tipton, to amend the bill by striking out the 11th section, as follows:

"Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That whenever the amount of public deposits in any bank shall, for a whole quarter of a year, exceed the one-fourth part of the amount of the capital stock of such bank actually paid in, the banks shall allow and pay to the United States, for the use of the excess of the deposits over the one-fourth part of its capital, an interest at the rate of two per centum per annum, to be calculated, for each quarter, upon the average excesses of the quarter; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury, at the close of each quarter, to cause the amounts on deposit in each deposit bank for the quarter, to be examined and ascertained, and to see that all sums of interest accruing under the provisions of this section are, by the banks respectively, passed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States in his accounts with the respective banks."

The question on this proposed amendment was decided in the negative—yeas 7, nays 39.

On motion by Mr. Walker, to amend the reported amendment by inserting at the end of the 14th section these words: "Provided, also, that the amount directed by this act to be deposited with the state of Mississippi, be and remain deposited, without interest, in the Planter's bank of the state of Mississippi, until time be afforded for passing an act by the legislature of the state of Mississippi, authorising the receipt of the portion of that state under the provisions of this act."

The question on this amendment was decided in the negative—yeas 21, nays 24.

On motion by Mr. Black, to amend the reported amendment by striking out the 13th and 14th sections as follows:

"Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the treasury of the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving the sum of ——— millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several states, in proportion to their respective representation in the senate and house of representatives of the congress of the U. States; and the secretary of the treasury shall deliver the same to such persons as the several states may authorise to receive it, on receiving certificates of deposit, signed by the competent authorities of such state, each for such amount and in such form as the secretary of the treasury may prescribe, which shall set forth and express the obligation of the state to pay the amount thereof to the United States, or their assigns; and which said certificates it shall be competent for the secretary of the treasury, in the name and behalf of the U. States, to sell and assign, whenever so directed by any act of congress, all sales and assignments, however, to be ratable, and in just and equal proportions, among all the states, according to the amounts received by them, respectively; and all such certificates of deposit shall be subject to, and shall bear an interest of five per centum per annum, payable half-yearly, from the time of such sale and assignment; and shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the states issuing the same.

"Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said deposits shall be made with the said states, in the following proportions, and at the following times, viz: one quarter part on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, or as soon thereafter as may be; one quarter part on the first day of April, one quarter part on the first day of July, and one quarter part on the first day of October, all in the same year."

The question on this proposed amendment was decided in the negative—yeas 7, nays 39.

The reported amendment was then agreed to, and the bill, as amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 40, nays 6.

June 17. The chair laid before the senate a communication from the hon. Arnold Naudain, of Delaware, resigning his seat in the senate of the United States.

After the transaction of some business of minor importance, the bill supplementary to the act making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1836 was taken up and passed, as was the bill to authorise the governor and legislative council of Florida to sell the lands granted to that territory for the support of seminaries of learning.

The engrossed bill to regulate the deposits of the public money, &c. was read a third time; and the question being on its passage, Mr. Wright made some remarks in opposition to the bill, in the course of which he introduced some calculations of the appropriations already made, and those which remain to be made, in order to show that, at the end of the present year, the whole of the revenue, ordinary and surplus, will be consumed.

Mr. Calhoun made some remarks, in reply, on the extravagance of the administration, which had raised the annual expenditures from twenty-two millions to sixty-six millions. He regretted that the bill had not passed unanimously, which would have been a proud monument to our patriotism. Such would have been the case had the friends of the bill received the aid of the senator from New York. Mr. Walker defended the ratio of distribution which he had offered from the attack made on it by the senator from New York. Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Webster addressed the senate, after which Mr. Benton moved to lay the bill on the table until the important appropriation bills should have been acted on. He withdrew the motion, while Mr. Rives spoke in favor of the bill, at some length. Mr. Tallmadge followed in a series of remarks also in favor of the bill. Mr. Wright made some remarks in explanation of several things that had fallen during the debate, and in opposition to the bill. Mr. Shepley said he had wished to state the reasons of his vote, but would take some other occasion, and hoped the question would be taken at once. Mr. Clay took the floor, and spoke at length in favor of the bill, and in general congratulation of the determination which seemed to pervade the senate, without distinction of party, to check extravagant expenditures and provided for the safety of the public moneys. Mr. Niles made a few remarks. Mr. Calhoun expressed a hope that the harmony of the debate would not be disturbed. He thought there was no mischief in the measure, and it was a mere measure of precaution. Mr. Webster called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Cuthbert, Grundy, Walker, Wright—6.

The senate then adjourned.

June 18. Mr. Morris being absent yesterday when the vote was taken on the passage of the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money, asked for leave to record his vote in the affirmative, and leave was granted. After the disposition of a number of petitions, bills, &c. chiefly of a private character,

Mr. Clay, from the committee on foreign relations, to whom were referred the resolutions of the legislature of Connecticut, and a number of memorials and petitions from various quarters, praying for the recognition of the independence of Texas, made the following report:

The committee on foreign relations, to whom were referred resolutions of the legislature of Connecticut, sundry memorials, and other proceedings of various meetings of the people, all recommending the recognition of the independence of Texas, has, according to order, had them under consideration, and now beg leave to submit to the senate the following report and resolution:

The right of one independent power to recognise the fact of the existence of a new power, about to assume a position among the nations of the earth, is incontestable. It is founded upon another right—that which appertains to every sovereignty to take care of its own interests, by establishing and cultivating such commercial or other relations with the new power as may be deemed expedient. Its exercise gives no just ground of umbrage or cause of war. The policy which has hitherto guided the government of the United States in respect to new powers has been to act on the fact of their existence, without regard to their origin, whether that has been by the subversion of a pre-existing government, or by the violent or voluntary separation of one from another part of a common nation. In cases where an old established nation has thought proper to change the form of its government, the United States, conforming to the rules which has ever governed their conduct, of strictly abstaining from all interference in the domestic concerns of other states, have not stopped to inquire whether the new government has been rightfully adopted or not. It has been sufficient for them that it is in fact the government of the country in practical operation. There is, however, a marked difference in the instances of an old nation which has altered the form of its government, and a newly-organized power which has just sprung into existence. In the former case, (such, for example, as was that of France), the nation had existed for ages as a separate and independent community. It is matter of history; and the recognition of its new governments was not necessary to denote the existence of the nation; but, with respect to new powers, the recognition of their governments comprehends, first, an acknowledgment of their ability to exist as independent states, and, secondly, the capacity of their particular governments to perform the duties and fulfil the obligations towards foreign powers incident to their new condition. Hence, more caution and deliberation are necessary in considering and determining the question of the acknowledgment of a new power than that of the new government of an old power.

The government of the United States has taken no part in the contest which has unhappily existed between Texas and Mexico. It has avowed its intention, and taken measures to maintain a strict neutrality towards the belligerents. If individual citizens of the United States, impelled by sympathy for those who were believed to be struggling for liberty and independence against oppression and tyranny, have engaged in the contest, it has been without the authority of their government. On the contrary, the laws which have been hitherto found necessary or expedient to prevent citizens of the United States from taking part in foreign wars have been directed to be enforced.

Sentiments of sympathy and devotion to civil liberty, which have always animated the people of the United States, have prompted the adoption of the resolutions and other manifestations of popular feeling which have been referred to the committee, recommending an acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. The committee shares fully in all these sentiments; but a wise and prudent government should not act solely on the impulse of feeling, however natural and laudable it may be. It ought to avoid all precipitation, and not adopt so grave a measure as that of recognizing the independence of a new power until it has satisfactory information, and has fully deliberated.

The committee has no information respecting the recent movements in Texas, except such as is derived from the public prints. According to that, the war broke out in Texas last autumn. Its professed object, like that of our revolutionary contest in the commencement, was not separation and independence, but a redress of grievances. In March last, independence was proclaimed, and a constitution and form of government were established. No means of ascertaining accurately the exact amount of the population of Texas are at the command of the committee. It has been estimated at some sixty or seventy thousand souls. Nor are the precise limits of the country which passes under the denomination of Texas known to the committee. They are probably not clearly defined, but they are supposed to be extensive, and sufficiently large, when peopled, to form a respectable power.

If the population is small; if, when compared with that of the United Mexican States, amounting probably to not less than eight millions of souls, the contest has been unequal, it has nevertheless, been maintained by Texas with uncommon resolution, undaunted valor, and eminent success. And the recent signal and splendid victory in which that portion of the Mexican army which was commanded by gen. Santa Ana, the president of the Mexican government, in person, was entirely overthrown, with unexampled slaughter, compared with the considerable loss on the other side, put to flight and captured, including among the prisoners the president himself and his staff, may be considered as decisive of the independence of Texas. That memorable event will probably be followed by negotiations which may lead to the acknowledgment by Mexico of the independence of Texas, and the settlement of its boundaries. And, under all circumstances, it might, perhaps, be more conformable with the amicable relations subsisting between the U. States and the United Mexican States, that the latter should precede the former in the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. But if the war should be protracted, or if there should be unreasonable delay on the part of the Mexican government, the government of the U. States ought not to await its action.

The recognition of Texas as an independent power may be made by the United States in various ways: 1st, by treaty; 2d, by the passage of a law regulating commercial intercourse between the two powers; 3d, by sending a diplomatic agent to Texas, with the usual credentials; or, lastly, by the executive receiving and accrediting a diplomatic representative from Texas, which would be a recognition as far as the executive only is competent to make it. In the first and third modes the concurrence of the senate, in its executive character, would be necessary; and, in the second, in its legislative character. The senate alone, without the co-operation of some other branch of the government, is not competent to recognise the existence of any power.

The president of the United States, by the constitution, has the charge of their foreign intercourse. Regularly he ought to take the initiative in the acknowledgment of the independence of any new power. But, in this case, he has not yet done it, for reasons which he, without doubt, deems sufficient. If, in any instance, the president should be tardy, he may be quickened in the exercise of his power by the expression of the opinion, or by other acts, of one or both branches of congress, as was done in relation to the republics formed out of Spanish America. But the committee does not think that, on this occasion, any tardiness is justly imputable to the executive. About three months only have elapsed since the establishment of an independent government in Texas; and it is not unreasonable to wait a short time to see what its operation will be, and especially whether it will afford those guaranties which foreign powers have a right to expect before they institute relations with it.

Taking this view of the whole matter, the committee conclude by recommending to the senate the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

Mr. Clay stated that the committee, he was happy to inform the senate, had been unanimous in their sanction of this report. He did not know that it was very important that the resolution should be acted on at this session. Yet, as there might be gentlemen who would desire to give their views on the subject, he would move that the report be printed, and made the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. Preston, in a tone which did not reach us in our remote position, expressed his acquiescence in the motion, and his wish that a resolution offered by him some days since, calling on the president for a communication on the subject of any correspondence between him and the government or agents of Texas, on the subject of the condition, administration, &c. of Texas. The senate would then be able to decide whether any further action was necessary.

Mr. Clay said he hoped the resolution would be taken up. It would be very desirable to have the information which it asked for, in order to determine if any stronger measure was necessary than that now reported.

The motion of Mr. Clay was agreed to.

The resolution offered by Mr. Preston was then taken up and agreed to.

Some time was spent in the consideration of bills for personal or local objects, after which the senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, went into the consideration of executive business; and having remained a short time in secret session, adjourned.

June 20. The chair presented the credentials of Richard Bayard, elected U. States senator, by the legislature of the state of Delaware, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the hon. Arnold Naudain. Mr. Bayard then appeared, and took the requisite oath and his seat.

The chair laid before the senate a communication from the secretary of the treasury, enclosing a report on the transactions of the mint, under the act of 1792.

Mr. Webster, from the committee on finance, to which was referred a resolution (Mr. Hubbard's) instructing the committee to inquire if the course pursued by the territorial legislature of Florida concerning the incorporation of banks did not require the interference of congress, and into the number of banking institutions in Florida established within the last three years, reported that the committee had attended to this business, and had come to a decision that the state of the banking institutions does require the attention of congress. He was, therefore, instructed to report a bill and joint resolution. It was certain that laws had been passed by the territorial legislature which should be disapproved and annulled. There was no doubt that congress had the power to disapprove or annul, although there might arise a question, in some cases, where the property to be acted on may have passed into the hands of a third person.—Such had been the lax state of the legislation in Florida on this subject, that persons having capital had gone thither expecting that, by the passage of extraordinary laws with unusual privileges, they might use their capital with greater advantage. Mr. W. concluded with reporting—

An act to prohibit the passage of acts incorporating banks in Florida, without the sanction of congress, and disapproving and annulling certain laws therein named.

A joint resolution disapproving of certain charters, &c.

The bill and joint resolution were read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Webster gave notice, that he should ask the senate on Thursday so take up these subjects.

After the reception of several other reports on the prayers of individuals, the senate, on motion of Mr. Grundy, took up the bill to change the organization of the post office department, the question being on non-concurring with the committee in an amendment by which the 43d and 44th sections were inserted, it was agreed to.

Mr. Grundy then moved to strike out the 43d and 44th sections. [These are the sections which relate to the taxes on the post office.] Mr. Davis offered to amend the motion by inserting as a substitute several sections making it lawful for postmasters in each village, town or city, to erect office boxes, evaluating the price of those boxes in proportion to the population of the town or city, viz: boxes in cities or towns containing less than ten thousand inhabitants to be rented at any sum not exceeding one dollar each a year; those in towns or cities containing more than ten thousand inhabitants and less than twenty thousand, at a sum not exceeding one dollar and fifty cents a year; those in towns or cities containing more than twenty thousand inhabitants, at a sum not exceeding two dollars a year.

The expense of erecting the boxes to be defrayed therefrom to be returned to the post office department. The several deputy postmasters, except in the cities of New York and New Orleans, may, in addition to the other allowances made to them by law for their services, detain for their own use the revenue arising from said boxes, provided such revenue, when added to the other emoluments, shall not exceed the sum of thirty-five hundred dollars in a year; in which case, the balance shall be paid as other revenues to the general post office. The deputy postmasters may detain in their respective hands from the revenue of said boxes until that, with their other emoluments, amounts respectively to four thousand dollars.

A debate now ensued in which the merits of the proposition were discussed at some length; when, finally, Mr. Grundy's proposition to strike out was carried—ayes 25. The question was next taken on Mr. Davis' motion to amend, which was lost—ayes 16, noes 23. Mr. Buchanan then moved the following amendment: "Be it enacted, That each post-master and deputy post-master shall make quarterly returns of the amount received by him for the rent of boxes; and if the same shall exceed the sum of two thousand dollars per annum, he shall account for and pay over the excess." Mr. Grundy opposed this amendment. He thought the postage on letters too high, and wished this subject to stand over to the next session and that the amendment could be withdrawn. Mr. Buchanan refused to withdraw it; Mr. Webster then called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Clay said this matter of perquisites was inconsistent with the genius of our government. He knew these perquisites existed, but he had never dreamt that the senate would have been seriously engaged in regulating these perquisites. They might as well undertake to regulate the perquisites of custom house officers. If a postmaster receives 1,000 dollars salary, and by means of his exactions can make another 1,000, the law is now to be changed so as to give him authority to do so. He was glad to find that the attention of the popular branch had been called to the subject, and that they had arrested this official abuse in the beginning. Mr. Grundy said that the boxes had been established at Boston above forty years ago. He wished the subject to remain over until the next session. Mr. Davis said this was a beginning of legal enactments on the subject, and he should, therefore, vote against the amendment. The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Grundy, and decided in the negative—ayes 15, noes 29.

Mr. Preston moved to amend the bill by introducing a provision that the postmaster general shall keep all offers for contracts in a well bound volume, which shall also be reported to congress and published; which was agreed to. The amendment was agreed to; the bill was then reported to the senate as amended, the amendments concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The message of the president of the United States, returning the bill to fix the day for the annual meeting of congress, &c. being the special order, was, on motion of Mr. Clayton, postponed till to-morrow, and made the special order for that day. The bills from the house on the table were read twice, and referred. The several bills ordered to a third reading were read a third time, and passed.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States.

The question being on the amendment reported by the committee on military affairs as a substitute for the whole of the original bill,

The amendment was agreed to as in committee of the whole, and the bill, as amended, was reported to the senate.

Mr. Clay moved to strike out the first section of the bill. Mr. Benton asked for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were accordingly ordered. Mr. Calhoun required an estimate of the increased expense of the military establishment. Mr. Benton replied that the cost per man was already fixed by law, and that the increase of cost was so easily obtained by the amount of the increase of number, that he had not thought it worth while to make any estimate. Mr. Preston expressed a desire to increase the army sufficiently to tranquillize the feelings of that part of the country which had been under apprehensions of danger, provided the cost to the country should not be too burdensome. He stated that the increase of expense was to be reckoned by the rank and file, as the officers had not been increased. Messrs. Crittenden, Linn and Calhoun made some observations; after which, the question was taken on the motion to strike out the first section, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, Kent, Knight, Prentiss, Southard—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, Linn, Mangum, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

On motion of Mr. Preston, sections 12, 13 and 14, including the provisions for the increase of the ordnance department, were stricken out. On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the 15th and 16th sections relating to changes in the quartermaster's department, were stricken out. On motion of Mr. Nicholas, the 17th, 18th, and 20th sections were stricken out.

The bill was further amended by the insertion of a proviso, on motion of Mr. Calhoun.

The question being on the engrossment of the bill, the yeas and nays were taken, and it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Shepley, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Kent, Knight, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—8.

Mr. Ruggles moved to postpone the orders to take up the bill to provide for the erection of a building for a patent office, which was agreed to—yeas 19. Some debate took place on this bill, which proposes to expend $180,000 in the building of a patent office; but before any question was taken, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate adjourned.

June 21. Mr. McKean presented the joint resolutions of the legislature of Pennsylvania, in favor of an equitable distribution of the surplus revenue among the states; which were read, laid upon the table and ordered to be printed. [For the resolutions see page 291.]

After the reception and disposal of several reports and resolutions which will be duly noticed hereafter, the bill to reorganize the general post office department was read a third time and passed.

A bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States was also read a third time and passed.

[This bill, as it has been amended, provides that there shall be added to each company of artillery of the army one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, two corporals, and twenty-seven privates; and to each company of infantry one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, one sergeant, two corporals, and thirty privates; and to each company of dragoons one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, and one saddler. The present regimental sergeants-major and quartermaster-sergeants, and first sergeants, to be discontinued, and in lieu thereof there shall be appointed, for each regiment, two sub-adjutants, with the rank, pay and emoluments of cadets. The bill further authorises the president to assign to any officer of the army, when necessary, the duties of paymaster; and provides that five additional surgeons and ten additional assistant surgeons to the army be appointed. The bill also authorises the president, when deemed expedient, to cause one of the regiments of infantry to be armed and equipped and to serve as a regiment of riflemen, and another regiment to be equipped and serve as a regiment of light infantry.]

The senate then proceeded, as in committee of the whole, to consider a large number of bills principally of a private nature.

[Among those of general interest was the bill organizing the navy of the United States, which was amended, on motion of Mr. Southard, by striking out "fifty" surgeons and inserting "sixty"—and the question being on its engrossment, it was, on motion of Mr. Buchanan, laid on the table.]

On motion of Mr. Shepley, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time had been passed with closed doors, the senate adjourned.

June 22. After the usual morning business, the senate, on motion of Mr. Webster, proceeded to consider the amendment made by the house to the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money. The amendment having been read, Mr. Calhoun moved to lay it on the table to allow time for examination. The motion was agreed to. The senate then considered the amendments to the bill granting lands to the state of Alabama for purposes specified therein—which were concurred in.

Mr. Calhoun now moved that the senate proceed to consider the amendment to the deposit bill, which motion was agreed to. He then moved that the senate concur in the amendment. This motion gave rise to a brief debate in which Messrs. Webster, Morris, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, White, Ewing, Benton and King, of Ala. participated. The amendment was then concurred in.

The senate then took up the message of the president, returning, with his objections, the bill to change the time of meeting of congress. The question being on the passage of the bill, the objections of the president thereto notwithstanding, a debate ensued in which Messrs. Clayton, Webster, Preston, Bayard, Clay, Leigh, Calhoun, spoke against and Messrs. Rives and Shepley in favor of the president's views.

The bill was then laid on the table until to-morrow. Some business of minor importance was next transacted: after which the senate went into the consideration of executive business; and having spent some time therein, the doors were opened, several private bills were considered and ordered to a third reading, and then the senate adjourned.

June 23. But little business of importance was transacted this day. We will, however, give the details in our next that the journal may be complete.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, June 16. [Continuation of the proceedings at the evening session.] The question, after some remarks from Mr. E. Whittlesey, urging the house to dispose of this subject, and proceed to the bills in which the western country was interested, was taken, on the motion of Mr. Hard, to reduce the appropriation for repairs of fortifications, &c. from 200,000 to 100,000 dollars, and was determined in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 88. Mr. Robertson moved to strike out the words "for the purchase of additional land." After some remarks from Messrs. Cambreleng, Hardin, Mason, of Va. McKay and Wise, the motion was lost. The amendment of the committee, as amended in the house, was then agreed to. Mr. Cambreleng proposed an amendment to the amendment appropriating $700,000 for the arming of fortifications, by inserting in detail the names of many articles necessary for that purpose.

At 8 o'clock, P. M. without further question, an adjournment was called for, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 76, noes 73. So the house adjourned.

Friday, June 17. Mr. Jarvis, from the committee on the public buildings, reported, without amendment, the joint resolution from the senate, to furnish the vacant panels in the rotundo of the capitol with four historical paintings, by American artists; which, by general consent, was read a third time, and passed.

The house next took up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the relief of Ellen A. Snuck was rejected—when the merits of the bill were discussed, after which the question was taken and the motion lost.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng the rule setting apart this day for the consideration of private business was suspended, and the house took up the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1836. Mr. Cambreleng then withdrew the amendment he had offered yesterday.

The question now being on concurring in the amendment of the committee of the whole, appropriating 700,000 dollars, in addition, for the arming of the fortifications, provided the president be authorised to expend such portion of the sum as may be necessary therefor, in establishing a national foundry. Mr. Bond opposed the amendment at some length. Mr. Drown-goole moved to amend the amendment in such manner as to appropriate 75,000 dollars of the above sum towards the establishment of a national foundry at the city of Washington, and 10,000 for the purchase of land in the vicinity of the same. A discussion now ensued which occupied a considerable portion of the time of the house, during which an appeal was taken from a decision of the chair, which decision was sustained. Finally the yeas and nays were ordered and the amendment rejected, only 27 voting in favor of it.

The house then took a recess.

Evening session. The fortification bill was again taken up. The proposed amendment of $700,000 for the arming of fortifications, &c. was reduced, after a long debate, to $400,000, and was then adopted. The other amendments reported from the committee were agreed to, after more or less discussion. The bill having been gone through with, Mr. Hawes moved to reduce the appropriation for the forts in Boston harbor from $200,000 to $150,000, inasmuch as the appropriation for Charleston had been reduced. The motion was agreed to. Motions were made to reduce other items of appropriation. Mr. Vandervoort said it was apparent that a system of razeing was to be carried through the bill, and he moved the previous question, which was seconded. The main question was then put, and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time this day. The house about nine o'clock adjourned.

Saturday, June 18. On motion of Mr. Jarvis, the committee of the whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for the completion of vessels of war upon the stocks, and for repairing and equipping those in ordinary; and the same was recommitted to the committee on naval affairs.

Mr. Jarvis, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill to provide for the peace establishment of the navy, and a bill making appropriations for repairing and equipping vessels in ordinary, and for building two brigs and three steam vessels; which were read twice, and committed. Several motions to take up different subjects out of their order were rejected.

Mr. McKay moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of enabling him to offer the following resolutions—but the yeas and nays having been ordered, the house refused to suspend them—yeas 121, nays 70. Not two-thirds.

Resolved, That the revenue receivable under the present laws is, and will be more than is required for the fair and legitimate wants of the government, and that provision ought to be made for its reduction.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury report to this house, at the commencement of the next session, what alteration can be made in the existing tariff of duties, consistently with the principles of the several acts imposing duties upon imports, with a view to reduction.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury also report upon the best mode of diminishing the revenue arising from the public lands, without retarding the settlement of the new states, or impairing the interests of the general government; and generally his views as to the best mode of reducing the revenue to the fair and constitutional wants of the government.

After several bills and reports had been received and disposed of, Mr. Patton moved to take up the bill from the senate "to regulate the deposits of the public moneys of the United States," with the view to make it the special order for next week. Mr. Briggs called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered and the motion lost—yeas 129, nays 67; not two-thirds.

On motion of Mr. Bell, the house went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, in the chair), and took up "the bill to provide for the adjustment of certain claims and reservations of land, under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians." The bill having been read, the committee rose, and reported the same to the house, without amendment, and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It was subsequently read a third time and passed. The bill to extend the pension system, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day, was taken up, and, after a variety of motions, finally passed—yeas 109, nays 75.

After the passage of the bill, Mr. Jarvis moved a reconsideration of the vote—which motion was lost.

A private bill was next disposed of, after which, on motion of Mr. Ash, the house adjourned.

Monday, June 20. Mr. Lane moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the bill from the senate "to regulate the deposits of the public money," and thereupon asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered. A call of the house having been ordered, and a question of order considered and decided by the speaker, by general consent the bill was taken up and the question being on its commitment, Mr. Dickerson moved to add to the motion to commit the bill to a committee of the whole, with instructions to separate the same into two bills, so that the first should regulate the deposit of the public moneys, and the second should provide for the distribution of the surplus among the states.

Mr. Dickerson said he was in favor of the whole bill, but thought if both propositions were acted on jointly it might be placed in jeopardy; for a majority of members might be willing to vote for one and not the other proposition; and intimated that the president might approve of that portion of the bill relating to the deposits, but veto the whole if the proposition for the distribution of the revenue was connected with it, &c. Mr. Denny thought the proposition to divide fatal to the whole bill. The gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. Dickerson), he said, had gone, apparently, on the ground that there were two bills, instead of one; but he could see only one entire proposition for the disposition of the public money; and he did not see how it could be divided. There would not be time during the session to mature two bills, and obtain the action of the senate upon them separately. He thought that all those who wished to pass the bill would keep the two propositions together.

Mr. McKenna said he was utterly opposed to separating the two propositions; and he would appeal to the friends of the bill not to take up time in debating this preliminary motion. All the house had to do at this period of the session was to vote.

Mr. Speight considered the bill as clearly embracing two distinct propositions. He was in favor of that for regulating the deposits, but was opposed to the other. A principal objection to it was, that it asked no security of the states for the repayment of the money, when it should be called for; and he considered it, in that respect, as very defective. Mr. Mercer was really astonished that the gentleman could consider the two propositions distinct. He would not vote for the first proposition unless it was united with the other which had been considered so obnoxious. It was a proposition to reduce the amount of the deposits in the banks from $38,000,000 to $5,000,000. It was an important part of the subject of regulating the public deposits, and indissolubly connected with it. He said it went to make the states responsible for the repayment of the money, and ought not to be called a distribution; and he could not understand how it should be said there was no security for the money, when they were required to render certificates, and it depended on the action of the general government alone to make them responsible for the repayment.

Mr. Lane moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey as follows: "That the bill be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and made the special order of the day for to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and each succeeding day thereafter until disposed of."

Mr. Dickerson accepted the amendment as a modification of his motion. Mr. Parker made a few remarks in opposition to a division of the bill. Mr. Calhoun, of Mass. thought it an incorrect course to instruct the committee, and called for a division of the question. Mr. Smith spoke at length on the question, but his remarks are not reported.

Mr. Mann, of New York, said he did not rise to discuss the subject; and he hoped the house would not spend much more time in debating the preliminary measure. He then offered a substitute for the instructions of the gentleman from N. Jersey, (Mr. Dickerson), so as to direct the committee to report the first twelve sections of the bill as one bill, and the three remaining sections as another bill, with such amendments as the committee might think proper.

Mr. Dickerson accepted this amendment as a modification of his motion. Mr. Adams hoped the instructions would be withdrawn. Instructing a committee of the whole, he said, was incompatible with the object of going into the committee. It would confine them to the subject of the instructions, and he went on to show some deficiencies and discrepancies, which ought to be considered and amended in the first part of the bill.

Mr. Patton said that there was no doubt about the propriety of committing the bill. He thought there was a great moral and political necessity for passing it; and it ought not to be trammelled to prevent that free discussion which it ought to receive. It was unusual to instruct a committee of the whole, and he could not perceive what extraordinary reasons there could be why the house was asked to adopt such a course. It had been said it was possible, and had been intimated to be probable, that the president would veto the bill. The house, he said, ought to act according to its sense of duty, without regard to the opinions of any other department of the government; and he himself would not turn a hair's breadth from what he thought right, from any apprehensions or threatenings of what the executive might do.

Mr. Dickerson rose to explain. He said he did not know that the executive would veto the bill. He had had no conversations with the president; nor did he mean to say that any one should be influenced by a knowledge of his opinions; but if he was opposed to a part of the bill, he thought the house ought to secure the passage of that part upon which there was no doubt.

After a few remarks from Mr. Patton, Mr. Vinton said he thought the instructions in either shape ought not to prevail; and he went on to point out the embarrassment that would arise from introducing a bill in a manner so contrary to the rules into the house, and also of the inconvenience and delay in sending such a bill to the senate.

The question having been divided, was taken first on the commitment of the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union; which was agreed to.

The question being on adopting the instructions, it was divided, and first taken on the instructions to the committee to separate the provisions of the bill so as to report the first twelve sections thereof as one bill, and the remaining three sections as another bill. This question was decided in the negative by yeas and nays as follows:

The bill was then made the special order of the day for to-morrow at 12 o'clock and every succeeding day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. Thomas, from the select committee on the District banks, made a report, accompanied by a bill, to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia from the 4th of March, 1836; which bill was twice read, and, together with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hunt, by general consent, offered the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire whether any member or members of congress have received any accommodation or facilities from any person or persons, bank or banks, in the employment of the government, or not, in obtaining the use of the public money for the purpose of speculating in the purchase of the public lands.

Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, moved to amend the resolution by embracing the heads of departments, or any officer of the government; which Mr. Hunt accepted as a modification.

Mr. Boon said he hoped the resolution would be further modified so as to inquire whether any member of congress, &c. had borrowed money from the banks without paying interest for it.

Mr. Lewis said he would have no objection to the resolution if there was any ground for a belief that any improper partiality had been exhibited by the deposit banks in their transactions with members of congress; but he was averse to a general exploring expedition. He wanted information on the subject.

Mr. McKay took a similar view. The adoption of the resolution amounted to a tacit admission that some members had received accommodations from the deposit banks for the purposes of speculation. This was a grave charge, and ought not to be countenanced without some ground to go upon. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman would inform the house what was the object of the resolution, and the ground for it.

After some remarks from Mr. Bouldin,

Mr. Hunt said that every member must have heard rumors, and seen intimations in the public prints, that certain members of congress have had the use of the public funds in their private speculations. He did not pretend to be possessed of any more information on the subject than any other member. He thought some inquiry ought to be made in regard to the matter, and he had therefore submitted the resolution to the disposition of the house.

Mr. Adams said he could not vote for this resolution. If this committee was appointed, it must have judicial power, and must be a sort of grand jury; and, in order to examine every member of the house, they must sit during the recess. In fairness and impartiality, they must summon every member before them. After all, what would it amount to? Suppose a member has borrowed money of a bank, with interest or without interest, of what consequence is it? There is nothing in it contrary to law. Suppose it be ascertained that some forty or sixty members have borrowed money of banks to buy lands; a voluminous document, costing some thousands of dollars, would be published to excite public odium against those individuals; and there the matter would end, unless, indeed, the gentleman from New York intended to follow up his motion by moving the expulsion of such members. He could not see that it would be sufficient cause for expulsion, for nothing was charged in violation of the laws of the land. The house must then be converted into a grand inquest on the subject, and the members accused must appear in their defence at the bar of the house, with their witnesses. Was this a position in which the members of the house wished to be placed towards each other? On the contrary, it was highly desirable that they should entertain towards each other the kindest feelings and respect.

Mr. Lewis asked for some specification of the accusation. If there was any ground for it, he wished to know it.

Mr. Boon said the banks were established for the public accommodation, and members of congress had a right to borrow money from them and buy lands, as well as others. If any corrupt practices had prevailed, it was a different thing, and an investigation would be proper. But nothing of this kind had been alleged.

Mr. Pearce, of R. I. advocated the adoption of the resolution at some length.

Mr. Speight said, for his own part, he had no objection to the adoption of the resolution; but, as the time of the house was precious, as it wanted but a few minutes of the hour assigned for the house to take a recess, he moved the previous question, which was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put, and the resolution was agreed to, without a count.

The select committee was then ordered to consist of five members.

Mr. Wise moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up and considering the resolutions heretofore offered by him in relation to the deposit banks and Ruben M. Whitney; and thereupon asked the yeas and nays which were ordered, and, the question being taken, the motion was negatived, yeas 101, nays 59—not two-thirds. It being half past 2 o'clock the house took a recess.

Evening session. After an ineffectual attempt of Mr. Adams, (in consequence of a quorum not being present), to obtain leave to offer a resolution directing the clerk of the house to cause to be prepared a copy of the constitutions of the several states of the union, embracing all the amendments thereto adopted, from the declaration of independence till the year 1789, and the transaction of some other business, the house concurred in an amendment of the senate to the bill authorising the secretary of the treasury to act as an agent of the United States in all matters concerning the stock of the government in the bank of the United States.

The resolution of Mr. Adams above referred to, was now taken up, a quorum having appeared, and being amended so as to include the constitution of the United States and the articles of confederation, laid upon the table.

The house, in further execution of the special order of the day of the 26th of January, took up the engrossed bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1836. The bill was read a third time, and passed.

After settling a question of precedence in relation to certain bills, the house passed to the order of the day and took up the bill amendatory of the act for the continuation of the Cumberland road (to change the location of part of it) which was read a third time; and the question being upon its passage; a debate arose in relation to the proposed change in the route, in which Messrs. Crane, Kennard, Pearce, of R. I. Boon, Mason, of O. and Webster participated. The previous question was called by Mr. Mann, but he withdrew it, and the question was taken on the passage of the bill, which was decided in the negative: yeas 79, nays 88. The house then adjourned.

Tuesday, June 21. After the usual morning business and several ineffectual attempts to suspend the rules, with the view to the consideration of business out of its usual order, the house, at 12 o'clock, in pursuance of the special order, adopted yesterday, resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, Mr. Sutherland in the chair, and proceeded to consider the bill from the senate for "the regulation of the deposits of the public money."

The bill was then read through as published in the present sheet [see page 290.] Mr. Harrison moved to amend the first section so as to require the assent of the states to the establishment of agencies. Mr. Dromgoole moved to strike out all that part of the first section which relates to the establishment of agencies in the states, lost. Mr. McKay moved to strike out the words "as banks of deposit." Lost. Mr. Vanderpoel moved to amend the fifth section so as to provide that no bank should be selected as a deposit bank which shall issue any note of less denomination than ten dollars. Lost. Several other amendments, of lesser magnitude, were moved and lost.

Mr. Adams moved to strike out, in the 8th section, the following words: "or the public money withdrawn therefrom." Lost. Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, moved an amendment to the effect that the banks shall pay 4 per cent. interest on the whole amount of the deposits; which was lost. Mr. Gillett moved a verbal amendment; which was lost. Mr. Dromgoole moved to strike out the 11th section. Lost. Mr. Mann, of New York, moved to amend the 13th section of the bill so as to provide that the distribution shall be made in proportion to the representation of the people on this floor; and upon this motion he wished, he said, to be heard. But, at the suggestion of some gentlemen, he, for the present, withdrew it.

Mr. Anthony stated to the committee the substance of an amendment of similar import, and said he thought the ratio adopted by the senate wrong, as it violated a fundamental principle of the constitution of the United States which was that representation and taxation should go together; and in his opinion representation and distribution should go together, &c. He then moved as a substitute for the 13th section, the proposition explained by him which is as follows:

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the treasury of the United States on the first day of January, 1837, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with such of the several states, in proportion to their respective representations in the senate and house of representatives of the United States, as shall by law authorise their treasurer, or other competent authorities, to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified; and the secretary of the treasury shall deliver the same to such treasurer, or other competent authorities, on receiving certificates of deposit therefor, signed by such competent authorities, in such form as may be prescribed by the secretary aforesaid, which certificates shall express the usual and legal obligations of common depositories of the public money, for the safe keeping and repayment thereof, and shall pledge the faith of the states receiving the same to pay the said moneys and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the secretary of the treasury, for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public treasury beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid:

Provided, That if any state declines to receive its proportion of the surplus aforesaid, on the terms before named, the same may, at the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, be deposited with the other states agreeing to accept the same on deposit.

And provided further, That when said money, or any part thereof, shall be wanted by said secretary to meet appropriations made by law, the same shall be called for in ratable proportions, within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different states, with which the same is deposited, and shall not be called for in sums exceeding ten thousand dollars, from any one state in any one month, without previous notice of thirty days for every additional sum of twenty thousand dollars, which may be required.

Mr. Speight said he had heard it remarked that the amendment was proposed with the view of defeating the bill; but he assured the house it was offered in good faith and meant to obviate the objections of many members to the bill—and if adopted, would receive their votes.

Mr. Hardin said, as the bill now stands, all states having ten members and under, will be gainers by the bill. The states having ten members will, by the bill, receive one dollar and a half per head; if the amendment is made, all states having eleven members will have two dollars and a quarter per head. There were, he said, eighteen states having under ten members, and ten having over eleven members; and he thought the alteration would operate hardly upon some of the small states. After some observations upon the operation of the bill upon particular states, he thought it would, on the whole, operate as equally as any thing that could be devised. He had no great objection to the amendment, but he thought it better to take the original bill.

Mr. Pearce, of R. I. was in favor of the amendment, which he thought would prevent stock-jobbing in case the stock should be offered for sale by the secretary of the treasury. He referred to the amendment as respected the exclusion of the senatorial representation. He said, the small states did not, in the house, stand upon an equal advantage, but in the senate they had the greater power, numbering fifteen to nine in the representation; and if this provision had been made, as was right, with a view to the advantage of the small states, then it was not to be supposed they would give it up without discussion, and perhaps the bill would be lost, which he considered a much greater evil than the inequality of distribution. He then went into an examination of the effect of the bill and the amendment upon several states, and thought it more proper to make the distribution upon federal numbers, according to the census of 1830. He thought, also, if some apparent injustice would be done to the large states by the original bill, still more would be done to the small states by adopting a different course.

Mr. Pearce gave way to permit Mr. Anthony to restore the words "senate and," so as to improve the objection that had been made. Mr. P. then took his seat. After some remarks from Mr. Miller in favor of the proposition, Mr. Vinton moved to amend the amendment, so as to provide that the money should be called for by the treasurer, only "for want of other money in the treasury." Mr. Lewis was opposed to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Vinton) because he thought the original amendment sufficiently strong. The question was then taken and the amendment lost. Mr. Mason, of Va. and Mr. Galbraith both spoke in favor of Mr. Anthony's amendment—when Mr. Mercer moved an amendment to the amendment, in order to provide for distribution in proportion to federal numbers, according to the last census. Lost. Mr. Mann, of New York, said he felt it his imperative duty to oppose some of the provisions of the amendment. He held the principle of compromise in high respect, but he would not compromise the principles of the constitution. What were we about to do? To rack and destroy the principles of our confederation; and to consolidate the powers of the government. The amendment was even more favorable to the states than the original proposition, for it gave the money, on deposit, without interest. Mr. Patton was unable to see any difference, in principle, between the amendment and the section as it stood in the bill, and would vote for the bill, even if the amendment was adopted. Mr. Vanderpoel would vote for the amendment, but not for the bill—but as it would undoubtedly pass, he would rather have it in the form proposed by the amendment. Mr. Adams took the floor; but it being half past two o'clock, the committee rose and the house took a recess until four o'clock.

Evening session. The deposit bill (from the senate) being still under consideration, the question being the motion proposed by Mr. Anthony to substitute his proposition for the 13th section of the bill, and Mr. Anthony having modified his proposition so as to retain the rates of distribution proposed by the senate, after a debate in which Messrs. Adams, Granger, Speight and Wise took part, Mr. Jarvis moved to amend the amendment by inserting after the words "United States," the word "unappropriated." Lost. Mr. Anthony, at the suggestion of Mr. Briggs, modified his amendment by inserting the words "to pledge the faith of the state for the safe keeping thereof."

After a few words from Messrs. Wise and Loss, Mr. Anthony's amendment, as modified, was adopted—yeas 133, nays 50.

Mr. Adams moved to strike out the first clause of the eighth section, and supported the motion with some remarks. Lost. Mr. Max, of New York, moved to strike out the words "and senate" from the section as amended, so as to cause the surplus to be distributed according to federal numbers.

Mr. Mann went on to speak, with great earnestness, in support of his motion to amend; but he finally withdrew the motion, at the request of Mr. Mercer and others, and gave notice that he would renew it in the house. Mr. Ripley moved to amend the bill by adding to it sections regulating the management of the public lands, and providing that the land sales be suspended for five years.

The chair decided that the motion was out of order, it being inconsistent with the bill. Mr. Ripley explained the object he desired to accomplish by the amendment, and then appealed from the decision of the chair. Mr. Cambreleng briefly supported the appeal; when the question was taken and the decision sustained. Mr. Rencher submitted an amendment, which he supported by a few remarks. Mr. McKay said that the house had just passed a bill placing the whole power of the government, in relation to the government bank stock, in the hands of the secretary of the treasury. There was, therefore, no necessity for the amendment. The stock would be sold and distributed of course. The amendment was rejected. Mr. Doubleday arose for the purpose of addressing the house, but after he had made some progress, such was the confusion of the house that his voice became utterly inaudible. He was, however, understood to be in favor of the bill. Mr. Dromgoole moved to strike out the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the bill.

Lost. Mr. Ash moved to amend the bill by inserting a clause providing that the states should appropriate a portion of the sum deposited with them to the purposes of education. Lost. The committee rose, and reported the bill, with the amendment, at a quarter after 6 o'clock. Mr. Mercer moved to amend the 13th section by striking out the words "in proportion to their representation in the house and senate," and inserting the words "in proportion to their federal population, according to the census of 1830." Mr. Finton argued against the bill, which he said was partial in its operation, and that Ohio, under its provisions, would lose something like twelve and a half per cent. of her full proportion. Mr. Lane made an earnest and warm reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio last night, and contended that, even upon the senate's plan of distribution, the states of Illinois, Indiana and Missouri would lose much of the proper proportion of the surplus due to their greatly increased and increasing population. Mr. Mercer signified an intention to move to amend by allowing the new states ten per cent. in addition to their distributive share. Mr. Mann, of New York, then sent to the chair a similar proposition, which he said he had intended to offer; and Mr. Mercer accepted it as a modification of his proposition. Mr. Lewis, of Alabama, thanked the gentleman from New York for his amendment; but, though it rendered the bill better for the new states, he warned the gentlemen that they would lose the bill if they undertook greatly to amend it. He believed that the mode of distribution adopted was as fair as any that could be devised; and, even if Rhode Island and Delaware gained a little by it, it was but a small objection. Mr. Adams said that the bill, as it stood, was, he believed, as fair as any that could be adopted by the house. Mr. Ashley was, he said, in favor of sticking to the bill as it stood. Mr. Johnson, of La. expressed the same sentiment. The question was taken by yeas and nays on the motion to amend, offered by Mr. Mercer, and decided in the negative—yeas 88, nays 120.

The question being on concurring with the committee of the whole in their amendment, adopting a substitute for the 13th section, the yeas and nays were ordered. Mr. Parks said as he intended to vote against the amendment and against the bill, he felt it due to himself to offer a few words in explanation of his views, and was proceeding to express them, when he was compelled to refrain by the extreme confusion that prevailed.

Mr. Gillett said he wished to move an amendment. [Loud cries of "no," "no," and "question," "question."] Mr. Gillett stated his motion to be, to add, after the words "five millions" reserved, the words "over and above all unexpended balances of appropriation." The amendment was rejected by acclamation. The question being taken on concurrence in the amendment of the committee of the whole, inserting Mr. Anthony's substitute for the 13th section, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 142, nays 67.

Mr. Hawes. Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question. [The time was seven o'clock P. M.] The speaker said the previous question was on the engrossment of the amendment, and ordering the bill to a third reading. Mr. Lane hoped, he said, that the house would not urge the previous question to-night. The motion was seconded—87 to 72. Mr. Rencher asked the yeas and nays on the question "Shall the main question be now put?" Refused. Mr. Hopkins moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded. Lost—88 to 93.

Mr. Pierce, of New Hampshire, moved an adjournment. There had been, he said, important amendments made to the bill, and he wished to examine it in print. If the question was pressed to night, he would be compelled to vote against the bill. He, therefore, moved an adjournment; which was rejected.

The main question on ordering the bill to a third reading having been ordered to be put,

Mr. Granger called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered. The question was then taken, and decided, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton, Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Boyd, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, Bynum, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Carr, Carter, Casey, J. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Childs, N. H. So the bill was passed, with an amendment, and ordered to be returned to the senate for concurrence in the amendment.

The house then adjourned, (it being 9 o'clock P. M.)

Wednesday, June 22. Considerable time was spent in discussing and settling the priority of business.

Mr. Adams presented the protest of certain Cherokee chiefs against the treaty lately promulgated as having been made with that nation; which was referred to the committee of the whole that has a bill upon that subject under consideration.

The amendments of the senate to the bill to reorganize the post office were read, and referred to the post office committee.

The remainder of the day, after the morning business, was spent in the discussion of the bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for other ports and harbors. [Particulars in our next.]

Thursday, June 23. The hour was consumed in the usual morning business, and in the consideration of the senate's amendments to the bill to change the organization of the post office department. The house then went into committee of the whole, and considered the bill making appropriations for certain harbors, &c. which occupied its attention until the hour of recess. Details hereafter.

PUBLIC REVENUE.

The following is the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money as it passed the senate on Saturday last. To the amendment of the house, in which the senate concurred, see page 288.

A bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to select, as soon as may be practicable, and employ as the depositories of the money of the United States, such of the banks incorporated by the several states, by congress for the District of Columbia, or by the legislative councils of the respective territories for those territories, as may be located at, adjacent or convenient to, the points or places at which the revenues may be collected or disbursed. And in those states, territories or districts, in which there are no banks, or in which no bank can be employed as a depository bank, and within which the public collections or disbursements require a depository, the said secretary may make arrangements with a bank, or banks, in some other state, territory or district, to establish an agency, or agencies, in the states, territories or districts, so destitute of banks, as banks of deposit; and to receive through such agencies such deposits of the public money as may be directed to be made at the points designated, and to make such disbursements as the public service may require at those points; the duties and liabilities of every bank thus establishing any such agency to be the same in respect to its agency as are the duties and liabilities of depository banks generally under the provisions of this act: Provided, That at least one such bank shall be selected in each state and territory, if any can be found in each state and territory willing to be employed as depositories of the public money, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter prescribed, and continue to conform thereto: that the secretary of the treasury shall not suffer to remain in any deposite bank an amount of the public moneys more than equal to three-fourths of the amount of its capital stock actually paid in for a longer time than may be necessary to enable him to make the transfers required by the twelfth section of this act; and that the banks so selected, shall be, in his opinion, safe depositories of the public money, and shall be willing to undertake to do and perform the several duties and services, and to conform to the several conditions prescribed by this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if, at any point or place at which the public revenue may be collected, there shall be no bank located which, in the opinion of the secretary of the treasury, is in a safe condition, or where all the banks at such point or place shall fail or refuse to be employed as depositories of the public money of the United States, or to comply with the conditions prescribed by this act, or where such banks shall not have sufficient capital to become depositories of the whole amount of moneys collected at such point or place, he shall and may order and direct the public money collected at such point or place, to be deposited in a bank or banks in the same state, or in some one or more of the adjacent states, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter prescribed: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent congress at any time from passing any law for the removal of the public money from any of the said banks, or from changing the terms of deposit, or to prevent the said banks at any time from declining any longer to be the depositories of the public money, upon paying over, or tendering to pay, the whole amount of public moneys on hand, according to the terms of its agreement with the said secretary.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall hereafter be selected and employed by the secretary of the treasury as a depository of the public money, until such banks shall have first furnished to the said secretary a statement of its condition and business, a list of its directors, the current price of its stock; and, also, a copy of its charter; and, likewise, such other information as may be necessary to enable him to judge of the safety of its condition.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said banks, before they shall be employed as the depositories of the public money, shall agree to receive the same upon the following terms and conditions, viz:

First. Each bank shall furnish to the secretary of the treasury, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, statements setting forth its condition and business, as prescribed in the foregoing section of this act, except that such statements need not, unless requested by said secretary, contain a list of the directors, or a copy of the charter. And the said banks shall furnish to the secretary of the treasury, and to the treasurer of the United States, a weekly statement of the condition of his account upon their books. And the secretary of the treasury shall have the right, by himself, or an agent appointed for that purpose, to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statements: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

Secondly. To credit as specie all sums deposited therein to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, and to pay all checks, warrants, drafts, drawn on such deposits, in specie, if required by the holder thereof.

Thirdly. To give, whenever required by the secretary of the treasury, the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States and the territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions or claiming allowance on account of difference of exchange.

Fourthly. To render to the government of the United States all the duties and services heretofore required by law to be performed by the late bank of the United States and its several branches as offices.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposit of the public money which shall not redeem its notes and bills on demand in specie; nor shall any bank be selected or continued as aforesaid, which shall, after the fourth of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars; nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States, which shall, after the said fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorised, and it shall be his duty, whenever in his judgment the same shall be necessary or proper, to require of any bank so selected and employed as aforesaid, collateral or additional securities for the safe keeping of public moneys deposited therein, and the faithful performance of the duties required by this act.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to enter into contracts in the name and for and on behalf of the United States, with the said banks so selected or employed, whereby the said banks shall stipulate to do and perform the several duties and services prescribed by this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no bank which shall be selected or employed as the place of deposit of the public money shall be discontinued as such depository, or the public money withdrawn therefrom, except for the causes hereinafter mentioned: that is to say, if at any time, any one of said banks shall fail or refuse to perform any of said duties or services as prescribed by this act, and stipulated to be performed by its contract; or, if any of said banks shall, at any time, refuse to pay its own notes in specie if demanded, or shall fail to keep in its vaults such an amount of specie as shall be required by the secretary of the treasury, and shall be, in his opinion, necessary to render the said bank a safe depository of the public moneys, having due regard to the nature of the business transacted by the bank; in any and every such case it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to discontinue any such bank as a depository, and withdraw from it the public moneys, which it may hold on deposit at the time of such discontinuance. And in case of the discontinuance of any of said banks, it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to report to congress immediately, if in session, and, if not in session, then at the commencement of its next session, the facts and reasons which have induced such discontinuance. And in case of the discontinuance of any of said banks as a place of deposit of the public money for any of the causes hereinbefore provided, it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to deposit the money thus withdrawn in some other banks of deposit already selected, or to select some other bank as a place of deposit, upon the terms and conditions prescribed by this act. And in default of any bank to receive such deposit, the money thus withdrawn shall be kept by the treasurer of the United States, according to the laws now in force, and shall be subject to be disbursed according to law.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That until the secretary of the treasury shall have selected and employed the said banks as places of deposit of the public money, in conformity to the provisions of this act, the several state and District banks at present employed as depositories of the money of the United States shall continue to be depositories aforesaid, upon the terms and conditions upon which they have been so employed.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury to lay before congress, at the commencement of each annual session, a statement of the number and names of the banks employed as depositories of the public money, and of their condition, and the amount of public money deposited in each, as shown by their returns at the treasury; and if the selection of any bank as a depository of the public money be made by the secretary of the treasury while congress is in session, he shall immediately report the name and condition of such bank to congress; and if any such selection shall be made during the recess of congress, he shall report the same to congress during the first week of its next session.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That whenever the amount of public deposits to the credit of the treasurer of the United States in any bank shall, for a whole quarter of a year, exceed the one-fourth part of the amount of the capital stock of such bank actually paid in, the banks shall allow and pay to the United States, for the use of the excess of the deposits over the one-fourth part of its capital, an interest at the rate of two per centum per annum, to be calculated, for each quarter, upon the average excesses of the quarter, and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the treasury, at the close of each quarter, to cause the amounts on deposit in each deposit bank for the quarter, to be examined and ascertained, and to see that all sums of interest accruing under the provisions of this section are, by the banks respectively, passed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States in his accounts with the respective banks.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all warrants or orders for the purpose of transferring the public funds from the banks in which they now are, or may hereafter be, deposited, to other banks, whether of deposit or not, for the purpose of accommodating the banks to which the transfer may be made, or to sustain their credit, or for any other purpose whatever, except it be to facilitate the public disbursements, and to comply with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, prohibited and declared to be illegal; and in cases where transfers shall be required for purposes of equalization under the provisions of this act, in consequence of too great an accumulation of deposits in any bank, such transfers shall be made to the nearest deposit banks which are considered safe and secure, and which can receive the moneys to be transferred under the limitations in this act imposed: Provided, That it may be lawful for the president of the United States to direct transfers of the public money to be made, from time to time, to the mint and branch mints of the United States for supplying metal for coinage.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the treasury of the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several states, in proportion to their respective representation in the senate and house of representatives of the congress of the United States; and the secretary of the treasury shall deliver the same to such persons as the several states may authorize to receive it, on receiving certificates of deposit, signed by the competent authorities of each state, each for such amount and in such form as the secretary of the treasury may prescribe, which shall set forth and express the obligation of the state to pay the amount thereof to the United States, or their assigns; and which said certificates it shall be competent for the secretary of the treasury, in the name and behalf of the United States, to sell and assign, whenever it shall be necessary, for want of other money in the treasury to meet appropriations made by congress, all sales and assignments, however, to be ratable, and in just and equal proportions, among all the states, according to the amounts received by them respectively; and all such certificates of deposit shall be subject to, and shall bear an interest of five per centum per annum, payable half-yearly, from the time of such sale and assignment, and shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the states issuing the same.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said deposits shall be made with the states in the following proportions, and at the following times, viz. One quarter part on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, or as soon thereafter as may be; one quarter part on the first day of April; one quarter part on the first day of July; and one quarter part on the first day of October, all in the same year.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That to enable the secretary of the treasury to carry into effect the provisions of this act, he be authorized to appoint three additional clerks for his department; the one at a salary of one thousand six hundred dollars per annum; and the remaining two at a salary of one thousand dollars each; and to pay the said clerks quarterly, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE.

The legislature of Pennsylvania terminated its extra session by adjournment last week.

Before the close of the session, the following resolutions were introduced in the senate by Mr. Penrose, and passed that body by the votes annexed to the end of each of them:

Resolutions relative to the distribution of the surplus revenue of the United States.

Whereas It is an incumbent duty constantly to guard the liberties of the people, and our free institutions of government acquired for us by the valor and virtue of our revolutionary fathers, from the encroachment of power common to all governments: and whereas the immediate representatives of the people are bound to warn them of approaching danger, and to endeavor to avert it from them:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in general assembly met, That this assembly will maintain and defend the constitution of the United States, the rights of the states, and the integrity of the union, and that it solemnly expresses its devotion to that union, and its conviction that it can be preserved only by opposing every violation of the principles upon which it is based—[yeas 29, nays 1.]

That the powers of the federal government are defined by a written constitution, and are specifically enumerated. No power can be rightly claimed for or exercised by it that is not expressly given, and the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people—[yeas 28, nays 2.]

Any attempt by the federal government, or those who administer it, to encroach upon, overawe, interfere with, or control the states in the exercise of their reserved rights, or to extend the power of the federal government beyond the limits expressly prescribed by the constitution of the United States, is a usurpation and infraction of those principles which constitute the only basis of our union, and must be dangerous and fatal in its consequences—[yeas 20, nays 12.]

That this general assembly views with profound regret the spirit manifested to enlarge the powers of the general government, and to wield those which are conferred to obtain an influence over the states to interfere with the domestic policy of the state governments, to overawe and control them in the free exercise of their reserved rights, and so to consolidate the states, by degrees, into one sovereignty, the obvious tendency and inevitable result of which would be to transform the present republican system of the United States into an absolute, or, at best a mixed monarchy—[yeas 20, nays 12.]

That this general assembly consider the proposition lately made in the congress of the United States to invest the surplus revenue of the nation in stocks issued by the states, as a measure fraught with danger, calculated to give to the federal government a power which, if wielded by corrupt hands, would be inimical to the liberties of the country in an eminent degree, and, under all circumstances, injurious. It may be properly characterized as one of those measures "in fiscal systems and arrangements which keep a host of commercial and wealthy individuals embodied, and obedient to the mandates of the treasury;" and it would give to the federal government a decided influence in the councils of such states as it might be thought expedient to win to its purposes. It would foster and encourage a system of gambling and speculation in stocks, giving to the agents of the government the opportunity of employing the public money to promote private interests, to reward corrupt favorites, and acquire an interest among the community, leading to servile devotion to those clothed with the power of the general government—[yeas 20, nays 12.]

If to this be added an increase of the standing army and navy beyond the necessities of the country, which will on one hand enlist the tendency of man to pay homage to his fellow-creature who can feed and honor him, and, on the other, employ the principle of fear, by punishing imaginary insurrections under the pretext of preventive justice; and if we further have enormous expenditures of the public treasure in the construction of fortifications necessary in a country where the government must keep the people in subjection, but here only to be tolerated, at points essential to defence from foreign foes; and if, in this course of policy, swarms of officers, civil and military, are required who can inculcate political tenets tending to consolidation and monarchy, both by indulgences and severities, and can act as spies over the free exercise of human rights; if all these measures are at once pursued by the general government, we may well fear the tendencies to consolidation, and warn the people of approaching danger—[yeas 20, nays 12—Therefore,

Resolved, That our senators in congress be instructed, and our representatives requested, to vote against any bill for investing the surplus revenue of the United States in stocks issued or authorized by the respective states, believing that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue would be its apportionment among the several states—yeas 20, nays 11.]

Resolved, That copies of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted by the governor to each of the senators and representatives in congress, to be laid before the senate and house of representatives of the United States.

These resolves, after passing the senate, passed the house of representatives by a vote of 56 to 11.

THE CROPS.

From the Philadelphia National Gazette.

The following is extracted from the Commercial List and Philadelphia Price Current of Saturday the 11th inst. Later advices than could have been possessed by the editor of the Price Current, at the date his remarks were composed, mention further advances in wheat, &c. in the English corn markets.

The coming crops—From various parts of the country it is now ascertained, that the wheat crop has sustained considerable injury, and in some places it has been nearly destroyed by the fly. From our various correspondents we learn that the prospect is also quite unfavorable for an average crop of rye and corn. In some sections the grub worm has been very destructive.

Late advices from Liverpool state that the spring has so far been cold and backward, and that prices of grain are creeping up a little. There is also a decided diminution in the quantity of wheat sown, oats and barley having paid the farmer much better during the last two years. English wheat is quoted 7 to 8s.; Irish 6s. 1d. a 7s. 4d.; American 7s. a 7s. 6d.; Dantzic 7s. 2d. a 7s. 9d. per 70 lbs.

From Dauphin and Luzerne counties are the annexed accounts:

Dauphin county—From all parts we learn that the wheat crop is going to be lighter than it has been in the remembrance of our oldest citizens. In many parts of this county our farmers will not reap as much as they sowed. This is also the case in the counties adjoining. The wheat crop is gone—nothing can save it, and those who are so fortunate as to have any to dispose of may expect a higher price for it than it has commanded for twenty years, unless our wants are supplied from some distant source.

[Penn. Telegraph.]

Luzerne county. Kingston, June 8. We understand the wheat crops in this section of country, generally, are not promising. The severity of the winter it is said had an unfavorable effect upon wheat, and the insect is now at work in many fields.

A letter from Reading dated 7th June, says: "It has now rained with us 15 days, but as to its benefiting, the crop, particularly the wheat it is all idle. I am now confident that there will not be a quarter crop in Berks county."

A second letter says: "The wheat crop is daily becoming worse and worse, the ravages of the fly are very great."

A third letter of the third of June, written by a person a few miles out from Reading, in Berks county, states that in that neighborhood some farmers are ploughing up their wheat fields—some pasturing them, others manuring them, and many purchasing wheat for seed for the ensuing crop.

From Bucks, Montgomery, Lehigh, Northampton, Lancaster, Lebanon, York, Cumberland, and other adjoining counties of Pennsylvania—throughout Maryland, not only in the fertile western counties, but all lower Maryland, both shores of the bay—throughout the rich wheat raising districts of western Virginia, and in lower Virginia south of the James river, the same calamity is to be deplored. What the prospect is in lower Virginia, between the James river and Potomac, we are not informed.

Those acquainted with the history of the Hessian fly need not be informed, that the destruction caused by that insect, which is ascertained to be generally even in those fields which to day promise some yield, has not yet fully developed itself. Time has not permitted its operations to their extent.

Why should this dispensation be concealed or glossed over? Why should expectations of better results to the harvests be made than the existing reality and the known operations of the Hessian fly permit? We fear that the language of the Dauphin county Pennsylvania Telegraph is too true: "The wheat crop is gone, nothing can save it." The injuries it has already sustained would seem to be irretrievable.

The last crop of Indian corn did not, in great part, attain to sufficient maturity to keep—it is daily perishing. The recently planted (and now planting, upon the ploughed up wheat fields), crop of Indian corn exhibit, from all accounts, a very unpromising aspect: and there will, in all probability, be a failure of it, unless the future weather of summer be propitious and protracted—propitious, beyond all experience of our seasons.

That immediate importations of grain to any extent from Europe are not to be expected, is obvious. Prices in this country were declining in April and May. No apprehensions were, until towards the close of May, entertained for the growing harvests. Would any merchant in the United States or in Europe undertake shipments of grain to the United States in the face of declining prices, and of a growing crop, coming to maturity in July—respecting which no apprehensions were expressed, none made possible?

Should the alarm now commencing, excite shipments to arrive even late in the autumn, it will be well—it is the best that can be anticipated—for the latest accounts from England forbid the anticipation of any foreign grain being likely to come to this country, until prices here may have approximation to famine prices.

The introduction to the paragraph in this paper of yesterday, purporting to be taken from the Pittsburgh Advocate would have been more correct, had it read that in the entire northern, north western and eastern sections of the state of Pennsylvania, the injury sustained from the Hessian fly, the extent of which is not yet fully developed, has been of the most calamitous character.

The first notice of the appearance of the Hessian fly in the Valley of the Mississippi that has appeared, is that published also by us yesterday from Tennessee of the extensive destruction to the wheat crops of that state. It is to be borne in mind that the destruction caused by this insect first is manifested to the south, where the crops mature earliest, and progress northwardly as the maturing of the crops usually progress. The insect may not exist where it is not already known to be, but it is probable that it does exist where as yet it is not acknowledged. So wide spread a dispensation of this nature, as the present is ascertained to be, is not within the memory of man.

The Pittsburgh Advocate may have occasion to alter its representation. From Muncey, Lycoming county, the following appears in the Commercial Herald of this morning. Muncey is among the most fertile parts of the county.

The fly has destroyed the wheat crop in this section of the country. Fields which looked very well a few weeks ago, will not be worth the cutting. The rye fields bid fair for an average crop. The corn looks very bad. Owing to the drought about the time of planting, it did not come up, and the continued rain for eighteen days, which succeeded, caused the replanting, in many instances to rot in the ground.

[Muncey Telegraph, June 11.]

The Richmond Enquirer of the 10th instant, as quoted in the New York Journal of Commerce of Monday, together with several notices of the Virginia and Maryland wheat crops more or less favorable as to their production, remarks, "in several parts of Pennsylvania and Delaware the crop is unpromising."

This same general observation amounts to absolute misrepresentation, by the idea it conveys to every reader's mind—to convey the truth, the observation ought to be, that throughout the greater part of Pennsylvania, every part yet accurately heard from, and throughout the state of Delaware, including the best cultivated and most productive wheat raising districts in both states, the prospects of the growing crop is of a deficiency thereof of an alarming character.

If our readers will refer to their maps they will better realize the extent of the calamity, than can otherwise be brought to their minds. Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and Virginia, all deficient to an alarming extent.

FLORIDA INDIANS.

In a recent speech in the house of representatives, colonel White, of Florida, gave a sketch of the history of the Florida Indians, the information contained in which is interesting at the present moment. He says that the Florida Indians are the remains of that ancient and warlike tribe called the Natches tribe on the Mississippi, which formerly waged such fierce war with the French, and driven by them from the lower part of the Mississippi, retreated along the northern coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and united with broken bands of Biloxies, Red Sticks and runaway Creeks, called Seminoles. The word Seminole means a wanderer and runaway, and hence, the runaway Creeks being the most numerous, the name of the whole mixed tribe who settled in Florida.

As early as 1784 these Indians entered into a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive with the Spanish government, by which they were incorporated into the Spanish monarchy, with certain reserved rights, depending chiefly on the will of Spain. In this state of things the Floridas were ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 22d February 1819, in which treaty no mention was made in any form of the Indians. In the mean time, however, during the Indian wars in the southern United States after the revolution, their numbers were greatly increased by Creeks who fled from our territory into the then Spanish territory.

When the two provinces of East and West Florida were delivered to the United States by the Spanish commissioners, the white population was confined to the towns of St. Augustine and Pensacola, and the whole region between these two places, one on the Atlantic and the other on the Gulf of Mexico, distant four hundred miles one from the other, was occupied in a manner by these roving savages. What was to be done with the Indians, was the first question of course that presented itself to congress after the session. At that period already they were reduced to great extremities for want of food, game being very scarce, and they being too idle and dissolute to work.

In the beginning of 1823, Mr. Calhoun, the then secretary of war, in answer to a call of the Indian committee, communicated various documents relating to these Indians, among them several letters from gen. Jackson, then governor of Florida.

In one of these letters from gen. Jackson, dated 20th September, 1821, referring to a talk he had had with the head chiefs of the Florida Indians, he says, "They acknowledge that it is just that those who rejected peace when it was offered to them, and fled from their own country, continuing the war, ought to return to their own nation." The president proceeds, "I am of opinion, from the smallness of their numbers, and the shape of the Floridas, that it would be much better policy to move them all up, and amply to provide for them by an annuity."

General Jackson, in a talk to the Indians on the 18th September, 1821, told them, "those who fled from their nation, and joined in the war against us, must return to their country, where their chiefs are willing to receive them. They cannot be permitted to settle all over the Floridas."

The chiefs were satisfied with what was then communicated to them. By a letter subsequently addressed to the secretary of war, he says: "The exposed situation of the Floridas imperiously demands that its frontier upon the coast should be immediately inhabited by white citizens." He states, "the largest portion of the Seminoles are a part of the Creek nation;" and adds, "with what pretence of justice can those who fled from the Creek nation, and kept up an exterminating war on our frontier, until crushed by the arm of our government in 1818, set up such claims?"

The committee on Indian affairs, after examining these documents, reported that in their opinion, the Indians as a nation own no land in Florida, except where it was granted to them by the Spanish authorities, and that they stood to our government in the relation of domestic dependant communities. This report was concurred in by the house. Congress and the executive at that time were of opinion, that the largest portion of these Indians, being runaway Creeks, should be sent back to the nation to which they belong.

Notwithstanding this opinion and recommendation, the Seminoles were permitted to contract for and obtain possession, by treaty with the United States commissioners, of five millions of land in the peninsula of East Florida. Within a few years after the conclusion of this treaty, the Indians were found actually in a state of starvation, and a large sum was appropriated by government for their relief.

In 1827, in consequence of statements made by the agent of the Seminoles, colonel White was appointed a commissioner to offer them a country of sufficient extent to the west of the Mississippi, with a guarantee of title forever. Being unwilling to go without an examination of the country, nothing was then effected. Three or four years afterwards, the Indians themselves made proposals to enter in a treaty to move west of the Mississippi, and in 1832 a conditional convention was entered into, by which the Seminoles relinquish all claim to the land they held in Florida and agreed within three years to remove from it. When this term expired, they showed reluctance to comply with the terms of the treaty. Our government then told them they must go, or be forced. After remonstrances and petitions, they entered into a new agreement with the commanding general Clinch to fulfil the above treaty, one more year being allowed them to get ready to move.

At the expiration of this term of a year, instead of complying with their promises and pledges, they commenced hostilities against the inhabitants of Florida, laid waste three counties, destroyed more than a million of property, and massacred one hundred United States troops. [Bull. American.

OFFICIAL ACCOUNT OF THE TEXIAN VICTORY.

Head quarters of the army, San Jacinto, April 25th, 1836.

To his excellency D. G. Burnett, prest. of the republic of Texas. Sir: I regret extremely that my situation since the battle of the 21st has been such as to prevent my rendering you my official report of the same, previous to this time.

I have the honor to inform you, that on the evening of the 18th inst. after a forced march of fifty-five miles, which was effected in two days and a half, the army arrived opposite Harrisburg; that evening a courier of the enemy was taken, from whom I learned that general Santa Ana, with one division of his choice troops had marched in the direction of Lynch's ferry on the San Jacinto, burning Harrisburg as he passed down. The army was ordered to be in readiness to march early on the next morning. The main body effected a crossing over Buffalo Bayou, below Harrisburg, on the morning of the 19th, having left the baggage, the sick, and a sufficient camp guard in the rear. We continued the march throughout the night, making but one halt in the prairie for a short time, and without refreshment. At day-light we resumed the line of march, and in a short distance our scouts encountered those of the enemy, and we received information that general Santa Ana was at New Washington, and would that day take up the line of march for Anahuac, crossing at Lynch's.

The Texian army halted within half a mile of the ferry in some timber, and were engaged in slaughtering beeves, when the army of Santa Ana was discovered to be approaching in battle array, having been encamped at Clopper's point eight miles below. Disposition was immediately made of our forces, and preparation for his reception. He took a position with his infantry, and artillery in the centre, occupying an island of timber, his cavalry covering the left flank. The artillery, consisting of one double fortified medium brass twelve pounder then opened on our encampment. The infantry in column advanced with the design of charging our lines, but were repulsed by a discharge of grape and cannister, from our artillery, consisting of two six pounders. The enemy had occupied a piece of timber within rifle shot of the left wing of our army, from which an occasional interchange of small arms took place between the troops, until the enemy withdrew to a position on the bank of the San Jacinto, about three quarters of a mile from our encampment, and commenced fortification. A short time before sunset, our mounted men, about eighty-five in number under the special command of colonel Sherman, marched out for the purpose of reconnoitering the enemy. Whilst advancing, they received a sharp encounter from the left of the enemy's infantry, and after a sharp encounter with their cavalry, in which ours acted extremely well, and performed some feats of daring chivalry, they retired in good order, having had two men severely wounded and several horses killed. In the mean time the infantry under the command of lieutenant colonel Millard, and colonel Burleson's regiment, with the artillery, had marched out for the purpose of covering the retreat of the cavalry if necessary. All then fell back in good order to our encampment about sunset, and remained without any ostensible action until the 21st, at half past three o'clock, taking the first refreshment which they had enjoyed for two days. The enemy in the mean time extended the right flank of their infantry so as to occupy the extreme point of a skirt of timber on the bank of the San Jacinto, and secured their left by a fortification about 5 feet high, constructed of packs and baggage, leaving an opening in the centre of the breastwork in which their artillery was placed, their cavalry upon their left wing.

About nine o'clock on the morning of the 21st, the enemy were reinforced by 500 choice troops under the command of general Cos, increasing their effective force to upwards of 1,500 men; whilst our aggregate force for the field numbered 783. At half past three o'clock in the evening, I ordered the officers of the Texian army to parade their respective commands, having in the mean time ordered the bridge on the only road communicating with the Brazos, distant eight miles from our encampment, to be destroyed, thus cutting off all possibility of escape. Our troops paraded with alacrity and spirit, and were anxious for the contest. Their conscious disparity in numbers seemed only to increase their enthusiasm and confidence, and heightened their anxiety for the conflict. Our situation afforded me an opportunity of making the arrangements preparatory to the attack, without exposing our designs to the enemy. The first regiment, commanded by colonel Burleson was assigned the centre. The second regiment, under the command of colonel Sherman, formed the left wing of the army. The artillery, under the special command of colonel George W. Hockley, inspector general, was placed on the right of the first regiment, and four companies of infantry, under the command of lieutenant colonel Henry Millard, sustained the artillery upon the right. Our cavalry, sixty-one in number, commanded by colonel Mirabau B. Laniar, (whose gallant and daring conduct on the previous day had attracted the admiration of his comrades, and called him to that station), placed on our extreme right, completed our line. Our cavalry was first despatched to the front of the enemy's left, for the purpose of attracting their notice, whilst an extensive island of timber afforded us an opportunity of concentrating our forces and displaying from that point, agreeably to the previous design of the troops. Every evolution was performed with alacrity, the whole advancing rapidly in line, and through an open prairie, without any protection whatever for our men. The artillery advanced and took station within two hundred yards of the enemy's breastwork, and commenced an effective fire with grape and cannister.

Colonel Sherman with his regiment, having commenced the action upon our left wing, the whole line, at the centre and on the right, advancing in double quick time, rung the war cry, "Remember the Alamo," received the enemy's fire, and advancing within point blank shot before a piece was discharged from our lines. Our line advanced without a halt, until they were in possession of the woodland and the enemy's breastwork. The right wing of Burleson's and the left of Millard's taking possession of the breastwork; our artillery having gallantly charged up within 70 yards of the enemy's cannon, when it was taken by our troops. The conflict lasted about eighteen minutes from the time of close action, until we were in possession of the enemy's encampment, taking one piece of cannon, (loaded), four stand of colors all their camp equipage, stores and baggage. Our cavalry had charged and routed that of the enemy upon the right, and given pursuit to the fugitives, which did not cease until they arrived at the bridge which I have mentioned before, capt. Kearnes, always among the foremost in dangers commanding the pursuers.

The conflict in the breastwork lasted but a few moments; many of the troops encountered hand to hand, and not having the advantage of bayonets on our side, our riflemen used their pieces as war clubs, breaking many of them off at the breech. The route commenced at half past four, and the pursuit by the main army continued until twilight. A guard was then left in charge of the enemy's encampment, and our army returned with their killed and wounded. In the battle, our loss was two killed and twenty-three wounded, six of whom mortally. The enemy's loss was 630 killed, among which was 1 general officer, 4 colonels, 2 lieutenant colonels, 5 captains, 12 lieutenants. Wounded 208, of which were 5 colonels, 3 lieutenant colonels, 2 second lieutenant colonels, 7 captains, one cadet. Prisoners 730—president general Santa Ana, general Cos, 4 colonels, aids to gen. Santa Ana, 6 lieutenant colonels, the private secretary of general Santa Ana, and the colonel of the Guerrero battalion, are included in the number. General Santa Ana was not taken until the 22d, and gen. Cos, on yesterday, very few having escaped.

About 600 muskets, 300 sabres and 200 pistols, have been collected since the action; several hundred mules and horses were taken, and nearly twelve thousand dollars in specie. For several days previous to the action, our troops were engaged in forced marches, exposed to excessive rains, and the additional inconvenience of extremely bad roads, illy supplied with rations and clothing—yet amid every difficulty they bore up with cheerfulness and fortitude, and performed their marches with spirit and alacrity—there was no murmuring.

Previous to and during the action my staff evinced every disposition to be useful, and were actively engaged in their duties. In the conflict I am assured that they demeaned themselves in such manner as proved them worthy members of the army of San Jacinto. Colonel T. J. Rusk, secretary of war, was on the field. For weeks his services had been highly beneficial to the army, in battle he was on the wing, where col. Sherman's command first encountered and drove the enemy; he bore himself gallantly, and continued his efforts and activity, remaining with the pursuers until resistance ceased.

I have the honor of transmitting herewith a list of all the officers who were engaged in the action which I respectfully request may be published, as an act of justice to the individuals. For the commanding general to attempt discrimination as to the conduct of those who commanded, in the action, or those who were commanded, would be impossible. Our success in the action is conclusive proof of their daring intrepidity and courage; every officer and man proved himself worthy of the cause in which he battled, while the triumph received a lustre from the humanity which characterized their conduct after victory, and richly entitles them to the admiration and gratitude of their general. Nor should we withhold the tribute of our grateful thanks from that being who holds the destinies of nations, and has in the time of greatest need enabled us to arrest a powerful invader whilst devastating our country. I have the honor to be, with high consideration, your obedient servant, SAMUEL HOUSTON, commander-in-chief.

[ARMY ORDERS.]

Head quarters, San Jacinto, May 5th, 1836.

COMRADES: Circumstances connected with the battle of the 21st, render our separation for the present unavoidable. I need not express to you the many painful sensations which that necessity inflicts upon me. I am solaced, however, by the hope, that they will soon be reunited in the great cause of liberty. Brigadier general Rusk is appointed to command the army for the present. I confide in his valor, his patriotism and his wisdom—his conduct in the battle of San Jacinto was sufficient to ensure your confidence and regard.

The enemy, though retreating, are still within the limits of Texas—their situation being known to you, you cannot be taken at surprise. Discipline and subordination will render you invincible—your valor and heroism have proved you unrivalled. Let not contempt for the enemy throw you off your guard. Vigilance is the first duty of a soldier, and glory the proudest reward of his toils.

You have patiently endured privations, hardships and difficulties. Unappalled, you have encountered odds of two to one of the enemy against you, and borne yourself in the onset and conflict of battle in a manner unknown in the annals of modern warfare. When an enemy to your independence remains in Texas, the work is incomplete; but when liberty is firmly established by your patience and your valor, it will be fame enough to say, "I was a member of the army of San Jacinto."

In taking leave of my brave comrades in arms, I cannot suppress the expression of that pride which I so justly feel in having had the honor to command them in person, nor will I withhold the tribute of warmest admiration and gratitude for the promptness with which my orders were executed, and union maintained throughout the army. At parting my heart embraces you with gratitude and affection.

SAM'L. HOUSTON, commander-in-chief.

Head quarters, army of Texas, Harrisburg, May 10, 1836.
To the people of Texas:

The recent victory—a victory unparalleled in the history of war—has given us signal advantages over the enemy; advantages which, if they are followed up by a prompt, energetic advance upon him, will secure to us and our posterity the blessings of liberty and independence.

The force of our enemy now in Texas amounts to upwards of five thousand men; our army to little over one-tenth of that number are advancing upon them. Information derived from our advance renders it evident that they intend retiring to San Antonio, in order to give us time to do what we have once done before—disband and make the country an easy prey. Have you any confidence in the enemy you are contending with? Can you place confidence in the promises of Santa Ana, the man who could, in violation of a treaty, murder your brethren and friends in La Bahia? Do you expect to secure your liberty and independence by any other means than the strength of your arms and the sure aim of your rifles? I trust not. Then if you would have your country, if you would prevent a recurrence of the tragical scenes of San Antonio and La Bahia, turn out at once, join the army—drive the enemy from your soil, secure your rights and avenge the death of your brethren, whose bleaching bones yet lie on the prairies at La Bahia.

The laws of the land require you to serve your country—your own honor and reputation demand of you, and the laws impose as a penalty for a failure to do your duty the loss of property and citizenship.

To our friends of the United States I would say, you may be told, as you have before been told, that the war is at an end; that there is no farther need of men. It is not so. The people of Texas, a small number of men, struggling for the sacred principles of human liberty, need your assistance. We present to you one of the most delightful countries on the face of the globe; we offer you the most liberal remuneration in land; we present to you a field where daring and enterprising bravery may measure arms with a hiringling soldier, who are warring against the sacred rights of man, and have unhallowed hands in the best blood of the United States. Come, then, to our assistance, let us plant our standard in defiance of the yoke of tyranny, upon the Rio Grande.

THOS. J. RUSK,

brig. gen. and commandant of the Texian army.

SKETCH OF SANTA ANA.

Some particulars of this personage, which we have derived from gentlemen intimately acquainted with him, may be interesting to the public.

Santa Ana is about 42 years of age, and was born in the city of Vera Cruz. His father was a Spaniard of old Spain, of respectable standing though poor, his mother was a Mexican. He received a common education, and at the age of 13 or 14 was taken into the military family of the then intendant of Vera Cruz, gen. Davila, who took a great fancy to him and brought him up. He remained with gen. D. until about the year 1820. While with Davila he was made a major, and when installed he took the honors very coolly, and on some of his friends congratulating him he said, "Si mihi ciera dios, qui siera estar algo mas." [If you were to make me a God, I should desire to be something greater.] This trait developed at so early a period of his life, indicated the existence of that vaulting ambition which has ever since characterized his life.

After serving the Spanish royal cause until 1821, he left Vera Cruz, turned against his old master and benefactor, and placed himself at the head of some irregular troops which he raised on the sea coast, near Vera Cruz, and which are called Jaroches in their language, and which were denominated by him his Cossacks, as they are all mounted and armed with spears. With this rude cavalry he besieged Vera Cruz, drove Davila into the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa, and after having been repulsed again entered at a subsequent period, and got entire possession of the city, expelling therefrom the old Spanish troops, and reducing the power of the mother country in Mexico to the walls of the castle.

Subsequent to this Davila is said to have obtained an interview with Santa Ana, and told him he was destined to act a prominent part in the history of his country, and now, says he, I will give you some advice: "Siempre vayas con los muchos," [always go with the strongest party]. He always acted up to this motto until he raised the grito, (or cry), in other words took up the cudgels for the friars and church. He then overturned the federal government and established a central despotism, of which the priests and the military were the two privileged orders. His life had been from the first of the most romantic kind, constantly in revolutions, constantly victorious, until the last fatal rencontre.

His manners are extremely affable; he is full of anecdote and humor, and makes himself exceedingly fascinating and agreeable to all who come into his company; he is about 5 feet 10, rather spare, has a moderately high forehead, with black hair, short black whiskers, without mustaches, and an eye large, black, and expressive of a lurking devil in his look; he is a man of genteel and dignified deportment, but of a disposition perfectly heartless, but has never evinced a savageness of character except in the massacres in which he has been implicated in Texas. He married a Spanish lady of property, a native of Alvarado, and through that marriage obtained the first part of his estate called Manga de Clavo, 6 leagues from Vera Cruz. He has three fine children, yet quite young.

The following striking anecdote of Santa Ana illustrates his peculiar quickness and management: during the revolution of 1829, while he was shut up in Oaxaca, and surrounded by the government troops, and reduced to the utmost straits for the want of money and provisions, having a very small force, there had been in consequence of the siege and firing every day through the streets, no mass for several weeks. He had no money, and hit upon the following expedient to get it; he took possession of one of the convents got hold of the wardrobe of the friars dressed his officers and some of the soldiers in it, and early in the morning had the bells rung for mass. People delighted at having again an opportunity of adoring the Supreme Being, flocked to the church, where he was and after the house was pretty well filled his friars showed their side arms and bayonets from beneath their cowl; and closed the doors upon the assembled multitudes. At this unexpected denouncement there was a tremendous shrieking, when one of his officers ascended the pulpit and told the people that he wanted $10,000 and must have it. He finally succeeded in getting about $6,500, when he dismissed the congregation.

As a sample of Santa Ana's pious whims we relate the following:

In the same campaign of Oaxaca, Santa Ana and his officers were there besieged by Rincon, who commanded the government troops. Santa Ana was in a convent surrounded by a small breastwork. Some of the officers one night to amuse themselves, took the wooden saints out of the church and placed them as sentries, dressed in uniforms, on the breastwork. Rincon alarmed on the morning at this apparent boldness began to fire away at the wooden images, supposing them to be flesh and blood, and it was not until after some of the officers who were not in the secret had implored Santa Ana to prevent this desecration that the firing ceased.

Many similar facts are related of Santa Ana. We have not room at present to say more than there is no man who has filled the space he has that is so little understood. In short, he is all things to all men. He never was out of Mexico, and the likeness exhibited of him in this city bears no resemblance to him.

CIVIL ACTIONS AT BEL-AIR.

Brought by the trustees of the bank of Maryland.

From the Baltimore Gazette of the 18th inst.

The causes were removed from Baltimore county court, where they were instituted, to Harford county court, upon the affirmations of the several defendants therein, that a fair and impartial trial could not be had in that court. The following statements show the results to this period:

The first cause tried was against Thomas Ellicott, of the last term. The following short copy of the judgment shows the result of this case and its present condition—

Harford county court, August term, 1835.
The president and directors of the bank of Maryland, use of John B. Morris, Richard W. Gill and Thomas Ellicott, trustees, vs. Thomas Ellicott.
True copy. Test, HENRY DORSEY, clerk.
Appeal entered by defendant, 7th December, 1835.

The next cause tried was against Poultney, Ellicott & Co. The following short copy shows the verdict in this case—

Harford county court, March term, 1836.

TAILORS' COMBINATION TRIAL.

From the Journal of Commerce.

COURT OF OVER TERMINER. Henry Falkner, Wm. Livingston, James Noe, Alexander Hume, Peter Moss, Joshua Busey, Geo. Smith, John Walsh, Daniel S. Gray, Thos. Keating, Thos. Renter, Howel Vane, John Bomberger, Stephen Norris, James S. Magee, Alex. Douglass, John Dillon, Jas. Skillig, Daniel Rose and Thos. Douglass, were indicted for a riot and conspiracy injurious to trade and commerce.

The court has been occupied several days with the trial of twenty-one journeymen tailors for combination. The circumstances connected with it have already so fully come before the public in the police and other reports connected with the case, that it is not now necessary to give a detailed account of it. It will be remembered that some months back there was a strike for wages amongst a large number of journeymen tailors in this city, and that a certain body, called the Trades' Union society, who undertook to make laws and regulations for the trade, made several rules which they insisted on being observed by the master tailors, and on their refusing to comply with these rules, a number of journeymen left their employment and had recourse to threats and promises and various other modes to prevent journeymen tailors from working for any master tailor who did not conform to the rules, and pay the prices laid down by this association. The charges were fully substantiated by evidence.

The court charged the jury. It had been asserted that the individuals now on their trial could not be convicted of the offence charged against them, as they were already indicted for an assault and battery. This, however, formed no legal objection against putting them on their trial for a conspiracy. It had been decided by the supreme court of this state, that if an individual committed a felony, which was a higher offence than a conspiracy, then the conspiracy became merged in the felony, but where the offences committed by the individual were all of the same grade, as in the present case, the commission of the first offence was no legal bar to his being convicted on the second; therefore, a person having committed another misdemeanor, it can be no bar to his being tried for a conspiracy. Relatively to the law which was to govern the deliberation in the case now before them, it had been already settled by the supreme court of this state.

The very question involved in the present case was brought before that court, deliberately considered and unanimously adjudicated on. The case in question came before the supreme court, on appeal from the general sessions of Ontario; the crime charged against them was one under our statute. In the case which the court alluded to, the defendants, with other persons, formed a combination, and conspired to prevent journeymen shoemakers working below certain prices, and made a regulation that any person who made coarse shoes for less than a certain sum per pair, should forfeit one dollar, and that they would not work for any boss who gave less than the price fixed on.

A Mr. Lunn, however, procured a person named Pennault to make ten pair of shoes at a less price than the defendants had fixed upon, and for this reason they refused to work for him. Another count in the indictment against the defendants was, that they agreed not to work for any shoemaker who employed Pennault, and they refused to work for Mr. Lunn, and made him discharge Pennault. And this conduct the supreme court unanimously decided was a violation of the statute.

The offence committed by the present defendants, if an offence at all, is against the statute which says that if any man enter into a combination injurious to trade or commerce, that constitutes a conspiracy, but at the same time the act says—"That no agreement, except to commit a felony on the person of another, or to commit arson or burglary, shall be deemed a conspiracy, unless some act, besides such agreement, shall be done to effect the object thereof, by one or more of the parties." If then there is a conspiracy against trade or commerce, and any act in furtherance of it is done by one of the parties, it renders them all guilty.

In criminal cases the jury were judges of the law and the facts; this was their constitutional right; but the court trusted that as a discreet jury they would pay proper respect to the opinions of the highest tribunal of the country, which had unanimously concurred as to what was the exposition of the act; and the supreme court had said in a case similar to the present one, that it was a conspiracy and injurious to trade. That opinion had been read for the jury, and, in the mind of the court, was conclusive on the subject; and if it wanted exemplification, let them suppose that a number of persons engaged in the trade or manufactures of this city would from time to time enter into combinations of this sort and determine not to work under certain rates, and carry their resolutions into effect at times when their services were most necessary, what sort of a state would society be reduced to? For instance, suppose all the carpenters and bricklayers would, at the commencement of next May, determine not to work unless their wages were raised, and demand ten times more than they ought, and could succeed in doing so, what would become of the citizens, or who would occupy their houses? Or suppose that the produce of this country bore the highest price in the foreign market, and every one was anxious to export it; and that, at that moment, all the stevedores, shipwrights and other mechanics, whose services were necessary to fit out ships, insisted upon having ten times the value of their services, such conduct must bring commerce to a stand, and would be well calculated to destroy the trade of the city altogether. If such a system was tolerated, the constitutional control over our affairs would pass away from the people at large, and become vested in the hands of conspirators. We should have a new system of government, and our rights be placed at the disposal of a voluntary and self-constituted association. The settled law of the state was, however, as the court had just stated it, and it was to be hoped that the jury, acting discreetly and with a due regard to the well being of society, would not now turn their back upon the supreme court, and say that an offence was lawful, which they declared to be illegal. Before the jury came to such a conclusion, let them well consider the grievous consequences which must result from their doing so. Much pains had been taken to show that this prosecution was a spiteful proceeding between the masters and journeymen. This, however, was but a narrow and partial view of the subject, and not what the legislature had in view when they established a law for the community at large, and if their law could be now set at naught, or rendered imperative, the bad effects would be felt by every member of society.

If the law was as the court stated, the next question would be, were the defendants parties to the indictment, and what was the offence charged against them? Amongst other things charged against them was, that they entered into a conspiracy, and agreed not to work for any master who did not give them certain rates which they demanded, or for any master who employed men that worked for a less rate, or for any master who employed men who were not members of their society. They also made various other rules to secure the objects they had in view, which was to place thereby both the master and journey-men tailors under the domination of a few individuals. It would be for the jury to say, whether any body of men could raise their crests in this land of law, and control others by self organized combinations. This conduct constituted a combination, but it was necessary, according to the statute, that something more than mere agreement should be done. Before the revised statutes were passed, the combination would make the offence, but the legislature has added that, in order to consummate the offence some act must be done by one or more of the parties, in furtherance of their agreement. And on this subject it was perfectly settled, that if a body of men conspire together, and any one of them does an act in pursuance of that conspiracy, that act is to be visited on the whole body, and if the jury were satisfied that the defendants did make an agreement, and that any one of them did an act to carry their agreement into operation, then the offence was consummated. Such was the law, and how stood the facts?

The court then summed up the leading facts of the case.

It was unnecessary for the court to state more. It would be insulting the understanding of the jury to suppose they could imagine for one moment, that the prisoners had not taken measures to carry their combination into effect; and if they did form a combination, and take measures to carry it into effect, and that the law was as the supreme court decided it, then the prisoners were indubitably guilty.

The combination had been of so extensive a character, and created so great an excitement, that it might possibly have involved some persons for whom the jury might directly or indirectly feel some interest—but the court and jury must raise themselves above all feelings of friendship or sympathy, and be true to their oaths, and the well being of the public at large; and it was impossible that the acts of the defendants could escape with impunity, unless the court and jury violate their duty in order to take them out of the operation of the law. The court would again impress upon the minds of the jury that the present question was not to be considered a mere struggle between the masters and journeymen. It was one on which the harmony of the whole community depended. Let these societies only arise from time to time, and they would at last extend to every trade in this city, and we should have as many governments as there were societies. There was no necessity for such societies, and in the end they might operate against the very individuals who belonged to them. Many of these journeymen might themselves become masters, and the combinations which they now formed might hereafter mar their own interests. But the law does not view it as a mere question between master and men alone; it looks upon it as a question involving the interests of the entire community, and of every man who wants to live by the produce of his labor.

The jury retired for a short time, and returned a verdict of guilty against all the defendants. Counsel for the prisoners made a motion for time to put in exceptions to the charge; but the court stated its determination to sentence the prisoners on Monday next.

Counsel for the people, Messrs. Phenix, N. B. Blunt and Morris. For the prisoners, Messrs. Western and Whiting.

SENTENCE OF THE COURT.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser, June 11.

This being the day appointed by the court of oyer and terminer for pronouncing sentence on the journeymen tailors, convicted for conspiracy, before ten o'clock a considerable number of persons, apparently mechanics, assembled before the door of the court room, and in the passages of the hall. The numbers continued to increase, although not rapidly, until five minutes past eleven, at which time the doors were opened, and twenty-five minutes to twelve, the court made its appearance, consisting of Judge Edwards, and aldermen Banks, Benson, Ingraham and Randall. The spectators, whose number amounted perhaps to three or four hundred, were perfectly quiet and evidently disposed to create or countenance no disturbance. An efficient force of officers was, however, very properly in attendance.

The defendants were called as follows:—Henry Faulkner, Wm. Livingston, Jas. Noe, Alexander Hume, Peter Moss, Joshua Bussey, George Smith, Jno. Welsh, David S. Gray, Thos. Keating, Thos. Renton, Howell Vail, John Bomberger, Stephen Norris, Jas. S. Magee, Alexander Douglass, Jonathan Delong, Jas. Skillen, Dan'l Rose and Thos. Douglass. All answered.

Mr. Western rose and said the right of defendants to move an arrest of judgment was unquestionable. It had been held that an objection in arrest of judgment could not avail, in the appellate court, because not raised in the court below. For this reason, he would now state his objections.

1. That no substantial offence appears on the face of the indictment.

2. That even if such an offence is charged, yet the evidence does not bring any one of defendants within the penalty of the law, under the indictment and the opinion of Judge Savage.

3. That the judge, by his charge, took from the jury both law and fact.

He stated these objections, asking the court to reserve them for the benefit of the defendants, ruling as it should think proper.

Mr. Whiting also urged that the exceptions taken in the progress of the trial, should be reserved for the benefit of the defendants. He asked the court to suspend the sentence until the bill of exceptions can be disposed of, because, if passed the defendants would have no means of escaping the infliction of the penalty, although the judgment may be reversed on the writ of error. The bill of exceptions is taken in good faith, and will be brought to a decision as soon as possible.

Mr. Western said the conspiracy in this case, if there was one, was not against the public peace, but against thirty or forty master tailors, and read a case in which Lord Ellenborough gave his opinion that persons conspiring to commit a civil trespass, should not be indicted criminally.

Mr. Blunt asked if the court wished to hear any reply.

Judge Edwards said that the counsel was under misapprehension in saying that the court had wrongly charged the jury. The other points were embraced in the opinion of the supreme court, and need not be again determined by this court.

The court could not consent to suspend the sentence. They conceived the points of exception to be already decided by the supreme court against the defendants, and they had not the slightest expectation that the decision would be reversed on the bill taken in the case.

Judge Edwards proceeded to pass sentence. He recapitulated the charges of the indictment—defined conspiracies, and commented on their effects, as shown in this city, and particularly in the case of these defendants. He said combinations were not necessary in this country for the protection of mechanics, or any other class. They were of foreign origin, not in harmony with our institutions, or with the character of our people. He believed they were mainly upheld by foreigners.

In passing sentence, the court had been influenced by the recommendation to mercy of the jury, by the poverty of the defendants, and by the belief that they acted in ignorance of the law: a belief strengthened by the fact, represented to the court, that most of them were foreigners. The court were determined to punish mildly, in this instance, but at the same time gave the assurance that a repetition of the offence would be visited with increased severity.

Henry Faulkner, who was president of the society, and as it appeared in evidence, the master spirit of the proceedings of the defendants, was sentenced to pay a fine of $50.

Howell Vail, another very active party, to a fine of $100. And the others, to a fine of $50 each; and to stand committed until these fines are paid.

When the judge ceased speaking, a few hisses were heard from among the auditory—not more than five or six, however—and orders being immediately given to the officers, to arrest any person making disturbance in that or any other way, silence was at once restored, and the court room quickly emptied.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Congress will, in pursuance of the joint resolution adopted by both houses, adjourn on Monday next, the 4th of July. The people will rejoice at this event for more than one reason, and it will be a great relief to us and our readers—for we will then be at liberty to impart greater variety to our pages, and thus render them more interesting. A long session of congress is a hard trial to both parties, but the valuable character of the papers and documents recorded, mitigates in some degree, the labor of preparation and of reading.

It becomes our melancholy duty to announce the death of JAMES MADISON, who departed this life on the 28th ult. For this event we were, in some measure, prepared by recent accounts of his illness; yet its annunciation has raised in our heart the most deep and solemn emotions, and we feel as if the last of the altar-lights of the temple of liberty had been extinguished forever. For, in despite of the truths of philosophy and the enduring character of principles, we have ever associated the purity and prosperity of our free institutions with the lives of those patriots who assisted in their formation, and regarded them as their guardian genii; and now that their glorious work has been deprived of its last protector, we look upon the future as upon an untried experiment. But whether the great plan of self-government shall continue to promote the welfare of the human race, or be deserted to selfish and unallowed purposes, the latest posterity will not impeach the fair fame of those who devised it, or cease to admire the glory of their achievement—and to the memory of no one of that band of patriots are gratitude and honor more justly due, than to that of James Madison. His public acts were a noble commentary upon his political principles—his private life an illustration of the purest virtues of the heart. The honest intentions of the first are acknowledged by those who denied their wisdom—the effects of the last have been felt in that benevolence which gives comfort and delight in well-doing. His course has, indeed, ended gloriously, and his latter days offer an example for the imitation of those who have enjoyed or may enjoy the same honors no less commendable, than his services in the cause of his country have been useful.

Mr. Madison was born on the 15th March, in the year 1751, and was of course, eighty-five years old in March last. He retired from the presidential chair on the 4th of March, 1817, and has since resided in philosophic ease at Montpelier, Orange county, Virginia.

MINISTER TO FRANCE. We learn from the Intelligencer of yesterday, that LEWIS CASS (now secretary of war) has been appointed by the president of the United, with the advice and consent of the senate, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the UNITED STATES TO FRANCE. The appointment was, we understand, confirmed unanimously as soon as announced.

THE CREEK WAR. There have been a few skirmishes between the Creeks and our troops, but no important event has transpired since our last notice. The report of a passage of a large body of Creeks into Florida, is, as we apprehended, unfounded. Such an event cannot well take place; for we see it stated in the Columbus Herald of the 19th ult. that 1,000 of our troops are stationed on the river below that town, and that two steam boats are constantly running up and down to prevent the Indians from crossing. A very large force has been concentrated in and near Columbus, and it was expected that gen. Scott's would speedily open the campaign. But we learn by the Intelligencer of yesterday, that general Scott has been recalled to the seat of government, and that by this recall gen. Jessup will be left in chief command.

We have published several official papers in the present sheet, which contain some interesting particulars in relation to the war, and must confine our selections to such documents; for it is almost impossible to sift the truth from the mass of rumors and reports contained in the southern papers.

FROM FLORIDA. Gen. Clinch is unwilling to assume the command of the troops in Florida, and the president has accepted his resignation. By this determination of gen. C. the regular troops and militia in that territory are placed under the command of gen. Call. The remaining garrisons on the seaboard have been ordered to proceed forthwith to Florida for active service in the field. The troops there are suffering from sickness, and we see it stated that, of 118 men stationed at Fort Gilleland, 43 were afflicted with chills and fevers. The measles had also been raging there among the women and children. There was occasionally a skirmish with the enemy, who were still employed in driving off the cattle.

We have on file a letter from major Reed, giving an account of the delivery of the block house on the Wythlacoochee, which we will publish in our next.

TEXAS. Gen Houston and suite have left New Orleans to join the army. Messrs. P. W. Grayson and James Collingsworth, have been appointed commissioners by the Texian government to negotiate with the government of the United States for the recognition of the independence of Texas, and left New Orleans for Washington on the 17th ult.

The New Orleans Bulletin of the 18th ult. states, on the authority of the above commissioners, who arrived from Velasco, the present seat of government of Texas, that, on the — day of last month, an agreement in the nature of an armistice was entered into between the government of Texas and gen. Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, the substantial stipulations of which, on the part of the latter were, that all the Mexican forces then in Texas should forthwith evacuate the country, passing beyond the Rio Bravo del Norte; that all property taken in any portion of the Mexican army from Texian citizens, at any time since the commencement of the late invasion, should be forthwith restored; that all Texian prisoners in the hands of the enemy should be immediately set at liberty; for and in consideration of a corresponding number of Mexican prisoners in the hands of the Texans—and finally, that there should be for the present a cessation of all hostilities both by land and sea.

Among the minor stipulations of the agreement was one given by gen. Santa Ana personally, that he would not himself take up arms, or cause them to be taken up against the people of Texas, during their struggle for independence.

It is further authorised to state, that, in compliance with the stipulation for the evacuation of the country, all the Mexican forces were actually retreating as fast as possible, having when they were last heard from, already passed beyond San Antonio and Goliad, under the command of gen. Filasola, who whilst being next in rank to gen. Santa Ana, had, on receiving a copy of the armistice, passed his official engagement to obey its terms, so far as they applied to him.

It will be seen by reference to page 310 that gen. Santa Ana has offered a defence for the slaughter of colonel Fanning's troops.

THE DEPOSITE BILL. Upon the supposition that the amount of surplus revenue to be distributed on the 1st January next, will be $20,000,000, an accurate friend of the New York American has calculated for it, in round numbers, the apportionment according to the electoral college ratio, that is, according to the representation of each state in the senate and house of representatives. [The left column gives the result as the bill now stands—that on the right, the result that the bill as originally reported in the senate would have produced; that is, according to the ratio of representation in the house of representatives. This was altered by inserting "senate," so as to include the representation in both branches.]

RAILWAYS IN ENGLAND. A late number of the London Athenaeum contains an outline map of England, on which the principal rail roads—whether completed or in progress, are laid down. The Stockton and Darlington, which was opened in 1825, cost £200,000. The Liverpool and Manchester, at the opening of which, in 1830 Mr. Huskisson was killed, cost £1,200,000. The Kenyon and Leigh and Bolton and Leigh rail road, cost £150,000. That between Confort and High Peak, in Derbyshire, cost £180,000. The Leicester and Swarminston road, cost £135,000. That of Leeds and Selby £350,000. That of Whitby and Pickering £120,000, making in all an amount of two millions, two hundred and fifteen thousand pounds sterling—for completed rail roads: besides which there are several short mining rail roads, in South Wales, Durham and Northumberland, for the conveyance of coal. Those partially completed, are that between Carlisle and Newcastle, which will cost £540,000. That between London and Southampton, that between the Metropolis and Birmingham, that from Newton to Preston, the cost of which estimated at £500,000, an extension of which, five miles further will complete the rail road union, between the northern and southern waters of England, to the extent of 300 miles, at a cost of six millions sterling, and that from London to Greenwich, which will cost £400,000, and will be used as a channel for the entrance, of other lines into London, from the east. Several additional rail roads are in contemplation; and the capital employed on these works of improvement, amounts to the enormous sum of fifty-six millions eight hundred and fifty-six thousand pounds sterling. [Metropolitan.]

VIEWS OF RELIGION. The following table, compiled from the official publications of the several sects, is supposed to afford a fair view of the comparative strength of the different religious denominations in the United States. EMANCIPATION. Condition of the descendants of a number of emancipated slaves in Prince Edward county.

Richmond, March 23d, 1836.

To the editor of the Farmers' Register:

You expressed a wish (page —, vol. III.), to obtain information to the history of the emancipated people of color in Prince Edward; I presume those emancipated by the late Richard Randolph more especially.

More than twenty-five years ago, I think, they were liberated, at which time they numbered about one hundred, and were settled upon small parcels of land of 10 to 25 acres to each family. As long as the habits of industry, which they had acquired while slaves, lasted, they continued to increase in numbers, and lived in some degree of comfort—but as soon as this was lost, and most of those who had been many years in slavery either died or became old and infirm, and a new race, raised in idleness and vice, sprang up, they began not only to be idle and vicious, but to diminish instead of increasing, and have continued to diminish in numbers very regularly every year—and that too, without emigration; for they have almost without exception, remained together in the same situation as at first placed, to this day.

Idleness, poverty and dissipation are the agents which continue to diminish their numbers, and to render them wretched in the extreme, as well as a great pest, and heavy tax upon the neighborhood in which they live. There is so little of industry, and so much dissipation amongst them, that it is impossible that the females can rear their families of children—and the consequence is, that they prostitute themselves, and, consequently, have few children—and the operations of time, profligacy and disease more than keep pace with any increase among them. Whilst they are a very great pest and heavy tax upon the community, it is most obvious, they themselves are infinitely wretched by the exchange from slavery to liberty—if, indeed, their condition deserve that name. JAMES MADISON.

THE BLOODHOUND. The Cuba bloodhound, which it is proposed to introduce into Florida, is one of the fiercest and strongest of the Canine tribe. The breed was used in the early period of Spanish colonization to hunt the wretched natives of that island, and is still employed in the discovery and seizure of runaway negroes. So uncaring is the scent, and so pertinacious is he in the pursuit, that he never fails to track the fugitive to his lurking place in the most secret and remote recesses of the island, and so terrible is he from his strength and fierceness that the negro who is unarmed, on the approach of the animal always gives himself up for lost. The Floridian, in mentioning the project of introducing this breed, remarks as follows:

"The necessity of having recourse to this ferocious animal is to be deplored; but whatever may be the issue of the present war, that necessity will still exist. Should the Seminoles be obliged to submit, they will not be allowed to carry with them the slaves which they have captured. The country will still be left infested with banditti, which can hardly be exterminated by any other means. While the war lasts, the employment of this animal would effectually deter the enemy from separating into small parties. We should have no scruples in calling to our aid a brute as ferocious and blood-thirsty as the enemy we have to contend with."

A GREAT PROJECT. Steam navigation from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic. We perceive that the New York papers are beginning to agitate a grand project for opening a navigation from Lake Ontario to the Hudson river, adapted to the steamboats and other vessels that navigate both waters. The plan proposed, is to improve the Oswego and Oneida rivers, which are large deep streams, requiring but little to be done except locking around the rapids, and through those rivers to open the channel to the Oneida lake; thence to construct a canal 8 or 10 feet deep, and 100 feet wide, to the city of Utica; and from that point, eventually, to continue the same enlarged navigation either through the channel of the Mohawk river, or by a ship canal along its valley, to the Hudson. The city of Utica stands about half way between the two waters thus to be united; and a survey has recently been made from Lake Ontario to Utica, by which it appears that the proposed navigation can be opened to that point for about one million two hundred thousand dollars. This sum appears very small when we consider the distance (nearly 100 miles) and the magnitude of the work; but its cheapness is accounted for from the fact, that for about two-thirds of the distance there is already a navigable channel provided by nature, through the Oswego and Oneida rivers, and Oneida lake.

This strikes us as one of the most magnificent enterprises of the age, and worthy of the state which has the honor of being the pioneer in the system of internal improvement. It is evident from a glance at the map of the union, that the route alluded to, is the only one through which such a grand water communication can be made on the continent; and the work if practicable in that direction, as we suppose it is, will undoubtedly be undertaken by the enterprising state that possesses so peculiar an advantage; and when accomplished, would confer everlasting glory on the age, and incalculable benefits upon the whole country. We entertain no narrow jealousies in relation to the great internal improvements going on in our neighboring states. The trade of the vast and growing west is a subject of fair competition, and we have no doubt our own city will come in for its full share, as we are not a whit behind them, if not actually in advance, in respect of facilities for commanding that trade. We rejoice to see our whole country engaged in this noble strife of public improvement—this glorious competition for conferring blessings on the human family. The great project alluded to, if accomplished, would but stimulate the energies of our own state to further exertion, and carry her resources to farther development.

MUNIFICENT REQUEST. From the African Repository for May. The rev. Mr. Butler, of Port Gibson, Mississippi, in a letter to the New Orleans Observer, gives the following notice of the liberality of Isaac Ross, of Mississippi, who died last January. Mr. Ross was an officer in the war of the revolution, and one of the most esteemed citizens of that state. Mr. Butler says:

The deceased was the owner of more than 170 slaves, a splendid plantation, probably better stocked than any other in the state, and now an immense territory lying around "Prospect Hill." By his will, his plantation will be managed as before, during the life-time of his daughter, Mrs. Reed, the relict of the late Theo. B. Reed, esq. who died soon after his election to a seat in the senate of the United States from Mississippi. After the event, the servants who are over 21 years, are to decide, by a vote of the majority, whether they will go to Liberia or remain in servitude. If the election should terminate in favor of emigrating to Liberia, then all the property is to be sold, and the proceeds, together with the money realized from the sale of the crops since his death, (with the exception of 12 or 15,000 dollars subtracted for a grandchild), are to be expended in the transportation and comfortable settlement of the emancipated in the colony of Liberia, and the establishment of an institution of learning in some place of the colony. But if a majority of his servants over 21 years, should elect the continuance of their servitude, then it is required that the entire estate, servants and every thing else, except the mansion and some land around it, should be exposed to public sale, and the whole proceeds, with the exception before named, are to be vested in certain trustees, for the endowment of the said institution of learning.

I would not attempt to make an estimate of the amount of the entire property of which our benevolent fellow citizen has made such a noble disposition; but I am fully persuaded it will stand among the most munificent deeds in the history of our country.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 22. [The following proceedings took place in the senate on the consideration of the amendment of the house to the deposit bill, and are published for future reference, our last notice of the proceedings having been necessarily brief.]

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate proceeded to consider the amendment made by the house to the bill to regulate the deposits of the public money.

The amendment being read, Mr. Calhoun moved to lay the amendment on the table for examination; which motion, after a few words from Mr. Webster, was agreed to. [The amendments of the house to the bill granting lands to the state of Alabama, for the purposes specified therein, were taken up, and concurred in.]

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the senate proceeded to consider the amendment to the deposit bill. Mr. Calhoun moved that the senate concur in the amendment.

Mr. Webster expressed his acquiescence, but said he should have preferred the bill as it went from the senate, as it was then in a form which disconnected it most completely from the state governments. For other reasons, also, he would have preferred the bill as it went from the senate.

Mr. Morris objected to the motion to concur, as he thought the amendment by which the states were bound to repay the deposit on the demand of the general government very exceptionable, and likely to lead to serious abuses. He would rather give the money exclusively to the states than vote for this amendment. He hoped the amendment would be printed. He was opposed to all compromises where right and principle were involved.

Mr. Buchanan said we had arrived at that point when we must accept the amendment, or leave the money in the deposit banks for another year. Whatever he thought of the amendment, he was not prepared to meet this responsibility. The house objected to the senate bill, that it placed the money in the state treasuries not as a public deposit, because the federal government did not reserve the power to reclaim the money at any time, and that this was not a constitutional mode of depositing. The bill was amended to obviate the objection, and he hoped the amendment would be concurred in.

Mr. Calhoun said the principle of the bill had not been changed, and he hoped the senate would come to a vote. No secretary of the treasury will ever call for this money.

Mr. Clay deemed the bill as amended better than it was before, because it now contained a restriction on the treasury in calling in the money, so that it would not be in the power of the treasury to distress the banks. He also understood that the amendment would quiet constitutional scruples somewhere, and he was himself disposed to respect and quiet scruples of that kind any how and any where.

Mr. Clayton expressed his preference for the bill in its amended form to the original bill.

Mr. White suggested that, as the operation of a law of the states was rendered necessary by the amendment, and as the legislature of Tennessee met but once in two years, this state might have the benefit. He wished that no state should be deprived of the benefit until her legislature should have been in session. He would have preferred the bill as it went from the senate.

Mr. Webster thought that the original bill was liable to the same objection, and that the amendment did not make the difficulty greater.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, would have preferred the bill as it went from the senate, because he thought the certificate system the best mode of reclaiming the deposits. Still he would vote for the amendment, although it put it in the power of the states to evade the payment, should any of them be disposed to evade, which he did not expect would be the case.

Mr. White suggested that the difficulty he had suggested might be rendered by the introduction of an amendment to the amendment of the house.

Mr. Calhoun said that few, if any, of the legislatures would be in session before the 1st of January, when the bill will take effect.

Mr. Morris said his great objection to the amendment was, that it created the relations of debtor and creditor between the federal and state governments. The money is placed in the banks by agreement, but there could be no bargaining with the states.

Mr. Benton said he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. King, of Alabama, did not approve of the amendment, but, thinking it necessary to provide for placing the revenue in greater security than that in which it now stands, he would surrender his objections.

Mr. White said, on examination he found that his objections had abated, and he should not oppose the amendment.

The amendment was then concurred in.

June 23. The chair laid before the senate a communication from the department of state, in reply to a resolution calling for copies of all the acts passed by the territorial legislature of Florida; which was laid on the table.

Mr. Clay stated that the committee on foreign relations had examined the correspondence which had passed between the governments of the United States and Great Britain, for the settlement of our north eastern boundary. It had been referred, it would be recollected by the senate, for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether it might be published without prejudice to the public interests. The committee, thinking that the opinion and wishes of the senators from the two states of Maine and Massachusetts, more immediately interested, ought to have controlling influence on the question of publication, had afforded them an opportunity of examining the correspondence, and they all concurred in believing it might be safely published.

The negotiation has not entirely closed, although the committee regret to find that it does not promise to result in any satisfactory adjustment of the boundary question. Various endeavors, during the progress of the correspondence, to accomplish that desirable end, have failed of success. Under all the circumstances the committee believe that more mischief might be done from misconception and misrepresentation of what has been attempted, by withholding the correspondence from the public, than by a publication of it. The committee, therefore, concur in opinion with the senators from Maine and Massachusetts, that it is expedient to publish it. Mr. Clay accordingly moved that it be published, which was ordered; and, upon the motion of Mr. Shepley, three thousand copies were ordered.

After the reception of several reports from the committee on pensions, on motion of Mr. Shepley, a member of the committee on engrossed bills was ordered to be appointed in place of Mr. Hill; and Mr. Page was then appointed.

Mr. Southard offered a resolution providing that the senate meet every day at 10 o'clock and take a recess from 2 till 4— which was laid on the table.

The bill to provide a building for a patent office, was read a third time, and the question being on its passage, a brief debate occurred, Messrs. Clay and Clayton speaking in opposition to and Mr. Ruggles in favor of the bill, after which it was laid on the table according to Mr. Clayton's motion. Ayes 20, nays 18.

The bills on the table ordered to a third reading, were read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, the senate proceeded to consider the bill to change the mode of conducting the sales of public lands.

After the bill had been amended, on motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, Mr. Walker moved the indefinite postponement of the bill, and asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered. Some discussion took place, in which Messrs. Porter, Preston, Ewing, of Ohio, Linn, Walker, King, of Alabama, Hendricks, Clay and Robinson participated, when the question was taken on the motion to postpone indefinitely, and decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Hendricks, Hubbard, King, of Alab. Linn, Moore, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robinson, Shepley, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, Knight, Leigh, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Tomlinson, Webster—15.

The senate then adjourned.

June 24. A message was received from the president of the United States, announcing his approval of the bill to regulate the public deposits.

Mr. Clay remarked that the message just communicated by the president announced the gratifying fact that he had approved the deposit bill. He (Mr. C.) was extremely glad of it, and it afforded ground for great rejoicing; but he could not refrain from observing that the same fact was announced this morning in the Globe, in an editorial article which bore an authorized character; and that it was not according to established usage, nor respectful towards congress, that his approbation of a bill passed by that body should be communicated to the editor of a newspaper prior to the communication of the fact to that house in which the bill had originated.

The following message was also received from the president of the United States:

To the senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the senate of the 18th instant, I transmit a report from the secretary of state, with the papers therewith presented. Not having accurate and detailed information of the civil, military and political condition of Texas, I have deemed it expedient to take the necessary measures, now in progress, to procure it, before deciding upon the course to be pursued in relation to the newly declared government.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, 23d June, 1836.

Department of state, Washington, 23d June, 1836.

To the president of the United States:

The senate of the 13th instant, requesting the president "to communicate to the senate any information in his possession not inconsistent with the public interest touching the political condition of Texas—the organization of its government, and its capacity to maintain its independence; and, also, any correspondence which may have taken place between the executive of the United States and the government of Texas or its agents," has the honor to lay before the president the accompanying copies of papers addressed to, and left at, the department of state by persons claiming to be agents of the republic of Texas, being all the information and correspondence called for by the resolution. No answers having been returned to any of these communications, they remain for further consideration, and such direction as the president shall hereafter give. All which is respectfully presented.

JOHN FORSYTH.

The message having been read,

Mr. Clay rose, and said it did not appear to him to be necessary that a reference should be made of this message, as the president himself states that he deems it requisite that he shall have further information on the subject before he determines on the propriety of recognising the independence of Texas. The committee on foreign relations in their report had certainly thrown out no reflection on the president as having been too tardy in his movements, but had come to the conclusion that it would be proper to recognize the independence of Texas whenever it should be communicated that she had a government able to sustain itself. As the president had signified a desire to wait for further information before he acts, there would probably be no necessity to move to refer these papers to the committee on foreign relations. He moved to lay the message on the table and print it.

Mr. Preston stated that the only fact necessary to be established was, that the war in Texas had terminated; and that was proved by the documents accompanying the message. He would, however, concur in the motion of the senator from Kentucky, merely reserving to himself the privilege to move further in the subject, if, on reflection, he should feel convinced that such course was advisable. The present inclination of his mind was to move to refer the resolution of the committee on foreign relations back to that committee, with instructions to report a resolution to recognise the independence of Texas.

Mr. Clay said that if it should be considered by the senator from South Carolina, (or any other senator) advisable to adopt such a resolution as he had suggested, he might do so when the resolution of the committee on foreign affairs came to be acted on, and that resolution was the special order for yesterday. He did not concur in the opinion expressed by the senator, that the sole fact to be regarded in acting on this subject was that of the termination of the war. There was also another fact, and it was that concerning which he presumed the president was now seeking information, and this was—whether there is, in fact, a government existing in full and successful operation, so as to justify the establishment of intercourse and relations of amity. Whenever the motion to lay the message on the table, and print it, was disposed of, he would move to make the resolution reported by the committee on foreign relations the special order for a day next week.

The message was then laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the resolution reported by the committee on foreign relations was then postponed and made the special order for Wednesday next.

A number of reports were received and disposed of, when, on motion of Mr. Tomlinson, it was ordered that the daily hour to which the senate shall adjourn shall be ten o'clock during the residue of the session.

After the consideration of several bills for the relief of individuals, on motion of Mr. Southard, the senate proceeded to consider the bill for the organization of the navy. On motion of Mr. Southard, the bill was amended by striking out the words

"four rear admirals"—he also moved to strike out "nine?" before commodores and insert "thirteen."

Mr. Cuthbert moved to divide the question, but it was decided by the chair to be out of order. The question on the motion of Mr. Southard was then decided in the negative. Mr. Cuthbert then moved to strike out the whole of the commodores, so as to destroy that rank. Mr. Southard asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Webster expressed a wish to retain the rear admirals and strike out the commodores. He would move when out of committee, to restore the rear admirals, and would now vote against the commodores. The proposition to take the question by yeas and nays was then withdrawn, and the motion to strike out was agreed to. Mr. Cuthbert moved to amend the bill by striking out the grade of second lieutenant; which was agreed to. Mr. Webster moved to increase the number of "first" lieutenants from 250 to 350, so as to include the number which had been included under the head of "second" lieutenants; which was agreed to. The bill was then reported to the senate, and the amendments were concurred in, except that in relation to rear admirals. On motion of Mr. Webster, the bill was so amended as to make one admiral, one vice admiral and three rear admirals—yeas 18, nays 10. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

A number of private bills were next considered and ordered to a third reading, when the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and, after some time spent in secret session, adjourned.

June 25. On motion of Mr. Swift, the assistant door-keeper, Mr. Haight, was excused from attendance for the residue of the session, on account of sickness in his family. After receiving reports from committees and agreeing to several reports and resolutions which were lying upon the table, &c. the senate proceeded to the consideration of the pension bills, when seventy-three bills of that character were considered and ordered to be read a third time. The bills on the table ordered to a third reading were read a third time and passed.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Wright, took up the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York. Mr. W. moved to amend it so as to extend the relief to the sufferers who had paid their loans previous to the passage of the act, and whose losses exceeded $1,000. He explained that there had been loans paid by the sufferers to the amount of $405,115 before the passage of the act. The amendment was then agreed to and the bill ordered to be engrossed.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, agreed to postpone the previous orders, for the purpose of taking up the bill to grant certain annuities of land to the states therein named. Some discussion arose on this bill, when it was, on motion of Mr. Mangum, laid on the table—yeas 23, nays 17.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Clayton, proceeded to consider the amendment of the house to the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States in the State of Michigan. The amendment struck out the salary of $2,000 appropriated by the senate bill for the district judge of Michigan, and substituted $1,500. The question being on the motion of Mr. Clayton to strike out $1,500 and insert $1,800, Mr. Clayton withdrew his proposition, and the amendment of the house was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the bill to settle the claim of the executrix of Richard W. Meade, was taken up, slightly amended, read a third time and passed.

Mr. Buchanan moved the senate to take up the bill to increase the pay of the marine corps. The bill being taken up, Mr. Buchanan moved to amend the bill so as to place the marines on the same footing with the infantry companies in the army, and in case they are called out to sea, they shall be entitled to the same privileges as officers of the navy.

The amendment was lost—yeas 14, nays 14.

Mr. Buchanan (the bill having been reported to the senate) renewed his motion to amend, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the motion rejected—yeas 27, nays 10. An amendment was moved by Mr. Southard and agreed to, after which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The District bills from the house, with amendments, were referred to the committee for the District of Columbia. On motion of Mr. Moore, a bill to create a new land office in Alabama was taken up and ordered to be engrossed. The senate concurred in the amendments of the house to the resolution concerning the Smithsonian institution, and, having spent a short time in the consideration of the bill for the relief of Joseph Grant, before a question was taken, adjourned.

June 27. Mr. White presented the proceedings of a large meeting assembled at Nashville, and a memorial praying that Texas may be acknowledged as a free, sovereign and independent state. Mr. W. expressed his acquiescence in the feeling and action of the meeting, when, on his motion, the proceedings were read, laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster, from the committee on finance, reported the bill from the house making appropriations for certain fortifications, with two amendments; which amendments were ordered to be printed.

The committee on military affairs and the committee on the judiciary were respectively discharged from the various subjects which had been submitted to them.

Mr. Preston offered the following resolution which lies one day for consideration.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for defraying the expenses of an agent or commissioner to Texas, whenever the president may think it proper to make such appointment.

Mr. Webster offered resolutions, in substance, as follows, which lie for consideration:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury, and the secretary of the navy, and the secretary of war, lay before the senate early in the next session of congress, an account of all moneys paid away under contracts made with their departments, and by the several disbursing officers, out of appropriations made at this session.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury cause to be published, during the recess of congress, the amount of money in the treasury which is subject to draft.

On motion of Mr. Tomlinson, the senate reconsidered the vote by which a bill granting pensions to certain individuals therein named was passed on Saturday, and the bill was then laid on the table.

The several bills ordered to a third reading on Saturday were read a third time, and passed.

The senate proceeded to consider the message of the president of the United States, returning the bill fixing a day for the annual meeting of congress, and for the close of the first session of each congress.

The question being on the passage of the bill, the objections of the president to the contrary notwithstanding, Mr. Morris stated at length the reasoning which had brought him to the conclusion that the objections of the president are not sustained by the soundest construction of the constitution. Mr. Goldsborough took a similar view, and expressed his dissent from the views of the executive. Mr. Porter said he had voted against the bill when it was brought forward, but he was opposed to the grounds taken by the president. Mr. Wall sustained the argument of the president in a few observations. Mr. Southard had voted against the bill, because he considered that its provisions involved an inconvenience, but he was satisfied that congress had the constitutional power to pass the law, and he could not therefore sustain the veto, but should vote for the bill, the decided vote of the two houses having settled the question of expediency. Mr. Niles sustained the principles of the message, and maintained that the bill could not be sustainable, because it fettered the successors of the congress which passed the law. Mr. Walker referred to the constitution to show that when a bill was vetoed by the president, it was not required of congress to reconsider his reasons, but only to reconsider the bill.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, the president's objections notwithstanding, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Morris, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Webster—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Rives, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—23.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. Clayton asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to fix the day for the annual meeting of congress, which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading. [This bill merely fixes the day of meeting for the first Monday in November.]

The special order, being the bill to restore the constitutional currency, was postponed, by a vote of 17 to 11.

Mr. Wright moved to take up a bill anticipating the payment of the indemnities obtained under the French and Neapolitan treaties, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

[This bill proposes to take about four millions out of the treasury, and pay it in advance to the claimants.]

The question being put, it was determined as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Grundy, Hubbard, King, of Ala. King, of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Knight, Leigh, Mangum, Porter, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Webster, White—21.

So the senate refused to take up that bill.

A bill to establish a foundry; an armory in the west and one in the south; arsenals in the states in which none have yet been established, and depots for arms in certain states and territories, came up in its order. The bill was amended on motion of Mr. Benton, when Mr. Calhoun moved its indefinite postponement, on account of the want of time for its consideration. Mr. Walker called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered. Some discussion took place on this motion, in which Messrs. King, of Ala. Linn, Porter, Calhoun, King, of Ga. [who stated that we have 800,000 stands of arms on hand, as many as Great Britain has, and nearly as many as France, and that we require no more], and Wall participated, when the question was taken, and decided in the negative. Yeas 13, nays 22. Mr. King, of Ga. moved to lay the bill on the table with the view to give time for further inquiry—negatived yeas 16, nays 17. On motion of Mr. King, of Ala. the armory for the south was stricken out, and the bill was so amended as to provide for one in the west or south west. On motion of Mr. Webster, the provision for the arsenal at St. Louis was stricken out.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A number of private bills were considered as in committee of the whole and ordered to be engrossed. The senate then, on motion of Mr. Clay, proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after remaining for some time with closed doors, on reopening them the senate adjourned.

June 28. After other business had been transacted, which will be noticed hereafter, on motion of Mr. White, the senate proceeded to consider the resolution offered by him, some time ago, rescinding the resolution of the senate of March, 1834, declaring that the president had transcended his authority in reference to the removal of the depositories. Mr. White addressed the senate at length in explanation and support of his views, for nearly three hours, when he asked the yeas and nays on his resolution. Mr. Walker then expressed the grounds on which he should vote against the resolution.

The yeas and nays being ordered, the question was taken on the rescinding resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. King, of Georgia, White—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, Knight, Leigh, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Swift, Tomlinson, Walker, Wright—28.

So the resolution was negatived.

Mr. Wright presented instructions he had received from the legislature of New York on this subject; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Clay suggested the propriety of taking up the expunging resolution, so as to dispose of the whole business. Mr. Clayton moved to take up the resolution, as he had received instructions to vote against it, and wished to record his vote. After some conversation between Messrs. Wright, Benton and Clayton, it was fixed that the resolution should be taken up at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Knight, the vote by which the bill for the relief of Joseph Grant [extending his patent for making hat bodies] was reconsidered. Mr. Knight then moved to strike out the amendment which secured from harm those who had used the invention since the patent had expired, which this bill was intended to renew. Some discussion ensued. The yeas and noes were then demanded by Mr. Wright, and ordered, on the motion to strike out.

The question was then about to be taken, when Mr. Hubbard moved to lay the bill on the table, which was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 20.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider the vote annulling the bill by inserting the proviso, and decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19.

The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 17.

[This bill was to renew a patent expired perhaps two years ago for a machine for making hat bodies. Since the expiration of the patent, the invention had fallen into the public hands, and was now in common use. Mr. Ruggles introduced an amendment to secure to those who have the machine the right of using them, notwithstanding the renewal of the patent. The bill had been originally ordered to be engrossed, with this amendment engrafted upon it; but it was complained that this prevented the patentee from making any advantage of his invention, the motion to reconsider was made.]

The bills ordered to a third reading were read a third time, and passed.

The question coming up on the third reading of the bill to establish a foundry, an armory in the west and south, &c. its consideration was, on motion of Mr. Crittenden, postponed until to-morrow.

A communication having been read on the part of the owners of a brick building near the capitol, offering to sell it to the U. States for a patent office, with some other communications, Mr. Ruggles made a brief explanation, in which he said that it was the opinion of the president and Mr. Livingston that the building would not answer.

Mr. Clayton moved to recommit the bill in relation to the subject with instructions, to the committee on the judiciary, to report a new bill providing for the purchase of the brick building referred to, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The question was then taken and the motion lost.—Yeas 14, noes 19.

Mr. Ruggles, by general consent, now moved to insert a proviso that a contract should be made for the building for $103,000. This amendment was agreed to, and the bill passed by the following vote.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Goldsborough, Leigh, Moore, Porter, Southard, White—11.

The bills from the house were read a first and second time, and referred.

June 29. Mr. Clay rose, and said he had a petition to present from the citizens of a portion of Kentucky, recommending the Colonization society to the favorable notice of congress, and asking aid in its behalf. Mr. C. said it was too late, he was aware, for any action on the petition at this session, but he would take occasion to remark, that, after all his experience and his observation of the course of the society, his convictions as to the utility of this great project remained without change; and he trusted that the society would hereafter receive a larger portion of the public favor than it had heretofore enjoyed. At present he would merely move to lay the petition on the table; which was agreed to.

Mr. Wall asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill supplementary to the act to regulate the deposits of the public money; which was read twice, and referred to the committee on finance.

After other business, on motion of Mr. Webster, the senate proceeded to consider the bill from the house, making appropriations for certain fortifications.

Mr. Webster then explained that two amendments, one appropriating $50,000 for Boston, and the other appropriating $50,000 for Charleston, to supply an omission in the house, were proposed; but as the adoption of these amendments would render it necessary to send the bill back to the house, so as to make it necessary to refer it again to the committee of the house, thus endangering the whole bill, he was not disposed to press the amendments.

The amendments were then negatived.

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the bill was laid on the table for further examination, with the understanding that it would be called up again during the day. After some time, the consideration of the bill was resumed, on motion of Mr. Wright. Mr. Calhoun moved to recommit the bill to the committee on finance, principally on the ground that the lateness of the session rendered it impossible that the amount can be expended this season. Instead of three millions he was willing to go as far as one million. Mr. Clayton explained, that the cause of the increased appropriation was the failure of the fortification bill of last year. He wished to amend the bill by adding a section prohibiting the payment of any of the money to the disbursing officers, except so fast as the progress of the works rendered it necessary.

Mr. Clay thought the amendment a proper one. But he wished to call the attention of the senate to the extraordinary appropriations made at this session. The amount appropriated by the bills passed, up to the 25th instant, was twenty-five millions; the bills which had come in since comprised eight millions, making thirty-three millions; and when the Indian appropriations, for the Cherokees and Creeks, shall be added, the total amount will be from forty to forty-five millions—a sum larger than is expended by the British government, exclusive of the interest and management of the public debt and the pension list. He reminded the senator from New York, (Mr. Wright), that he had estimated eighteen millions as the maximum, and that the calculation of the secretary of the treasury was that the expenditures would be little more than one-third of the present amount. How are we to spend four millions and a half during the session? He had heard that one of the objects of these appropriations was, before a certain bill which had been called for by the voice of the country, (the deposit bill), should go into operation, to draw these large sums from the treasury, and place them in banks where exorbitant interest can be made upon the people's money. He expressed regret that the fortification bill of the last year had failed, but the failure of that bill did not render it necessary to swell the appropriations in the bill to such an enormous extent. He called on the friends of the administration to think of the country. He did not wish to see them driven out of power by public indignation, although he had no particular desire to see them remain in office. But he called on them, for the sake of themselves and their party, to be careful to carry into effect the principles of reform which they laid down at the outset of their career, and to prepare to justify their conduct before the people.

Mr. Wright said that he had hoped this bill would not have been resisted. He recalled to the recollection of the senate that last year no fortification bill had passed, and now half of another session had passed away, and there is not a dollar appropriated. The appropriation for next session will not pass a day before the 31st of March, and the public interests were suffering. He stated that there were included in this bill items which should have been in the army bill, not pertaining to fortifications, but introduced into this bill for convenience, so that the whole of the sum ought not to be charged to the fortifications. He presumed that the money could be expended, and that we were not in that sad condition in which men never were before. He did not object to the amendment of the senator from Delaware.

Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, said that the amount appropriated by the bill was five times as large as were the usual annual appropriations; and notwithstanding the confident tone of the senator from New York, he did not believe that we could expend all this money, although we might throw it away. He stated that the appropriation bills had not been delayed in the senate. They had been kept back elsewhere, and not here. Mr. Calhoun then withdrew his motion to enable Mr. Clayton to offer his amendment. The amendment of Mr. Clayton was then agreed to.

On the clause making an appropriation for the fortification on the Pea Patch island, coming up, Mr. Wall moved an amendment rendering it necessary for the attorney general to investigate the title before any disbursements were made upon the island. The question was argued at some length, when the motion was rejected—yeas 10, nays 25.

Mr. Calhoun renewed his motion to recommit the bill with instructions to report a bill appropriating not more than sixteen hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. Wright asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The motion was discussed by Messrs. Clayton, Calhoun, Crittenden and Ewing, of Ohio, and decided as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Kent, King, of Alab. Leigh, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Hendricks, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Webster, Wright—20.

Mr. Clay, moved to lay the bill on the table in order to go into executive business. Mr. Benton called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, Kent, Leigh, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White, Wright—21.

Mr. Clay, after stating that the amount appropriated was alarming, said he would make one more effort to check the current of extravagance, and moved to recommit the bill with instructions to report a bill reducing the appropriations one-third. Mr. Clayton asked for a division, so as to take the vote first on the motion to recommit. Mr. Clay consented to this division of the motion. After some remarks by Messrs. Cuthbert, Webster, Calhoun, Preston and Davis, the yeas and nays being ordered, the question was taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Hendricks, Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Porter, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Hubbard, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Rives, Robinson, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wright—18.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short time spent therein, the senate adjourned.

June 30. We have not room for a detailed account of this day's proceedings, which will be given in our next. The principal business transacted was—the indefinite postponement (rejection) of the bill to change the time of the annual meeting of congress which passed the house of representatives yesterday by a small majority—the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution, which had passed the other house, for amending the joint rules of proceeding of the two houses so as to continue over from one session to another unfinished business depending between the two houses—and the concurrence in the amendments of the house to the bill concerning the banks in the District of Columbia, so as to extend the charters of all the existing banks to July 4, 1838.

The fortification bill was under consideration, when the senate, at 5 o'clock, took a recess.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, June 23. Mr. Adams, by general consent, presented the protest of certain Cherokee chiefs against the treaty made with that nation of Indians, and it was committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Sutherland moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer a resolution that the house proceed to the consideration of the harbor bill and the bill in relation to the Cumberland road, at 12 o'clock this day, and continue in the consideration thereof until disposed of—and asked on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, by adding the bill to carry into effect certain Indian treaties. The question was then taken on suspending the rules and decided in the affirmative—yeas 141, nays 49. On motion of Mr. Finck the house proceeded to the orders of the day.

The motion of Mr. Vanderpoel, to reconsider the vote by which the bill amendatory of the act for the continuation of the Cumberland road was rejected, was postponed till to-morrow.

The bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting land to certain states, was then taken up; the motions pending, being to commit to the committee of ways and means, or to the committee on public lands, with certain instructions heretofore published.

On motion of Mr. Hawes the bill was laid on the table—yeas 104, nays 85.

Several bills were committed that will be noticed in their progress: among them was the bill to change the organization of the post office department, which was referred to the committee on the post office and post roads.

The house, in execution of the special order of the day, went into committee of the whole, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for certain harbors, and removing obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, for 1836. The bill was considered until the hour of recess. After the recess several bills, received from the senate, were read twice and referred. The house then went into committee of the whole upon the harbor bill, and having rejected several amendments, the committee rose and the house adjourned.

Thursday, June 23. Mr. Adams, from the committee on manufactures, reported a bill from the senate in relation to the duty on rail road iron; which, by consent, was read three times and passed.

Mr. R. M. Johnson, from the committee on military affairs, reported the bill from the senate, to increase the military establishment of the United States, with an amendment; also, a bill for the moral and religious instruction of the army, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. Vanderpoel, from the select committee on the subject, made a report in favor of the erection of a monument to the memory of the captors of major Andre, with a bill for that purpose, which was read twice and committed.

After several ineffectual attempts to suspend the rules, Mr. Connor, from the committee on the post office and post roads, reported the "bill to change the organization of the post office department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof," with the amendments of the senate thereto, with the recommendation that the house concur in the same. The bill and amendments were committed.

On motion of Mr. Connor, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Howard in the chair), on the above bill. Some of the amendments were concurred in. The amendments increasing the salaries of the clerks of the department were disagreed to. The question being on the amendment of the senate, striking out the 43d and 44th sections, which prevent the postmasters from receiving any emolument from pigeon-holes or boxes, some debate took place, in which Messrs. Phillips, Mann, of New York, Ash, Johnson, of La. Everett and Briggs took part, when the hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the committee rose.

In pursuance of the special order, the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), and was about to proceed to the consideration of the light house bill, that being the next in order, when Mr. Vinton moved to reconsider a vote by which his proposition to amend the bill making appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for the improvement of certain harbors and rivers, had been rejected. This motion gave rise to a brief debate, after which the question was taken, the vote was reconsidered and the amendment adopted. [The amendment adds a section appropriating thirty thousand dollars for the improvement of the Ohio river from the falls to Pittsburgh.]

The bill was further amended, on motion of Mr. Ashley, by striking out the sections making appropriations for the improvement of the Ohio, Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and to insert another section, embracing the same amount of appropriation, to be expended under the direction of the secretary of war—and then laid aside.

The committee next proceeded to consider the harbor bill, Mr. Bell moved to strike out the enacting clause; and addressed the house in support of his motion till the hour for the usual recess arrived, when he suspended his remarks.

Evening session. The house resumed business at 4 o'clock; and having disposed of several resolutions of a private character, went again into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), on the bill making appropriations for certain harbors, &c. the motion of Mr. Bell to strike out, being still pending. Mr. Bell again took the floor and opposed the bill in a speech of considerable length. After he had concluded, Mr. Sutherland expressed a hope that the gentleman from Tennessee would permit the bill to be laid aside till to-morrow. Mr. Mercer also expressed a wish that it might be deliberately considered to-morrow, and hoped the committee would rise. Mr. Bell not wishing, he said, to delay the action of the committee, or the progress of the bill, withdrew his motion for the present, giving notice that he should renew it in the house.

After some remarks from Messrs. Peyton, Sutherland, Mercer, Phillips and Johnson, of Louisiana, the committee, without taking any question, rose, and at nine o'clock the house adjourned.

Friday, June 24. Mr. W. B. Shepard, from the committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the senate bill to extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment—and remarked that as there was no necessity for the commitment of the bill he hoped it would be ordered to a third reading. This recommendation gave rise to considerable discussion and several motions, but before the bill was disposed of the special order was announced.

On motion of Mr. Thomas, the committee on the judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the senate bill, disapproving and annulling certain acts of the territorial legislature of Florida, and it was brought into the house and taken up for consideration.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. McKay moved the suspension of the rules for the purpose of enabling him to offer the following resolutions, which were read:

Resolved, That the power of taking money from the people, by laying and collecting duties, imposts and excises, is one of the most sacred of the trusts vested in the general government; that it is enforced solely to enable it to command the necessary means to execute the objects for which it was instituted, and that to exact money from the people when not necessary for those objects, or more than may be necessary, would be, on the part of the government, a manifest breach of trust, and to the people unjust and oppressive.

Resolved, That the revenue receivable under the present laws is, and will be more than is required for the fair and legitimate wants of the government, and that provision ought to be made for its reduction.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury report to this house, at the commencement of the next session, what alteration can be made in the existing tariff of duties, consistently with the principles of the several acts imposing duties upon imports, with a view to reduction.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury also report upon the best mode of diminishing the revenue arising from the public lands, without retarding the settlement of the new states, or impairing the interests of the general government; and generally his views as to the best mode of reducing the revenue to the fair and constitutional wants of the government.

Mr. Mann, of New York, called for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered. Mr. McKay moved a call of the house, which motion was agreed to—yeas 105, nays 74. On motion of Mr. Heister all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with. The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and decided in the negative—yeas 124, nays 66.—Not quite two-thirds. Mr. McKay then gave notice that he would offer the same motion on Monday.

The house, in pursuance of the special order, resolved itself into committee of the whole, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain harbors for the year 1836. An animated debate now ensued, in which Messrs. Lane, Vinton, Crane, Chambers, Vanderpoel, Sutherland, Mercer, Galbraith, Hawes, Whittlesey, Patton, and Cambreling participated. The latter asked Mr. Patton, who was addressing the committee, to give way, that he might request the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell), to renew his motion to strike out the enacting clause. Mr. Patton said he had intended to renew that motion before he had done; when he gave way for the house to take its usual recess.

Evening session. The house resumed, in committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for certain harbors for the year 1836."

Mr. Patton moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. On this motion a long debate took place, in which Messrs. Gillet, Garland, of Virginia, Galbraith, Smith, Sutherland, E. Whittlesey, Turrill, Cambreling, Bell, Boon, Underwood, Everett, Denny, Mercer, Briggs, Hannegan, Reed, Harper, Robertson, Pearce, of Rhode Island, Love, and Wise took part.

Mr. Wise closed his remarks about 9 o'clock, and the question being then taken, the motion to strike out the enacting clause was rejected by a vote of 59 to 89.

The bill was then further amended; and at a quarter before 11 o'clock, the committee, without coming to any conclusion on the bill, rose—and the house then adjourned.

Saturday, June 25. After several motions relating to the priority of business had been rejected, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, (Mr. Loyal in the chair), in execution of the special order of the day for the consideration of bills relating to the District of Columbia. A number of bills and joint resolutions were then considered, with the amendments reported by the respective committees—after which the committee rose, reported the bills, &c. to the house, when they were, with one exception, severally read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

[Among them was the joint resolution to authorise the president of the United States to assert, and prosecute with effect, the right of the United States to the bequest of James Smithson, late of London, deceased, to found at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian institution, an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge, &c.]

Three unsuccessful attempts were made to suspend the rules with the view of taking up business out of its order, when, in pursuance of the special order, the house, at one o'clock, on motion of Mr. Sutherland, resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for certain harbors for the year 1836." Several amendments were offered and considerable discussion ensued, which occupied the attention of the house till it took the usual recess.

Evening session. A variety of bills received from the senate were referred to their appropriate standing committees, and will be noticed in their progress through the house. Some other business of minor importance was next transacted, when the house again resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, and took up the harbor bill, which was amended and then laid aside.

The committee next took up the "bill making appropriations for building light houses, light boats, &c. &c." which was also amended and then laid aside. The committee then rose and, at a quarter past eight o'clock, adjourned.

Monday, June 27. On motion of Mr. Taliaferro, the house, by consent, took up the joint resolution to give effect to a resolution of congress, passed in the year 1789, for the execution and delivery of a gold medal to Lieut. Col. Henry Lee; and the same having been read twice, was committed.

Mr. Bell presented a memorial from a large and respectable meeting at Nashville, in Tennessee, praying congress to recognize the independence of Texas, and, in relation thereto, asked leave to submit the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That an appropriation be made for the outfit and salary of a minister to the republic of Texas, to be appointed by the president at as early day as shall appear to him to be expedient and proper.

Mr. Bell moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the above resolution. This motion gave rise to some discussion, when the resolution was finally laid on the table—yeas 135, nays 56.

The house agreed to suspend the rules—(yeas 113, nays 45) to enable Mr. Vinton to offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the following shall be a standing joint rule by the two houses, viz:

That after six days from the commencement of a second session, or other subsequent sessions of any congress, except the final session of such congress, all bills and joint resolutions which originated in and had passed either house, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in the other house, shall be resumed and acted on in the house where they remained undetermined, in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place.

Mr. Hawes moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution till Friday next—Lost. After some remarks from several gentlemen, Mr. Sutherland moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the main question being taken, the resolution was passed.

A number of memorials, petitions, &c. were presented, among them was one presented by Mr. Dickson, from a large body of citizens of Mississippi, praying for the recognition of the independence of Texas; which was referred to the committee on foreign relations.

On motion of Mr. Miller the house went into committee of the whole and took up a bill reported by the committee on pensions, granting an increase of pension to Ransom Clark, a soldier who was wounded at the massacre of major Dade's command, of which he was the sole survivor. The bill was considered, reported to the house without amendment and passed.

Some other private business was next transacted, when Mr. McKay moved the suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the resolutions, relative to alterations in the existing tariff of duties, which will be found in our abstract of the proceedings of Friday last. Mr. Mann, of New York, called for the yeas and nays—Mr. Slade moved a call of the house—Lost. The question was then taken and the motion to suspend, lost—yeas 127, nays 72; not two-thirds.

On motion of Mr. Connor the rules were suspended to enable him to report the bill establishing certain post routes, which had been returned from the senate with amendments. He then reported the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the house concur therein, and moved that the house now go into committee of the whole on the state of the union on this bill, and the bill to reorganize the post office department, which motion was lost.

On motion of Mr. Sutherland, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), in further execution of the special order of Wednesday last, upon certain bills making appropriations for harbors, rivers, military and other roads, light houses and Indian treaties.

Mr. Sutherland appealed to the committee to suffer the bills to be reported, and the question upon them to be speedily met, in order that other business could be acted on. The bill making appropriations for military and other roads and for examinations and surveys for the year 1836 was taken up, read through by sections—and, having been amended by striking out the paragraph making appropriations for continuing the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and in some other unimportant particulars, it was, finally, laid aside to be reported.

The committee then took up the bill to continue the Cumberland road from Vandalia, in Illinois, to Jefferson city, Missouri; and, after some discussion, the committee, without coming to any conclusion on the bill, rose, and the house took a recess.

Evening session. The house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), upon the bill to continue the Cumberland road from Vandalia to the Mississippi river.

Mr. Hawes moved to amend the bill by striking out so much as provides that the road should be graded so as to allow its conversion into a rail road; which motion was debated by Messrs. Hardin, Ashley, Mercer and Lane, and agreed to by a vote of 98 to 38.

The bill was laid aside to be reported, and the committee took up the bill to continue the national road from the Mississippi river to Jefferson city, in the state of Missouri, and it was considered, and laid aside to be reported, with an amendment similar to the one made in the above.

The bill making appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties was taken up.

The bill having been read through by sections, Mr. Adams wished to be informed why the treaty had not been communicated to the house by the president, as had been customary. He had been told that it was contained in a document, and he should like to know what document it was, for he had not seen it. Mr. Cambreleng rose, and gave the number and title of the document. Mr. Adams said he had not seen that document, and he thought there were not many of the members of the house who had. He said it had been remarked that it was not customary for the president to communicate such treaties; and, in reply, he referred to the journals of preceding sessions, and read a message of president Jackson to show that he had communicated a similar treaty with the Choctaws, to the end that congress might make the appropriations necessary to carry it into effect. He said it was important that the document should be examined, not only to the members of the house, but because a large portion of the Cherokee nation protested that the treaty was not made by any competent authority. He had presented a memorial from that nation a few days ago, against the treaty, the reading of which he called for.

After the reading had been proceeded in some time, Mr. Howard objected to the further reading, saying it was a printed document. Mr. Adams said it had not been laid on the tables till this day, and now the house was called upon to vote upon it. [Cries of "go on, go on."] The clerk continued the reading of the memorial. After some time, Mr. Cambreleng asked how much more was to be read; and if it was not the same document presented to the senate when the treaty was before them. Mr. Adams said, no; it was a document presented by him to the house. Mr. Wise said he would call for the reading of every document that was before the senate. If there was a charge that the treaty had been obtained by fraud, he would never vote a dollar to carry it into effect till that charge was removed. He would not aid in carrying into effect a fraudulent treaty against an ignorant and savage people. The clerk proceeded, and concluded the reading of the memorial.

Mr. Adams then moved that the committee rise and report the other bills, leaving this bill to be acted upon hereafter, when the house should be in possession of documents they had not seen, and which would fully confirm all the declarations of the memorial. He thought the house would perceive that this subject ought not to be decided hastily and without examination. Mr. Adams moved to strike out the first appropriation for the Cherokee treaty. Mr. Wise asked if the documents which were before the senate had been before the house. Mr. Adams said they were communicated with the memorial by him; they were confidentially communicated to the senate by the president, and after the treaty was passed, and the injunction had been taken off, he obtained a copy by sending to the president. They were ordered by the house to be printed with the memorial, and why it had not been done, he did not know. Mr. Wise said he understood the gentleman, and he wanted to know if those documents had been communicated in any other way than by the gentleman himself. Mr. Adams said that was what he had complained of last week—that the president had not communicated the treaty and the documents connected with it, according to custom.

Mr. Wise said that for one then, he would agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, never to vote one dollar to carry this treaty into effect; a treaty thus impeached by a memorial ably, reasonably drawn. He would not rely upon the documents in support of it thus informally communicated by one of the Cherokee delegation to a member of the house. He wanted the documents from the president himself. It was the duty of the house to look to the money, and guard the honor of the nation, and to see that its character was not debased by the infliction of frauds upon the ignorant, and violence upon the helpless, &c. He believed, he said, that, under these circumstances, the Georgia delegation, the honorable representatives from that state, would let the house wait till it could see that the honor of the nation is not to be tarnished, now and hereafter, at home and abroad, by carrying this treaty into effect.

Mr. Cambreleng stated that it had not been customary for the president to communicate such treaties to the house, though it had sometimes been done upon a call of the house upon the executive therefor. Mr. Owens urged the committee not to delay their action upon the bill. If the committee intended to defeat the appropriation, they would agree to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the committee should rise. He thought, if the appropriation was delayed four-and-twenty, or eight-and-forty hours, it would be defeated, inevitably. The documents, he said, had been before the house some time, and gentlemen could have informed themselves sufficiently upon the subject. If gentlemen would look at them, they would find that the wrongs set forth in the memorial were only imaginary wrongs; and that the treaty had been negotiated in an open, fair, and honorable manner. He then went at length into an examination of the history and details of the treaty, and called for the reading of two documents in opposition to the statements of the memorial. He argued that the memorial was not true in facts or principles, and was an attempt to impose upon the senate and the house.

Mr. Wise replied at some length to the remarks of Mr. Owens. He said this was a treaty alleged to have been obtained by fraud, from a portion only of the Cherokee nation; and he would not vote to carry it into execution, till the allegation was fully answered by the documents in possession of the executive. He spoke of the partial council by which the treaty had been agreed to, while many of the nation had been kept away by force; and asked if such a treaty, so obtained, was to be taken by the people of this country as one to be enforced, against the protest of a large portion of the Cherokee nation. He examined the character of some of the delegates, and particularly defused the character of John Ross, one of the delegates, who came on to oppose the ratification of the treaty by the senate; and commented severely upon the character and conduct of Ridge, Schermerhorn and others, who had made it. He spoke at length upon the treatment John Ross had received from the Georgia guard, as set forth in the memorial. He was the man who had swam the river at the battle of the Horse-shoe, and at the risk of his life, brought away the canoes of the hostile Indians; and he it was who had been turned out of his own dwelling, out of the house he had built, at an expense of ten or fifteen thousand dollars, by a Georgia guard, and his property was all given to others. This, he said, was the faith and humanity of a Christian, civilized nation! He said John Ross was well known to many members of the house to be an honest, intelligent man, worthy to sit in the councils of the nation, letting alone the councils of an Indian tribe; and his objection to the treaty, and he believed it to be an honest one, was, that it would goad on the people of his nation to resistance, which would sacrifice their lives, as well as that of many of the whites. He hoped the house would pause and not appropriate the money till they had ascertained that it would be properly applied consistent with the honor of the nation.

Mr. Wise then renewed the motion that the committee rise, and report the bills upon which they had passed to the house. Mr. Owens requested him to withdraw the motion, to let a document be read showing the number of persons present at the making of the treaties. Mr. Wise said, if that document was to be read, he must call for the reading of others. Mr. Adams said, if that course was pursued, he should call for the reading of a document that would be found to have some point in it. Mr. Wise then insisted upon his motion. Before the committee rose, the Indian treaty bill having been laid aside, Mr. Mercer moved some amendments to one or two of the bills heretofore acted upon; which were agreed to. The committee having risen, and reported the several bills upon which they had concluded. Mr. Wise asked leave to submit a resolution calling upon the president of the United States to communicate to this house the same information in relation to the Cherokee treaty, lately ratified, which was laid before the senate. Mr. Gillett objected, and Mr. Wise moved the suspension of the rules; which was agreed to. The resolution being taken up for consideration, some debate took place, in which Mr. Haynes and Granger took part. Mr. Mann, of New York, moved to lay the resolution on the table. Mr. Williams, of N. C. asked the yeas and nays on this motion; and they were ordered. The question was taken, and the motion rejected—yeas 37, nays 99. The resolution was agreed to; and, at nine o'clock, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, June 28. Mr. Thomas offered, by consent, the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a joint resolution, prohibiting the further issue of bonds guaranteed to the territory of Florida by the Union bank of Florida, incorporated by act of the 13th February, 1833, by the governor and council of that territory.

Several unsuccessful attempts were made to suspend the rules, and a number of bills reported.

[Among the bills was a senate bill, from the committee on public lands, reported by Mr. Lincoln, confirming certain grants of land in Louisiana.]

The speaker presented a communication from the president of the United States, transmitting a report from the secretary of war, containing the information called for by a resolution of the house yesterday, in relation to the Cherokee treaty lately ratified; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Several ineffectual efforts were made to take up sundry bills out of their order; when the house, in further execution of the special order, proceeded to the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for certain harbors," &c. &c. which was further amended. Mr. Wise moved to strike out the enacting clause (in effect to reject the bill) and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The question was then taken, and the motion rejected—yeas 52, nays 133. The bill received some additional amendments; when Mr. Hawes moved to strike out that clause which appropriates $100,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the river Hudson, and spoke at some length in its support. Mr. Sutherland moved the previous question, which was seconded. Mr. Hardin called for the yeas and nays on the question, "shall the main question now be put?" and they were ordered. The main question was ordered to be put—yeas 106, nays 78. Mr. Lewis moved a call of the house. Lost. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 126, nays 64.

Mr. Hawes moved to recommit the bill to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, with instructions to strike out the clause making appropriations for the improvement of Hudson river, and thereupon he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered. After some remarks from Mr. Boon, the question was taken, and the motion was rejected—yeas 60, nays 101. The house then took the usual recess.

Evening session. The house resumed the consideration of the Delaware breakwater bill, and it was read a third time, and passed without a count.

The house then took up the "bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors for the year 1836, and for other purposes." Mr. Bell moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and thereupon the yeas and nays were ordered. The question being taken, the motion was rejected—yeas 69, nays 96.

Mr. Williams, of Ky. called for the previous question—but the motion was not seconded. Many amendments were concurred in, when Mr. Sutherland moved the previous question. After the amendments, (fifteen in number), to be set aside by the previous question had been read, on the call of Mr. Mercer, the main question was ordered—yeas 104, nays 93. The question was then taken on the engrossment of the bill, which was ordered to be read a third time, forthwith—yeas 104, nays 93. The bill was now read a third time, and the question being on its passage, Mr. Hawes moved to commit it with instructions to strike out the appropriations for Cattaraugus harbor, &c. Mr. Sutherland moved the previous question, which was seconded and the main question ordered to be put. Mr. Wise moved that the house adjourn. Lost. The question on the passage of the bill was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 85. So the bill was passed.

Mr. Wise again moved that the house adjourn. Lost. The house then took up the bill making appropriations for light houses, beacon lights, light boats and the survey of certain harbors, reported from the committee of the whole, with certain amendments. The amendments were concurred in by the house, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and to be read a third time this day. The bill was then read a third time. Mr. Lane called for the previous question on the passage of the bill, which was seconded—he then called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which were ordered. The question was then put, and the bill passed without a division.

Mr. C. Johnson moved that the house adjourn which was lost—yeas 55, nays 67. The house then took up the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road. Mr. Mann, of N. Y. moved the previous question, which was seconded by the house. An adjournment was then called for, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 53. So the house, at half past nine o'clock, adjourned.

Wednesday, June 29. On motion of Mr. Connor, the rules were suspended for the purpose of taking up the post route and post office organization bills, returned with amendments from the senate. The house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Casey in the chair), and took up for consideration the bill to reorganize the post office department.

The question being on the motion of Mr. Phillips to amend the senate amendment which strikes out the two sections preventing the postmasters from deriving any profit from post office boxes, by providing that the emolument derived from this source shall not exceed $2,000 a year—After some remarks from Messrs. Briggs, Gideon Lee, Ingersoll, Phillips, Mason, of Va. Reed, Connor, Williams, of N. C. Grennell, Underwood, Anthony, Love and E. Whittlesey, the motion of Mr. Phillips was rejected, and the senate amendment was concurred in. Several amendments of the senate were then disagreed to, and amongst the rest the amendment increasing the salaries of certain officers and clerks of the department. The bill was laid aside, and the committee took up for consideration the bill to establish certain post routes, and discontinue or alter others; and the amendments of the senate were concurred in.

The committee then rose, and reported that they had had under consideration the above bills, and concurred in some of the amendments, and disagreed to others.

The question being on the concurrence of the house in the recommendation of the committee of the whole to agree to some amendments and disagree to others, Mr. Lane asked, what would be the effect of the previous question if ordered at this time? The speaker replied that it would bring on the main question in the concurrence of the house with the senate in their amendments. Mr. Lane then moved the previous question.

Mr. Adams hoped, he said, that the gentleman would withdraw the motion. He wished to have an opportunity to record his vote on the amendment of the senate striking out the restriction as to the emoluments derived from boxes, for he considered that as one of the most exceptionable modes in which salaries could be increased without authority of law. He hoped also that the house would reject the proposition of the senate to increase the salaries of the officers of the department, and wished the house to have an opportunity to vote directly on that amendment.

Mr. Lane persisted in the motion, and it was seconded by the house—85 to 40. The main question was ordered to be put, and it was divided, so as to take it separately on each amendment, if desired. The amendments, not accepted, were concurred in without a count. The question being next on the amendment adding a clause to the 23d section, providing that contractors who may refuse to perform their contracts shall receive no pay, and that no contract shall be taken at a rate exceeding by more than five per cent. the amount of the lowest bid. Mr. Everett asked the yeas and nays upon the amendment, which were refused. The amendment was concurred in.

The question was taken next on concurrence in the amendment of the senate, increasing and fixing the salaries of certain officers and clerks of the department. Mr. Heister called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered, and were—yeas 107, nays 75. So the amendment was concurred in.

The question being on the amendment of the senate, striking out the 43d and 44th sections of the bill, which prevent the postmasters from deriving any profit from their boxes or pigeon-holes, Mr. Underwood called for the yeas and nays; which were refused. The amendment was then concurred in by a vote of 89 to 41.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

The amendments to the post route bill were concurred in.

The rules were suspended (yeas 120, nays 29) to enable Mr. Briggs, from the committee on enrolled bills, report a bill fixing the time for the annual meeting of congress on the 1st Monday in November.

The resolution was then offered, and Mr. Vinton moved to amend it by instructing the same committee to report a joint resolution fixing a day for the adjournment of the two houses of congress. Mr. Wardwell moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the original resolution of Mr. Briggs was adopted. Mr. Briggs, from the committee on enrolled bills, reported a bill fixing a day for the annual meeting of congress, in conformity with the resolution. Objections were made to the order of the proceeding, but it was decided that it was always in order for the committee on enrolled bills to report.

The bill was read twice; and the question being on its engrossment, Mr. Pierce, of N. H. called for the yeas and nays. Refused. Mr. Hannegan moved to amend the bill by adding a section providing that the per diem compensation of members of congress shall hereafter be six dollars a day.

Mr. May moved the previous question, which was seconded. Mr. Mann, of New York, moved to lay the motion and the bill on the table. Lost. The main question was ordered to be put. Mr. Hannegan asked the yeas and nays; and they were ordered. The question being taken on the engrossment of the bill for a third reading, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 93. The bill was then ordered to be read a third time this day.

Mr. Adams moved that the bill be recommitted to the committee on enrolled bills, with instructions to amend it so as to confine its effect to the next session of congress, instead of rendering it a permanent law. Mr. Miller opposed the motion, but moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till to-morrow. Mr. Pearce, of R. I. moved the previous question. Mr. Speight moved to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading, but it was pronounced to be out of order, as the previous question had been demanded. The motion for the previous question was seconded by a vote of 98 to 53.

The main question being then taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Beale, Boeckee, Borden, Briggs, J. Calhoun, J. So the bill was passed.

The house, in pursuance of the special order, took up for consideration the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the states of Ohio, Illinois and Indiana, reported from the committee of the whole, with various amendments thereto. The question being on the motion of Mr. Everett to lay the bill on the table, it was taken, and the motion rejected.

Thursday, June 30. After the bill from the senate to extend the charters of the District banks had been amended, so as to renew their charters, as they now exist, till the 4th of July, 1838, the house went into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties. It caused an animated discussion, and was not disposed of at the period for the usual recess.

Evening session. On the speaker's resuming the chair, at 4 o'clock, he announced the following message from the president of the United States:

Washington, June 30, 1836.

To the senate and house of representatives:

It becomes my painful duty to announce to you the melancholy intelligence of the death of James Madison, ex-president of the United States. He departed this life at half past six o'clock, on the morning of the 28th instant, full of years and of honor.

I hasten this communication, in order that congress may adopt such measures as may be proper to testify their sense of the respect which is due to the memory of one whose life has contributed so essentially to the happiness and glory of his country, and to the good of mankind.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The message having been read, Mr. Patton, of Va. arose, and, after pronouncing a brief but eloquent panegyric upon the exalted virtues of the departed patriot, moved a resolution that a committee be appointed by the house to join such committee as may be appointed by the senate, to express the sensibility of the nation upon the melancholy event. Mr. Adams next addressed the chair, and expressed his deep admiration of the deceased's life of usefulness and glory, which had placed him among the benefactors of mankind, &c.

A message was received from the senate informing the house that they had appointed a committee, to join such committee as may be appointed by the house, &c. The house then concurred in the resolution, and, according to a previous order, the committee was ordered to consist of one member from each state in the union; and the following gentlemen were appointed: Messrs. Patton, of Virginia; Mason, of Maine; Cushman, of New Hampshire; Adams, of Massachusetts; Toucey, of Connecticut; Pearce, of Rhode Island; Allen, of Vermont; Ward, of New York; Parker, of New Jersey; Anthony, of Pennsylvania; Milligan, of Delaware; Washington, of Maryland; Deberry, of North Carolina; Griffin, of South Carolina; Coffee, of Georgia; Johnson, of Kentucky; Dunlap, of Tennessee; McLene, of Ohio; Ripley, of Louisiana; Carr, of Indiana; Claiborne, of Mississippi; Reynolds, of Illinois; Lyon, of Alabama; Harrison, of Missouri.

[The senate's committee is composed of Messrs. Rives, Clay, Calhoun, Grundy, Buchanan, Leigh, and Tallmadge.]

The house then resumed the discussion of the Cherokee treaty appropriation, and continued engaged therein when the Intelligencer, from which we make our abstract, paper went to press.

FLORIDA WAR. BATTLE OF MICANOPY—OFFICIAL.

Micanopy, June 10, 1836.

GENERAL: I have the honor to report that yesterday morning a party of Indians, estimated at 150 to 200, made their appearance in front of this place, at the distance of about three-quarters of a mile. Their object was evidently to draw us out; and not having any disposition to baulk their views, I directed Captain Lee to take his company and skirt a hammock on the right of this post, and again the left of the enemy. At the same time I directed Lieutenant Wheelock to mount with his dragoons, and make a corresponding movement on the left, and Lieutenant Humphreys, with a detachment of D and E companies of the 2d United States artillery, to move across a field in front holding a six pounder with a few men in reserve.

The promptitude with which my orders were complied with, brought the three detachments immediately in contact with the enemy. Seeing the heavy fire of the enemy, I became at once satisfied they were treble our numbers, and immediately moved forward with the six pounder. The horses not being well broke, I was obliged to cast loose the prolonge. I had hardly done this, and while waiting a flank movement of Lieutenant Wheelock to unmask the six pounder, when I received a message that the Indians were coming on the rear of this place. Having left a few teamsters and citizens in charge of the work, I deemed it proper to move back with the gun, and gave the directions accordingly. Taking myself a shorter route across a field, I arrived a few moments before the gun; and finding the report to be untrue, I directed Lieutenant Talcott, 3d artillery, to return to the field at full speed, while with a few men I reconnoitered the rear of our position.

After an hour and twenty minutes hard fighting under a boiling sun, our troops returned, having driven the enemy two miles into their strongholds. The gallantry and good conduct of both officers and men is beyond all commendation I am able to bestow; and it is with deep regret I have to report captain Lee, 3d artillery, severely, but not dangerously wounded. He was shot early in the action, but directed his men to press forward, which they did manfully.

I enclose Dr. Maffitt's report; and let me express my acknowledgments to Mr. Center, a resident of this place, for his unremitting kindness and attention to our wounded men and our selves generally.

Some individual acts of gallantry will form a special report from the officers immediately in command of the troops.

I received 800 rounds of cartridges last night from Fort Drane, and shall move there to-morrow morning. Lieutenant Burke, 3d artillery, with his company, reached that place at 11 o'clock last night. I shall write you on my arrival there. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. F. HEILEMAN, major 2d U. S. artillery.
Gen. Eustis, commanding forces in Florida.

War department, adjutant general's office.
Washington, June 25th, 1836.
GENERAL ORDER.

The gallantry and good conduct of the officers and troops in the action of the 9th June, with the Seminole Indians, near Micanopy, in Florida, where they met and defeated a very superior force of the enemy, merit the thanks of the president; and in consideration of the meritorious conduct of the commander of the detachment of regular troops, major JULIUS F. HEILEMAN, of the 2d regiment of the United States artillery, the president of the United States has been pleased, and he hereby confers, on that officer, the brevet of lieutenant colonel in the army.

By order,

R. JONES, adjutant general.

THE CREEK WAR.

We publish the following "order," issued by general Scott, which was received at the adjutant general's office last week. The arms and ammunition have doubtless arrived, and the troops are, ere this, in full operation: [Globe].

ORDER, NO. 8.

Head quarters, army of the south, Columbus, Ga. June 16, 1836.

All the troops of the Georgia line will hold themselves in readiness to take the field the moment the arms and ammunition, now daily expected, shall arrive.

As an indispensable preparation, every mounted officer of every rank, and every mounted man, will immediately provide himself with a wallet capable of carrying three days supply of corn for his horse. Commanding officers will see that this preparation will be made at once.

Haversacks are provided for all the volunteers and drafted men, whether mounted or on foot. To obtain them, requisitions will be made on the United States' quartermaster at this place. Each man will be careful to mark his wallet and haversack with his name, as soon as they come into his hands.

The baggage of officers and companies, at the commencement of the first march, must be reduced to the smallest amount. All heavy and superfluous articles will be left behind. Troops to pursue an enemy with success, must move lightly; no company, therefore, can be allowed to take into the enemy's country more than four tents for officers and men. Commanders of every rank will look strictly to the due execution of this order, or the army will be rendered utterly incapable of active movements by the overwhelming weight of its baggage train.

Light camp kettles and mess pans have been provided for the troops. Cast iron ovens, skillets and the like, are too heavy to be allowed to go into the wagons, which are principally to be loaded with ammunition and subsistence for men.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

Head quarters, at Long's, June 15th, 1836.

GENERAL: I have received your letter of the 10th inst. since I left Tuskegee for Irwinton, or rather for the lower line of the Creek country. I arrived here about five o'clock, yesterday: having been deceived by the mistake of a guide, I passed the Irwinton road nine miles. I am within four miles of Nehor Mico's camp. He has gone to the neighborhood of Tuskegee to surrender himself. I received and disarmed thirty-four of his people, who had left his camp, professing to be friendly. I have with me twelve companies, seven mounted and five infantry, and expect to be reinforced by two companies to-night. I have also four hundred Indian warriors; and expect to be reinforced to-morrow by five hundred under the celebrated chief, Opothle Yoholo. I find it impossible to obtain either corn or subsistence here; the hostile Indians have destroyed all that they have not taken away.

June 16. I am now at the Big Spring, within fourteen miles of Fort Mitchell, and shall move on Nehor Mathala's camp to-morrow. A detachment of Indian warriors, from this division, captured Nehor Mathala and his son last evening, and they are now prisoners in my camp.

I wish captain Page to join me as soon as possible. If he had been with me I would have organized, before this time, an emigrating party of several hundred.

I have to request that provisions and corn be sent to Fort Mitchell. I have only five days' rations, and not a grain of corn. My movement to this point has, I understand by a gentleman who arrived to-day, tranquillized the frontier. A party of two came through to-day.

If I should not obtain supplies at Nehor Mico's camp, I shall probably be compelled to fall back on Fort Mitchell, or to a position near it. I hope to receive orders from you at that place, to which, if I do not go myself, I shall send wagons for subsistence. I am, general, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) THOS. J. JESUP,

2d army corps of the southern army.

Maj. gen. Scott, commanding the southern army, Columbus, Ga.

From the Columbus (Ga.) Sentinel.

Head quarters, Ga. Columbus, 15th June, 1836.

ORDER.

The commander-in-chief having heard various and contradictory reports of the battle fought at Dr. Shepherd's plantation, between a detachment of Georgia volunteers, composed of a part of the Gwinnett company, commanded by capt. Garmany, with a part of the Stewart company under command of captain Ball and major Jernigan; and a party of Creek Indians—deemed it due to the character of the state and her brave sons, to obtain a correct statement of the facts connected with this unfortunate though glorious achievement. For this purpose he applied to captain Garmany, now confined to his bed by a wound received in the battle, and has obtained the following circumstantial account of the rencontre, which it is hoped will disabuse the public mind of the false impressions made by the various slanderous reports which have been circulated to the prejudice of this small though gallant band. Georgia may well be proud of such sons, and may rest assured that her honor will never suffer when committed to the care of Georgia volunteers, whose motto is "DO OR DIE."

By order of the commander-in-chief.

OSSIAN GREGORY, aid-de-camp.

Columbus, June, 14th, 1836.

His excellency Wm. Schley:

DEAR SIR: On Wednesday evening, the 8th, my company was, by order of major Howard, stationed at Dr. Shepherd's plantation, about four miles above Roanoke. That night I placed out three picket guards, four men in each; one picket two and a half miles from the camp, where the Indians were expected to cross; one picket one and a half miles, and the third one, a quarter mile from camp. My picket guards remained at their posts till about an hour by sun in the morning, and returned. I had sixteen police guards out the same night, which were relieved every two hours. That night no Indians were seen by either of the guards. Next morning I received an order from major Howard to send an officer and twenty men up to Fort McCreary, four miles up the river, to guard that place until 3 o'clock, when he would send another company down to take charge of the fort, which had been vacated by the troops, whose time of service had expired, which order was obeyed. As soon as these 20 men left, colonel Gibson and four of my men, went to the river, in order that colonel Gibson would show them all the places where the Indians would be likely to cross, he being well acquainted with their places of crossing. After scouting up and down the river, they returned about 10 o'clock without having seen any Indians. About that time major Jernigan, with about 25 men, came to our camp, and about 12 o'clock he left on a scouting party on the river, and when we separated he told me if I should hear him in an engagement to come to his assistance. That being the first day from the time we had entered the service when we had an opportunity of washing our clothes, I recommended to my men for some of them to wash their shirts, as they were very dirty, having left our clothes at Fort Ingersoll, when we were ordered down the river on the Sunday previous, with an expectation of returning in two days to get our clothing. The men had finished their washing and hung their clothes out to dry, and were just eating their dinner. Between 2 and 3 o'clock, I heard firing commence about half a mile from where we were—supposing that maj. Jernigan and his men had been attacked, I ordered my men to parade immediately, and leave their dinner. We left our horses and all our clothes, and indeed every thing we had except the clothes we had on, and several of the men had no shirts on, and we repaired immediately to the firing, leaving one man in the house to take care of our things. After we marched half a mile, and found the Indians prepared for battle, we made the attack. I directed my men to reserve their fire until they would be sure to make an effective fire. When in about one hundred yards, I directed the men to fire; a number of Indians fell; I am certain 6 or 7—they were carried back, and the Indians retreated till they came to their commander, who was on horseback, and formed the line; we then gave them another fire, which they returned—my company then stood firm until they fired four rounds, the Indians keeping up a regular fire. They again retreated until they reached their commander. Every time they retreated they were reinforced to the number, I think, of at least 250 Indians; and as long as I could keep them in front, they were repulsed every time. But they became so numerous, and my company consisting of only 42 men in line at the time, the enemy began to flank us. I found it necessary to order my men to retreat, and fire on the retreat, which we did; directing half my men to face to the right and the other to the left, and fire upon their flanks, to keep them from surrounding us. After having retreated and firing in this way about half a mile, we reached a small field, and used the fence as a breastwork, until we fired two rounds. By this time the enemy had succeeded in dividing our men. By firing on the left flank, myself and about ten more succeeded in getting possession of the yard; at the time I entered the gate, the enemy had succeeded in getting into the opposite side of the yard, but we succeeded and drove them from their position. They then fled to the gun house, and we took a position and watched an opportunity to shoot as they passed around the house. I directed my men not to fire until they could be certain to kill. They obeyed my orders. I took a position behind two trees, so situated that they could not see me, and from that place I am certain I killed an Indian who was attempting to get one of our horses over the fence. When he fell another attempted to get the same horse, and before he succeeded in getting the horse, I shot him and he fell within three feet of the other. I then loaded again, and just at that moment three other Indians passed round the corner of a small house forty yards from us. Two of my men shot, which stopped two; and the other shot me through the thigh, which caused me to fall. The Indian drew his knife and made towards me. I raised up and shot him and he fell. At the time I fell it produced a panic amongst those of my men who were present, and they cried out our captain is dead. I called to them I was not dead, but to fight on. After killing the Indian after I was wounded, I drew my pocket pistol, determined still to defend myself, and called to my men to turn the horses out of the lot; which they did. All of my men that were near continued to fight. During all this time my men, who were on the other flank of the enemy, continued to fight with vigor and energy.

Just at this moment, major Jerigan, of Stewart county, who was at Fort Jones, three miles below the battle ground, arrived with a small detachment of men, not exceeding thirty, and charged upon the Indians, which diverted them from us and enabled me to make my escape. One of my men seeing I was wounded, brought me a horse, took me up behind him, and carried me to Fort Jones; and all the men attempted their escape in the best way they could.

About this time my men who had been sent to Fort McCreary, and had heard the firing, came and charged through the ranks of the enemy; but they were too late to render much assistance. Four of my company had been left sick at Fort Ingersoll, and two others to wait on them, and two or three of my company had gone to the shop to get their horses shod. These things account for the few men I had in the action.

Now, sir, let me say to your excellency, that those of my company who had an opportunity in the engagement, acted with great bravery and firmness. Every man of them stood firm until ordered to retreat, and I cannot conclude this communication without bearing testimony to the courage and bravery of major Jerigan and his men, who came to our assistance. In my company we have lost seven killed and four wounded, none thought to be dangerous—of major Jerigan's men, four killed and three wounded. Of my men dead, ensign Lacy, orderly sergeant James C. Martin, James H. Holland, Robert T. Holland, James M. Allen, Wm. M. Sims, (by exhaustion), J. A. V. Tate and H. W. Peden. Wounded, captain Garmany, John R. Alexander, Thomas W. Hunt and William Stapp. I thought there were from twenty-five to thirty Indians killed, but col. Gibson, who has since visited the battle ground, is clearly of the opinion the number of the Indians killed must have been much greater. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON GARMANY,
captain of the Guinnell mounted men.

Those of the Stewart company who fell in the battle were, David Delk, esq. Jared Irwin, esq. captain Robert Billups and a young man by the name of Hunter. They were all gentlemen of the first standing. Mr. Delk was a member of the bar, and occupied a very respectable station in his profession. Mr. Irwin was clerk of the inferior court of Stewart county. Their loss will be long regretted by the citizens of Stewart county and their numerous friends.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

From the New York Journal of Commerce.

The annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States, for the year ending 30th September, 1835, was submitted to congress on the 18th of last month, and ordered to be printed. This, of course, is not yet accomplished, the documents comprising 300 or 400 pages, but we are enabled to state the general results.

The imports during the year, ending the 30th of September last, amounted, in value to $149,895,742, of which there was imported in American vessels $136,288,665, and in foreign vessels $14,606,877. The exports during the same year amounted to $121,693,577, of which $101,189,082 were of domestic and $20,503,495 of foreign articles. Of the domestic articles, $79,022,746 were exported in American vessels, and $22,166,336 in foreign vessels. Of the foreign articles, $15,112,445 were exported in American vessels, and $5,392,050 in foreign vessels. Of American shipping 1,352,653 tons entered, and 1,400,517 cleared from ports of the United States. Of foreign shipping 641,310 tons entered, and 630,824 cleared.

The registered tonnage, as corrected at the register's office, for the year ending Dec. 1834, is stated at.....857,438 42-95
The enrolled and licensed tonnage at.....763,618 65-93
And the fishing vessels at.....117,850 02-95

Tons, 1,758,907 14-95
Of the registered tonnage, there was employed in the whale fishery, 108,060 14-95

The total tonnage of the shipping built in the United States, during the year 1834 was, viz:

Registered,.....52,632 60-95
Enrolled,.....76,707 72-95

Tons, 118,320 37-95

The greatest imports to any previous year, were in 1816, at the close of the war, when they amounted to $147,103,000—being $2,792,742 less than last year; and the greatest exports in 1807, when they amounted to $108,843,150, or $12,850,427 less than last year. Of the exports in 1807, only $48,699,592 consisted of domestic articles, whereas last year the domestic export amounted to $101,189,082. [The year in every case, unless otherwise specified, ends 30th September.] In 1834 the imports amounted to $126,521,332 being $23,374,110 less than in 1835; and the domestic exports to $81,024,163, or $20,164,930 less than 1835.

The tonnage which entered the ports of the United States in the year ending the 30th September, 1835, was 1,993,963 tons, as stated above, being a greater amount by 351,241 ton entered during the previous year. Of this increase, 277,983 tons was American shipping, and 73,258 tons foreign shipping. Showing a comparative gain in favor of American. The same remarks, with some slight variations, are applicable to the clearances.

The statement of actual tonnage owned in the United States, indicates a corresponding increase. The returns for the year ending December, 1834, show a greater amount than in any former year. This is seen from the annexed schedule; but the increase would be still more apparent, were it not for the errors which crept into the returns for some years previous to 1729, by including sundry vessels which had been lost, or sold out of the country. In 1829 such vessels were thoroughly expurgated from the list, which accounts for the great apparent falling off that year in the amount of shipping.

A comparative view of the registered, enrolled and licensed tonnage of the United States, from 1815 to 1834 inclusive.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

In order to afford some evidence of the vastly increased amount of business in the general land office, it has been ascertained that since the commencement of the present session of congress, there have been answered three thousand one hundred and seventy-seven letters, occupying one thousand seven hundred and seventy-one folios of the records, demi paper, inclusive of reports made to both houses of congress.

The estimated number of pages of paper containing copies of letters and documents of various descriptions accompanying the aforesaid letters, is nine hundred pages, which, with the records of briefs of pre-emption cases, and the registry of letters received, constitute, with the pages occupied by the letters recorded, an aggregate of three thousand four hundred pages of paper occupied by such correspondence and reports during the same period; and accompanying which were upwards of seven-hundred maps of states, sections of states, land districts, and Indian cessions.

The foregoing account is exclusive of the following items, which are printed, viz: circular letters, proclamations, notices, forms of bonds, and letters accompanying the same; also of five hundred and forty-nine letters, being applications to the secretary of the treasury for the issue of scrip, which are printed blank forms. Also, exclusive of the number of pages occupied by hundreds of exemplifications of patents prepared to meet demands during the same period, and of all tabular statements, (involving considerable research and calculation) which accompanied the reports and documents aforesaid.

There are seventeen regular clerks in the office, and sixteen temporarily employed. In conducting the correspondence, about one-fifth of the whole force may be said to have been regularly employed. Frequently one-fourth have been engaged, and sometimes a greater number, in transcribing the documents connected with the correspondence, the records of which are fully kept up to date.

It may fairly be estimated that during nearly the whole of the same period the attention and research occasioned by verbal inquiries in various branches of business, and personal calls where no written correspondence appears, occupied thirty-five per cent. of the time of many of the clerks engaged in conducting this correspondence. For the accomplishment of this amount of labor, as might be supposed, a much greater amount of time than the regular office hours has been devoted.

GEN. SCOTT AND MR. WHITE.

The Tallahassee Floridian of the 11th instant contains a letter from colonel White, the delegate from Florida, to general Jackson, dated 28th ult. asking that general Scott be relieved from the command in Florida. As the letter will doubtless be read with interest, we give it entire below, with the note requesting its publication.

[Charleston Courier.

Washington, May 29.

DEAR SIR: I must request that you will, without delay, give a place to the enclosed letter. I have no idea of permitting any major general to denounce as cowards, flying before five Indians, the whole population of Middle Florida without stopping to see whether they were "squaws or warriors." I am
JOS. M. WHITE.

Washington, May 28.

SIR: By orders recently issued from the war department, it is directed, that should major general Scott leave the head quarters of the army in Florida and retire from that command, it will devolve on brigadier general Clinch. This order leaves to the discretion of general Scott the period of his departure. It is with the greatest pain that I feel myself constrained, by a sense of duty to my constituents, respectfully to ask that gen. Scott be relieved from that command. No man has more admiration for the gallantry, or respect for the former military achievements of general Scott than I have.

From the present attitude of affairs, and unfortunate and disgraceful occurrences which have happened in that quarter, the public interests, as well as the lives, security and property of the inhabitants imperiously require the order I have recommended. There is no harmony between him and the public authorities of the territory—and it is evident that he is in the highest state of exasperated feeling, on account of an atrocious outrage on all decency and propriety, in burning him in effigy at Tallahassee. This infamous proceeding, which ought to have been arrested and punished by the authorities at the seat of government, does not justify general Scott for the degrading epithets and insults he has offered to a whole population. In his published orders, he represents the conduct of the people of Middle Florida as "infinitely humiliating"—and the people "wild with fear," possessed of "disease so general and so degrading."

This is not the usual language of a major general, commanding on our frontier; and should not, under any circumstances, be resorted to, whatever may have been the disappointments and wounded sensibilities of a commanding general. I ask, upon what authority he says there were just "five Indians," who had produced that consternation, panic and flight, of which he has drawn a picture so derogatory to the whole population? It is well known that the Indians never show their whole force; and if five have penetrated into the country from the Indian boundary, to within a few miles of the seat of government, a much larger number will soon follow. As general Scott did not succeed with five thousand men in destroying five Indians, he might have spared the inhabitants he has left defenceless, such degrading denunciations. As that, however, is an affair between him and the governor, as to the number of the enemy, and the defence of Middle Florida, I shall proceed to what is the object of this communication.

My purpose is most respectfully to request an inquiry into the manner of conducting the late campaign in Florida, and into the conduct of the major general commanding, for having gone into summer quarters the last of April, leaving the country without defence, and the inhabitants at the mercy of the Indians.

Major general Scott had power to call upon the governors of South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama, for any number of men that he might consider necessary to put an end to the war. Congress by law had provided ample means, and whilst he was in command, the governor of Florida had no power to call for troops. General Scott, after an unsuccessful campaign, disbanded the whole militia force; but the term of service of a portion of it only had expired and he has neither called, by draft, or for volunteers, or for any further militia force. He has on the contrary refused the acceptance of some that was offered, and has disbanded the militia of East Florida.

When called upon to furnish an adequate defence for the protection of that frontier, he complains of his limited means, when it is apparent from the above statement, that his means are only limited by his own discretion, and that he has the power at any moment to order any number from Georgia or South Carolina. He admits that 3,000 men are necessary to subdue these Indians, and that he has but 1,000 under his command. Now, I ask, why it is that he has not these 3,000 men in the field that he deems necessary? He, and he alone, is responsible, for all the lives and property of the inhabitants that may be destroyed, for the want of that protection and security, which every citizen has a right to look for from his government. Added to this, the feelings of the people are outraged, by representations calculated to degrade and expose them to ridicule throughout the United States.

These people you are aware, are sparsely settled over an extensive territory, in detached neighborhoods, without any dense population to fall back upon, and without any fortified places in which to place their wives and children in safety. If upon the first sound of alarm, some small neighborhood should go in pursuit of even five Indians, they might, as they did with gen. Scott's grand army, dodge out of the way, and fall back upon the women and children in the rear. It is however unnecessary to detain you with these details. The complaint I make is, that major general Scott has left that country without adequate protection, and has not a sufficient force for either offensive or defensive operations. He has produced a state of feeling that forbids all harmony or concert with the local authorities, or the people of the country, and the public interest imperatively demands his immediate withdrawal.

I have the honor to be, with the highest degree of respect, sir, your most obedient servant,
JOS. M. WHITE.

To Andrew Jackson, president, U. States.

From the Charleston Courier.

Charleston, June 21.

I have seen in your paper of yesterday, the letter, addressed by Joseph M. White, delegate from Florida, to the president of the United States, demanding the immediate recall of general Scott. In requesting the publication of this epistle, Mr. White states that he has "no idea of permitting any major general to denounce as cowards, flying before the whole population of Middle Florida, without stopping to see whether they were squaws or warriors."

Perhaps Mr. White may "have no idea of permitting" the governor of the territory to make a similar denunciation. To afford him an opportunity, if he deems it expedient, of addressing another letter to the president, demanding the removal of the governor, as well as the major general, I request you to publish the accompanying copy of a letter from governor Call to gen. Scott, acknowledging the order No. 43, and fully reciprocating his opinions of the conduct of the people of Florida.

Mr. White asks, "upon what authority gen. Scott says there were just 'five Indians,' who produced the consternation," &c.

I answer, on the authority of col. Gadsden, quarter master general of Florida, who was in the vicinity, and stated that, among other facts, in a letter to gen. Scott, and who did his utmost, unhappily without success, to allay the panic and to stay the fugitives.

[COPY.]

Tallahassee, May 26.

SIR: I have the satisfaction to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th inst. and a copy of your order, No. 43, by express.

Before you returned from the field, having heard that the Indians had reappeared in Alachua, I ordered col. Sanchez, of that county, to call out the whole available strength of his regiment, and col. Warren to send fifty horsemen from Duval, for the purpose of protecting the frontier. I subsequently divided East Florida into two districts, giving major Putnam charge of that east of St. Johns, and col. Warren that between the St. Johns and the Suwannee rivers, with authority to each of those officers to call, from the respective districts, such number of men as would effectually hold the enemy in check, and give security to the settlements. The population of that county [Alachua] was fully adequate, with the aid of the regular force, to perform this duty. But it appears they have retired, without resistance, leaving the enemy in undisturbed possession of their homes. A panic highly dishonorable to the whole country has spread over the land, when, by one manly effort, the enemy might have been repulsed, and their homes and property defended. I shall adopt the necessary measures to hold the officers accountable for their neglect in not executing my orders, &c. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
B. K. CALL.

Major general W. Scott, commanding the army in Florida.

From the National Intelligencer of the 29th inst.

Gentlemen: I observe in the National Intelligencer, of Monday morning, an extract from a communication in the Charleston Courier, stating that general Scott's order (No. 43) denouncing the people of Florida, was made upon the authority of the quartermaster general of that territory. Accompanying this extract is a letter from governor Call to general Scott, of the 26th of May last. Upon this communication and letter you remark, very justly and properly, that if they had been known to me at the time, I would have left the affair to the individuals assailed, and to those who had made or endorsed the charges. I certainly had no disposition to do injustice to any one. The distinguished and gallant officer against whose order I felt it my duty to the people of Florida to complain, is a gentleman against whom I would have been most reluctant to make a charge of misconduct, and most ready to make reparation, if I had, impelled by a sense of duty, inadvertently or unjustly assailed his military conduct.

It was represented to me from every portion of the territory, reiterated and confirmed by governor Call's proclamations, and letters to the war department, that the country was without adequate defence or protection; and as unlimited power had been conferred upon general Scott to call for any force he might require to defend the country, and to put an end to the war, I was obliged to consider him responsible for the lives and property of the inhabitants.

I do not profess to be much acquainted with military affairs, and if I had known that on the 26th of May the governor of Florida acknowledged with "satisfaction" and without complaint, major general Scott's "order, No. 43," I should at least have qualified that portion of my complaint to the president relating to the five Indians, and to the sufficiency of the protection.

I regret that I was so far led by governor Call's proclamations and letters, upon which, in part, my letter to the president was founded. I now perceive, for the first time, that the governor says, "the population of Alachua was fully adequate, with the aid of the regular force, to hold the enemy in check, and to defend the settlements," and that this population "had retired without resistance, leaving the enemy in possession of their homes." The governor then declares to general Scott, that "a panic, highly dishonorable to the whole country, has spread over the land, when, by a manly effort, their homes and property might have been defended."

This removes from general Scott the heaviest complaint I made against him upon the testimony of the governor of Florida, who imputes the abandonment and destruction of property to the want of a "manly effort" to defend it by the inhabitants; and professes his determination to make his militia accountable for obeying orders.

Whilst I do not presume to set up my opinions at this distance, against officers of their reputation at the theatre of operations, I must say, in justification of myself and of my constituents, that I cannot concur with either of these commanders in admitting that the protection was adequate, if every man in Alachua had been armed and equipped for service. There were at that moment not more than three hundred men in the country, from seventeen to seventy years of age, as I am informed. We had one thousand regulars. The whole force, then, without a corporal's guard for the protection of the women and children, would have been 1,300, to man six posts, and to hold "the enemy in check, and give security to the settlements." Major general Scott has said in an official letter to the war department, that 3,000 good troops, excluding raw recruits and volunteers, were necessary to operate against, and to subdue these Indians; and another major general had, with 1,100 men, been confined to his breastworks and pickets. eleven days, by a part only of the Indian forces.

Governor Call has since asked for 1,000 men, in addition to the regular forces, to defend the settlements. This is 700 more than every man in Alachua. It might be inferred from this demand, that he has changed the opinion expressed to general Scott since the date of the letter. The requisition was, however, of nearly even date with the letter to general Scott.

I cannot retract the expression, nor have I changed my opinion, that great injustice has been done to the people of Florida by the publication of "order No. 48," and must forever consider such a denunciation, from a major general commanding, without precedent in this or any other country. The enemy is, without exception, the most cunning and intrepid of any savages on this continent, and, for the first time in the history of Indian warfare, have attacked our fortified posts and block-houses, cut up a detachment of the best of our officers and soldiers, and for more than one hour and a half fought general Clinch in the open field, in one of the most brilliant and creditable affairs on our part, since the war commenced.

It cannot be expected that planters, without arms, discipline, or organization, in remote neighborhoods, are to resist such an enemy. They ought to escape denunciation from a federal officer sent there for their protection and defence in a war which had desolated four counties before any military force had been collected by the United States.

The establishment of a block-house by forty men from my own county, on the Wythlacoochee, in the heart of the enemy's country, and its heroic defence against the combined and unresisted force of the Indians for six weeks, and the noble relief of that garrison by eighty Floridians, will prove to the world that these undisciplined militia have executed an enterprise, which, for boldness of conception, and skill and bravery in execution, has not been surpassed in any country. This was done, too, without a panic, and in a wilderness where it may be said, without ridicule or extravagance, there was an "Indian in every bush."

JOS. M. WHITE.

SANTA ANA'S VINDICATION.

General Santa Ana has presented a document to the executive government of Texas, with a request that it may be published, of which the following is a translation. The translation is a very imperfect one:

Private secretary of the president of the republic of Mexico, general-in-chief of the army of operations.

In the journal entitled "El Correo Atlantico," of New Orleans, dated 25th of April last, which has casually fallen into my hands; which, although dictated by vengeance, as may be perceived at first sight, I cannot refrain from noticing the injury done to the Mexican army, by attributing to it actions of which it is incapable.

It is said in an article relating to the event respecting colonel Fanning, that which follows:

This chief, according to the orders received from general Houston, left Goliad on the 19th March, with from 330 to 350 volunteers, and at the distance of eight miles east from that port, found himself surrounded by 2,000 of Santa Ana's infantry and cavalry, who, after having destroyed his little advance guard, which consisted of 53 men, attacked him between 4 and 5 in the afternoon, and were repulsed with the loss of 190 killed and wounded, the loss of the Texans being insignificant; night coming on Fanning marched to a more favorable position, where he entrenched.

The Santa Anists despairing of conquering him by an attack face to face, [cara a cara], had recourse, as usual, to deception, and on the following morning they hoisted a flag of truce. Fanning then went to converse, half way between his encampment and that of the traitors, with their chief, who stated to him that he was acquainted with the smallness of his forces; that they were in a plain, destitute of water, and surrounded; but he was willing to grant them quarters, &c. Fanning fell into the snare and capitulated. According to the agreement his troops were to lay down their arms, return to Goliad and remain there some days until they could embark at Copano for New Orleans. All this was done; but on the ninth day after their arrival at Goliad they were informed that a vessel was ready at Copano to receive them; they were accordingly marched between two files of salientes, who, at the distance of five miles from Goliad, fired upon them, and assassinated them all, excepting Mr. Huddon and three others, who fled precipitately to a bush, where they remained until able to put themselves in safety, &c.

To these assertions I can observe that the Mexican troops who defeated Fanning, did not hoist a flag of truce, nor did their chief give any assurance of quarter by celebrating a capitulation in consequence of such an offer. To affirm facts of so much importance, it is necessary to have an evidence of them, and I am certain that they could never be proved.

The report I received from general Don Jose Urrea, who commanded in that action, was to the effect: that finding himself in front of Goliad (where Fanning was with his party) he was told that the enemy had undertaken a retreat towards Victoria, a circumstance he had not before perceived, on account of the thick fog; and that he proceeded to join them, which he subsequently effected on the plain called "Encinul del Pedido," and fought until dark; that on the following day a part of his artillery and infantry arrived, with which he continued the attack; which having been observed by Fanning, and considering his loss as sure, hoisted a flag of truce, and sent a paper written with a pencil, containing some articles offering to surrender if his life should be warranted, &c. to which general Urrea returned a negative answer, adding, that if they did not surrender immediately, he would continue firing upon them. Fanning then surrendered, by laying down his arms, and they all remained in the power of general Urrea, who sent the prisoners and wounded to Goliad, and he continued his route to Victoria.

This is the substance of general Urrea's report, as can be seen in the "Diario del Gobierno" of Mexico, the original having been sent by me to the minister of war, as it was my duty, to inform his excellency, the president ad interim of the republic.

The commandant of Goliad made me acquainted with the conflagration of the town, executed by Fanning on his starting from the fort, not one house having been left for the shelter of the inhabitants; and with the indignation of the latter at the loss of their cattle, together with other vexations, they were reduced to a most sad situation; and communicated to me subsequently his having applied the circular of the supreme government to those who were comprehended in it, with the exception of 86 individuals who had come from New Orleans, taken in Copano on account of their having surrendered their arms at the first summons.

Although we knew that the object of that party was to join Fanning, for which motive they came armed, I ordered them to be kept as prisoners, as was effectively done. I gave the same order respecting other individuals taken in the remaining divisions, and they will manifest the treatment they have received.

The Mexicans, in every epoch, have given repeated proofs of their generosity, as they are naturally humane and compassionate. If some military chiefs have fulfilled the express orders of their government, to whom they owe obedience, they do not merit for this any diatribe or charge whatever. When governments determine about some matter, they must have their reasons, and to them alone it belongs to be answerable to the world for their actions; and in this persuasion, I omit to examine if the circular I have quoted as dictated by the government of the Mexican republic, applied to Fanning and his companions, was founded or not upon justice.

This being the true exposition of what has taken place in this matter, which has induced me to take the pen, I will be obliged to your excellency to order this manifestation to be published, to avoid equivocations which might stain the name of the army to which I belong, protesting to your excellency, on this occasion, the considerations of my esteem.

God and liberty! Velasco, May 23d, 1836.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA.

GENS. HOUSTON AND HAMILTON.

The following are the letters from col. Wharton and gen. Hamilton alluded to in our last:

To the editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer.
Washington City, June 13th, 1836.

To col. WEBB,

Dear sir: With great regret I have noticed in several papers for a week past, a statement that there was a project on foot to supersede gen. Houston, and to place gen. Hamilton of South Carolina, in the command of the Texian army. It is stated in some of the papers that the Texian commissioners have sent a despatch to their government to effect this purpose. This rumor is referred to in your paper of the 9th, which induces me to trouble you with the following remarks:

The Texian commissioners have never held any communication directly or indirectly with gen. Hamilton. He is personally unknown to all of them, and they have never mentioned his name in any of their despatches to their government. Moreover, they have never made a proposition to supersede general

Houston. They have never received a proposition to that effect, and would have rejected any such proposition with indignation, no matter from whence it proceeded. Furthermore, they have viewed gen. Houston's conduct as commander-in-chief of the Texian army with feelings of unalloyed and unqualified approbation. My colleagues, gen. Austin and Dr. Archer, are absent; but inasmuch as I have joined them in all their despatches, and am entirely acquainted with their sentiments in relation to gen. Houston's military career in Texas, I pledge my honor for the truth of the above statements. I have a great disinclination to appear in the public prints, but feel that the above is due to gen. Houston, to ourselves, and to truth.

Very respectfully, yours, &c. WM. H. WHARTON.

From the Charleston Mercury.

Sir: The following extract from the N. York Evening Star, having met with a very extended circulation, I trust I shall stand excused for adding a brief commentary which I feel to be due to myself.

"The following is from Hudson's correspondence, Washington:

"I am enabled to state, on undoubted authority, that a plot is now on foot to deprive Houston of the command of the army in Texas, and place gen. James Hamilton, of South Carolina, at its head. The proposition has been made to the Texian commissioners and is now under consideration. If Hamilton can be placed at the head of the affairs of Texas, it is said that $10,000,000 will soon be pledged to the cause. It is alleged Houston is not the man to carry the plans of Texas into effect, and a strong party in the south is ready to take hold of the struggle if Hamilton can be elected to the chief command."

I am sure that those who know me, will believe that I am at least innocent of the charge of sanctioning any "plot," to deprive a gallant soldier of the command of an army to which he has vindicated a paramount claim by his own sword, more especially at a moment when wounded in a battle which has covered him with laurels, he is at once the object of mingled sympathy and admiration.

But I am confident, sir, you will believe with even a bribe of "ten millions to the cause of Texas," I am incapable of being made the instrument of this injustice. I may envy gen. Houston the glory of having fought with consummate bravery and conduct, one of the most decisive battles in the annals of ancient or modern war—but if I know myself, I could never "plot," or sanction any "plot," to the prejudice of claims infinitely greater than my own.

I should not have noticed this rumor if I did not desire to relieve myself (if there is a single man who believes the accusation to be true), from the imputation of the gross and offensive arrogance of "plotting" to take the command from a successful general of the companions of his glory, in the very hour of his victory. I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. HAMILTON.

CASE OF MAJOR GATES.

The following order embraces the official proceedings in the case of major Gates.

GENERAL ORDER.

Head quarters of the army,

Adjutant general's office, Washington, June 11, 1836.

I. The proceedings of the court of inquiry, held at St. Augustine, East Florida, on the 6th day of May, 1836, and continued until the 7th, assembled by order of major general Scott, at the request of major William Gates, and of which court lieutenant colonel Crane, of the United States army, was president, have been laid before the president of the United States.

The court, at the request of major Gates, was directed to investigate the conduct of that officer during and subsequent to the attack on the military post at Volusia, on the St. John's river, in Florida, embracing the 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th of April, of this year.

The court of inquiry having been directed to give its opinion on the whole case, came to the following conclusion:

"OPINION."

II. "The court, after mature deliberation on the testimony before them, are of opinion, from the evidence of adjutant Patterson, doctor Graham and lieutenant Petties, that the effective force under the command of maj. Gates was much greater than the estimated force of the Indians who attacked him on the morning of the 14th April, 1836; and that, therefore, he was capable of meeting the enemy in the field, if necessary; also, that the bodies of two volunteers, killed, were improperly left exposed, and ought to have been brought in on the morning when they were killed; such exposure necessarily operating injuriously on the garrison."

On which proceedings and opinion, major general Scott, commanding the troops in Florida, made the following remarks:

"It is clear, from the evidence, that the garrison of Fort Barnwell was, at the time it was attacked, at least twice as numerous as the assailing party. A vigorous sortie, with two-thirds of the garrison, should, therefore, have been promptly made.—The moral effect of such movement would have been great on both sides. Many of the enemy would, probably, have been killed or captured, and the garrison thereby inspired with a just confidence in the superior prowess of the white man."

"If for no other object, a strong detachment ought instantly to have been sent out to bring in the bodies of the sergeant and private who were seen to fall, near the wood, at the beginning of the attack. This imperious duty was neglected for more than forty-eight hours: a delay that is curiously slurred over in the major's official report.

"It is most painful to remark the fatal charm that seems to have hung over every commander in this war who has been attacked behind breastworks or pickets. From the leading case, at Camp Izard, to the last that has been reported, not a sortie—certainly not one of vigor—has been made by any garrison, however inferior the assailing force. Several mortifying cases of this sort have duly followed, and major Cooper alone, with his Georgia battalion, has ventured, for a moment, beyond a line of defences to receive or to repel an attack. The series of examples alluded to have inspired the enemy with hardihood, repressed the zeal of our troops, and may slightly excuse the conduct of major Gates. Certainly a gallant effort is yet to be made by some future commander of a post to break the charm and to check Indian audacity."

III. The president of the United States, on a full consideration of the conduct of major William Gates, of the 1st regiment of artillery, as disclosed by the evidence before the court of inquiry, has directed that the name of that officer be stricken from the rolls. Major William Gates, therefore, ceases to be an officer of the army.

By order of ALEXANDER MACOMB, major general commanding-in-chief: R. JONES, adjutant general.

CIRCULAR.

To collectors and receivers of public money, and to the deposit banks.

The charter of the United States bank having expired on the 3d of March last, and the 14th section of it, which made the notes of that bank receivable for public dues, having been repealed by congress on the 15th instant, you are hereby notified that said notes are no longer, by law, so receivable.

For further information, connected with the kind of money which ought hereafter to be taken, I annex a copy of the second section of an act of congress, passed April 14, 1836, directing in what alone all further payments are to be made to the public creditors, viz:

Section 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no bank notes of less denomination than ten dollars, and that from and after the third day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, no bank note of less denomination than twenty dollars, shall be offered in payment in any case whatsoever, in which money is to be paid by the United States, or the post office department; nor shall any bank note of any denomination be so offered, unless the same shall be payable, and paid on demand, in gold or silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie, at the place where offered; and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to make any thing but gold or silver a legal tender by any individual, or by the U. States."

In carrying faithfully into effect the above imperative provision, and, at the same time, giving all safe and legal accommodations to the community in the receipt of money, you will perceive the propriety of not receiving any bank notes which are not redeemable and redeemed in specie, and on demand; or any which do not, in other respects, come within the regulations of former circulars from this department.

LEVI WOODBURY, secretary of the treasury.

Treasury department, 16th June, 1836.

THE REVENUE FOR APRIL.

Report from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the senate.

Treasury department, June 9, 1836.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the senate of the 6th instant, directing me to report "to the senate the amount of money now in treasury subject to draft; and, also, the receipts from both customs and lands, during the month of April, now last past, as compared with the receipts from the same sources, for the month of March last," I have the honor to submit the following statement:

The amount of money in the treasury, subject to draft, on the 6th instant, as ascertained by the treasurer's running account, was $33,563,654.

This does not embrace any part of the Chickasaw fund, nor of the French indemnity received, as neither of them can be used for general purposes, and both are held but temporarily and in trust for others. On the other hand, nothing has been deducted for any existing appropriations, except so far as warrants have issued for actual payments.

In respect to the other branch of the resolution, it appears, from the current returns made to this department, and they are believed to be all complete, that the receipts in the month of March last were—

From customs.....	$1,924,427
And from lands.....	1,997,253

Making an aggregate of.....	$3,921,680
-----------------------------	-------------

The receipts in April last were—

From customs.....	$1,238,800
And from lands.....	1,617,860

Making an aggregate of.....	$2,856,660
-----------------------------	-------------

or about $1,065,020 less in April than in March.

I have the honor to be, &c.

LEVI WOODBURY,
secretary of the treasury.

Hon. M. Van Buren, president of the senate.

SPEECH OF GOVERNOR EVERETT.

Delivered in Faneuil Hall, Boston on Monday the 6th inst. at the anniversary celebration of the ancient and honorable artillery company.

Mr. Commander: I am sensible to the honor done me by the chair and the company; and beg leave to make my grateful acknowledgments. The toast drank does me no more than justice, in anticipating my best efforts for the promotion of the welfare of the militia system. I embrace also with pleasure this opportunity to declare my entire sympathy with that feeling of respect for the work and the memory of our fathers, to which we owe the perpetuity of this institution. I have always considered this feeling as one of the safe-guards of the republic; as one of the best correctives of the violence of the selfish and party passions of the day. To cherish and strengthen this respect for the principles of our fathers has been one of the chief objects I have proposed to myself in life; and one in the accomplishment of which I have spared no effort, within the compass of my humble sphere of influence.

Perhaps, sir, there is no subject, in regard to which the principles of our fathers are better entitled to respect, than the military defence of the country. The more I turn over the pages of our early colonial history; the more I am struck with the all pervading traces of a sort of providential watchfulness, for the establishment of free institutions; and in nothing more than in this important respect. I need not repeat what is so well known to all who have read the early history of the colony, that it was left to itself—a handful of pious adventurers self-exiled to the distant and savage shore—shut out by the ocean from the civilized world, open through the fearful pathways of the forest to the inroads of fierce and remorseless tribes of savages, spurred forward to the work of destruction, by the subjects of the French monarchy, the hereditary foes of England. In this state of things, nothing would have seemed more desirable, than the presence of a military force, a regiment at least of British troops scattered up and down New England to preserve the feeble settlement from destruction. It might have been thought that our fathers, from the instinct of self-preservation, would have importuned the mother country, for some such protection: especially under the commonwealth, when the civil and military power had passed into the hands of men, whose religious and political opinions harmonized with their own. Whether our fathers desired it or not, it might have been thought that the government of England, royal or republican, would have looked after its own interests in this quarter. It would have seemed natural, that the king of England, would not have been wholly indifferent to the secure possession of these colonies; and that Cromwell, after thundering with his fleets through the Antilles and capturing Jamaica, should take measures to hold fast to the continent. We all know what the colonial system of England in modern times has been. Where-soever the British jurisdiction is established, in either hemisphere, from the rocky towers of Corfu, to the burning latitudes of Hindostan and Australasia, the British flag is its symbol; and within dark and frowning tiers of artillery is the hiding place of its power. They never pretend to hold a foreign colony by any other tenure, than an ever present military force. Their government is as mild and paternal, perhaps, as a colonial government can be, but from the rock of Gibraltar, round to the rock of Quebec, it compasses the globe with an iron belt of glittering bayonets; it speaks in the voice of the morning drum and stalks with the nightly sentinel, along the battlements of impregnable castles. What an escape for the British colonies that form the United States! Had this system, which seemed equally required by the interest of the mother country and the safety of the colonies, been introduced here at the foundation, had a regiment, a battalion of English troops been stationed from the first on Boston common, who cannot perceive that the republican institutions of the country never could have grown up. No, sir, we not only grew by the neglect of the mother country, as col. Barre said in the house of commons, but such neglect was absolutely necessary to the growth of liberty. For this reason, all solicitation of aid from the mother country was studiously avoided. They never asked for a war. A patriotic militia, amounting sometimes to a draft of almost every able-bodied man in the community, was the dependence of our fathers in peace and in war. With this, they fought through the Pequot war and king Philip's war. With this, they went to the aid of the British forces in the wars on the frontier. With this, they conquered Louisburg, and shared in the glories of Quebec. Thus they grew up, a really warlike people wholly unused to standing armies: so that, when the British system, after the seven years' war, was changed, when regiments of troops were encamped on Boston common, when fourteen ships of war were moored in Boston harbor, with springs on their cables, and broadsides ready to open on the town—the spectacle carried no terrors to a brave population, who had learned the secret of their own power, and readily joined in the appeal to the God of battles.

Times are now changed. We have grown up into a great people. A sum of human interests and blessings of untold amount, an incalculable moral and social treasure, is committed to our charge. With the advantages of a powerful state, we have its duties and its exposures. We are subject to insults from abroad and disorders at home. The cloud of foreign war has just rolled away. Had it burst, how would it have found this great and rich metropolis? Without one gun mounted for its defence. I suppose it is pretty generally admitted, that a foreign enemy, even so polite a one as France, would pay but little respect to the white staff of our sheriff, though he should go with all his constables and read the riot act in their hearing; and whether these same peaceful emblems are adequate to sustain the majesty of the law, when threatened in moments of popular convulsion, we can all judge. Then, sir, there are two resources for protection and safety, in the first outbreaking of war and in times of civil commotion. One is, a well-organized patriotic militia—ever present, rarely seen; stationed among us, not in camps and forts, but at the firesides—in the counting-room, the work-shop, the place of business; this is one. The other resource is, a standing army, encamped on Boston common, or stationed on Castle Island. One or the other we must have. And the man who sets himself to ridicule the militia—to exaggerate the defects of the institution—to embarrass its administration—to bring it into discredit—wishes one of two things: he either wishes the country to be wholly exposed to insult from abroad and a prey at home to anarchy—to mob-law, club-law, and a general scramble; or he wishes to see a flag-staff planted in front of the state house; a couple of cannon pointing down State-street; to hear the morning gun at day-break, and to hold the exercise of his daily rights as a citizen, at the discretion of a military commander.

In a free country, this is a pretty serious alternative. I have, sir, for the last six months, thought much and deeply upon it. It has been my duty to do so; and I have come to the conclusion, that, if we intend to hand down unimpaired to our children the inheritance of republican liberty, which we have received from our fathers—if we mean that the civil shall control the military arm, alike in peace and in war, in prosperous and adverse times—the militia must again receive the respect of the community.

I give you, sir, as a toast—

A well-organized, efficient and patriotic militia—in time of peace the bulwark of the law, in war the basis of defence: may it be restored to the public favor.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Congress adjourned on the 4th inst. after a tedious session, much of the time of which was consumed by discussions on points of order, appeals from the decision of the chair, and the calling of yeas and nays on those appeals.

The National Intelligencer of yesterday says—

"The aggregate amount of appropriations made by the acts passed during the late session of congress is about thirty-five millions of dollars. Of this amount it is curious to see the very large proportion made for objects connected with our Indian relations. For carrying into effect treaties or suppressing hostilities with the Indian tribes, (exclusive of the expenses of the army proper), the amount appropriated is more than thirteen million and a half of dollars. The appropriations for the army amount to four millions of dollars; for the navy, to six millions and a quarter; for fortifications, to nearly three millions; for harbors, to over one million; for the Cumberland road, six hundred thousand dollars; besides three millions of dollars for the civil list.

"Notwithstanding this enormous amount of appropriations, there is no doubt that the surplus in the treasury on the first of January next, subject to distribution under the late act of congress, will exceed twenty millions of dollars."

Under the reorganization of the post office, deputy postmasters whose compensation exceed a certain amount, are to be appointed with the advice and consent of the senate. All the old officers, (except one), were nominated to the senate and confirmed. The exception was in the N. York post office, to which Jonathan J. Coddington was appointed to supersede Samuel. L. Gouverneur.

Mr. Cass. The Intelligencer states on the authority of the Georgetown Metropolitan, that Mr. Cass, (prospectively appointed minister to France), will continue in charge of the war department until October; and that it is not likely that there will be another appointment to fill the office of secretary of war after governor Cass retires, during the present administration. In which case, no doubt, Mr. Harris, the chief clerk, will be acting secretary of war from October to March next.

To this avowed determination on the part of the executive, (remarks the Intelligencer), the difficulty of selecting a successor to the present secretary has, doubtless, materially contributed.

The Metropolitan, announces the recall of gen. Scott from the south, and adds—"This measure, it is understood, was rendered necessary by the unfortunate acerbity of feeling, operating to an extent prejudicial to the public interest, existing between this distinguished officer and several other branches in the service."

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT,

By and with the advice and consent of the senate.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

June 30. The vice president announced that he should not resume the chair during the present session after this day.

A message was received from the president of the United States, communicating a copy of a treaty of peace, navigation and commerce with the republic of Venezuela, signed in January last.

Mr. Webster, from the committee on finance reported without amendment an act supplementary to the act to regulate the deposits of the public money.

Mr. Benton, in reference to the cause which prevented him from calling up the expunging resolution yesterday, said he left it to the senate to act in reference to it as they might think proper.

After a few remarks from Messrs. Preston, Clay and Benton the subject was dropped.

[The remarks of Mr. Clay were as follows:

Mr. Clay said he would take the opportunity of saying that it had been his fixed purpose, considering the relation in which he stood to the resolution of March, 1834, and to the senate, as having offered it, to address the senate on the subject of it. He was particularly desirous to have vindicated the resolution in the assertion which it contained of the exercise of executive power in derogation from the constitution and laws of the U. States. After the fullest reflection, his judgment remained unchanged, that it was an exercise of illegal and unconstitutional power, and dangerous to the liberties of the people of this country. And, if he could have seen a suitable occasion, after hearing all that could be urged against the resolution, he should have endeavored to maintain by argument that proposition. But it has been so treated, from time to time, taken up and laid upon the table, (the last time to afford an opportunity to the present chief magistrate of an eastern state to deliver his sentiments upon it, when he, (Mr. Clay), was detained from the senate by the illness of a member of his family), that he has not seen a fit moment when he could, according to his sense of propriety, address the senate.

*This includes the sum of $304,867 55 not then invested, arising from the sales of lands in the Chickasaw cession, and which, under the treaty, is to be invested for the benefit of that nation, leaving a balance of $36,976,166 72, without deducting outstanding drafts on it not then reported as paid, equal to $3,972,000; this being deducted, the sum in these banks, subject to draft on the 1st of June, was $33,004,166 72.

It is now, as every senator must feel, entirely too late in the session, when important public business was pressing upon both houses, to protract the discussion upon this resolution. Mr. Clay was anxious to have brought forward, from the present democratic fountain in this country a precedent, on all substantial points directly applicable, against the process of mutilating and expunging the journals of the senate. But, solicitous as he was to discuss the particular topic, and to spread before the senate the precedent to which he referred, he could not think of trespassing on the time of the senate during the precious moments that remain. With respect to the final disposition to be made of the resolution, he was content to acquiesce in any decision the senate might think proper to make. If it be its pleasure to take up the resolution and pass definitively upon it, without further debate, he would be satisfied.]

The bill from the house to change the time for the annual meeting of congress was taken up and indefinitely postponed—yeas 24.

At the suggestion of Mr. King, of Alabama, the consideration of the resolutions reported by the committee on foreign relations on the subject of Texas, was postponed until to-morrow.

The bill from the house making appropriations for light houses, &c. was read a first time. Mr. Calhoun objected to its second reading at this time.

The bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors, &c. from the house, and the other bills from the house, were read a first and second time, and referred.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the senate took up a bill to establish a foundry, and armory in the west, and one in the south, &c. Some of the items contained in this bill being also in the fortification bill, which had been recommitted. Mr. Benton moved to strike out these items, but the motion requiring, on the passage of a bill, unanimous consent, and objection being made, it was not persevered in.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill by yeas nays, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Ill. Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Ala. Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, King, of Geo. Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tomlinson—15.

The senate concurred in the amendment of the house to the bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

A communication was received from the treasury, showing the condition of the deposit banks, which was ordered to be printed. On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications, which had been recommitted without amendment. On motion of Mr. Wright, the items were stricken out which had been included in the previous bill. On motion of Mr. Webster, the amendment adopted yesterday on motion of Mr. Clay, restricting the issues of money to the actual necessity of the case, was again adopted.

After some few remarks from Messrs. Preston and Wright, Mr. Clay said that it had been stated that two hundred guns were all that would be required to arm the fortifications, and that we had one thousand eight hundred and eighteen; and as liberal appropriations had been made in another bill, he could not see the propriety of voting the large sums in this bill. He stated that two hundred thousand was wanted for the transportation of arms, and a gentleman of responsibility had stated, in the other house, that all the arms in the country could be transported for 25,000 dollars. Mr. Calhoun adverted to the necessity for some point at which the accumulation of arms might stop; and when there would be a tremendous reaction, when the losses in consequence of risk, insurance, impediment, &c. would be infinitely greater than the value of the arms. Mr. Cuthbert asked his understanding of the feelings and views which influenced the senate to recommit the bill, and alleged that there was a change of ground and of course, in the action of the gentlemen on the other side. He warned them not to incur the suspicion of acting only for the purpose of winning popular favor and to recollect that the verdict of the country had been repeatedly given in favor of the system of defence, on which this bill was founded.

The question was taken on engrossing the amendment and ordering the bill to be read a third time by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Ala. Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Walker, Webster, White, Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Crittenden, Ewing, of Ohio, Leigh, Mangum, Moore, Preston, Southard—9.

After several other bills had been disposed of, on motion of Mr. Webster the bill supplementary to an act to regulate the deposits of the public money, was committed to the committee on finance—which, in a short time reported it with an amendment.

A message was received from the president of the United States, communicating the death of James Madison, ex-president of the United States, on Tuesday, the 28th instant.

[The message will be found in our abstract of the proceedings of the house on the 30th instant, page 306.]

Mr. Rives addressed the senate as follows:

Mr. President: I feel that it would be an act of sacrilegious temerity were I to attempt to add to the intrinsic pathos of the melancholy intelligence just announced to us by the president of the United States, by any thing in the way of eulogy on the character of the great man whose decease he has communicated to us. The eulogy of Mr. Madison is written in every page of the history of his country, to whose service his whole life was devoted, and with every great event in whose annals his name stands conspicuously and enduringly identified. Filled, however, as his life was, from its dawn to its close, with labors of patriotism and superior wisdom, there is one great work of his which must ever recur prominently to the grateful memory of his country. He was, in an especial manner, the founder and author of that glorious constitution which is the bond of our union and the charter of our liberties; and it was graciously vouchsafed to him, in the order of Providence, to witness for a longer period than any of his illustrious colleagues the rich blessings which have resulted from its establishment. He was the last surviving signer of that sacred instrument. Amid the general grief which pervades the nation, may we not indulge one consolation at least, in the hope that his death, whilst adding the last seal to his own fame and glory, will, in some sort, canonize the work of his hands, and surround, with a new veneration, that precious relic of the wisdom of our departed patriots and sages.

Sir, but, I will not speak of the public life of Mr. Madison; it is known to us all; it is appreciated by us all. It was my privilege to see and to know him in the scenes of that classic retirement in which he passed the evening of his days. It was there that the mild lustre of his private virtues, which formed the crowning grace of his character, and is the indispensable compliment of a true public glory, was seen and felt. But who can paint him there? Who can adequately describe that fascinating suavity of temper and manners, that spirit and grace of conversation so happily blended with the oracles of philosophy and experience, that amiable and cultivated benevolence, ever watchful of the feelings and comfort of others, even in the minutest trifles, which together formed, around the hearth of Montpelier, a group of social virtues and attractions which, however competent the power of language to portray, none, who have felt their influence, can ever forget. In speaking of these things, Mr. President, I am but too forcibly reminded of my own personal loss in the general and national calamity which we all bewail. I was the neighbor of Mr. Madison, sir, and enjoyed his kindness and friendship; and if, in speaking of a great national bereavement, my mind recurs too fondly to the chasm his death has left in the immediate circle of his friends, something, I trust, will be pardoned to the feelings of the heart.

It is my melancholy satisfaction to have received, in all probability, the last letter ever signed by his hand. It bears date only six days before his death, and furnishes, in its contents, a striking illustration of that amiable benevolence, and sensibility to the kindness of others, which formed so prominent a trait in his character. In that letter, which is now before me, he spoke of his enfeebled health, and his trembling and unsteady signature, so much in contrast with the usual firmness and regularity of his writing, bore a graphic and melancholy intimation of his approaching end. Still I trusted that his light might hold out to the 4th of July, that he might be restored on that glorious anniversary to an immortal companionship with those great men and patriots with whom he had been intimately connected in life, and whose coincident deaths, on the birth-day of the nation's freedom, had imparted to that day, if possible, an additional and mysterious illustration. But it has been ordered otherwise. His career has been closed at an epoch, which, forty-nine years ago, witnessed his most efficient labours in the illustrious assembly which laid the foundations of our present system of government, and will thus, by the remembrance of his death, as well as by the services of his life, more closely associate him with that great work, which is at once the source and the guaranty of his country's happiness and glory.

What honors, Mr. President, are there, by which we can do justice to a character which history will hold up to future ages as a model of public and private virtue, not surpassed by the brightest examples in ancient or modern times? Sir, there are none. Still it is proper that, as representatives of the American people, we should show, by some suitable manifestations, how sincerely and deeply we participate in the universal feeling of grief on this mournful occasion, and I move you, therefore, the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the senate, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the house, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the president of the United States.

The resolution was adopted, and, on motion of Mr. Rives, the committee was ordered to consist of seven, to be appointed by the chair.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the bill supplementary to an act to regulate the deposits of the public money, was taken up for consideration.

[This bill goes to authorise the secretary of the treasury to transfer money from the deposit bank in any state or territory to any other deposit bank, when it is necessary to prevent the accumulation of too much of the public money in any one bank.]

Mr. Mangum moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew the motion. Mr. Walker renewed the motion, and it was negatived. The amendment of the committee was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Mangum moved that the senate take a recess till 7 o'clock; which was agreed to.

Evening session. The senate proceeded to consider the bill to establish a naval academy. [Laid on the table.]

The engrossed bills on the table were read a third time, and passed.

The bill supplementary to the act to regulate the deposits of the public money, being on its passage, the yeas and nays were ordered on the call of Mr. Walker, and the bill was passed—yeas 24, nays 6.

After a large number of private bills had been disposed of, the senate, on motion of Mr. Linn, took up the bill to create the office of surveyor of the public lands in the Wisconsin territory, which was considered and passed.

The bills ordered to a third reading this evening were severally read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Davis moved the senate to take up the bill to explain an act to amend the various acts to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, as amended, by the committee on manufactures. The bill was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to confirm sales of lands in certain cases was ordered to be engrossed. The bill was read a third time and passed.

A number of private bills were ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Rives, from the joint committee appointed on the message of the president communicating the death of Mr. Madison, reported sundry resolutions, (see the house proceedings); which were unanimously adopted.

After the transaction of some minor business, at half past 12 o'clock, the senate adjourned.

July 1. At eleven o'clock, A. M. the secretary called the senate to order; and,

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate proceeded to the election of a president pro tem; and the ballots being counted, the vote appeared to be as follows:

For Mr. King, of Alabama.....	22
For Mr. Southard.....	14
Scatterings.....	4

So that Mr. King, of Alabama, was declared to be duly elected president of the senate pro tem, and was conducted to the chair by Mr. White.

The president pro tem, returned his thanks to the following effect:

Gentlemen of the senate:

This flattering manifestation of the confidence and respect of my brother senators fills my heart with the liveliest sensibility.

To be called to preside over the deliberations of the senate of the United States, distinguished, as it is, for intelligence, moral worth, and a patriotic devotion to the principles of liberty, is an honor of which the first in this land might be justly proud. I shall enter, gentlemen, upon the discharge of the duties which your kindness has devolved upon me, with the determination to discharge them zealously, faithfully and impartially. I am, however, fully aware that, unless I am sustained by the senate, all my efforts correctly and usefully to discharge them must prove vain and fruitless; but the order, the decorum, which has heretofore so eminently distinguished the senate of the United States; the courtesy and good feeling which has uniformly marked the official and social intercourse of its members, gives to me the strongest assurance that I may confidently rely on their kindness and support. I earnestly request honorable senators to make proper allowances for the errors into which I may occasionally fall, and to aid me in correcting them.

Various motions were made to discharge the committees from the subjects referred to them.

Mr. Webster offered a resolution calling on the secretary of war to report in detail, next session, on the subject of fortifications and arsenals, &c. and the condition of the works, the original estimate of cost, and what sum remains unexpended; which was agreed to.

Mr. Clayton offered a resolution calling on the secretary of war to report, next session, the amount expended on the Delaware breakwater, &c.; which was agreed to.

The bills last read, from the house, were read twice, and referred.

The bill from the house making appropriations for light houses, light boats, &c. was read a second time, and referred to the committee on commerce.

The bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors, &c. was read a second time, and referred to the committee on commerce.

On motion of Mr. Preston the senate took up the resolution reported by the committee on foreign relations relative to the independence of Texas.

Mr. Preston made some remarks, in the course of which he stated that he had with difficulty restrained himself from offering an amendment to recognise the independence of Texas immediately. He gave a brief narrative of the events of the revolution in Texas, and stated that he had this morning received authentic information, in the form of a letter from Mr. Austin, which confirms the statement that general FULSOTA had carried into effect the armistice agreed on between the Texian government and Santa Ana. This treaty Mr. P. regarded as amounting to a recognition on the part of Mexico of the independence of Texas. The vice president of Texas was about to proceed to Vera Cruz to enforce from the mouths of the Texian guns the conclusion of a definitive treaty of peace between the two countries.

Mr. P. continued, at some length, to expatiate on the situation and achievements and claims of Texas, and adverted to certain treaty stipulations with Mexico concerning the Indians west of the Sabine, which stipulations it would only be in the power of Texas now to carry into effect. He concluded with offering to amend the resolution by adding an expression of the gratification which the senate felt on hearing of the course taken by the president of the United States to obtain information of the situation of Texas.

The report of the committee concludes with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

Mr. Clay said that the report of the committee on foreign relations was so full, and the session was so near its termination; that he had not thought it necessary to add one word to what that document contained; and he should not now have risen but for the amendment proposed by the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston), and what had fallen from him.

With respect to that amendment, (continued Mr. Clay), I have no objection to it, and wish it to be adopted. The committee on foreign relations had reported a resolution declaring that Texas ought to be recognised as an independent power, as soon as satisfactory information is acquired that it has an established government in successful operation. The president states, in a message received in the senate subsequent to the report, that he has adopted measures to obtain that information. There is, therefore, an entire consistency between the resolution of the committee, the message of the president and the proposed amendment, and he hoped it would be agreed to.

The senator from South Carolina, actuated by very natural and proper feelings, would be glad to propose a stronger measure—one of immediate recognition—but feels restrained by the dictates of his sober judgment. I, too, Mr. President, would be most happy if the state of our information, and the course of events, were such as to warrant the adoption of that stronger measure. But I do not concur in the opinion which has been expressed, that the actual independence of Texas, by the overthrow or expulsion of the armies of Mexico, is the only consideration which should guide us in deciding the question of recognition. There is another, scarcely of less importance, and that is, whether there is in Texas a civil government in successful operation, competent to sustain the relations of an independent power. This is the very point on which we want information, and that respecting which the president is, we are given to understand, now endeavoring to obtain it. And, surely, considering how recently Texas has adopted a constitution of government, it is not unreasonable to wait a short time to see what its operation will be.

But there are other considerations which ought not to be overlooked by a wise and discreet government. We are told by the senator from South Carolina that the vice president of Texas is on his way to La Vera Cruz to negotiate with the Mexican government a definitive treaty of peace between the two powers, and, consequently, an acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. This fact furnishes an additional motive on the part of the United States for forbearing, at present, to proceed to the formal acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. And how much more glorious will it not be for Texas herself, by her own valor, to force from her enemy the first acknowledgment of her independence?

We ought to discriminate between Santa Ana—the blood-thirsty, vain-boasting, military tyrant, who has met in his overthrow and captivity, a merited fate—and the eight millions of Mexicans over whom he was exercising military sway. We should not allow the feelings of just indignation, which his conduct has excited, to transport us against the perhaps unoffending people whom he has controlled. We ought to recollect that Mexico is our neighbor, having continuous territory; that as long as we both remain independent powers, we shall stand in that relation to her; that we are carrying on, by sea and by land, a commerce highly beneficial to both parties; and that it is the interest of both to cultivate the most amicable and harmonious intercourse. If we proceed precipitately and prematurely, how will our conduct be regarded by Mexico? May we not lay the foundations of a lasting and injurious misunderstanding? If, indeed, Mexico delays unreasonably the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, and resolves on the prosecution of the war, I should be far from thinking that the United States ought to postpone, to any distant day, the recognition of Texas, after the desired information is obtained. The senator from South Carolina has supposed it to be necessary to recognise Texas in order to insure the execution of existing treaties with Mexico. So far as they affect Texas, she is as much bound by them as if they had been negotiated under her express authority. For I suppose it to be incontestable that a nation remains bound by all the treaties it has formed, however often it may think proper to change the form of its government; and that all the parts of a common nation also continue so bound, notwithstanding and after they shall have formed themselves into separate and independent powers.

Then there are other considerations which recommend us to act on full information, and with due deliberation. It is undeniable that many citizens of the United States, impelled by a noble devotion to the cause of liberty, have rushed to the succor of Texas, and contributed to the achievement of her independence. This has been done without the sanction or authority of this government; but it nevertheless exposes us to unworthy imputations. It is known that European powers attribute to our union unbounded ambition, and a desire of aggrandizing ourselves at the expense of our neighbors. The extensive acquisition of territory by the treaties of Louisiana and Florida, peaceful and upon a fair consideration as it was, is appealed to as sustaining the unfounded charge against us. Now, if, after Texas has declared her independence not quite four months ago, we should hasten to acknowledge it, considering the aid afforded by citizens of the United States, should we not give countenance to those imputations? Does not a just regard to our own character, as a wise, cautious and dignified power, a just regard to the opinion of the people of Mexico, and a just regard to that of the impartial world, require that we should avoid all appearance of haste and precipitation? And, when we have reason to suppose that not a single hostile bayonet remains in Texas, and when the ceremony of recognition, performed now or a few months hence, can be of no material consequence to her, is it not better for all parties that we should wait a little while longer.

The senator from South Carolina refers to the policy which has constantly guided our councils in regard to the acknowledgment of new powers or new governments, and he has correctly stated it. But it would not be at all difficult if it were proper to detain the senate, to show an essential difference between the present instance and the cases of France, of Spanish America, and of Greece, to which he has adverted. There is an obvious difference in the duration of the new governments, and the degree of information which we possess about them.

The senate, without the co-operation of the executive in some way, is incompetent to recognize Texas. The president tells us, in his message, that he has adopted measures to acquire necessary information to guide his judgment. We also want it. He cannot be justly accused of having delayed unreasonably to act. There is ground to believe not only that Texas is independent, but that it has a government in practical operation. I sincerely hope it has; and that it has laid, on deep foundations, perfect securities for liberty, law and order. In the mean time, every prudent consideration seems to me to require that we should stop with the resolution and proposed amendment. Such appears to be the deliberate judgment of the senator himself. I sincerely, I most anxiously hope that the desired information will be soon obtained by the executive; and that the feelings and wishes for the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, which so generally prevail among our constituents, may be speedily gratified.

After some further debate, the resolution was agreed to by a unanimous vote.

Mr. Webster added a few words to express his entire acquiescence in the resolution of the committee and the amendment. He was willing to go so far as to vote funds to enable the president to send out a proper minister. But against a direct recognition he thought there existed strong objections. It was the proper function of the president to take the lead in this matter. He was of the opinion that the reactivity of the revolution was an objection to immediate recognition. Time was expedient where the object was not of peculiar urgency. He adverted to the generally cautious policy of our government, carried even to the point of timidity in reference to Greece; and referred to the fact that general Houston had seconded his resolutions on the subject of sending commissioners to that republic.

Mr. Walker made some remarks to show that Mexico had never exercised the power of government in Texas, except during a short interval when Santa Ana was in Texas.

Mr. Buchanan concurred in every sentiment expressed in the report of the committee, and congratulated the senate on the spectacle exhibited by the people of the United States, who, although operated upon by the strongest feelings of indignation at the outrageous conduct of the Mexicans, had confined themselves within the limits of our established policy. He did not perceive that any disadvantage could result to Texas from a little delay, now that she is in the full tide of her prosperity.

Mr. Calhoun congratulated the senate on the tone of the discussion; stated that he had hoped we should be ready to recognize Texas before now; but, under existing circumstances, he thought we should only go at present so far as the report and resolution contemplate.

The debate was continued by Messrs. Niles, Southard, Benton and Preston, when the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Preston asked for the yeas and nays on the resolution; which were ordered, and the question being taken, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Illinois, Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, Kent, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Leigh, Linn, Mangum, Moore, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Porter, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Wright—39.

So the resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Leigh, on leave, introduced a bill to extend the privilege of franking to Dolly P. Madison, relict of James Madison, during her life; and the bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. Webster, from the committee on finance, reported a bill from the house making appropriations for the West Point academy, and the bill was taken up, considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading. The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Webster, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, a bill from the house making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities, and for other purposes, which was taken up, considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading. The bill was then read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Swift, the senate agreed to take a recess from 3 to 5 o'clock.

Several bills ordered to a third reading were read a third time and passed—and others ordered to be engrossed. [Among them was a bill to renew the gold medal given to Gen. Morgan in honor of the battle of the Cowpens.]

The senate took a recess until 5 o'clock.

Evening session. A message was received from the president of the United States, in reply to a resolution of January last, in relation to frauds in Indian reservations; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

The senate considered as in committee of the whole a bill for the relief of the sureties of Nicholas Kern. Ordered to a third reading.

Mr. White, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported the bill from the house making appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties, with amendments. The bill was taken up, and, after some discussion between Mr. White and Mr. Webster, the amendments were ordered to be engrossed.

The bill making appropriations for fortifications was received from the house, with a message concurring in one amendment, and non-concurring in the other.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate recessed from the amendments which had not received the concurrence of the house.

The senate, on motion of Mr. Davis, took up the bill to regulate the compensation of certain officers of revenue cutters.—The amendments of the committee were agreed to, and ordered to be engrossed.

The senate took up the bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, &c.

There was a discussion on this bill, in which Messrs. Davis, Mangum, Buchanan, Walker, Preston, Porter, Linn, Moore, Calhoun, Webster, Leigh, Wright and Southard took part.

The committee on commerce had reduced the amount of appropriations in this bill one-third from that which had passed the house.

Mr. Clayton asked for the yeas and nays on the reduction made by the committee of the appropriation for Newcastle harbor, in order that he and his colleague might record their votes against it. The yeas and nays being ordered, the question was taken and decided in favor of the reduction—yeas 23, nays 5.—The other amendments of the committee were concurred in.—On motion of Mr. Davis, the bill was amended by the addition of an appropriation of $30,000 for surveys, under an existing law of congress.

The bill was then reported to the senate, and ordered to a third reading by the following vote:

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, King, of Georgia, Leigh, Walker, White—5.

At half-past one the senate adjourned.

July 2. Mr. Morris presented a number of petitions on the subject of slavery. Mr. Walker moved that the petitions be not received—and then moved that the motion be laid on the table.

A number of private bills were considered and disposed of.

A bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for other purposes, was read a third time; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. Calhoun asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Ewing, of Ill. Ewing, of Ohio, Goldsborough, Grundy, Hendricks, King, of Ala. Linn, Niles, Page, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, King, of Georgia, Leigh, Mangum, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Rives, Walker, White—12.

Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, made a report on the bill from the house making appropriations for light houses, &c. referred to that committee yesterday. The report states that in so short a period as that allowed to them, it had been found impossible to give that examination to the bill which its importance required; and, although there are many useful objects which must suffer, the committee find themselves compelled to return the bill, for the senate to make such disposition of it as may be thought desirable.

The bill granting half pay to the widows and orphans of the officers and soldiers who have died, or shall die in the service of the United States, was amended and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, reported the bill making appropriations for certain harbors, &c. with amendments.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported from the committee were considered and agreed to.

At 3 o'clock the senate took a recess until 5 o'clock.

Evening session. The senate resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for harbors, &c. which received several amendments and gave rise to considerable discussion, during which Mr. King, of Georgia, moved to postpone the further consideration of it until December next, and called for the yeas and nays on the motion—which were ordered and the motion rejected, yeas 17, nays 22. The bill was then reported with the amendments; when, finally, they were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time—yeas 21, nays 17. The bill was then passed.

The senate proceeded to consider the amendments made by the house of representatives to the bill to reorganize the general land office, and they were concurred in.

At half past eleven, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The doors were reopened at half past twelve.

The senate then proceeded to consider the bill for the construction of the national road from Vandalia to the Mississippi river; which was ordered to a third reading.

The amendments to the bill to authorize additional paymasters, made by the house, were taken up and concurred in.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported the amendments of the house to the bill in addition to the act making appropriations for the service of the government, with a recommendation to concur in all except the two items for removing the naval monument to the botanic gardens, and for extending the capitol square. The report was agreed to, so far as concerns the removal of the monument, but the appropriation for extending the capitol square was retained.

The senate took up the bill to continue the Cumberland road to Jefferson city, Missouri; which was ordered to be read a third time.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the senate reconsidered the vote by which a bill to repeal so much of the act of March 2, 1799, as requires the issuing of certificates on the importation of wines, was rejected, and it was read a third time and passed.

The senate took up the bill for the adjustment of claims to reservations of the Choctaw Indians, under the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek; which was ordered to lie on the table.

It was ordered, on motion of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio, that when the senate adjourns, it adjourn to meet at 8 o'clock on Monday morning.

The senate then (at 3 o'clock) adjourned, (only eight members being present).

July 4. Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, reported the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to cause to be collected and laid before the senate at its next session all such facts and information as can be obtained through the custom house, or from other sources, respecting the deportation of paupers from Great Britain and other places, ascertaining as nearly as possible to what countries such persons are sent, where landed, and what provision, if any, is made for their future support.

On motion of the various chairmen of committees, the committees were discharged from the further consideration of the business referred to them.

On motion of Mr. Clayton, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short time, the doors were reopened.

Mr. Davis offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the secretary of war cause to be prepared and laid before the senate at its next session a statement, showing what improvement of harbors, rivers and other objects have been commenced by the United States, what was the original estimated cost of each of such improvements, what sums of money have from time to time been appropriated in aid of each object, what balances of such appropriations remain unexpended, and what is the present condition of each work.

Resolved, That the said secretary cause to be collected and arranged in chronological order all reports of surveys made for such objects which have been printed, and also all such as have not been printed, together with the maps and drawings, with an index or indexes of reference, that they may be laid before the senate at its next session.

The resolutions were agreed to.

A message was received from the house stating that the house had suspended the 17th joint rule in reference to certain bills which have not yet passed.

As it requires the unanimous consent of the senate to take up a resolution on the day when it is introduced for consideration, and an objection was made by Mr. Mangum, the chair decided that the resolution could not be considered.

Mr. Calhoun sustained the objection, and thanked his friend from North Carolina for making it. He deemed it of the utmost importance that the senate should take a stand on the principle of this rule to check the practice of hurrying bills through at the last moment of the session.

The president of the senate, (Mr. King, of Alabama), indicated that he felt it to be his duty to sign the bills whether the joint rules were suspended so as to allow them to be offered to the president of the United States for his signature or not. He accordingly signed them.

Mr. Mangum withdrew his objection.

Mr. Benton appealed from the decision of the chair that a resolution of this kind could not be taken up for consideration on the same day; but to make all safe, as a majority could rescind a rule, he had drawn up a resolution to rescind. He then read a resolution that so much of any rule as prohibits the presentation of a bill to the president on the last day of the session be repealed.

The chair stated that it would require one day's notice before such a resolution as the senator had read could be received by the senate.

Mr. Black moved to amend the resolution by confining its operation to the bills which have been enrolled and signed by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house. The amendment was agreed to, and the bills were transmitted to and signed by the president accordingly.

A message of an executive character was received from the president, and,

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, (ten minutes past one o'clock), and in a few minutes the doors were reopened.

The usual message was received from the house, stating that the house, having completed all the business before it, is now ready to adjourn.

Mr. Grundy, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president, reported that they had performed that duty, and that they had received for answer that he had no further communication to make.

The senate then adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, June 30. Evening session. The following remarks were made by Mr. Patton, of Va. and Mr. Adams, upon the death of Mr. Madison, announced by the president of the U. States to the house of representatives.

The message of the president having been read, Mr. Patton, of Virginia, said that the particular relation in which he stood, as his immediate representative and personal friend, towards the great public benefactor whose decease, "full of years and full of honors," had just been announced by the message of the president of the United States, had induced the Virginia delegation to devolve upon him the mournful duty of proposing for the adoption of the house the resolution he was about to offer, for the purpose of determining upon the course to be pursued for giving expression to the national sensibility to the great bereavement we had suffered.

I do not, however, Mr. Speaker, feel it to be a suitable occasion in which to employ or indulge in any studied phrase of panegyric upon the public or private virtues of the venerable man whose loss we deplore.

It is true, sir, that early imbued with the sincerest veneration for the character of Mr. Madison, with the profoundest admiration of his talents, and the warmest gratitude for his eminent and varied public services, there is no language that I could employ which would exaggerate the deep emotion with which I have been impressed by the melancholy intelligence of his death. And I am sure that it would be equally impossible for me to speak of him in any terms that would depict an individual pre-eminent in all the virtues of social and private life, or one that combined the merits of a patriot, statesman and sage, that would not find a ready and full response in the minds and hearts of all who hear me. But it is not a feeble effort of this kind, such as I could make, nor even by the highest effort of human eloquence, the lofty inspiration of poetry, "the storied urn or animated bust," than can rear an appropriate monument to the memory of Mr. Madison, or erect a suitable monument to his fame.

His appropriate and enduring eulogium is to be found inscribed in those pages of his country's history, which are identified with her honor and glory. It is engraved upon every pillar of that splendid fabric of constitutional liberty under which we live. It is identified with the existence of that glorious union of confederated states which he contributed so essentially to form, and the maintenance and preservation of which with all its numerous blessings, were the constant objects of his care during his long, laborious and useful public life, and of his most earnest and anxious solicitude in the shade of retirement.

And, Mr. Speaker, another and not less decisive and more affecting evidence of his merit and title to public gratitude, will be found in the deep grief with which his loss will be deplored by every man in the nation as a great national calamity. I offer the resolution which I now send to the chair.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this house, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the senate, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the president of the United States to this house.

The resolution having been read, Mr. Adams rose, and addressed the speaker. By the general sense of the house, (said he), it is with perfect propriety that the delegation from the commonwealth of Virginia have taken the lead in the melancholy duty of proposing the measures suitable to be adopted as testimonials of the veneration due from the legislature of the union to the memory of the departed patriot and sage, the native of their soil, and the citizen of their community.

It is not without some hesitation, and some diffidence, that I have risen to offer in my own behalf, and in that of my colleagues upon this floor, and of our common constituents, to join our voice, at once of mourning and of exultation, at the event announced to both houses of congress by the message from the president of the United States—of mourning at the bereavement which has befallen our common country by the decease of one of her most illustrious sons—of exultation at the spectacle afforded to the observation of the civilized world, and for the emulation of aftertimes, by the close of a life of usefulness and of glory, after forty years of service in trusts of the highest dignity and splendor that a confiding country could bestow, succeeded by twenty years of retirement and private life, not inferior, in the estimation of the virtuous and the wise, to the honors of the highest station that ambition can ever attain.

Of the public life of James Madison what could I say that is not deeply impressed upon the memory, and upon the heart of every one within the sound of my voice? Of his private life, what but must meet an echoing shout of applause from every voice within this hall? Is it not in a pre-eminent degree by emanation from his mind that we are assembled here as the representatives of the people and the states of this union? Is it not transcendently by his exertions that we all address each other here by the endearing appellation of countrymen and fellow citizens? Of that band of benefactors of the human race, the founders of the constitution of the United States, James Madison is the last who has gone to his reward. Their glorious work has survived them all. They have transmitted the precious bond of union to us now entirely a succeeding generation to them. May it never cease to be a voice of admonition to us of our duty to transmit the inheritance unimpaired to our children of the rising age.

Of the personal relations with this great man, which gave rise to the long career of public service in which twenty years of my own life has been engaged, it becomes me not to speak. The fullness of the heart must be silent, even to the suppression of the overflows of gratitude and affection.

A message was received from the senate announcing the adoption of the following resolution by that body.

In senate of the United States, June 30.
Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the senate, to join such a committee as may be appointed on the part of the house, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the president of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. Rives, Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Grun- dy, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Leigh and Mr. Tallmadge, be the committee.

Attest: WALTER LOWRIE, secretary.

The house concurred in the resolution, and according to a previous order, the committee was ordered to consist of one from each state in the union. [For the committee see page 306.]

The house then resumed, in committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair), the consideration of the bill making further appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties, the motion of Mr. Adams to strike out so much of the bill as provides for the execution of the Cherokee treaty still pending.

Mr. Calhoun, of Kentucky, took the floor, and addressed the committee at considerable length, and with great earnestness, in support of the motion to strike out. Mr. Wise followed, and spoke for three hours in the strongest opposition to the appropriation moved to be stricken out. Mr. Peyton spoke briefly in support of the measures. The motion of Mr. Adams was then rejected, and Mr. Wise moved to amend the bill so as to make the appropriations, but to omit the words recognizing the treaty, which was also rejected. On motion of Mr. Cambre- leng, the committee rose, and reported the bill and amendments.

The house concurred in the amendments; and the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, Mr. Adams asked the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 43. So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was then read a third time. The question being on its passage, Mr. Vinton asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered and are as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Bell, Bockee, Bouldin, Boyd, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, Fry, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gillett, Grantland, Griffin, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hardin, Harper, A. G. Harrison, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Hopkins, Hubley, Huntsman, Ingham, J. Jackson, Jarvis, R. M. Johnson, C. Johnson, Henry Johnson, J. W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Lawler, G. Lee, T. Lee, L. Lea, Leonard, Lewis, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Job Mann, Martin, J. Y. Mason, W. Mason, Moses Mason, Marray, May, McKay, McKim, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Owens, Page, Parker, Parks, Patterson, Patton, F. Pierce, D. J. Pearce, James A. Pearce, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phelps, Puckney, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Roane, Rogers, Schenck, Wm. B. Shepard, Shields, Sickles, Smith, Storrs, Sutherland, Taylor, Thomas, J. Thom- son, Toucey, Towns, Turritt, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Washington, Webster, White, T. T. Whittlesey, S. Williams —137.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Ash- ley, Bailey, Beale, Beaumont, Bond, Briggs, John Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, G. Chambers, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Deberry, Denny, Evans, Everett, Graves, Grennell, Hard, Harlan, Hazeltine, Henderson, Heister, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, Jenifer, Lawrence, Lay, Lincoln, Love, Sampson Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Morris, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Robertson, Russell, Slade, Taliaferro, Vinton, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Wise —54.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The house, on motion of Mr. Cambre- leng, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union generally (Mr. Mason, of Virginia, in the chair).

The committee took up the bill making an additional appropriation of $2,400,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities. After some debate, the bill was laid aside to be reported, and the "bill making appropriations for the military academy of the United States for the year 1836" was taken up. After some remarks from Messrs. Pierce, of N. H. Ward, Lewis, Cambre- leng, Briggs, Boon, White and Hawes, Mr. Hawes gave way for a motion that the committee rise. A quorum not voting, the committee rose and reported the fact to the house. The speaker having caused the house to be counted, reported that a quorum was present. Mr. Ingersoll offered a resolution for the appointment of a select committee to investigate the concerns of the West Point military academy. Lost. The house went again into committee, and Mr. Hawes moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill making appropriations for the West Point academy, and spoke at length in support of the motion; which was rejected. The committee, at 12 o'clock, rose, and reported both of the above bills without amendment, and they were severally ordered to be engrossed, and were then read a third time and passed.

The house went into committee of the whole on the bill to provide for the erection of a fire-proof building for the accommodation of the departments of the treasury and of state. After some debate, in which Messrs. Taliaferro and Jarvis took part, the committee rose and reported that a quorum was not present.

Mr. Patton, from the select joint committee to whom was referred the message of the president, announcing the death of James Madison, made the following report:

The president of the United States having communicated to the two houses of congress the melancholy intelligence of the death of their illustrious and beloved fellow citizen, James Madison, of Virginia, late president of the United States, and the two houses sharing in the general grief which this distressing event must produce,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the U. States of America in congress assembled, That the chairs of the president of the senate and of the speaker of the house of representatives be shrouded in black during the present session, and that the president of the senate, the speaker of the house of representatives, and the members and officers of both houses wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the people of the United States to wear crape on the left arm as mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to Mrs. Madison, and to assure her of the profound respect of the two houses of congress for her person and character, and their sincere condolence on the late afflictive dispensation of Providence.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

The house then adjourned.

Friday, July 1. Mr. Bell, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on Indian affairs have power to sit in the recess of congress for the purpose of completing the investigation directed by the resolution of this house of the 15th of January last, and that any two or more of their number, under the direction of the committee, be authorised to take testimony in relation to the same.

Mr. Mann, of New York, asked the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered. He next moved to lay the resolution on the table. Mr. E. Whittlesey asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were yeas 69, nays 84. Mr. J. Y. Mason moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till to-morrow. Mr. Hawes moved the previous question; which was seconded. The main question was ordered to be put. The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and there appeared yeas 87, nays 87. The speaker voted in the negative. So the resolution was lost.

A number of bills were reported, read twice and committed, and will be further noticed when finally acted on.

Mr. Lewis said he held in his hand a most extraordinary and interesting document in relation to events connected with the Creek war. He sent it to the chair to be read, and stated that he should offer a resolution on the subject which, he hoped, would lead to no debate.

[The memorial which was read is from the citizens of Georgia and eastern Alabama, and represents that the Indian hostilities in which the people of that country are involved were caused by individuals jointly associated under the name of land companies, whose proceedings and contracts were of the most nefarious character. The memorialists ask congress to institute an investigation into the circumstances which, as they represent, will not fail to exhibit a state of facts of the most revolting character. They intimate that the press of that country is entirely under the control of these heartless agitators, and that, through bribery and corruption, all the channels of information to the public and to the government on this subject are closed.]

Mr. Lewis then offered a resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of certain citizens of Alabama and Georgia, respecting alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the causes of their present hostilities, be referred to the president of the U. States; and that he be requested to cause such measures to be taken for investigating these transactions, and for the prosecution of the persons engaged in them, who may have been guilty of any breaches of the laws as may appear to be proper, and within the power of the executive.

Mr. L. expressed the hope that the matter would be thoroughly investigated, and that the individuals who had been guilty of exciting the hostility of the Creeks might be brought to condign punishment.

This resolution gave rise to a very animated debate in which a large number of members participated—but we must defer the particulars until next week. At half past 2 o'clock, Mr. Adams having concluded his remarks, the house took a recess.

Evening session. Several bills received from the senate were read a first and second time, and referred.

The bill from the senate to confirm the titles to public lands in certain cases, was read three times, and passed.

Several private bills returned from the senate with amendments, were taken up, and the house concurred therein.

The bill making appropriations for certain fortifications, returned from the senate with amendments, was taken up. The amendments were to strike from the bill the clause authorising the purchase of sites, the construction of arsenals and depots for arms, in Arkansas, Missouri and Tennessee, provided the same should not cost over $14,000 each, and to add a section providing that the appropriations should be drawn from the treasury only as they were wanted for actual disbursement. After some remarks from Messrs. Cambreleng, Hall, of Vermont, Dunlap, Ashley and R. M. Johnson, the question was taken upon concurring in the first amendment, and decided in the negative.

The second amendment was then concurred in by the house.

On motion of Mr. Patton, the resolution from the senate, proposing to suspend that rule of the house which provides that no bill originating in either house of congress shall be sent to the other house during the last three days of the session, so far as regarded a bill from the senate in favor of Dolly P. Madison, was taken up, and adopted unanimously. On motion of Mr. Patton, by general consent, the bill to extend the privilege of franking letters and packages to Dolly P. Madison, relict of James Madison, was taken up, read three times, and passed.

Mr. R. M. Johnson, from the committee on military affairs, reported the bill from the senate, without amendment, to establish a foundry, and construct arsenals in the south western states, and to provide depots of arms in states where none have been established; which was read a first and second time, and referred.

The house then proceeded to the unfinished business of the morning session, being the resolution of Mr. Lewis, as modified, proposing an inquiry into alleged frauds in the purchase of lands from the Creek Indians, according to the suggestion of Mr. Wise, with the amendments and substitutes thereto, proposed by Messrs. Garland, of Ia. and Ripley.

The discussion was renewed, when, after a variety of motions, the resolution was adopted in the following form—yeas 91, nays not counted.

Resolved, That the memorial of certain citizens of Alabama and Georgia, respecting alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the causes of their present hostilities, be referred to the president of the U. States, and that he be requested to cause such measures to be taken for investigating these transactions, and for the prosecution of the persons engaged in them who may have been guilty of any breaches of the laws, as may appear to be proper, and within the power of the executive.

The bill from the senate, supplementary to the act regulating the public deposits, was read twice, and referred.

The bill to provide for the compensation of officers of revenue cutters came back from the senate, with amendments reducing the salaries proposed to be allowed to those officers; which were concurred in by the house.

Mr. Jarvis, from the committee on naval affairs, reported the bill from the senate to regulate the pay of the officers of the marine corps of the United States.

Mr. Whittlesey, at half past nine P. M. called for the orders of the day; and, after some conversation on the priority of business, the house went into committee of the whole, for the consideration of certain private bills from the senate. The house sat till one o'clock, passing upon a multitude of bills, and then adjourned.

Saturday, July 2. Several senate bills for the relief of private individuals were reported from the standing committees, and severally committed to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Bell, from the committee on Indian affairs, to which was referred an inquiry concerning fraudulent contracts for Indian reservations, made a report in part, which he submitted to the disposition of the house.

On motion of Mr. Hawes, the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hunt, from the select committee appointed to inquire whether any and what members of congress, heads of departments, and other officers of the government, had obtained accommodations and facilities from any bank or banks in obtaining the use of public money for the purposes of speculation in the public lands, submitted a report, concluding with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed by this house on the 20th June, 1836, be increased to nine, and that the said committee have power to sit during the recess of this house.

Resolved, That the said committee embrace, in their inquiries, any connexion between deposit banks or others and the land offices, for the purposes of speculation.

Resolved, That the said committee inquire how far, and to whom, for speculation in public lands, the deposit banks have issued certificates of deposit without an actual deposit in cash, and to what extent they have been received in payment for purchases of public lands at the several land offices.

Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to what extent, combinations in the purchase of the public lands have been formed, or are forming, sufficiently strong, from interested motives, to control, to any extent, the legislative action of congress.

Mr. Hunt addressed the house at some length, in explanation of the course taken and recommended by the committee; and stated that the report and resolutions had the unanimous assent of the committee.

Mr. Lane moved that the report and resolutions be laid on the table and printed, remarking at the same time, in justice to himself, that he had no interest in making the motion, having had no connexion with any banks, having received no accommodation or facilities from them, and having had nothing to do with land speculations.

Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island, (a member of the committee), begged leave to ask the gentleman whether he could say the same of his son; and whether his son had not made forty or fifty thousand dollars through bank facilities? Mr. P. was called to order. Mr. Adams called for a division of the question, so as to be first taken on laying on the table. Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and being taken were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Boyd, Buchanan, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Geo. Chambers, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dunlap, Effner, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, Fry, William K. Fuller, Gillett, Grantland, Albert G. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton, Allan, Bailey, Beamont, Bell, Bond, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, Carter, Childs, John F. H. Claiborne, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Darlington, Evans, Everett, Forester, James Garland, Granger, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hazeltine, Hoar, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Ingham, James H. So the report and resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and they were then ordered to be printed.

The house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union generally, (Mr. J. Y. Mason in the chair), and took up for consideration the bill for the reorganization of the general land office.

The bill was read, and the question being on the amendments recommended by the committee on the public lands. After a long discussion, the amendments were agreed to and the bill then laid aside to be reported.

The committee took up the bill supplementary to the act making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1836; and, after some consideration, it was laid aside to be reported.

At half past two o'clock the committee rose, and the house took the usual recess.

Evening session. The bill to carry into effect certain Indian treaties, returned from the senate with amendments, was taken up, and the amendments were concurred in.

The house also concurred in the amendments of the senate to the bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for the improvement of certain harbors, and the removal of obstructions at the mouths of certain rivers.

The house then resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union generally, and took up for consideration the bill supplementary to the bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1836.

[This bill provides for the payment of members of both houses, and for the compensation of the officers of government not otherwise provided for.]

A number of amendments were offered to this bill, some of which were adopted. Mr. Parks moved to amend it by inserting a provision for the extension of the grounds of the capitol square to 1st street, including what is called the botanic garden, between Pennsylvania and Maryland avenues. The motion was then advocated by Messrs. Parks and Ward, and agreed to. Mr. Graves moved to amend the bill by adding an appropriation for the purchase of the individual stock in the Louisville and Portland canal company, which, after considerable discussion, was rejected, and the bill was laid aside to be reported.

The "bill to promote the progress of the useful arts, and to repeal all acts, or parts of acts, heretofore made for that purpose," was taken up; and, after some discussion upon the many propositions to amend the bill, by providing for the erection of buildings for the accommodation of the treasury and state departments, and other measures, a vote being taken, it was found that a quorum was not present. The committee rose, and reported this fact to the house, and a call was ordered and proceeded in for some time.

The house went again into committee, after having obtained a quorum, and the discussion of the above bill was renewed. Upon taking a vote there appeared to be no quorum, and the committee rose, and a call of the house was again ordered and proceeded in. When the house went again into committee, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the committee rose, and reported the bill for the reorganization of the land office, and the supplementary bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1836, with the amendments, and the amendments were agreed to, and the bills severally ordered to a third reading, read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house went again into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and resumed the consideration of the bill to promote the progress of the useful arts, &c. and, after the adoption of some amendments, the bill was laid aside to be reported. Many propositions were made and rejected for taking up different bills. On motion of Mr. R. M. Johnson, the committee took up the bill to appoint three additional paymasters to the army; and after some consideration, it was laid aside to be reported; also, the bill appointing additional surgeons and assistant surgeons to the army.

On motion of Mr. Thomas, the committee took up the bill to extend the circuit court system of the United States; and after a very earnest debate of long continuance, the bill was passed over for want of time further to discuss it. The bill to suspend the discriminating duties on goods imported in Portuguese vessels; and to reduce the duties on wines, was considered and laid aside to be reported. The committee rose, and reported the above bills, and they were severally ordered to a third reading, read a third time and passed. The house went again into committee upon a variety of senate bills, several of which were considered, reported and finally passed. The house continued to sit until five o'clock, acting upon some bills, which will be found enumerated in the list of laws. Much more business would probably have been transacted, but for an unpleasant occurrence, which involved a question of a violation of order by a member of the house, and which, after debate, ended in a unanimous vote of censure of that member.

After passing which, the house adjourned, to meet again at 8 o'clock on Monday.

Monday, July 4. A resolution to suspend the operation of certain joint rules which prohibit the sending of bills to the president after a certain day was adopted.

Mr. Mason, of Va. by consent, made a report from the committee on foreign affairs, on the subject of the recognition of the independence of Texas.

The report was read, and the concluding resolutions are as follows:

1. Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in operation a civil government, capable of performing the duties, and fulfilling the obligations, of an independent power.

2. Resolved, That the house of representatives perceive with satisfaction that the president of the United States has adopted measures to ascertain the political, military and civil condition of Texas.

Mr. Adams moved that the report and resolutions be laid on the table.

Mr. Pinckney asked the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Bailey, Barton, Beale, Beaumont, Bond, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Coles, Crane, Evans, Everett, Grennell, Hiland Hall, Hazeltine, Heister, Hoar, Hunt, Jarvis, H. Johnson, Lawrence, Lay, Lincoln, Love, McKennan, Morris, Parker, Dutee J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Schenck, Slade, Smith, Sprague, Turritt, Vinton—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Ash, Bell, Bockee, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, J. F. H. Williams—108.

Mr. Peyton, remarked that he was as desirous as any member of the house could be, to discuss the subject of these resolutions; but, as neither the time nor the patience of the house would allow of a debate, he, for the first time in his life, moved the previous question.

The motion was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. Adams asked a division of the question, so as to take it separately on each resolution.

The question was, accordingly, taken on the adoption of the first resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Boulding, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Bailey, Beale, Clark, Crane, Grennell, H. Hall, Hazeltine, Jarvis, Lawrence, Lincoln, Love, D. J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Vinton—20.

The question being on the second resolution, Mr. Adams said he wished to ask the chairman of the committee on foreign relations what evidence he had of the fact stated in the resolution.

Mr. Hardin. I can inform the gentleman that the president himself stated it to me, in conversation, several days ago.

The question being taken, the resolution was agreed to as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Beale, Bockee, Bond, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Bailey, Beaumont, Bondin, Darlington, Greenell, Hiland Hall, Hazeltine, Heister, Lawrence, Lincoln, Love, Milligan, D. J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade—20.

A message was received from the senate informing the house that the senate had appointed a committee on their part, to join such committee as might be appointed by the house, to wait on the president and inform him that the two houses, having finished the legislative business before them, were ready to terminate the present session by an adjournment.

A committee was thereupon appointed on the part of the house—and after some time having elapsed,

Mr. R. M. Johnson, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the president, &c. reported that they had discharged that duty, and that the president had no farther communication to make to the house.

When the house adjourned sine die.

THE CREEK WAR.

The public feeling a lively interest in the military operations now progressing in the Creek nation, we publish the following general order, issued from the head quarters of major general Scott, which leaves no doubt, we apprehend, that matters have taken a decided course in that quarter before this date.

[Globe.

ORDER, NO. 11.

Head quarters, army of the south, Columbus, Georgia, June 20, 1836.

Major general Sanford will, as fast as he can, arm and equip the troops of his division, put them in march by detachments on this side of the Chatahochee for Roanoke, and a point below, which will be given in time. All the regular troops which have already arrived, and which are daily expected, including the United States marines, will take the same route without delay.

The quartermaster will furnish the necessary land transportation for those several detachments, including three days' subsistence, in wagons. Besides this provision, every man will commence the march with two days' rations in his haversack, and every mounted officer and mounted man will take corn in his wallet sufficient for his horse for two days.

Major general Sanford will as soon as practicable, designate two companies, in addition to the three now in Columbus, to be left for the defence of this city; and he will designate one other company, to proceed to Fort Mitchell, as a part of the garrison of that place. These companies will all be infantry, and not mounted men. They probably will not long be left stationary; but, if practicable, shall have an opportunity of participating in the events of the field. WINFIELD SCOTT.

ORDER, NO. 15.

Head quarters, army of the south, Columbus, Georgia, June 21, 1836.

Major general Scott has received with great satisfaction, a report of the zeal, gallantry and general good conduct of the Alabama troops, in their march through the enemy's country upon the waters of the Hatchachubbee, under the able command of major general Jessup.

Major general Jessup will march his forces, by the best practicable route, down the country, to a point a little below the enemy, where, in a very few days, he will come into line with the Georgia volunteers and a brigade of regular troops. This brigade is destined to constitute a part of his command.

On the union of the forces mentioned, the whole will move up the country in concert against the enemy, when it is confidently hoped that no feelings other than a generous rivalry will be entertained by the forces of the different states, or between those of a state and the troops of the United States. The whole will be engaged in a common cause, and against a common enemy, whom all must be equally desirous to punish and to crush, for the innumerable atrocities which that enemy has committed.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

- Company A, 4th artillery, at Fort Monroe.

Assistant surgeon Tripler, will accompany the troops to Florida.

II. The president directs that the several captains and subalterns, now absent from their companies, and not on duty with the army, nor employed in military service proper, be ordered to join their respective regiments without delay. Accordingly the following named officers are relieved from detached service, and will forthwith proceed to their proper stations for duty with the troops:

Special service.

Brevet major T. Legate, 2d artillery, (lead mines).
Lieut. A. D. Mackay, 1st artillery, (coast survey).
Lieut. R. H. K. Whitley, 2d artillery, (ordnance).

III. The several officers recently serving with the army in Florida, who have been permitted by the commanders in that quarter to withdraw temporarily from duty there with a view to recruit their health, will now repair to their stations, it is hoped with renewed ability to discharge the duties which may devolve upon them. Accordingly colonel Lindsay, of the 2d artillery, will take post at Fort Brooks, Tampa Bay; lieutenant Colonel Crane, of the same regiment, at Fort Marion, St. Augustine; and lieutenant Colonel Bankhead, of the 3d artillery, will take post on the St. Johns. If the field officers named be not able to perform active duty in the field, their experience as commandants of posts, and their valuable services as officers in charge of affairs, and the general interests of the service within the reach of their influence and authority, cannot now be dispensed with. Brevet major Mounfort, of the 2d, and captain Lendrum, of the 3d artillery, and all other officers who have recently left the Florida army, will now join their respective regiments.

IV. Major B. K. Pierce, recently promoted to the 1st artillery, will join his regiment in Florida without delay. Lieutenant Colonel Stanton, quartermaster at New York, will forthwith proceed, via Charleston, S. C. and Augusta, Geo. to the head quarters of the general commanding army, operating against the Creek Indians, and there take charge of the quartermaster's department; and major Aeneas Mackay, assistant quartermaster, at Philadelphia, will repair without delay to New York, and report for orders, to lieutenant Colonel Stanton.

V. "A due regard to the public interest, and the good of the service, no longer justify the practice of granting long leaves of absence on the acceptance of the resignations of officers of the army. Indulgences ought not to be expected, nor can they be accorded to an officer, when the public interest may be concerned, and his presence, or the performance of duty be necessary."

The president accordingly has been pleased to direct, that, 1. "In time of active service, and the employment of the army in the field, as is now the case in Florida and elsewhere, if the resignation of any officer be accepted, it shall take effect within thirty days from the date of the order of acceptance, and the vacancy be immediately filled by the next officer entitled to promotion, who will forthwith proceed to the station of the officer resigned, and there relieve him in his duties.

2. "All officers now absent on leave, with a view of quitting the army, and whose resignations have been so far accepted as to have been permitted to take effect at some prospective date, are hereby required, at the expiration of three months from the date of the order of acceptance, either to resume their duties as officers of the army, or then vacate their commission. If any officer choose the former, and join his regiment or corps, his resignation may be considered as cancelled. The officers so absent will make their election, and report to the adjutant general accordingly."

VI. In conformity with the 2d paragraph of the foregoing regulations, leaves of absence, heretofore granted with a view of retiring from service, for any period exceeding three months, are hereby countermanded; and any officer so absent will immediately report for duty or consider his resignation as taking effect from this date. The same rule will apply to other officers, now absent under like circumstances of prospective resignation at the expiration of three months, computing the time from the date of the official notification of acceptance.

VII. The practice of commanding officers assuming authority to grant leaves of absence to officers on tendering their resignations, is disapproved, it being contrary to the rules of service. Letters of resignation, hereafter, will be forwarded to the adjutant general, for decision, at the war department.

By order of major general Macomb:

R. JONES, adjutant general.

RELIEF OF THE WYTHLACOOCHIEE.

OFFICIAL ACCOUNT.

Head quarters of the corps of relief of the Wythlacoochee block-house, on board steamboat Minerva,

St. Marks, 30th May, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the garrison at Camp McLemore have been rescued and brought off in safety.

The Minerva left this place at 2 o'clock, P. M. on the 23d inst. and about the same hour of the ensuing day, arrived off the mouth of the Wythlacoochee river. On the evening of the 24th, the entire corps, amounting in all, to ninety-eight men, commenced ascending the river in a large barge, which had, at immense labor, been prepared for the expedition, and before one o'clock in the morning, we had the pleasure of receiving on board every inmate of the miserable structure. The distance from the bar at the mouth of the river is upwards of fifteen miles. We returned to the steamboat, two miles, perhaps, without the bar by eight o'clock A. M. and were soon under weigh for the mouth of the Suwannee, whither the boat was now directed to repair with all possible despatch. We had the good fortune not to be fired upon. The enemy was not seen in any force, an individual only having been discovered, perhaps surprised, on the margin of the stream—several fires, apparently those of Indians' encampments, were seen on the south side of the river, near the block-house. The last attack received by the garrison, occurred on the preceding Friday, 18th inst.

On my arrival at Old Town (Suwannee) I was gratified to find that the stockade at that place, had not been abandoned. In order to strengthen the defences on that frontier, I left, subject to the orders of Major Cutlbert, a detachment of twenty-five men under the command of capt. Willis, of the Leon county quota. Fort Dabney was furnished with a large supply of ammunition, and all the subsistence which could be spared from the steamboat, was ordered also to be left at that place.

I have instructed capt. Walker to permit his company to return to their respective homes, and remain until Saturday next, when they will assemble in Monticello, to be mustered out of service. The accompanying communication, from the officers of the brave little band, has been handed me, by captain W. with a request that it may be published—may I desire that your excellency will so direct?

Next to the satisfaction I experience in reporting the relief of the block-house, is the pleasure I enjoy, in speaking of the conduct of the gallant little corps, who achieved the rescue. They merited and were rewarded with success—success which was not the less acceptable, because it was bloodless. I desire to present for the archives of the executive office, a list of the names of the "corps of relief," and of the garrison relieved.

If within the limits of my duty, I would recommend, for the more perfect protection of the remaining settlements on the frontier of this young community, the immediate employment of a steamboat of small burthen and light draft, the tow-boats in use in the tributary streams of our large rivers would answer very well—let her be well manned, one hundred men at the least, and two six pounders, cause her to be well fortified, and the machinery particularly well protected. Let her be directed first to co-operate with the steamer ordered by maj. gen. Scott to ply on the Suwannee river by passing through the numerous bayous, which make out through either bank of that river, near its mouth. When this duty shall have been performed, cause her to ascend in succession, all the streams susceptible of such navigation as far south as circumstances may justify. It is believed to be a peculiarity of the aboriginal nations of America, and particularly of the Seminole tribe, to select as the sites of their own towns and patches, places, contiguous to large bodies of water. The Micosukee town and Suwannee old town, the principal objects of the brilliant campaign of 1818, as far as the savages were concerned, were situated, each, on a large sheet of water, and the hostile portions of the present race of Florida Indians, will be found not to have sought the jungles and hammocks, which skirt the swamps of the peninsula for security alone, but also for the great facility which they thus enjoy, in fishing and bathing. Their new towns and new plantations will be discovered, to be on the banks of the rivers, so near that they must be subject to such operations as I suggest.

Should a boat, prepared, furnished and equipped as I recommend, succeed in passing the rapids on the Wythlacoochee, of which I have very little doubt it would be capable, we should soon have the pleasure of knowing that the now famous cove would be disenchanted of that impregnable, with which it has been invested, more by the prolific imaginings of that brain, which did not fancy an Indian squaw in every bush, during the marchings which occurred in the last grand campaign: than by any actual obstacle to a thorough scouring of that supposed retreat of the enemy.

To the south of the Wythlacoochee, and not more than 30 miles from the mouth of that stream, are two other large rivers—one of them the We-wac-ki-a-backa or Crystal river, the largest perhaps on the gulf, is within 12 miles of Amasura island, the other, We-ke-wa, lies further to the south. Both are navigable, as I am informed and believe, quite up to their source, being like the Wacissa river from their very heads. To the north of the Wythlacoochee and not far from the Suwannee, lies the Wacassassa, which is likewise susceptible of navigation. The enemy will be found on these rivers, I have almost every reason to believe, not in parties "dispersed" by the late operations, but voluntarily formed for the greater facility of engaging in their marauding expeditions, hunting, planting, &c. In any event, by means of these streams, not only any quantity of subsistence, but any number of men also may be conveyed into the heart of the enemy's country. The future operations of this war, to be successful, must, I respectfully submit, be conducted not with the very laudable view of pursuing such small parties of the enemy, as annoyed the army of Florida in its late grand movements, and ascertaining their sex, but their towns must be burnt down, their provisions destroyed, their growing crops cut down, and lastly, their women and children must be sought and captured. In attempting to accomplish the objects above indicated or perhaps either of them, the enemy might be brought to a general engagement, to render the result of which perfectly satisfactory to the supposed present views of the diplomatic agent of the war department, only 1,000 volunteers would be quite adequate—amply sufficient, especially if those volunteers happened to be from that community, to be a commanding general in which is deemed so great a misfortune. I do not hesitate, sir, to declare as my firm conviction, that one thousand men, such as the population of this territory can even now afford, under the command of an active and enterprising officer, will, if ordered to act in simultaneous and co-operative movement, with expeditions by water, such as recommended, bring this disgraceful war to a close in less than three months, and long before the "THREE THOUSAND GOOD TROOPS," so much desired, can be brought into the field. Should it be ascertained that that force cannot be raised from our oppressed and harassed country, an appeal to the gallant sons of the west, will bring us the means of preventing, in an effectual manner, those incursions, which seem sometimes almost to threaten the existence of the territory. The fancied unhealthiness of the climate can no longer be urged against the continuance of active operations against the enemy in summer. Should a campaign be resolved upon—a measure which I would most respectfully, but earnestly urge upon the consideration of your excellency—more can be accomplished at this season, June and July, with less expense of life and treasure, than at any other. It is notorious to all who have observed the operations of our climate, that May, June and July are the most healthy months of the spring, summer and fall. In corroboration of this remark, I have to communicate a fact, not less interesting and gratifying to the humane and benevolent, than it must be valuable in the future operations to the government—there was not a case of disease in the block-house, and but one of even slight indisposition, though the miserable edifice had no roof on it, and the men had subsisted, for upwards of twenty days, without meat, without bread and without salt; parched corn and a coarse hominy, made in a worn-out hand-mill, were their only food, the maize had been exposed to the weather for nearly the whole period of their detention. I have said more could be accomplished—the women and children of the enemy can now be found, wherever their plantations are, and further, their crops are now growing and may be destroyed. I gave no particular order in regard to the steamboat. Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEIGH READ, M. C.
corps of relief to the Wythlacoochee block-house.

30th May, 1836.

To colonel Read and the officers and privates under his command, for the relief of the forces on the Wythlacoochee.

Allow us, in behalf of ourselves and men, to return you our most sincere thanks for your noble gallantry, in relieving us from the very perilous situation in which we were placed a few days since, and where, perhaps, we should have been every man massacred. Gallant benefactors! worthy of your ancestors of '76.

It could not possibly have been for sport or recreation, that you attempted to remove us from the Wythlacoochee, because you well knew that we were completely surrounded by our barbarous enemy, but from a greatness of soul, known only to the good and virtuous. You attempted and succeeded in your perilous enterprise, of entering the Wythlacoochee and rescuing us from our impending fate; or with the determined resolution to perish in the attempt, although discouraged at home by some, who should have been among the first to come to our assistance.

Taken by major McLemore by orders received from general Scott, at head-quarters, to the Wythlacoochee with corn for the use of the army under his command, we were left there; and general Scott, regardless of his promise to relieve us, left the Indian nation, and abandoned us to our fate; where we should, most probably, have met a horrid death, had it not been for your timely assistance.

To his excellency governor Call, we are also under lasting obligations, for the very active part taken by him for us, and the deep interest expressed by him for our deliverance from the cruel deaths which awaited us, either from savage hands or starvation.

We are also most happy to say that your expedition was performed without the loss of a single man.

Gallant countrymen! words cannot express, nor pen write the deep sense of gratitude which we feel towards you; and we believe your joy was equal, if not even greater than ours, when you found that we were able to answer the welcome watchword of "ALL'S WELL!"

We know that your feelings, at that time, were unutterable, and known and felt by the brave and generous alone; but virtue is of itself a sufficient reward for all good actions. We are, gentlemen, yours with the greatest respect and esteem.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAIL ROAD.

RESIGNATION OF PHILIP E. THOMAS, ESQ.

Office of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road co. 30th June, 1836.

At a special meeting held this day, the following proceedings were had—JOSEPH W. PATTERSON, esq. was appointed president pro tem.—when the committee appointed on the 7th inst. to confer with Philip E. Thomas, esq. in regard to his resignation of the presidency of this company, tendered by him to the board on that date, reported verbally, that they had held several interviews with Mr. Thomas on the subject, and that it had continued, against their remonstrances, to be his earnest wish to withdraw from his actual situation—that the board were aware that such had been his desire for a long time past, and that he had only been prevented from taking this step sooner in condescension to the wishes of the board. The committee reluctantly, and with regret, were obliged to add, that in consideration of the impaired condition of Mr. Thomas' health, they believed it indispensable to its restoration, and to his comfort, that he should be relieved from the confinement and labor incident to the discharge of the duties of the office which has been so ably filled by him.

The letter of resignation which is as follows, was then read and considered.

Office of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road co. 7th June, 1836.

To the directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, GENTLEMEN: It is known to you that the duties which have devolved upon me as president of this company, have been extremely arduous, and that for several years past, they have necessarily so wholly occupied my time, that I have scarcely had any opportunity to devote the least attention to my private affairs. The circumstances of the company have however, until very recently been such, in the opinion of my friends, as to render my withdrawal from the post in which your confidence and kindness had placed me, incompatible with the interests of the company; and this consideration alone has prevented me from carrying into effect my earnest wish to retire.

The extension of the main line of the road being effected as far as Harper's Ferry on the Potomac river, at which point it is now connected with the Winchester and Potomac railway; and the lateral road to Washington being also opened, and in successful operation, I feel myself at liberty to withdraw from the situation of president of the company.

On retiring from a position in which I have received so many proofs of your personal friendship, I cannot forbear the expression of my most grateful acknowledgments. When I entered upon the duties of this office, little was known in our country, either as regarded the construction of railways or the application of moving power upon them, and indeed the experience of Europe at that time, offered but feint and very uncertain lights in relation to this system. We had, therefore, of necessity, every thing to learn; and without your constant and cordial co-operation, I am sensible I could not have sustained myself—under the many complicated difficulties which often pressed upon me—an extensive fund of valuable information has now been obtained, a universal confidence is felt in the undertaking, and a firm determination is manifested to carry it forward to its final completion as originally intended. Under these circumstances I feel assured, that with the excellent organization you have adopted in relation to the several departments into which the concerns of the company are divided, its further management will be rendered much less difficult, and that the early completion of the road may be considered as certain. An opportunity will then be afforded of fully testing the usefulness of this undertaking, and whilst important benefits will be secured to our country, and especially to the city of Baltimore, by the facilities, opened through the channel of communication with the west, the stockholders, under a prudent management of their affairs, will receive a fair remuneration for their capital invested. With the assurance of my highest regard and esteem, I am, very respectfully your friend,

P. E. THOMAS.

When on motion of Mr. Hawkins, it was Resolved, That this board accepts the resignation of P. E. Thomas, of the presidency of this company, with deep and profound regret.

On motion of Mr. Brown, seconded by Mr. McKim, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the most unforgotten and cordial thanks of this board are due to Mr. Thomas for the long, faithful and valuable services rendered by him to this company—services which none but those who have been associated with him in the prosecution of this most arduous work are capable of appreciating, and rendered at an expense of private interests which it is difficult to calculate, but which must be well understood by this community, and of health which has been sacrificed by close and continuous application to the business of this company.

On the commencement of this work, of which he has been in fact, the father and projector, every thing connected with its construction was new, crude and doubtful, with little light to guide the way, and that derived from distant and uncertain sources—now, such has been the increase of information and experience acquired under his auspices and direction, as to ensure the completion and success of the undertaking, if prosecuted with the same zeal, assiduity and integrity, which has ever marked his course.

Resolved further, That this board in taking leave of Mr. Thomas, their president, cannot omit the opportunity of tendering to him their respectful acknowledgments of the uniform, correct, urbane and friendly conduct which has characterised his department during the time of their official intercourse, and of expressing to him their best wishes for the speedy restoration of his health, and for his future prosperity.

Resolved, That the president pro tem. convey to Mr. Thomas a copy of these proceedings under his signature.

THE FORTIFICATION BILL.

When the fortification appropriation bill was up in the senate on Tuesday, Mr. Clay made some remarks, of which a report is subjoined—an imperfect brief sketch having been all that time and room allowed us to give in our last: [Nat. Int.]

Mr. Clay thought there was no inconsistency between the two propositions to amend the bill as proposed by the senator from South Carolina, with the view of reducing the amount proposed for fortifications, and to amend it as proposed by the senator from Delaware, to restrain the issue of money from the public treasury, except as it should be called for in a course of regular disbursement. Both might be well adopted, and he hoped would be.

He had, however, risen more particularly for the purpose of calling the attention of the senate to the enormous and alarming amount of appropriations which had been actually made, or were in progress, during this session. He had procured from the secretary of the senate a statement of such as had been made by bills which had passed one or both houses up to the 27th of last month, when it amounted to about twenty-five millions. Since then, other bills had passed, which swelled it up to thirty-two or three millions; and other bills were now in progress, and would probably pass, carrying it up to forty millions, or beyond that sum. Forty millions of dollars in one year, when we have no debt, and no foreign war! Will not the country be justly alarmed, profoundly astonished, when it hears of these enormous appropriations? Is it possible to proceed with the government on such a scale of expenditure?

Why, sir, it is a greater amount than is appropriated to similar objects by the British parliament, since its reform, in one year. The whole revenue of Great Britain is about forty-two millions sterling, of which sum twenty-eight millions is applied to the public debt, six to the payment of pensions, annuities, &c. and only about eight millions to the current annual expenses of the whole of their vast establishments, military and naval, and the civil government at home and abroad. Now, forty millions of dollars exceed eight millions sterling. Who would have supposed that an administration which came in upon pledges and promises of retrenchment, reform and economy, should in the eighth year of its rule have swelled the expenditure of the government to an amount exceeding that of Great Britain? And this surprise must be increased when we reflect that the British parliament stands to the people of Great Britain in the double relation of the federal and state governments to the people of the United States.

When Mr. Adams left the administration, the current annual expenses of the government, exclusive of the public debt, amounted to about twelve millions. Only a few years ago a secretary of the treasury under the present administration (Mr. McLean) estimated the ordinary expenses of the government at fifteen millions annually. Even during the present session, the able senator from New York, when the land bill was under discussion, placed them, for a series of succeeding years, at eighteen millions. And now we propose, in this year, to more than treble the amount of expenditure during the extravagant administration, as it was charged, of Mr. Adams!

Mr. Clay hoped the senate would pause. He called upon the friends of the administration, in no taunting or reproachful spirit, to redeem the pledges and promises with which they came into power. If the love of country; if a faithful discharge of duty to the people; if a just economy, would not animate them, and stay these extravagant appropriations, he hoped the devotion to party would. Could they expect to continue in power (and he candidly confessed that he was not particularly anxious that they should) with such unexampled appropriations? How can they meet their constituents with these bills staring them in the face?

And for what purpose shall they be made? Does any man believe, will any senator rise in his place and say, that these immense appropriations can be prudently, safely and wisely disbursed? He had, indeed, heard that it was not expected they would be. He had heard, what was too wicked, prodigate and monstrous for him to believe, that it was intended to withdraw the appropriations from the public treasury, place them to the credit of disbursing officers, in the custody of local banks, and thus elude the operation of the deposite bill, which has recently passed. That bill had been demanded by the people of this country. It had passed, from a profound sense of duty, in consequence of that demand, by unprecedented majorities in both houses. And he would not allow himself for a moment to believe that a sinister design existed any where to elude the operation of that great and salutary measure. What, sir! is the money of the people of this country to be held in the deposite banks, one of which, according to a statement going the rounds of the papers, has made 14½ per cent. dividend for six months?

The annual average appropriations for fortifications heretofore have been about seven hundred and fifty or eight hundred thousand dollars; and by the bill now before us, and that for a similar object which we have sent to the house, if both pass, we shall have appropriated for fortifications for one year four millions and a half. Is it possible in one year judiciously to expend this enormous sum? When we look at the price of labor, the demands upon it for an increase of the army, for volunteers, and for the general avocations of society, does any body believe that this vast sum can be judiciously laid out? It has been said that, having omitted to make any appropriation last year, we ought this year to appropriate double the ordinary sum. But, if you cannot safely expend it, why should that be done? He was willing to make large and liberal appropriations for the navy and for fortifications; we ought, however, to look to all our great interests, and regulate the appropriations in reference to a survey of the whole country; and he earnestly entreated the senate to fulfil the hopes and expectations which had been recently inspired in the people of this country, by checking and putting itself decidedly against this rash, wild and ruinous extravagance. He would vote for the commitment, to reduce the appropriations one-half; after which there would remain an amount equal to double the ordinary annual appropriations, without including the sum in the bill now before the house.

VOTES IN THE SENATE.

The injunction of secrecy having been removed by the senate from the proceedings and votes upon the treaty with the Cherokee Indians, we extract therefrom the following concluding proceedings thereon: [Nat. Int.]

Wednesday, May 18, 1836. The senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution for the ratification of the Cherokee treaty.

A motion was made by Mr. Clay to strike out all the resolution after the word "resolved," and to insert:

"That the instrument of writing purporting to be a treaty concluded at New Echota, on the 29th day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the chiefs, headmen and people of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, and the supplementary articles thereto annexed, were not made and concluded by authority on the part of the Cherokee tribe competent to bind it; and, therefore, without reference to the terms and conditions of the said agreement and supplementary articles, the senate cannot consent to, and advise the ratification thereof as a valid treaty, binding upon the Cherokee tribe or nation."

"Resolved, That the senate do advise the president to open a new negotiation with the Cherokees on the east side of the Mississippi, or with persons invested by them with full powers to treat in their behalf, upon the basis of a cession of the whole country of the Cherokees on the east side of the Mississippi, or any part thereof that may be deemed most expedient and practicable."

And the question being stated by the chair, "Shall the words proposed be stricken out stand part of the resolution?"

ABOLITION.

Legislature of Pennsylvania—the slave question.

The following is the report of the committee on the judiciary system on the subject of abolition societies and incendiary publications—THADDEUS STEVENS, chairman; read in the house, May 30th, 1836.

REPORT.

The committee on the judiciary system, to whom was referred the message of the governor, transmitting resolutions of the legislatures of the states of Virginia, Kentucky and Mississippi, on the subject of abolition societies and "incendiary" publications, made report—

That the resolutions of the legislature of Virginia (with which those of the other states named accord), assert:

1st. "That this commonwealth (Virginia) only has the right to control or interfere with the subject of domestic slavery within its limits; and that this right will be maintained at all hazards."

The committee readily grant that none of the other states or congress, has any right by legislation, to interfere with or control domestic slavery within the slaveholding states. That is prohibited by the constitution of the United States. Nor are they aware that any of the states, or citizens thereof, or congress, claim such right. But the committee cannot concede that individual freemen are, or can be prohibited from dissen-sing the question of slavery, in all its bearings upon the morality, religion and happiness of a people, and the expediency and duty of abolishing it by constitutional means.

2d resolution. "That the state of Virginia has a right to claim prompt and efficient legislation by her co-states to restrain, as far as may be, and to punish those of her citizens who, in defiance of their social duty and that of the constitution, assail her safety and tranquility, by forming associations for the abolition of slavery, printing, publishing and circulating seditious or incendiary publications, designed, calculated, or having a tendency to operate on her population, and that this right, founded as it is on international law, is peculiarly fortified by a just consideration of the intimate and sacred relations which exist between the states of the union."

The 5th resolution asserts—"That congress has no power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, or the territories of the United States."

The 6th declares—"That this general assembly would regard any act of congress having for its object the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia or the territories of the U.
States, as affording just cause of alarm to the slaveholding states, and bringing the union into imminent peril."

The committee are compelled, by a sense of duty which they owe to Pennsylvania as a sovereign and independent state, and to themselves as freemen, to deny the right of Virginia, or any other state, to claim from us any legislation of the character referred to in these resolutions. Every citizen of the non-slaveholding states has a right freely to think and publish his thoughts on any subject of national or state policy. Nor can he be compelled to confine his remarks to such subjects as affect only the state in which he resides.

Without regard to the place of his residence, he may attempt to show that the usury laws of New York or Pennsylvania, or the laws regulating negro slavery in Virginia or Mississippi, are immoral and unjust, and injurious to the prosperity and happiness of the respective states; his arguments may be weak, foolish and false, but it would be tyranny to prohibit their promulgation. Could any other state maintain the right to claim from us such legislation, we and our citizens would be reduced to a vassalage but little less degrading than that of the slaves whose condition we assert the right to discuss. Nor can we yield our assent to the opinion that congress does not possess the right to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia and the territories of the United States. No such prohibition, is to be found in the constitution of the United States. But the unrestricted right to legislate for them is expressly granted.

Possessing such right, it would seem to be a reproach upon our national legislature not to have exercised it heretofore.
Slavery not only exists with the District over which congress has exclusive jurisdiction, but it is understood to be an extensive market for the sale of slaves. To witness droves of human beings, bound together with iron fetters, and lashed forward to hopeless servitude, by freemen, descanting loudly and boastfully on the blessings of liberty, is a moral anomaly, which fails to shock only because of its familiarity. The committee forbear to notice those parts of the resolutions which seem to imply a menace, if the non-slaveholding states should not comply with the wishes of the slaveholding states on this subject. As it can hardly be believed that they were intended to bear such construction, the committee report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the slaveholding states alone have the right to regulate and control domestic slavery within their limits.

Resolved, That congress does possess the constitutional power, and it is expedient to abolish slavery and the slave trade within the District of Columbia.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

Report of the board of visitors invited by the secretary of war to attend to the general examination of the cadets of the United States military academy.

Hon. Lewis Cass, secretary of war:

Sir: The undersigned have, in compliance with your request, attended the annual examination of the cadets at this post, and herewith report the result of their investigation.

Having been instructed by their letter of appointment to "make a full and free investigation in regard to the course of instruction, both military and scientific, to the internal police, discipline and fiscal concerns of the institution," the board of visitors entered upon and have conducted their examinations with the most rigid scrutiny. Every facility for this purpose was afforded by the officers of the institution.

In order, most effectually, to discharge their duty, the board committed the different branches of their investigations to committees of their members, whose separate duty it became to examine into, 1st, the fiscal affairs; 2d, the internal police; 3d, the course of instruction; 4th, religious instruction; and 5th, the military education and discipline of the academy.

These several committees have submitted to the board the result of their respective investigations; and their reports, after having been sanctioned by the entire board, are herewith transmitted to the secretary of war, for his more particular information upon those several subjects.

1st. The fiscal affairs. The quartermaster's and paymaster's departments were carefully examined, and satisfactory evidence furnished that the sums appropriated had been properly disbursed with strict regard to the objects intended. The particular appropriations necessary for the year are set forth in the estimate marked A, annexed to the report of the committee, and are recommended by this board.

The board believed it to be their duty to examine also into the fiscal affairs of the cadets, and they are happy to express their full approval of the discipline and regulations upon this subject. Each cadet receives, in pay and rations, $28 per month, and no more. With this sum he is obliged to pay his board and to provide all the furniture to his room—all his books, his clothing and every necessary; the government providing nothing for him but instruction, arms and a room to lodge in.
By a very salutary regulation $2 a month are reserved out of each cadet's pay until he leaves the institution. Thus, if he is dismissed, he has the means of returning to his family; if he graduates, the means of providing himself a proper uniform.
The wisdom of this provision is apparent from the fact (which this board has satisfactorily ascertained) that the greater part of the cadets are of indigent parentage.* To preserve an entire equality among them in this respect, the regulation which forbids "any cadet to apply for or receive money or any other supply from his parents, or from any person whomsoever, without permission from the secretary of war," is strictly enforced.
Rigid economy therefore is required from the cadets to enable them with their pay to meet the necessary demands upon their funds. They are obliged to keep accurate accounts of their expenditures, and if any of their pay remains unexpended for necessaries, they are not permitted to receive it, unless for very special purposes.

They are thus with great care taught lessons of order and economy which become of the utmost value to them in after-life, and which have already so distinguished the graduates of the academy that the experiment of making them the disbursing agents of the government on its public works has been eminently successful. And it is, doubtless, from this cause that they present the excellent example of having disbursed millions of the public funds without a dollar's defalcation.

This is considered by the board of visitors as the legitimate result of the course of education at the academy. And it must be apparent to every one, that the strict morality, high sense of honor, and the lessons of order and economy, which they are taught, render them invaluable agents of the government, and will compensate the nation for the very moderate expenditure which is incurred in their education.

2d. The internal police. This comprehended, among other things, an inquiry into the provisions for the comfort and the regulations for the conduct of the cadets while in barracks, pursuing their studies.

This merits the entire approval of the board.

The fare of all the cadets is precisely alike. They eat at a common table. The furniture of their rooms and their conveniences are the same. In the barracks they sleep on the floor, and on the ground when in camp. They go through guard duty in succession; and, in fine, such are the regulations and discipline, that the combination of military duties, with their scientific studies, is well calculated, not only to make them industrious and laborious, but to inure them to the hardships of a soldier's life.

This branch of the inquiry involved an examination into the situation of the public buildings and their fitness for the purposes intended. The accommodation for the cadets, in respect to room, is by no means adequate to their comfort. In rooms of about twelve feet square, three and four, and sometimes a greater number of cadets, are compelled to reside. These rooms are badly constructed. In winter time, some of them are very cold, not having sufficient protection from the wind, and in summer some are uncomfortably warm, from an absence of ventilation. The buildings which the cadets occupy are, in fact, in no respect different from the ordinary barracks of the army, except that they are more uncomfortable and built of more substantial materials. The judicious expenditure of a small sum upon this subject would, in the opinion of the board, be very desirable.

The want of accommodations for the professors and their assistants is still more manifest. The crowded state of their laboratory and philosophical rooms adds much to the labor of the instructors, and consumes much of their time. Besides this, is the hazard to which much valuable property is necessarily exposed. The philosophical apparatus and the library, which are very valuable, are now in the same building with the chemical laboratory, and consequently very much exposed to danger from fires. Nothing but extraordinary care has preserved them until this time, and it certainly would not excite the wonder of the board, if they should learn, at an early day, that they were all consumed. The expenditure of $8,000 would, in the opinion of the board, erect a suitable fire-proof building, and thus guard against the unfortunate destruction of property which could not be replaced for less than $100,000.

3d. The course of instruction. By the regulations of the war department, for the government of the academy, two studies are enumerated, (among those which are to be taught to the cadets), which are entirely omitted, viz: mineralogy and geolo-

*Thus in one class (the only one we inquired of, and that selected accidentally), we found that out of 48 cadets, 26 were of parentage who were unable to give them a liberal education; and instances are within the knowledge of some of the members of this board, where individuals from the humblest walks of life have attained the highest honors of the institution.

gy; although among the required and necessary studies, no adequate provision has been made by law for the endowment of a professorship. All the power which the war department has over the matter, is to detail a lieutenant of the army for duty; but as this officer cannot receive any additional compensation for this duty, he has no inducement to qualify himself for teaching. This is the cause why that branch of education has been abandoned, and it cannot probably be resumed without a special provision by law. The importance of these studies in a military point of view is too evident to require from the board any other expression than that of their hope that a reform in this respect will be speedily accomplished.

This, however, is not the only provision which the board have deemed necessary in order to place the different branches of instruction on a proper footing. The very thorough course of instruction pursued at the academy necessarily requires a large number of instructors, seventeen of whom receive no other compensation for their services than the pay of a lieutenant in the line. That pay they would receive if with their regiments; and then they would not be subject to the arduous task now imposed upon them. Consequently, a situation at this academy is rather avoided by the officers of the army than sought after, and when once assumed, is abandoned as soon as circumstances will permit; and the board has ascertained that, during the three years ending on the 1st instant, twenty-six officers have abandoned their situations at the Point, and that one professor and four assistants will leave before the end of the approaching vacation: making a change of thirty-one instructors in little more than three years. This constant change is a serious evil, and the interests of the institution certainly require a remedy.

It cannot excite the surprise of the department that, under existing circumstances, these changes should frequently occur. Whatever may have been the education of an officer, it is no slight task to qualify himself to instruct, and properly to instruct; and it cannot be expected that any one would voluntarily assume their extra labors, when no compensation whatever is allowed for them.

Another difficulty is, that an officer, when he becomes duly qualified as an instructor, finds in civil life far greater inducements; and that class of individuals most useful to government, from their scientific attainments, have frequent offers of three or four times their present compensation to assume the duties of some civil station. Nothing but the strong sense of obligation to the nation for their education, which pervades the graduates of this institution, has prevented a more ready acceptance of these offers; and this board does not hesitate to declare its firm conviction, that if government would allow to these individuals only one-half the remuneration which they can readily obtain in civil life for the same services, the sense of obligation to which we have alluded would retain them in the service of the nation.

The present situation of the professorship of chemistry is a fair illustration of the evils of the present system. This professorship is not endowed, and this study can be taught only by detailing an officer of the army for this purpose. The present teacher receives as his entire compensation $767 per annum, not as much as he would receive if on staff duty at some other post; and although by long study and practice he may well qualify himself to teach, he is liable at any moment to be ordered to other posts; and although some of the assistant professors in other branches receive extra compensation, yet he is not allowed any, although at the head of a department, and performing duties as laborious and responsible as almost any other professor.

The board of visitors feel these evils so strongly, that they beg leave to suggest a representation of them to congress, in the confident belief that there will be no hesitation among the representatives of the nation in providing the necessary remedies.

Notwithstanding all these difficulties, the course of instruction is very perfect. The cadets are taught the rationale of their studies, to think for themselves, and to apply their scientific attainments to actual practice. The periodical examinations of the cadets not only test their proficiency in their studies, but guard against the bestowal of the care of government upon improper objects. Any one who is found unwilling to undergo the hardships of his academic life, to submit to the rigid discipline of the institution, or to manifest a suitable proficiency in his studies, is dismissed. This sifting operation, if we may so call it, is productive of admirable results. Those only who are found worthy are permitted to enter the service of the nation. The unworthy are discharged.* The cadets are, in fact, part of our army. They enlist for five years, and, like other branches of the service, are promoted only when their conduct justifies it.

It became a question with this board whether this term of enlistment was long enough, and whether the privilege of resigning at the end of one year after the close of their education had not been so far abused as to deprive the government of such benefits from the services of the graduates as would afford a just compensation for their education.

But an examination produced this result, that of the total number, 841, who had graduated, only 65 had resigned at the end of their term of enlistment.*

4th. Religious instruction. In this branch, the education is at present necessarily deficient. The same individual is now obliged to officiate as chaplain of the post and as instructor in rhetoric, moral philosophy and political science. He has only one assistant; and it is physically impossible for those two individuals adequately to discharge all these duties—some of them must be, and necessarily are neglected. The religious instruction of the cadets appears to the board to be a matter of too much importance to be neglected. The best remedy for this evil which suggests itself, would be the separation of the duties of the chaplain and professor. Next to this would be the appointment of a clerical gentleman, as an assistant in the duties both of chaplain and professor; and if neither of these is practicable, then, in the opinion of the board, an officer of the army ought to be detailed as second assistant to the professor. This improvement must commend itself to the favorable attention of the department, by every consideration affecting the permanent welfare of the cadets.

5th. Military education and discipline. Upon this subject, the board cannot do better than to refer to the full report made by the committee on that branch of our investigation, and to express their full concurrence in its views.

The board, however, feel themselves called upon to add their conviction of the importance of adhering strictly to the sound principles laid down by the president of the United States, in his letter of the 8th of December, 1835, in relation to cadet Hammond. The restoration of cadets to the academy after their dismissal for incompetency or misconduct, is not only subversive of the necessary discipline of the post, but must result in the application of the bounty of the government to unworthy objects. This board believe it to be within the proper range of their inquiries, to ascertain how far the regulations of, and mode of education at, West Point, conformed to the objects for which the academy was instituted. They supposed the institution was "designed not only as a school in which the youth of the United States are to be instructed in the art of war; but they are in all cases of exigence to serve as an actual defence to the community." This object seems to be kept constantly in view.

The school is strictly military in its character, instructing the young men in the art of war, and fitting them to defend their country.

It is believed to be true as a general rule, that some previous education is necessary to qualify a man to exercise the art of war. (To this, as to every other general rule, there are doubtless brilliant exceptions.) If in those rude days, when every battle was but a series of single combats, and when brute force and physical courage were the only qualifications of a soldier, long and arduous training was an indispensable prerequisite, how much more is it necessary now, when war has become a science, and when the mental more than the physical qualities of man determine the issue of the contest? When this science, unlike all others, shall change its nature, as to be inhibited by intuition, then, and not till then, can a country, extensive as ours is, and almost surrounded by savage and intractable enemies, and in its rapid prosperity coming in collision with the interests of powerful nations, dispense with at least such preparations for war as naturally will flow from the education of a portion of our youth for this special purpose.

This board is free to express its opinion, that this academy is admirably calculated and conducted for the attainment of this end. All its studies and practices are essentially military, involving at once a knowledge of the science, and an habitation to the hardships of the war, so that in case of actual conflict, we have the nucleus of an army; and a satisfactory guaranty against the misfortunes which visited our arms at the commencement of the last war with Great Britain; and in peace we have a well trained band of officers devoted to the service of the country, capable of defending our frontiers, and extending our fortifications—of carrying on our great system of internal improvement—of guarding us against the impositions of foreign empires: but, above all, of developing and calling into action the undiscovered resources of our new states.

These are advantages which we believe do necessarily flow from this institution. They can be attained only by arduous and indefatigable labor on the part of cadets and teachers.—This labor cannot be produced without adequate inducements.

*This examination further showed that of 220 cadets who had, from the first organization of the academy till 1835, either resigned, declined a commission in the army, or been dropped, 20 left the army one year after their graduation, 45 the second year, 28 the third year, 28 the fourth year, 13 the fifth year, 11 the sixth year, 8 the seventh year, 13 the eighth year, 7 the ninth year, 9 the eleventh year, 4 the twelfth year, 8 the thirteenth year, 4 the fourteenth year, 6 the fifteenth year, 5 the sixteenth year, 5 the seventeenth year, 1 in the eighteenth year, 1 in the nineteenth year, 1 in the twenty-first year and 1 in the twenty-third year. And of the residue of the number of graduates, 403 still remained in the service of the country, 15 had been killed in battle, and 106 had died in the service.

*The board examined the effect of this practice upon four classes—

One of which begun with 106 members, graduating	45
One of " " " " " "	43
One of " " " " " "	36
One of " " " " " "	56

So that of 444 who entered, only 180 graduated; and the board is informed that 160 of that number are now in the service of the nation.

To this end government must provide for the education. Unless it does, the poorer classes will be deprived of the advantages of such instructions, and the richer will discover no motive for undergoing the hardships necessary to its attainment.

These advantages are happily combined in this institution, and with the fostering care of the government, may easily be made to conduce to the permanent welfare of the whole nation.

In conclusion, the board of visitors earnestly recommend this institution to the care and attention of the government. Their examination affords them ample reason to know that the intention of the nation in regard to it is faithfully executed. "The instructors teach, in defiance of obstacles," and the graduates, after a most searching and rigid scrutiny, have evinced a knowledge of their profession, which cannot but be valuable to the country whenever its exigencies shall call it into practice.

Letter of the president of the United States in relation to cadet Hammond's restoration to the military academy.

Washington, December 8, 1835.

Cadet Hammond will be restored to the military academy after the 1st day of January next, if he shall then be found competent to enter the class he left.

In directing this restoration, however, I am influenced more by a regard to the remission of punishments, which has recently taken place at the military academy, and which may have induced cadet Hammond to think lightly of the offence he committed, than to any extenuating circumstances in his case. He has been guilty of a serious military offence. A proper subordination is essential in all the departments of the army. As it is the duty, so it should be the pride, of the young gentlemen at the military academy, to obey the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of that institution.

The very improper proceedings which took place, and which led to the conviction of cadet Hammond, are highly censurable. But if the cadets experience injuries from any person at the military academy, whether in authority or not, the regulations point out the mode in which redress shall be obtained. This must be pursued; and it will always be found effectual. But if they undertake to decide in their own cases, and tumultuously to seek their own remedy, it is obvious that the discipline of the academy, and the institution itself, would be destroyed. This will never be suffered. In this case, the proceedings were marked with another extraordinary feature. A claim seems to have been interposed, and in fact practically asserted, to carry from the commons certain victuals, which, if not consumed at the table, belonged to the contractor, and the resolutions passed in support of this claim, appear to be as grave as if some unalienated principal of human nature were to be wrested from these young gentlemen. All this is in very bad taste, and what is still worse, it is wrong in itself. I need not point out the error of the pretensions set up by these young gentlemen. I am sure they will perceive it at once in their moments of reflection.

I had hoped that a lenient system of administration would be found sufficient for the government of the military academy. But I have been disappointed, and it is now time to be more rigorous in enforcing its discipline. If the young gentlemen who are sent and educated there by their country, will not demean themselves as they are required to do by the regulations, they must suffer the prescribed punishments. Hereafter, therefore, the sentences of courts martial will, when legal and regular, be confirmed; and the punishment will be remitted only in cases recommended by them, or where the circumstances may appear so very favorable as to justify such a measure.

But the members of the institution must make no calculations on a favorable result. Let them look to their obligations and fulfil them faithfully. Unless they do, they must expect to be visited by adequate punishments.

That those views may be known, the secretary of war will communicate this order to the superintendent of the military academy, who will cause the same to be promulgated there.

ANDREW JACKSON.

LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE PATROON.

You ask me to tell you who the person called "the Patroon," in the state of New York, may be, and what is the meaning of this appellation? In my answer I shall reverse the order. The title is a Dutch one, and means the lord of the manor, or a large landholder. Although there are many descendants of the first settlers of this state, who are now in possession of large landed interests, yet the honorable Stephen Van Rensselaer, now of Albany, is the one known by the name of the Patroon, by way of pre-eminence. He was born in the city of New York in the fall of 1764, and has, of course, now passed his seventy-first year. He was born to affluence, having come into possession of one of the entailed estates of an original proprietor of the New Netherlands, who held his claims under the states general of Holland, and from Indian grants. He finished his collegiate education at Harvard university, and was highly respected in his class, although he was quite young when he graduated. After leaving college, he read law to qualify himself for a statesman, but without any intention to practice in the profession. He was early engaged in the public business of the state of New York. He was elected, when quite a young man, lieutenant-governor of New York, when the illustrious John Jay was governor. He was then accounted worthy of being a coadjutor of such a man as John Jay. In the deepest hour of confusion, when every patriot had to struggle hard for the blessings of a federal constitution, he was true to his post, and his honesty was never doubted. The most furious of his political opponents will acknowledge that he has been as exalted for his sense of justice as for his active benevolence. In 1812, he was one of those men who supported the war, from a belief, all things considered, that after it had been commenced, we had no alternative but to fight it out. Under governor Tompkins, he accepted the command of the militia on the frontier. He marched at the shortest warning to the defence of the soil, and bearded the enemy in his line, showing his military powers as well as his patriotism and moral courage. He never shunned any danger that was necessary for him to go through. He expended from his resources freely to arm and equip his division, and, with the magnanimity of Washington, thought not of his own emoluments, but of his country's honor and safety.

In the infancy of the great system of internal improvements, he commenced his course for the good of the state; believing that New York was as rich as other countries in its mineral kingdom, he caused a geological survey to be made at his own expense, from the sea coast to the shores of Lake Erie. This act was as useful as munificent. This was a pioneer labor; but little had been done in this way except in search of precious metals and particular objects.

He was one of the leaders in the great work of joining the waters of the lakes with those of the ocean. With Clinton and others he threw all the weight of his character into the scale and deserves his share of glory; and there is enough of it to be divided among many, granting to De Witt Clinton the greatest share.

In the days of the deepest corruption, his moral or political honesty was never doubted. His fiercest opponents in political life were constrained to bear testimony to his being "the patriotic and the just." Aristides never deserved the title more than this New Yorker. In his course as a member of the national legislature, he maintained the same exalted reputation. There is more than one memorable instance of his refusal to sacrifice the slightest principle of justice to sustain a party.

He has as many tenants as some of the German princes, and yet not one of them ever complained of his being a hard master; on the contrary, he has been so easy with them, from father to son, that the lessees feel that they are nearly possessors of the soil in fee simple. If one of his tenants is unfortunate in his circumstances, by sickness or fire, he has only to make his case known to the Patroon, and all is well. It is said, by good judges, that he might fairly realize three times the rent he now receives from his tenants, if he chose. If a nobleman in England, or a prince on the continent, was not to take a third part of the rent that their tenants could bear, would not his name be resounded in every portion of the globe; and the world hail him as "the man of Ross," in a colossus of Rhodes? He has been ever desirous of diffusing knowledge, and has given liberally for that purpose. He founded a school to hold an intermediate place between the common school and the college; it has been some years in successful operation, and is now supported from his own purse.

As an agriculturist, he has been the foremost in the state; sparing no expense or exertions to benefit the farming interests, and is now deeply engaged in the cause.

In the promotion of temperance he has been assiduous and successful, teaching by precept and example, but he never joined those intemperate fanatics who wished to banish the wine cup from the communion table. He never can be made an ultra in any thing. He is a valuable member of the Colonization society—a philanthropist who would diffuse happiness among all mankind as far as he could, but would not open the flood-gates of evil to push a principle to the extreme. Happy in great wealth, in the proper use of it; in a green old age, and in virtuous children, he still continues the even tenor of his way without any complaint that he has not had higher honor, in political life, or more influence in directing his country's destinies. Such a man may and will enjoy every moment of his existence, thanking heaven that he has lived so long, not regretting that the boundaries of human life are so short. He never sought for that momentary and extravagant gratitude from the suffering poor relieved by his bounty, which is so grateful to many good minds. No, he does better; he strives rather to prevent evils than to cure them. If he seldom hears the noisy buzzes of the multitude which are so fascinating to the ambitious, he never fails, wherever he goes, to "read his history in a nation's eyes," for he never expended a cent of his wealth, nor wasted a moment of his precious time, to aid arbitrary power, or to foment party feuds. In social life his friendships have been steady, warm and permanent; and his enmities, notwithstanding his refined feelings and high sense of honor, have always been placable; he could forgive the fiercest bursts of passion, if he could be persuaded there was no violation of principle in them.

Every day finds him alike assiduous in cherishing the good of society; his bounties, his wishes, and his personal exertions, as the rain, the dews and the sun upon vegetation, give a verdure to all around him. Very seldom do we find in the study of man a perfect symmetry of character; excellence and defects are thrown together, and we must, in general, judge of the character by balancing the different properties, but in the one we are now attempting to describe, the virtues are so well commingled, that, like the colors of light in a clear and lovely sky, they form the lustre of the perfect day. If in the diorama of his life there are no mountings of the first magnitude, nor cataracts of stupendous plunge, the whole landscape is one of extended views, abounding in magnificent rivers and lovely brooks, on whose borders are enchanting bowers and classic temples. There is not a tree in the whole landscape that has not brought forth its fruits in due season, and is not now as thrifty as ever. A spurious and transitory fame may arise in a few years, sweep through the land, for evil or for good, and when the historian shall come to examine it with discrimination and impartiality, it will be found to have been only a luminous vapour that arose in the damps and twilight of society; but a fame founded on intelligence, benevolence, corporeal and moral courage, kindly dispositions, refined affections, active duties and sound principles will grow brighter by the lapse of time, and become more firmly fixed in the memory and heart of each succeeding generation.

In person, Mr. Van Rensselaer is tall, spare, majestic and graceful. His countenance is full of intellect and composure, bearing an evidence of his having obtained a mastery over his passions, whatever they may have been. His manners are delicate, refined and gentlemanly, equally removed from aristocratic pride on the one hand, and from office seeking familiarity on the other. Such men are "cedars in the garden of God that cannot be hid," and grow far apart even there.

This hasty notice of Mr. Van Rensselaer was written by one who has no debt of gratitude to pay him, nor personal motives to enlorge him. This character was sketched for a gallery of mental portraits, selected at pleasure from among the good and great of our countrymen, who will form the jewels in the crown of our nation's glory, and which will descend as heirlooms to posterity. If, at times, the writer has dipped his pen in his heart, when its currents flowed faster than they now do, and has left some of his pictures colored as of the Titian school, in this instance he can safely say, that all is subdued and tame, and the "image paler than life." LAW CASE.

Supreme judicial court, Massachusetts.

Dedham, Norfolk county, June 8 and 9—present justice Putnam.

Extraordinary case of cruelty on board of a whaling ship, which resulted in reducing the sufferer to madness. In August, 1832, the plaintiff, John C. Bull, aged 19 years, shipped as "boat steerer" on board of the whaler "Mount Vernon," commanded by captain Edwin Coffin, the defendant. Most of the ship's company, and all the officers with the exception of Bull, belonged to Nantucket, from which port the Mount Vernon sailed. It is surmised that the ill usage to which Bull was subjected on the voyage, originated from the fact that he came from a different section of the state from his shipmates. It was proved that he was sober, enterprising, courageous and competent to discharge the duties of his office, the most honorable and exciting function of which was that of "harpooner," which, when his boat hove alongside of a whale was assigned to another. He often requested the "post of honor and danger," and in one instance, on board of the same boat, did strike a whale, and as well as any could have done, although it was his first attempt. He was extremely mortified at being superseded in his duty, and in his manners exhibited the natural effects of his disappointment.

When the Mount Vernon put into Tombez. Captain Coffin, as is the custom, entertained some brother captains with wine from the ship's stores. Subsequently, on the same day, Bull had some brother boat steerers on board to see him, and he took an unfinished bottle of wine from the captain's room, opposite his own, and treated his company. The testimony inclined to the side; that though it was usual for captains and mates to entertain company on the ship's stores, it was not customary for petty officers to do so. Commodore Downes thought if it was an offence it was but a very trivial one. Bull was, however, dis-rated, sent forward, put to scrubbing decks, ordered to go aloft and deprived of his "lay." This treatment affected his mind; he began to talk wild, and was regarded as sullen. Once he was kept on deck a whole day, and not allowed any watch below. At another time he was kept the whole night at the windlass, while it rained. In the morning, being the 7th of June, he went below, refused to speak or eat, and lay in his berth till it was thought he was dying. The hands were convinced that he was sick, and so informed the captain, who had him removed to the cabin, where he received the necessary attention, but refused to eat for 8 or 9 days, till some soup was forced into his mouth. He began to revive a little, and captain Coffin, suspecting that he was shamming sick, drove him out of the cabin, but would not allow any one to help him take his chest out and drag it forward. The officers, by the captain's orders, continued to treat him as "shamming." He was confined in the fore-hold, and kept on bread and water by Coffin's orders.

In addition to these degrading privations, he was struck in the face, and finally twice seized up by the thumbs and regularly flogged, till the blood flowing from the wounds on his back ran on to the deck. The "cat" used had four tails; at the first flogging, on the 7th of July, he received 25 lashes, and on the second 23—some of them were struck on the small of the back—or loins.* He was once dragged out of his hiding place in the hold, where he had nothing to lie on but a coil of rope, at midnight, and flogged by a mate. He was also flogged by the captain, who declared that he would not only give his officers leave to flog him, but also the foremost hands. These measures entirely failed to restore Bull to his health or senses, and captain Coffin regarding him as incurable, took him on board the Potomac, then on that station, for the purpose of inducing commodore Downes to take him home. Captain Coffin told commodore Downes that he had used him with great severity, and still thought a good flogging would do him good, and when his body was examined on board of the Potomac, the scars on his back were plain and distinct.

As the Potomac was at that time under orders to cruise for several months under the "line," it was deemed unfit for Bull to be exposed to the climate so long, and com. Downes recommended Coffin to send him home in the first whaler that should sail. Capt. Coffin could not readily get an opportunity of doing this, and in the month of August, 1833, set him ashore at Payta, where he was placed in a small grog shanty on the beach. There was no bed or any domestic conveniences in this shanty, nor did it appear that capt. Coffin provided for him in that situation. He was found in this place by the officers of the Potomac, and was conveyed on board in a state of idiocy. By kind treatment his life was kept in him, but not a glimmering of reason was perceptible when he arrived in Boston, in June, 1834. His brother first awakened consciousness in him, by playing a familiar tune to him on the flute; and by degrees he gradually returned to a state of sanity, but accompanied with bodily debility.

A prosecution for damages was commenced in July, 1834, but for upwards of a year much time was necessarily spent in procuring depositions, evidence, &c. Last spring it became necessary to prepare fully for his trial, which has recently taken place, and Bull had for this purpose to hold an interview with his counsel. In this interview, it was requisite to trace minutely the painful history of the facts, and so harrowing were they to the mind of Bull, that he became furiously and irrevocably mad, and was sent to the State Lunatic Asylum at Worcester, where he will probably soon terminate his miserable life.

Three pleas in justification were set up—alleging mutiny, theft and drunkenness, on the part of Bull. There being no testimony to support these pleas, they were expressly abandoned in the argument in defence. This is spoken of as being very able, and proceeded on the ground that capt. Coffin had mistaken the condition of Bull, and had only adopted the usual mode of reducing a refractory seaman to obedience, and after it became obvious that he was deranged, he had only acted according to the formerly universally received notion that insanity could only be cured by punishment.

After being out some time, the jury came into court, and declared that they could not possibly agree upon any particular measure of damages. One of them said, that one of his fellows was determined to have a mind of his own. Mr. Derby told them that it was essential to his client that a verdict of some kind should be rendered at that time, as another trial could not be had till next spring, before which time Bull would in all probability be dead.

The jury retired again, and after another discussion, came in with a verdict of one thousand dollars damages. The jury were generally in favor of giving from five to six thousand dollars, but one struck out a long time for four or five hundred.

*Contrary to the regulations for army or naval flogging. In Russia the punishment of death is inflicted by the knout. The executioner first lays on a number of stripes on the back, with the knout, and concludes by striking a sudden and peculiar blow with it on the loins, which instantly despatches the condemned.

—A circular from the treasury department, having an important bearing upon the currency and purchasers of the public lands, is inserted in page 337.

—In the present sheet we have published a list of the acts passed at the last session of congress, and a report from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the senate, showing the amount of appropriations made by those acts. In our next we will publish a statement of the new offices created and the salaries of each, and also a statement of the offices the salaries of which are increased, &c. during the last session, made by the secretary of the senate in pursuance of law. It is our intention, when we have disposed of the mass of current articles pressing upon our attention, to publish some of the most important laws passed at the last session, for general information and future reference.

—The president of the United States left Washington on Monday last, on a visit to his residence in Tennessee—from which it is said he will not return until October. He has taken the Virginia route, and is accompanied by his private secretary, major Donelson. The vice president has also left Washington for the north.

—THE CREEK WAR. From the official reports of gen. Scott, it will be seen that there is a prospect that the Creek war will be speedily terminated, as the enemy, alarmed at the demonstrations against them, were voluntarily surrendering in large bodies. Among those who gave themselves up, were Neah-Mathla, an aged chief, and about a thousand Creeks, including two hundred warriors. They are described as a miserable collection of human beings, and have been sent from Fort Mitchell, where they were temporarily detained, with other Indians amounting, in all, to about 1,500 souls, to Arkansas. They are to travel the whole distance from Montgomery, Ala. by steamboats; others will be sent off in the same manner, with as much despatch as practicable, until the whole are removed beyond the states. A few of the murderers, however, it is intimated, will be punished.

—Another account says, general Jesup had taken about 1,200 hostile Indians, and was on his march from Fort Mitchell to Long's plantation—the half way point between Columbus and Tuskegee.

—We also see it stated that Jim Henry, a celebrated Uchee chief, the principal instigator of the late murders, with a body of one hundred and fifty warriors, had been captured by, or given himself up to, Jim Boy, one of the leaders of the friendly Indians. Much importance is attached to this event, as it was the general belief that it would put an end to the war.

—Preparations were making for the stages to run through the Creek nation, and it was expected that the channel of communication, south and west of Augusta, would soon be open as formerly. The Cherokees were still quiet. A company of United States troops arrived in New York a few days since, from Eastport, in the Providence steamboat, under the command captain CHILDS; they will proceed immediately to the south. This company (with the exception of a few corporals' guards) were the last U. S. troops stationed on our northern seaboard.

—FLORIDA. The garrisons were still suffering severely from sickness. Of 240 men at St. Johns', 130 were sick, among them 5 officers out of 10. At the post at Garey's Ferry there were about fifty families from the interior, all sickly, and from two to four dying daily, from chills and measles. Brevet lieut. col. Julius F. Hielman, died at Fort Drane on the 27th of June.

—There had been a slight skirmish at Newnansville, a few weeks ago, between a detachment of col. Warren's command, and a small party of Indians, in which the latter were routed with the loss of four men. The buildings at Fort King, which had been abandoned, have been burnt by the Indians.

—MEXICO AND TEXAS. The present sheet contains several interesting papers in relation to Mexico and Texas, among them an agreement, or treaty, between the president of the "republic of Texas" and Santa Ana, in which the latter stipulates not to take up arms against the republic during its present struggle, &c. But it will be seen by the decree of the provisional president of Mexico, inserted among the "Official Mexican documents," page 336, that the Mexican government is resolved to prosecute the war with vigor, "without paying any regard to the stipulations made or to be made with the enemy by the captive president." As an evidence of its uncompromising spirit it has imprisoned the commissioners who had been despatched by the Texian government to Metamoras to negotiate with the Mexican authorities. The commissioners, after announcing their imprisonment at Metamoras, says that all overtures or propositions made on the part of the Texian government were rejected, that a liberation of the prisoners at Metamoras was positively refused—and in fine, that no measure, in any manner based on Texian independence, would be listened to by the Mexicans. The commissioners also write that there were at Metamoras 4,000 Mexican soldiers, at San Patricio 5,000, and on the Neuces 6,000, with orders to concentrate at the former place. The above intelligence was received at Galveston by express on the 22d June, and in anticipation of an invasion the Texian forces have marched to the frontier to meet the enemy.

—The president of Texas has issued the following order, which confirms the accounts of the determined hostility of the Mexicans. This hostility is mingled with a strong feeling of dislike against North Americans generally; and we see it stated, on the authority of a gentleman direct from Mexico, that it was the prevailing opinion there that Santa Ana was defeated by the troops under gen. Gaines!

—Executive department, Velasco, June 20.

To J. Brown, com. schooner Invincible:

Sir: We have received information that the Mexicans are returning upon us. It is said an armament is fitting out at Vera Cruz. Our gallant little navy must be on the alert. You will sail for this place, where more extended orders and instructions will be furnished you. Your obedient servant, DAVID G. BURNETT, president.

—We have before us a long report from the new secretary of war, Mirabeau B. Lamar, on the disposal of Santa Ana, which strongly urges his trial as a felon for the murder of col. Fanning's detachment—and his execution on conviction. At the last advices Santa Ana and suite were still in confinement at Columbia, about forty miles from Velasco, on the Brassos river.

—The bodies of col. Fanning's command, slaughtered by the orders of Santa Ana, were buried on the 3d of June with military honors. An address was delivered on the occasion by gen. Rusk, who has communicated an account of the proceedings and ceremonies to the Texian government, by which it has been published.

—A PRESIDENT AT LAST! On the night of the 1st inst. the board of aldermen and common council, of New York, agreeably to a resolution adopted some days previous, and, after considerable discussion, elected alderman Varian, of the sixteenth ward, president of the board by a vote of 9 to 7—thus terminating one of the most unprofitable contests that has ever been witnessed.

—PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. The democratic convention which assembled at Newport, Rhode Island, on the 22d ultimo, unanimously nominated an electoral ticket friendly to Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson as candidates for president and vice president of the U. States.

The Virginia Harrison convention assembled at Staunton on the 4th inst.—col. James Crawford, a delegate from Augusta and Nicholas, was chosen president. On the 6th the convention adjourned, after having unanimously agreed upon the nomination of gen. William H. Harrison, of Ohio, for president, and John Tyler, of Virginia, for vice president of the United States, and adopted the White ticket of electors, that is, the ticket formed by the whig members of the late legislature of Virginia.

THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT. The following circular letter has been addressed to the clerks of the post office department by the postmaster general.

Post office department, 5th July, 1836.

Sir: You are hereby appointed a clerk in the post office department, at a salary of —.

On presenting yourself with the certificate of a judge, or justice of the peace, that you have taken the usual oaths of office, appropriate duties will be assigned to you.

A late act of congress requires the services of executive officers during ten hours a day from the 1st of April to the 1st of October, and eight hours for the balance of the year. Your constant attendance during those hours will be required, with the exception only of such absences as the calls of nature render indispensable.

No personal claims to office or promotion are recognized in this department. The offices are the property of the people, and the officeholders their hirelings; to be appointed, promoted or discharged, at the discretion of those who, by the constitution and laws, are made the people's agents for such purposes. Each clerk is paid in full for his services by his current salary: and, in relation to any higher or more lucrative station which may become vacant, stands on the same footing as the citizens out of office.

These principles are now stated, that, should you accept this appointment, you may not hereafter entertain any impression that injustice has been done you when they shall be carried into practice. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

STATISTICS OF NEW YORK. The New York Times glean from Williams' Annual Register the following statistical items:

There are in the state of New York 56 counties, 788 towns and 9 cities. There are published in the state of New York 253 newspapers, besides magazines. The number of daily papers is 27, viz: 15 printed in the city of New York, 1 in Brooklyn, 4 in Albany, 2 in Buffalo, 2 in Rochester, and 3 in Troy. In the city of New York 56 papers are published exclusive of magazines—15 daily, 10 semi-weekly, 2 tri-weekly, 25 weekly—1 semi-monthly, and two monthly. The average circulation of the ten large daily papers, is about 1,700 or

17,000 numbers of sheets issued daily. The state owns 663 miles of canal navigation. The amount of canal money, held on loan by the banks of this state, is $2,356,284 38. The amount on deposit $791,591 75. The total canal debt is $6,322,103 19. The amount of canal funds in hand $3,496,809 72, leaving a balance to be reduced by the receipts of future years of $2,915,203 47. The total capital of rail road companies incorporated, previous to the recent session of the legislature—is $34,405,000. (This capital has been immensely increased at the recent session.) The total value of real and personal estate in all the counties of this state is $530,653,524. The total amount of sales by auctioneers in the city of New York during the year 1835 was $34,311,609 09. The total amount of auction duties paid by auctioneers in New York city in 1835 was $270,996 39. There are 89 banks in the state with a capital of $31,781,461. (This does not include the banks incorporated at the recent session.)

TO MARINERS. The information below is important to all who may have occasion to visit Tampa Bay:

U. S. ship Concord, off Passage Island, Tampa Bay May 25, 1836.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you that I have planted a beacon on Egmont island to point out the entrance to Tampa Bay. It is a spar 80 feet high, with a barrel on it, painted white and black, and may be seen before the land.

To enter the bay in safety, bring the beacon to bear E. $\frac{1}{2}$ S. by compass, then run for it till you strike $3\frac{1}{2}$ fathoms water, which will take you over the bar, then steer E $\frac{1}{2}$ N. until the beacon bears E. by S. and then follow the northern bank, which can always be seen within a cable's length. Run for the beacon, to near a cable's length, and you will have ten fathoms water, the beacon bearing south then run E. by S. to $4\frac{1}{2}$ or 5 fathoms, then E. N. E. 6 miles, and N. E. to 3 fathoms, off Mangrove point, then north to 4 fathoms and N. E. to the anchorage at Cadsden's point. I have the honor to be, with great regard, your obedient servant,

M. P. MIX, Commander.

To com. A. J. Dallas, commanding naval force of the U. S. in the W. Indies and Gulf of Mexico, Pensacola.

THE LATE DUEL. The parties to the duel, alluded to in the "REGISTER" of the 25th ult. were midshipmen Key and Sherburne. It was stated, in the "Baltimore Chronicle," on the authority of an eastern paper, that the survivor, midshipman Sherburne, had been stricken from the rolls of the navy by the president—which statement is contradicted by the father of midshipman S. in the following letter to the editors of the Chronicle:

Gentlemen: Yesterday a notice appeared in the Baltimore Chronicle, (which I regret to observe copied into other papers), stating that the "president had stricken the name of midshipman Sherburne from the rolls of the navy, for having killed midshipman Key in a duel."

On reading the notice I immediately called on the president and stated to him the remark in the Chronicle; he replied, that it was not true, and that I had his authority for saying it, and also that no complaint had been made to him on the painful subject. I will also take the liberty to remark, that my son (who is of mature age) was the challenged party, and endeavored, as far as an officer and a gentleman of honor could do, to avoid the painful meeting, which proved so unfortunate to his opponent, and so truly afflicting to his bereaved parents. You will greatly oblige me by stating the above facts in your next paper, and request those who have copied the notice to make the correction, which, in justice to my son, (who is now absent on duty), I hope will not be denied.

I am, gentlemen, with the greatest respect, your obedient servant,
JOHN H. SHERBURNE.

GENERAL ORDER, NO. 44. Adjutant general's office, Washington, June 30, 1836. The following resignations have been accepted by the president, to take effect at the date set opposite their respective names, to wit:
First lieut. S. W. Shaumburgh, 1st drag. 31st July, 1836.

Brevet 2d lieutenant. R. King, corps engineers 30th Sept. 1836.

Brevet 2d lieutenant. A. V. Brunby, 1st artillery 30th, June, 1836. By order of maj. gen. Macomb.

ROGER JONES, adjuvant general.

Orders. July 5. Capt. E. A. Hitchcock, 1st infantry, assigned to recruiting service at New York instead of brevet maj. T. F. Smith, 1st infantry, ordered to St. Louis.

Lieut. F. L. Jones, 4th artillery, ordered to relieve lieut. Pickell, at fort Hamilton, and the latter to join his company.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. The annexed resolution on this subject was adopted by congress before the adjournment:

[No. 7.] Resolution providing for the distribution of weights and measures.

Resolved, &c. That the secretary of the treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to cause a complete set of all the weights and measures adopted as standards, and now either made or in the progress of manufacture, for the use of the several custom houses, and for other purposes, to be delivered to the governor of each state in the union, or such person as he may appoint, for the use of the states respectively, to the end that a uniform standard of weights and measures may be established throughout the United States.

Approved, June 14, 1836.

THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC. From a printed document lately received by us from Bogota, we learn that the congress of New Grenada have granted to Mr. Charles Biddle the exclusive privilege, for fifty years, of carrying goods and passengers in boats propelled by steam or other artificial means on the river Chagres, and to associate persons with him, under the title of the Transportation company of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

[The decree reserves the rights granted to baron de Thierry the 29th May, 1835, in a previous act of the congress, authorising the construction of a canal.]

Canoes, pirogues and other undecked vessels, carrying goods and passengers, are excepted from the operation of this decree.

A further exclusive privilege for the same period is granted to Mr. Biddle, for the transportation of goods and passengers by rail way or Macadamized road, from the head of navigation of the Chagres to the city of Panama, reserving to the public a lateral transportation road for horses and mules.

Extensive concessions of land are made to Mr. Biddle in the same decree, in which colonies of natives and foreigners may be settled, and be exempted from certain contributions for twenty years.

All materials necessary to the construction of the boats and roads of the company are to be free of duty, as well as all goods in transit to other places.

The works are to be commenced within two years from the date of the decree, (April, 1836), and to be finished in three years from their commencement.

The rates of transportation are to be fixed by the company, with liberty to change them annually, giving information to the government of the alteration. The troops of the government and public property are to pay half price.

At the end of the fifty years the property of the company reverts to the government.

One of the last provisions of the decree ordains, that if two steamboats at least are not kept in operation, and the communications are not kept constantly in such a state (excepting accidents) as to admit of the transportation between the Atlantic and Pacific being effected in fourteen hours, the exclusive privilege is to be forfeited, and the company to pay a fine to the government of ten thousand dollars. [Nat. Intel.]

A late number of the Salt River Journal states that many of the land offices in Illinois had been closed for a time, until the receivers gave the additional security required of them in consequence of the increased amounts coming into their hands. The Journal, in noticing the closing of the office at Palmyra, on this account, says—

"Until the bond of the receiver is executed, no entries can be made in this office. The increase of receipts in the office is scarcely exemplified in the United States. Heretofore the sales were stated to be about $90,000 per annum: last year, they were about a million, and since the 1st of April they are stated to be about $300,000. The whole country is agog for land, and almost every man who can procure money is thus investing it. We presume the amount of land taken up in what is known as the upper Mississippi district of Missouri, will exceed that of any other equal portion of country in the U. States. A number of large entries have been made during the last few months in every county from St. Charles to the Des Moines, and the fever appears to be near its height."

The rage for land speculations is not confined to that quarter, for we see it stated that the amount of sales at the land office in Detroit, for the month of June, amounted to the sum of four hundred and sixty-seven thousand dollars! [Balt. American.]

WARLIKE PREPARATIONS AT BATAVIA. The descent of an armed mob upon the village of Batavia, and the threatened destruction of the land office, as well as the more recent demonstrations of the existence of an organized force in that neighborhood, for the purpose of resisting legal process, has led to vigorous preparations for resistance on the part of the peaceable portion of the population. We learn from the Niagara Democrat, that two block houses have been erected, one in front and the other in the rear of the land office, and furnished with arms from the state arsenal—among them several pieces of artillery—and that the inhabitants generally have enrolled and equipped themselves as a military corps, with a view to repel, upon the shortest notice, any future aggression upon public or private property.

STEAM PLOUGH. Some experiments were tried on Friday week at Red Moss, near Bolton, in the presence of Mr. Handley, M. P. Lincolnshire, Mr. Ceapman, M. P. for Westmeath, Mr. Smith, of Deanston, and other members interested in agriculture, with a complete and very powerful steam-plough, constructed by Mr. Heathcote, M. P. for Tiverton. About six acres of raw moss were turned up in a few hours, and turned up in a most extraordinary style, sods eighteen inches in breadth and nine inches in thickness being cut from the furrow, and completely reversed in position, the upper surface of the sod being placed exactly where the surface had been before. The possibility of ploughing by steam has thus been established, though, as the employment of the steam-plough, in preference to one drawn by horses, will depend on the comparative cost of the two powers, and on that of the two implements used, and as there are not at present any sufficient data of judging what the difference of the cost will be, it is not possible to say how far steam is likely to be applied to this department of agriculture. The plough of Mr. Heathcote, though a very powerful machine, appears to us to be much too complex and costly for common agricultural purposes, though we have little doubt it might be used not only with effect but advantage, in reclaiming large portions of mossland, such as the bogs of Ireland. Indeed, it is the opinion of Mr. Heathcote himself, that it would not at present answer to employ it in reclaiming a smaller portion of bog than 1,500 or 2,000 acres, though it may probably be cheapened and simplified so as to make it ultimately useful on a smaller scale. [English paper.]

LEAD MINES. It is reduced almost to a certainty that the vein of lead ore recently discovered and now worked in Rossie, St. Lawrence county, extends westwardly through Alexandria, in this county, some 15 or 20 miles from the former place, and that it will prove a great source of wealth to individuals, and of very considerable importance to this country generally. We understand that an examination at or near Plesis, resulted in the discovery of lead and zinc, in such quantities as to warrant the belief that the mine there will be equally productive with that of Rossie, which yields from 75 to 80 per cent. of pure lead. Contracts have been entered into in New York, to deliver in that city, this season, some two hundred tons of ore from the latter mine, and at a price which ensures a fair profit to the proprietor. We hope the attention of mineralogists will be directed this way, as there is every indication that this country will be as much distinguished for its mineral wealth as it is for its unrivalled water power, soil and facilities for commercial purposes. BANK LAW IN RHODE ISLAND. The legislature of Rhode Island, at their late session, passed a law regulating banks, and fixing the rate of legal interest. A part of the provisions of the act relate only to banks to be hereafter incorporated. Others, however, apply to existing banks. One of them provides, under the penalty of $1,000, that no president, director or cashier of any bank, after the expiration of thirty days from the passage of the act, shall exercise the duties of such office, unless he shall have sworn faithfully to discharge the duties of said office according to law, and in said capacity to abide by and support the laws regulating the interest of money.

The act further provides that if any bank, or any officer in behalf thereof, shall directly or indirectly take a greater interest or discount, than at the rate of six per cent. per annum, on the discount of any note, bill of exchange or other obligation, the charter of the bank shall be forfeited, and the officer taking such excessive interest shall forfeit the sum of $500 for every offence; with a proviso, however, that on the discount of any obligation for a period less than a year, interest may be taken at the rate of 360 days; and that on the discount of bills of exchange or notes payable at other places than that where the same is discounted, a premium may be charged, not exceeding a quarter per cent. when drawn on places in Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut or the city of New York; one half per cent. on other places in New York state, or in other states not more remote than the District of Columbia; three-eighths per cent. on Philadelphia, one per cent. on Virginia, &c. Bank commissioners are to be appointed whose duty it will be to visit and examine all the banks. [Bos. Daily Adv.]

MARATIME. The barque Detroit, capt. Niles, arrived in our harbor yesterday. There is more than ordinary interest attached to this announcement, inasmuch as it is a second instance, wherein the armaments of the ancient enemies of our infant liberties, have been turned, like the sword of the warrior, to the ploughshare of the husbandman; now being made an agent in the peaceful, but stirring commerce of the western lakes. In the memorable action on Lake Erie, which immortalized the gallant Perry and his brave companions, this was the flag ship of the enemy, under the command of commodore Barclay, a brave officer, reared under Nelson, and who lost an arm in the engagement of the Nile; but who had to yield to the superior seamanship and prowess of his warlike opponents. How truly that brilliant affair verified the adage, that "thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just," our loss being comparatively insignificant.

The Detroit is about 300 tons burthen, is fitted up in good style, for passengers and merchandise, and will, in a few days, take her place in the Eagle line. We have been on board, and have been much gratified by the inspection. She was, as our readers are perhaps aware, sunk in the year 1815, consequently has been 21 years under water. She carried, we believe, 20 guns, and a full complement of men. There are many relics of the engagement preserved on board, particularly a 32 lb. shot in one of the beams on the starboard side, which must have entered from the larboard bow, that being opposed to our guns; the proprietors have also, with admirable taste, refitted the original companion ladder, down which the poor commodore descended, after the loss of his remaining arm. [Buffalo Com. Adv.]

STEAM vs. HORSES. It would require twelve stage coaches, carrying 15 passengers each, and 1,200 horses, to take 180 passengers 240 miles in twenty-four hours, at the rate of ten miles an hour. One locomotive steam engine will take that number and go two trips in the same time, consequently will do the work of 2,400 horses! Again, it would require thirty mail coaches, (six passengers each), and 3,000 horses to take 180 passengers and mail 240 miles in twenty-four hours, at the rate of ten miles an hour. One locomotive steam engine will take that number, and go two trips in the same time, consequently will do the work of 6,000!

[Albany Gazette.]

BREACH OF PROMISE. A case of some interest, says the Cincinnati Whig, was tried in our court of common pleas a few days ago. It was an action for damages for a breach of marriage promise, brought by Frances Wyatt against Solomon Menkin. The plaintiff is about sixteen years of age and the defendant we suppose about forty-five. She is also sister-in-law to the defendant and resided in his family. The defendant was proved to be worth about 20,000 dollars. The breach of promise being established, the jury brought in a verdict of six thousand dollars damages. A new trial has been made on the ground of excessive damages.

POLIGNAC AND HIS COMPANIONS. Alluding to Polignac and his companions in confinement, the unfortunate ministers of Charles the tenth, the Paris correspondent of the Albany Advertiser says:

"They live in perfect harmony, and submit without murmuring to the severe rules of their prison. They have instituted among themselves courses of lectures on various subjects, and opened small workshops for those who have learned a trade. Your countryman, M. Beaumont, is still amongst them. In Ham, the same resignation is observable, but the inmates being more advanced in years, labor under more infirmities. M. de Peyronnet was almost given over a few days ago, and M. de Chantelauze has been a martyr to acute rheumatism ever since his confinement. M. Sauzet acted as counsel to the latter before the court of peers. It was M. de Chantelauze, who brought him into notice, and made his fortune by selecting him when only a young lawyer of the bar of Lyons, to plead his case in preference to M. Berriver and a number of other Parisian barristers, far superrior to him in talent and oratory. M. de Chantelauze might to-morrow obtain his liberty if he condescended to demand it, but he will not accept of a favor that his co-captives cannot participate in. M. Guernon Ranville, the youngest of the four ministers, devotes himself entirely to study. M. de Polignac is the only one whose energies and health remain unimpaired. He made, to be sure, a trial of the dungeon of Vincennes, under Napoleon, and on that account must be more inured than his colleagues to a prison life. He is exclusively occupied with his family concerns."

THE RAFT OF RED RIVER. Captain Shreve writes from Red River that he is getting on with the removal of the raft slowly. He finds it a much more difficult task to perform than he had anticipated. "The fact is," says he, "the work is of such a nature as to make it impossible to judge of the amount of labor required to perform any given portion of it until after it is done; but as I progress up, I leave behind a good steamboat navigation. Two old boats have been sunk in the raft, but neither of them fit to navigate, from age and decay, and came up with emigrants. Fifteen boats have been up through the former location of the raft 115 miles, since the 1st of January, and the emigration to the country is immense."

EXPLORING EXPEDITION. The command of the exploring expedition, says the Army and Navy Chronicle, has been tendered to captain Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, and accepted. We have heard of no other officers named as likely to accompany the expedition. The frigate Macedonian, now repairing at Norfolk, will be the principal vessel. See page 337.

THE CREEK WAR.

Orders, No. —. } Head quarters, 2d army corps, U. S. A.
Fort Mitchell, June 17, 1836.

The major general commanding congratulates the troops under his command upon the success which has attended their operations during the present campaign. Though no brilliant action has been achieved, peace and security have been restored to the country. The major general, in the course of twenty years' service, has commanded every variety of troops, and in every possible situation incident to peace and war; and he can say with truth, and he says it with pride and pleasure, that he has never seen any body of men animated by a more admirable spirit than the volunteers which he commands. Called suddenly from the comforts and endearments of home to the defence of a bleeding frontier, they put off the character of the citizen and assumed that of the soldier, with a promptitude worthy of veterans, and they have submitted to the privations, exposure and fatigue of a rapid and difficult march through a wilderness occupied by a savage foe, under the most trying circumstances, with a cheerfulness, alacrity and gallantry which prove that they left their homes determined to do their duty. They have performed their duty in the best possible manner, and deserve the gratitude of their country. In the name of that country the major general thanks them; and for himself he begs major general Patterson, and all the officers and soldiers of his command, to accept his grateful acknowledgments for the kind and liberal support which they have on all occasions accorded to him.

Major general Patterson will move his command, by easy marches to Long's, where he will encamp and await orders. Subsistence and forage will be drawn from the depot at Tuskegee. By command of major general Jesup.

R. P. PARROTT, acting adj. gen.

Extract from general Scott's official despatch to the war department of 2d July, 1836.

"Head quarters, army of the south, Fort Mitchell, July 2, 1836.

"Sir: Since my last letter, I have been down the river to organize the service as low as Irwinton, and to put the disposable force of Georgia, after nearly doubling the guards on the left bank of this river, handsomely in the field. I am now but just emerged from the creeks and swamps to the south and south west. The Georgians moved in two columns, with three small battalions of United States artillery, under majors Pierce, Lomax and Erving. I retained the immediate command of one of those columns, and gave the other to major general Sanford. The two amounted to about 1,200 men. We moved with pack horses, the country being so deluged with rain that no wagon could accompany either column. I shall be back at Roanoke to-night, [by means of a steamboat], where I shall receive general Sanford's report. I saw no recent trail of more than two or three Indians, which were directed towards this place or Tuskegee, no doubt for the purpose of surrender.

"One hostile warrior only we picked up, who declared he was going in to give himself up.

"The number of hostile warriors now here in confinement is about 430, most of them with their families. The whole number of prisoners at Tuskegee, the Alabama and friendly Indian camps west of this, major general Jesup is enabled to give me with accuracy. He thinks there might have been yesterday about 350 warriors at those places, besides women and children and the party of Neah-Micho, 150, whom I desired him some days ago to cause to be disarmed. This service will probably be performed to-day.

"I inclose a note from major general Patterson to major general Jesup, which shows that 100 warriors may be added to the foregoing number, including a noted leader, Jim Henry.

"I received yesterday a letter from col. Henderson, who is engaged in erecting a shed, &c. on this side of the river, at the head of summer navigation, for the reception of army supplies from New Orleans. It contains this paragraph—"I am led to believe that the position you directed my command to occupy, has been productive of important results. The day after the expedition of our two companies and part of captain Love's troop, 250 of the hostile Indians, men, women, &c. belonging to Jim Henry's band, surrendered to general Watson without firing a gun.

"It is now thought by the best informed, that there cannot now be in the late Creek country more than from forty to sixty hostile warriors. Some of these have sent word that they will soon be here, and are probably only delayed by the swell in the Enchee creek, which renders it to difficult pass.

"A few minutes after my arrival at Roanoke, fifteen miles above Irwinton, on the 25th ult. two Indian trails, leading to Florida, were reported to me—one three and a half, the other one and a half miles below me, and respectively one and two days old. Not a minute was lost in organizing two detachments of horse to give pursuit. I have a note from col. Beall who commanded one of the detachments, (three companies, and six friendly Indians, with subsistence for four days), from which I am afraid that he halted at Fort Gaines, and hearing that the fugitives were killing the inhabitants of Baker county, contented himself with sending thirty men to their assistance, instead of marching with his whole force, about 175 men. He was instructed specially and minutely, in a letter written with my own hand, never to give up the pursuit till stopped by starvation. I have better hopes of the other detachment, commanded by an excellent partisan, capt. Jerningan. No report is received from him. It was expected, however, that the two trails would unite, and the two detachments become one. I think that no other party has got across the river, and such are now the numbers, (since the Georgians got their arms) and the vigilance displayed on the other side, that it would seem impossible for emigrating parties to escape to Florida.

"I believe that there has hardly been a sharp skirmish on this side of the river, whilst there have been many hot encounters on the Georgia bank. The latter were made by the more desperate of the enemy, and in every instance probably to cover the passage of families endeavoring to emigrate to Florida, or to capture the horses, provisions, &c. necessary to facilitate emigration. Partial successes were obtained by the enemy in several of those affairs; in others they were repulsed; and in all it was seen that to escape with families, packs, &c. would be extremely hazardous. Consequently, the Hitchitees have generally sent in or abandoned their families, and, with a few individuals of other tribes have, finally, by some extraordinary neglect at and below Roanoke, succeeded in getting over the Chattahoochee.

"The general surrender, in most cases voluntary, of the enemy, may be attributed to many movements and arrangements on our part. It was known that large forces were gathering all around the country; the river was early pretty well guarded by the Georgians, aided by two well manned steamers cruising up and down. One of those destroyed many canoes, rafts, &c. Major general Sanford crossed the bridge at Columbus, and took up his camp four miles further, early in June; and although he had about 2,000 unarmed men, with about 400 armed, the enemy thought all Georgia was pouring into their country. About the same time major general Jesup made his entry into the heart of the nation, with a large force of Alabamians and friendly Indians. The latter movement precipitated and favored a general surrender.

"I shall necessarily be absent from this place, after a few minutes, to complete arrangements below, for two days. As it is the centre of correspondence and business, I shall return at the end of that time.

"Brigadier general Moore of this state, whose basis of operations has been Irwinton, is placed by my order below the south branch of the Cow-agee, extending himself far to the right and left. I shall instruct him to send a company of horse or two as far to the south west as Pea river. He appears, from his movements and correspondence, to be an officer of much merit. His force, mostly mounted, consists of about 1,300.

"I shall direct major general Sanford to keep out small detachments on the branches of the Cow-agee and on the Hatchee Chubbee, to precipitate the surrender of the small parties of the enemy yet out. General Jesup will take measures of a similar character on the upper parts of those streams which are nearer to his depots at Tuskegee, &c.

"I have twice written to the governor of Florida in great detail. The copy of my last letter is herewith inclosed, and I would send a copy of the other, but that I am separated from my books and papers.

"A copy of an order is inclosed respecting the West Tennessee seceders.

"I have directed major general Jesup to post two small battalions of artillery (here) in positions on the post road from Columbus to Tuskegee. This will be done in a few days, and I have caused the agent of the general post office to be advised of the directions.

"On my return to this place, I shall open a correspondence with brigadier general Wool, and hope soon to be able to spare him the detachment of United States marines, and some companies of Georgia and Alabama volunteers, should they be needed in the Cherokee country. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) WINFIELD SCOTT,
Brigadier general Jones, adjutant general of U. S. A.

Head quarters, army of the south, Fort Mitchell, July 4, 1836.

Sir: I have this moment returned here from Roanoke below, where I think I have so arranged the service with major general Sanford of the Georgia line, and brigadier general Moore, at the head of an Alabama brigade, as to secure the remaining objects to be accomplished in those directions in this war.

No official report had been received up to the time of my leaving Roanoke, from colonel Beall and capt. Jerningan, who commanded the two detachments of horse sent by me on the 25th ultimo in pursuit of the parties of Indians who had crossed the Chattahoochee on the 23d and 24th. I know, however, through respectable channels, that the two detachments had overtaken the Indians about the 28th in Baker county, and had surrounded them in a large swamp. The fugitives probably do not exceed sixty warriors, although represented by rumor to amount to more than three hundred. Colonel Beall, I again hope, will give a good account of them. He was collecting the forces of the neighborhood to make sure of his game. By a singular mistake into which I was led by a letter supposed to be from this officer, but which was written by another, I did him great injustice in my last report of events in this quarter. I hope soon to be able officially to speak of him with all the praise due to success.

Parties will be continually kept scouring the Indian country to force in the handfuls of the enemy remaining out. Major generals Jesup and Sanford, as well as brigadier general Moore, have my instructions to that effect. The former, after a detention here of ten or twelve days, proceeded last evening to the head quarters of major general Patterson, to the west. Yesterday a party of United States marines, a few mounted volunteers and friendly Indians, scoured the country between the Enchee and Hatchee Chubbee thoroughly, and to the extent of about twelve miles up those creeks. Coming up last night in a steamboat, I learned from colonel Henderson, at his camp, that sixteen women, boys and children were captured on the Chattahoochee—the warriors of the same party having escaped across the river, abandoning their families. I immediately sent off an express to give the intelligence to all the posts as low as Roanoke, with precise instructions for discovering the trail and pursuing. I do not doubt that two or three companies of horse were in motion by day-light this morning in pursuit of the fugitives.

I have not time to add more, nor have I any thing material to add, except that the armed steamer, the American, from Pensacola, is above, and that I shall immediately order her to Florida to report to governor Call, and to-morrow I shall send off col. Brooin, (a volunteer), of the marine corps, with a communication addressed to brigadier general Wool. With high respect I remain your obedient servant.

WINFIELD SCOTT,
To brig. gen. Jones, adjutant gen. U. S. army.

FLORIDA.

The following explanation of some of the peculiar terms which have been used in reference to the Florida affairs, will be found useful to our readers. They are extracted from a letter to the editor of the Northampton Courier:

"The hammock is an oasis in the desert. After travelling over many a tedious mile of sterile sand, covered with a thin growth of the gloomy fir, not a sound to be heard in the dreary wilds save that which you yourself may cause, you perceive in the distance an Emerald Isle with all the delight of a sea worn mariner, who after a long voyage hears the first cry of the thrilling land ho! As you approach this land of promise, you see spread before you one of the most imposing and at the same time beautiful scenes in nature. A luxuriant soil extending perhaps for many miles, covered with every variety of the laurel and other evergreen trees and shrubs, and in the midst, towering above them all, the stately magnolia grandiflora, the surrounding atmosphere redolent with its delicious flowers, combined with those of the orange, lemon, and endless others: to those add one hundred and twenty varieties of deciduous forest trees; flowers and plants without number, many that have lived and died for ages past unknown, and you will have, after all, but a very faint description of the magnificent vegetation of the hammock in East Florida. How can I adequately describe the effect of the many beautiful little rills which, springing from the feet of these giants of the forests, traverse these favored spots in every direction, and finally lose themselves in the adjacent pine forest. The deposit at the bottom of these is generally a perfect white sand, and the water as pure and limpid as a crystal.

The everglades you inquire about, are immense unencanted tracts stretching north and south from Lake George to very near the southern extremity of the peninsula, sometimes extending, sometimes contracting in breadth from east to west, till it assumes its greatest dimensions between 27 deg. and 25 deg. 30 min. In this immense body of waste, composed principally of morass, and covering probably (for every thing is rather hypothetical that relates to this terra incognita) from 4 to 5,000 square miles, lies Lake Mayaca, and here also is the source of the noble river Charlotte. These vast and inaccessible morasses have always and will afford a safe asylum to fugitive Indians, so long as they inhabit the peninsula, and they can there, it is said, subsist secure from intrusion, upon such game and fish as these wilds produce. It becomes therefore the policy of the commanders of our army to cut them off from this favorite retreat, and this they no doubt will endeavor, as a primary object, to effect."

FROM THE NORTH WESTERN FRONTIER.

St. Louis, June 25.

We understand that the protection of this exposed line, extending from the Santa Fe trace, (south of the Missouri river), to the northern lakes, has been confided to brigadier general Atkinson. Four companies of dragoons, comprising the garrison of Fort Leavenworth, three companies of the same regiment at Fort Des Moines, the first regiment of infantry, forming the garrisons of Forts Crawford and Snelling, and the garrisons of Forts Winnebago, Howard, Dearborn, Brady, Mackinaw and Gratiot, have been placed by the government at his disposal, to suppress any hostile movements on the part of our border Indians. We have already stated that some dissatisfaction has been manifested by the Menominees and Winnebagoes on the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, and by the Kickapoos on the Missouri. To arrest this hostile disposition, general Atkinson has ordered a detachment of dragoons, under captain Sumner, from Fort Des Moines, to that part of the frontier occupied by the first named tribes. Colonel Taylor has strengthened Fort Winnebago with three companies of infantry from Fort Crawford, to guard against the occurrence of open hostilities. The garrisons of Forts Mackinaw and Gratiot have been ordered by general Atkinson to Fort Howard, (Green Bay), to report to general Brooke; and two or three companies from Fort Snelling to Fort Crawford, to report to colonel Taylor. With this additional force and the vigilance of colonel Taylor at Fort Crawford, major Green at Fort Winnebago and general Brooke at Fort Howard, it is believed the line from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan can be protected.

The line from Mississippi to Fort Leavenworth is now guarded by only seven companies of dragoons, under the orders of colonel Kearney, an officer of great vigilance and enterprise. But we are glad to learn that the president has requested governor Dunkin to raise one thousand volunteers, under the act of congress recently passed which authorises the president to accept of the services of ten thousand volunteers, in case of Indian hostility. The governor will, no doubt, take immediate measures to comply with this requisition, and to organize the men so as to be ready in any emergency; and brigadier general Atkinson has been authorised to call upon the governor for all, or such part of the volunteers as he may think necessary to quell any disturbances that may arise among our border Indians.

[Republican.]

TEXAS.

From the Mobile Commercial Register, June 27.

MR. LAMAR, the new secretary of war in the Texas republic, has made a formal report to the cabinet on the subject of the proper disposal of Santa Ana. The secretary recommends, and argues at length in support of his recommendation, that Santa Ana shall be tried as a felon, for the murder of Fanning's detachment, and, on conviction, be executed. The date of this communication is not before us, nor have we that of the agreement between the Texas authorities and the captive despot. We cannot, therefore, judge how far they modify each other, or whether, in fact, the agreement is actually signed. If so, the views of the secretary are too late.

The bodies of those who were thus massacred in cold blood, were buried on the 2d instant by the Texans, with military honors. An address was delivered on the occasion by general Rusk.

The accounts we receive from Mexico continue to represent the public feeling against the Texans to be growing more determined in its hostility. The local parties, from whose discussions a strong diversion was expected favorable to Texas, unite in professing a determination to reconquer that country. The fate of Santa Ana is deplored by his political opponents as a national humiliation, and by his friends with deeper resentment. But the declaration of independence has deprived the Texans of any party support. Their first declaration in favor of the federation, and against the central system, was in accordance with the views of a large party opposed to Santa Ana. The restoration of the federal system will probably be attempted immediately; but the new position occupied by the Texans brings upon them equally the hostility of both parties. It seems to us, also, that the contest is looked upon among the Mexicans as a war against the North Americans, whom they hold in general dislike. Intelligent persons, direct from Mexico, tell us that, among even the best informed natives, the opinion is prevalent that it was the forces of gen. GAINES that defeated and captured Santa Ana. This affords a key to the temper with which the success of Texas is regarded. We do not doubt that strong efforts will be made to throw a very large force, as soon as possible upon Texas; and we see less reason than formerly to doubt of the reality of the danger.

A PROCLAMATION.

By the president of the republic of Texas.

Whereas, it is represented to me that there are many persons now in the United States of America calling themselves the agents of the government of Texas, and professing to have powers which have never been conceded, and as many frauds have been practised by such persons upon individuals who have been disposed to contribute for the support of our cause: and as some agents may have been appointed by this, or the late provincial government, whose powers are not sufficiently defined—

Now, therefore, be it known that I, David G. Burnett, president of the republic of Texas, by and with the advice and consent of my cabinet, do, by this public act, disclose and make known that the only agents for Texas, in the United States, are Thomas Toby and Samuel Toby, of New Orleans, of the firm Thomas Toby and brother, and that no other person is from this time authorised to act for, or bind this government, or to receive any thing for the benefit of Texas, by way of donation or otherwise except them or their sub-agents. And that all agencies or powers heretofore conferred upon any other persons, authorising them to contract for or borrow money, or to raise funds for the benefit of Texas, are, by this public act, solemnly declared to be revoked, null and void, except the agency of Robert Triplett, whose resignation takes effect from the first day of July next.

Done at Velasco this 10th day of June, 1836.

DAVID G. BURNETT.

Wm. A. Jack, secretary of state.

[New Orleans Bulletin.]

Proclamation of Don Jose Urrea, brigadier general and commander-in-chief of the division of reserve in the army of operations against Texas, to the troops under his command.

Companions! The last campaign which you have made in defence of the most sacred rights of the Mexican nation has shown to it, and to the whole world, that you know how to perform your duty with bravery and skill.

From the colony of San Patricio to Brazoria, you have conquered the whole country, disputing the ground inch by inch, with an enemy as much superior to you in numbers as in the advantage of his fortifications, in preparations and the knowledge of the country, of which you are ignorant. You have overcome all these difficulties with heroism, and the territory of Texas would have been swept of those bold adventurers, who have dared to provoke the national courage, if a misfortune, not uncommon in the hazards of war, had not attended these results which were nearly accomplished, into a dreadful disgrace for us all. Although the troops which I have the honor to command had no part in that event, nor in the consequences which followed it, they have been obliged to follow the movements of the army in the retreat they have undertaken, solely for the sake of subordination, and that implicit obedience which military duty requires.

It is to no purpose that the Texian rebels occupy for the moment the country of your conquests, the whole nation calls out unanimously for the continuation of the war and the supreme government supports it, and will prosecute it vigorously, until the department of Texas is totally reduced.

You yourselves also wish it—your constant conversations and your countenances during our retreat, have proved to me what pleasure you will have received at this order, which will be for all true Mexicans the best guarantee for the new triumphs you are going to achieve!

Valiant soldiers! I know that nothing will stop you, as I have seen your sufferings and determination. The campaign will certainly be filled with difficulties; however, as a recompense, you may count with satisfaction, that the glory of finishing it will be greater by the destruction of an enemy whom you have already conquered whenever you have met them!

You may then return to the arms of your families and friends, having removed from your hearts that pain and oppression which agonize you now, and which the pride, which has always been the character of the Mexican soldiers, now makes you feel so acutely.

Soldiers! we will march the moment the supreme government gives us the order, and we will bring with us, on our return, our worthy and beloved chief, after having revenged the misfortune he has suffered.

These are my intentions, and I promise you that you will always, as heretofore, find me at your head, in whatever quarter danger may threaten you!

JOSE URREA.

Matamoros, 6th June, 1836.

Agreement between Santa Ana and the Texian government.

"Articles of an agreement entered into between his excellency David C. Burnett, president of the republic of Texas of the one part, and his excellency general Santa Ana, president-general-in-chief of the Mexican army, of the other part:

"Article 1st. General Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana agrees that he will not take up arms, nor will he exercise his influence to cause them to be taken up against the people of Texas, during the present war of independence.

"Article 2d. All hostilities between the Mexican and Texian troops will cease immediately, both by land and water.

"Article 3d. The Mexican troops will evacuate the territory of Texas, passing to the other side of the Rio Grande del Norte.

"Article 4th. The Mexican army in its retreat shall not take the property of any person without his consent and just indemnification, using only such articles as may be necessary for its subsistence, in cases when the owner may not be present, and remitting to the commander of the army of Texas, or to the commissioners to be appointed for the adjustment of such matters, an account of the value of the property consumed, the place where taken, and the name of the owner, if it can be ascertained.

"Article 5th. That all private property, including cattle, horses, negro slaves or indentured persons of whatever denomination, that may have been captured by any portion of the Mexican army, or may have taken refuge in the said army, since the commencement of the late invasion, shall be restored to the commander of the Texian army, or to such other persons as may be appointed by the government of Texas to receive them.

"Article 6th. The troops of both armies will refrain from coming into contact with each other, and to this end the commander of the army of Texas will be careful not to approach within a shorter distance than five leagues.

"Article 7th. The Mexican army shall not make any other delay on its march than that which is necessary to take up their hospitals, baggage, &c. and to cross the rivers; any delay not necessary to these purposes to be considered an infraction of this agreement.

"Article 8th. By an express to be immediately despatched, this agreement shall be sent to gen. Vicente Filisola, and to general T. J. Rusk, commander of the Texian army, in order that they may be apprised of its stipulation—and to this end they will exchange engagements to comply with the same.

"Article 9th. That all Texian prisoners now in the possession of the Mexican army or its authorities be forthwith released and furnished with free passports to return to their homes, in consideration of which a corresponding number of Mexican prisoners, rank and file, now in possession of the government of Texas, shall be immediately released. The remainder of the Mexican prisoners that continue in possession of the government of Texas to be treated with due humanity; any extraordinary comforts that may be furnished them, to be at the charge of the government of Mexico.

"Article 10th. General Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana will be sent to Vera Cruz as soon as it shall be deemed proper.

"The contracting parties sign this instrument for the above-mentioned purposes, in duplicate at the port of Velasco, this 14th day of May, 1836.

DAVID G. BURNETT, president.

JAS. COLLINSWORTH, secretary of state.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA.

B. HARDIMAN, secretary of the treasury.

P. W. GRAYSON, attorney general.

The New York Journal of Commerce has received a copy of the documents transmitted by the president of the U. States to the senate, in compliance with a resolution of that body, requesting him to communicate such papers in his possession relating to the political condition of Texas, as he could, in his judgment, without prejudice to the public interests. They make a pamphlet of 23 pages large 8vo. but (the editors say) add nothing to the information already before the public.

Among them is the declaration of Texian independence, the constitution of the republic of Texas, and the declaration of rights. Also the official account of the battle of San Jacinto, (in which Santa Ana was captured), and the commission from president Burnett, appointing George C. Childress and Robert Hamilton, esqrs. special agents, "with plenary powers to open a negotiation with the cabinet at Washington, touching the political rights of this republic (Texas): inviting, on the part of that cabinet, a recognition of the sovereignty and independence of Texas, and the establishment of such relations between the two governments as may comport with the mutual interest, the common origin, and kindred ties of their constituents."

In connection with this commission is published, under date of May 21st, a note from the special agents to Mr. Forsyth, secretary of state, soliciting a personal interview with him in their official character. Of course there is nothing published from which we can learn the nature of the interview, or its results: but we know from other sources, that it did not eventuate in the accomplishment of the object of their mission—the recognition of Texian independence. In communicating to the secretary of state, under date of June 10th, the particulars of the battle of San Jacinto, they appear to have entertained a strong hope of an immediate recognition; for they speak of the documents describing that memorable engagement, as "affording indubitable proofs that the government they have the honor to represent, is de facto the government of Texas—feeling assured that the government of the U. States, is satisfied of that fact, will adopt such a course of action in relation to the matter as it may deem due to the republic of Texas, and accordant with those principles both of strict neutrality and impartial justice, which have ever characterised its intercourse with foreign nations, and greatly contributed to its elevated character both at home and abroad." Although many members of congress were in favor of an immediate recognition, and many more were in feeling strongly inclined in the same direction, yet the judgment of the majority was, that the time had not yet come for such a step, and so the affair was passed over. The recognition cannot now take place till the next meeting of congress. In the mean time there are various indications that Texas will have to pass through another ordeal. That it may result, like the former, in the success of her arms, and that it may secure the establishment of her independence, must, we think, be the wish of every American.

MEXICAN OFFICIALS.

The National Intelligencer, in publishing the following correspondence, translated from that paper, says—It will be remarked that Filisola asserts that Santa Ana had only 800 men with him. Gen. Castillon, it appears, was not killed, as former accounts have stated. But the most important fact in the Mexican officials is, the decree of the congress, whereby all Santa Ana's acts, while a prisoner, are declared null and void. It seems that the nearest friends of the captive president—those whom he had left to administer the government during his absence—have adroitly taken the lead in directing the national energies, and left his personal fate to be decided by events. This, we think, was not expected. It was rather supposed that a revolution would take place; or, at any rate a violent struggle of parties for ascendancy in the government, under favor of which the Texans might have had time to consolidate their independence.

Under the present state of things, it appears that the Texans will yet have to encounter all the energy which it is in the power of the republic of Mexico to exert for the recovery of the ground she has lost.

Department of the army and navy.

His excellency the provisional president of the Mexican republic has been pleased to forward to me the following decree:

DECREE.

The provisional president of the Mexican republic to the citizens.
Be it known, that the general congress has decreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The government will appeal to the patriotism of the Mexican people, and will exert all the means in its power to carry on the war in Texas, until the national honor is vindicated, the interests of the republic secured, and the liberty of the president general restored.

2. The successful co-operation of any native citizen or foreigner, in restoring to liberty the said president general, will be esteemed a distinguished service by the congress, with the intention of rewarding it in an honorable manner.

3. The government will carry into effect the provisions of the first article, without paying any attention to any stipulations made, or to be made, with the enemy, by the captive president, all of which are declared and are to be considered as null and void.

[There are a few other articles respecting the manner of apportioning the raising of new troops.]

ANTONIO MONTOZA, president of the congress.

JOSE R. MALO, secretary.

RAFAEL DE MONTALVO, secretary.

Let this decree be printed, published and circulated.

JOSE JUSTO CORRO, provisional president.

JOSE MARIA TORNEL, secretary of the army and navy.

Palace of the national government, Mexico, May 20, 1836.

[CIRCULAR.]

The provisional president of the Mexican republic to the citizens.

Be it known, with a view to manifest the just feeling of the nation and the army, excited by the captivity of that eminent friend of his country, Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, the following regulations are to be observed:

1. In the daily orders of the army, in all garrisons and military bodies, the following words are to be inserted:

"On the 21st of April, 1836, Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, president general of the republic, was made prisoner, fighting to preserve the integrity of the national territory."

2. During the captivity of his excellency the president of the republic, a band of black crepe shall be attached to the colors and standards of the troops of the Mexican army.

3. The national flag shall be lowered half-mast until the president general is restored to liberty.

JOSE JUSTO CORRO, provisional president.

JOSE MARIA TORREL, secretary.

Despatch of Filasola to the general government.

His excellency the president, general-in-chief of this army, left Holidort on the Brassos the 15th of this month, to operate on the enemy, taking with him 700 men and one six-pounder, and leaving at Holidort, on the right bank of the river, the remainder of the troops commanded by his excellency in person. I reached that station on the 16th, when general Ramirez y Sesma delivered up the command to me, and I remained there in camp according to the orders his excellency left for me on the march. His men were defeated on the 21st, a little beyond Harrisburg. I have, in consequence, reunited under my immediate command all the divisions of the army, including the troops under generals Gaona y Urrea. Being now without any base of operations, his excellency not having communicated any to me, I am going to establish myself on the Colorado, where I can receive reinforcements, and reorganize the army for the recommencement of military operations, &c.

VICENTE FILASOLA.

Plantation of Madame Pauli, five leagues from the river Brassos, April 25, 1836.

To his excellency the secretary of the army and navy:

I have this day received the official and private communication from his excellency the president Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, which I inclose to your excellency, and have sent him an answer, of which the following is a copy.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: As soon as I heard by some officers and the troops which had escaped, of the unfortunate encounter which your excellency communicated to me in your letter of the 23d, I took measures to concentrate the army, and having succeeded, marched upon this point, disembarassing myself of some useless things, with the intention of taking again the initiative upon the enemy; but in consideration of your excellency's communication, and the particular circumstances connected with it, and desirous of giving a proof of my high regard for you individually, as well as for the prisoners your excellency speaks of, I am preparing to repossess the Colorado, and shall discontinue hostilities, if not provoked to renew them by the enemy.

Generals Gaona, Urrea and Ramirez y Sesma, with their divisions, are, as I have said before, now united with me. Your excellency knows well what the forces now at my disposition would enable me to effect, and is consequently aware that I cease hostile operations, notwithstanding my responsibility to the supreme government, solely, I repeat, for considerations due to your own person, and to the peace of the republic. On the other hand, I am desirous of being assured that proper respect is paid to your excellency and the other prisoners, all of which is observed to the various prisoners of the enemy now in my hands.

Hostilities having ceased, as I have told, your excellency's property also will be respected, and nothing taken which is not absolutely necessary for the army. Where there is any owner present, it shall be religiously paid for, as it always would have been if they had not abandoned and burnt the greater part of their habitations. A few wooden houses have been burnt, and myself and the generals under my orders have been very indignant on this account. Disorders of this kind are committed by the bad subjects which are never wanting in armies, and I had ordered similar transgressors in future to be punished with death, before I received your excellency's letter.

As your excellency informs me that you have agreed upon an armistice with general Houston, without informing me of the particulars, I have directed general Don Adrian Wall to inform himself of them, that they may be mutually complied with, &c. &c. &c.

VICENTE FILASOLA.

San Bernardo, April 28, 1836.

Letter from gen. Santa Ana to gen. Filasola.

The small division operating under my immediate command having had an unfortunate encounter yesterday evening, the result has been that I am a prisoner of war with the enemy, who has preserved towards me every possible respect. In consequence, your excellency will direct general Gaona to counter-march to Béjar to await orders, in like manner as your excellency will do with the troops under your orders. You will direct general Urrea to retire with his division to Guadalupe Victoria. A provisional armistice having been agreed upon with general Houston, negotiations will be entered into to put an end to the war forever.

Your excellency may dispose, for the use of the army, which from this time remains under your command, of the supplies and funds which are at Metamoras and Victoria, independent of the twenty thousand dollars which ought to be in the army chest on leaving Béjar. &c. &c. &c.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA.

San Jacinto, April 23, 1836.

[PRIVATE.]

General Santa Ana to general Filasola.

MY ESTEEMED FRIEND AND COMRADE: As I am ignorant of the period I shall have to remain here, and you are retiring into the interior, I wish you to send me my equipage, that of my comrade Almonte, that of Castillon, that of Nunez, and a trunk of my secretary, Caro, which is in the chamber, with those belonging to me, sending a confidential person with the muleteers and guide who will conduct them to this camp, and delivering him the inclosed safe conduct, that no accident may occur on the road.

I recommend to you to comply with my official orders, respecting the retreat of the troops, as early as it is possible. It is necessary for the security of the prisoners, and particularly for that of your affectionate friend and comrade,

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA.

San Jacinto, April 26, 1836.

To his excellency Don Vicente Filasola.

IMPORTANT TREASURY CIRCULAR.

To receivers of public money, and to the deposit banks.

Treasury department, July 11, 1836.

In consequence of complaints which have been made of frauds, speculations and monopolies, in the purchase of the public lands, and the aid which is said to be given to effect these objects by excessive bank credits, and dangerous, if not partial, facilities through bank drafts and bank deposits, and the general evil influence likely to result to the public interests, and especially the safety of the great amount of money in the treasury, and the sound condition of the currency of the country, from the further exchange of the national domain in this manner, and chiefly for bank credits and paper money, the president of the United States has given directions, and you are hereby instructed, after the 15th day of August next, to receive in payment of the public lands nothing except what is directed by the existing laws, viz: gold and silver, and, in the proper cases, Virginia land scrip: provided, that, till the 15th December next, the same indulgences heretofore extended as to the kind of money received, may be continued for any quantity of land not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres to each purchaser who is an actual settler, or bona fide resident in the state where the sales are made.

In order to insure the faithful execution of these instructions, all receivers are strictly prohibited from accepting for land sold any draft, certificate, or other evidence of money or deposit, though for specie, unless signed by the treasurer of the United States, in conformity to the act of April 24, 1820. And each of those officers is required to annex to his monthly returns to this department the amount of gold and of silver respectively, as well as the bills received under the foregoing exception; and each deposit bank is required to annex to every certificate given upon a deposit of money the proportions of it actually paid in gold, in silver and in bank notes. All former instructions on these subjects, except as now modified, will be considered as remaining in full force.

The principal objects of the president in adopting this measure being to repress alleged frauds, and to withhold any countenance or facilities in the power of the government from the monopoly of the public lands in the hands of speculators and capitalists, to the injury of the actual settlers in the new states, and of emigrants in search of new homes, as well as to discourage the ruinous extension of bank issues and bank credits, by which those results are generally supposed to be promoted, your utmost vigilance is required and relied on, to carry this order into complete execution.

LEVI WOODBURY, secretary of the treasury.

SURVEYING AND EXPLORING EXPEDITION

TO THE PACIFIC OCEAN AND SOUTH SEAS.

We learn that the president has given orders to have the exploring vessels fitted out, with the least possible delay. The appropriation made by congress was ample to insure all the great objects contemplated by the expedition, and the executive is determined that nothing shall be wanting to render the expedition in every respect worthy the character and great commercial resources of the country.

The frigate Macedonia, now undergoing thorough repairs at Norfolk, two brigs of two hundred tons each, one or more tenders, and a store ship of competent dimensions, is, we understand, the force agreed upon, and to be put in a state of immediate preparation.

Captain Thomas Ap C. Jones, an officer possessing many high qualities for such a service, has been appointed to the command; and officers for the other vessels will be immediately selected.

The Macedonia has been chosen instead of a sloop of war, on account of the increased accommodations she will afford the scientific corps, a department the president has determined shall be complete in its organization, including the ablest men that can be procured, so that nothing within the whole range of every department of natural history and philosophy shall be omitted. Not only on this account has the frigate been selected, but also for the purpose of a more extended protection of our wharfen and traders; and to impress on the minds of the natives a just conception of our character, power and policy. The frequent disturbances and massacres committed on our seamen by the natives inhabiting the islands in those distant seas, make this measure the dictate of humanity.

We understand also, that to J. N. Reynolds, esq. the president has given the appointment of corresponding secretary to the expedition. Between this gentleman and captain Jones there is the most friendly feeling and harmony of action. The cordiality they entertain for each other, we trust, will be felt by all, whether citizen or officer, who shall be so fortunate as to be connected with the expedition. [Globe.]

APPROPRIATIONS OF THE LAST SESSION OF CONGRESS.

Report from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the senate, showing the amount of appropriations made by acts passed at the last session of congress, &c. &c.

Treasury department, July 6, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to report on the several matters contained in a resolution of the senate, passed June 25th, 1836, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the senate on the 4th day of July as follows:

1. The amount of outstanding appropriations of former years, unexpended on the 1st of January, 1836, and chargeable upon the present year.

2. The amount of permanent appropriations chargeable on the present year.

3. A detailed list of the acts of a general or public nature passed at the present session of congress, and the amount appropriated by each act.

4. A statement of the number of private bills passed at the present session, and the aggregate amount appropriated by them.

5. The amount drawn from the treasury during the present year.

6. The amount in the treasury subject to draft.

7. The amount of revenue expected to be received during the remainder of the year.

And if the said report cannot be made before the adjournment of congress on the 4th of July, then to be received by the secretary of the senate, and one thousand extra copies thereof to be printed and distributed as other public documents."

1. In answer to the first inquiry concerning "the amount of outstanding appropriations of former years, unexpended on the 1st of January, 1836, and chargeable upon the present year," I have to remark that it was $8,726,990.

2. "The amount of permanent appropriations chargeable on the present year" is ascertained and computed to be $3,913,670. As part of this amount depends on estimates, a schedule is annexed of each act, and the sums already paid, and those expected to be paid, under each.—(A.)

3. "A detailed list of the acts of a general or public nature, passed at the present session of congress, and the amount appropriated by each act," is annexed.—(B.)

The sums appropriated are in several cases indefinite and uncertain, but have been estimated from the best data attainable. They will amount in the aggregate, as ascertained and computed, to $34,577,018.

4. "A statement of the number of private bills passed at the present session, and the aggregate amount appropriated by them," is subjoined.

The whole number of such bills has been 289, and the amount appropriated by them, as ascertained where certain, and as computed where uncertain, is $220,000.

5. "The amount drawn from the treasury during the present year," up to the 30th of June, 1836, and exclusive of the Chickasaw fund, is $11,281,177.

6. "The amount in the treasury subject to draft," excluding the Chickasaw fund and unavailable assets, was on the 27th June, 1836, by the treasurer's report, $34,652,464.

7. "The amount of revenue expected to be received during the remainder of the year" is $16,000,000.

Should the receipts from lands continue to be unusually large, this estimate may be too low; whereas, if they fall off very much, it will prove too high. On that subject it is impossible to attain any great degree of certainty at this time. If any thing is received from the bank stock of the United States before the close of the year, the amount of revenue may be increased to that extent above the preceding estimate.

From the above reply to all the inquiries in the resolution of the senate, the general results, presented in a condensed form, are as follows:

The whole charges on the treasury for 1836, ascertained and estimated, are $47,437,678, viz:

Appropriations outstanding 1st Jan. 1836.....$8,726,990

Appropriations permanent, chargeable to 1836.....3,913,670

Appropriations general, passed in 1836.....34,577,018

Appropriations private, passed in 1836.....220,000

The whole means to meet these charges are, as ascertained and estimated, $61,933,641, viz:

Amount already received and paid out of the treasury towards them $11,281,177

Amount received and now on hand, including what was in the treasury on the 1st Jan. last 34,652,465

Amount expected to be received during the residue of the year 15,000,000

This would leave in the treasury, on the 1st of January, 1837, an excess of $14,495,963 of means beyond the charges; but the appropriations have been made so late the present year, that the excess of money in the treasury, beyond the sum then actually expended, must be much larger, and, though it cannot now be computed with accuracy, will probably exceed 27,000,000 dollars. Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY, secretary of the treasury.

Hon. Martin Van Buren, president of the senate.

COL. RICHARD M. JOHNSON'S OPINIONS.

The following correspondence of colonel Richard M. Johnson, with a committee of the democratic citizens of New York has been placed in the hands of the editors of the New York Evening Post for publication.

From the New York Evening Post.
New York, June 13th, 1836.

To col. Richard M. Johnson.

SIR: As a committee of a general convention of the democratic party of the city and county of New York, in favor of equal rights and opposed to all monopolies, we are instructed to submit to your consideration, as the candidate of the Baltimore convention for the office of vice president of the U. States, the following "declaration of principles" adopted and observed by those whom the delegates have the honor to represent:

1st. That "the true foundation of republican government is the equal rights of every citizen, in his person and property, and in their management."

2d. That "the rightful power of all legislation is to declare and enforce only natural rights and duties, and to take none of them from us. No man has a natural right to commit aggression on the equal rights of another; and this is ALL from which the law ought to restrain him. Every man is under the natural duty of contributing to the necessities of society, and this is all the law should enforce on him. When the laws have declared and enforced all this, they have fulfilled their functions."

3d. That "the idea is quite unfounded that in entering into society, we give up any natural right."

4th. Unqualified and uncompromising hostility to bank notes and paper money as a circulating medium, because gold and silver is the only safe and constitutional currency.

5th. Hostility to any and all monopolies by legislation, because they are a violation of the equal rights of the people.

6th. Hostility to the dangerous and unconstitutional creation of vested rights by legislation, because they are an usurpation of the people's sovereign rights. And we hold that all laws or acts of incorporation passed by one legislature can be rightfully altered or repealed by its successors.

In requesting an expression of your opinion in relation to them, as early as may be consistent with your other avocations, we are directed by the convention to add the assurance of their high appreciation of your political course, and the profound respect and esteem which they entertain for you as a man.

STEPHEN HASBROUCK,
E. W. GRAHAM,
ALEX. M. VACHE,
M. JAKUES,
ALEX. MING, jr.

Washington, June 24th, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 13th instant, enclosing the report and constitution of the democratic convention in New York, and submitting to my consideration the declaration of principles which it contains.

In contemplating man in a state of nature, I have not been in the habit of regarding him as a solitary, but as a social being. We come not into existence in a state of solitude; but the commencement of our being is in the society of our kind, and in a state of entire dependence upon our seniors.

A state of infancy is, therefore, by the law of nature, a state of subjection, and its government patriarchal. When infancy is past, our associations assume a different character. For most of the conveniences and for many of the necessities of life, we are still dependent on one another; but that dependence is reciprocal, and therefore it imposes no obligations, and confers no privileges on one class or individual, which are not common to all. No one has the natural right to interrupt another in the enjoyment of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," according to his own volition; and if man were not deprived, there would be no necessity for human laws or government, to secure to him the enjoyment of these natural rights. To restrain the licentiousness of those who would invade these rights, is the sole object of legitimate government. All beyond this is usurpation. In defining the rules to be observed in securing this object, every man in society is by nature equal, and entitled to an equal voice; and the obligation to contribute to the expenses and services necessary to the protection and support of the institutions by which those rights are guarded, is equally universal. These principles I conceive to be immutable, and the corollary is plain, that the natural rights and obligations of citizens of the same community are equal and universal.

The rights of no class can be relinquished, nor their obligations dissolved, without injustice and oppression.

This you will understand as expressing my views in approbation of the three first paragraphs of the "declaration of principles." On the other three, I believe all the acts of my public life have shown my opposition to monopolies and vested rights. Our natural rights are sufficient, and a legislative body cannot create others. To confer upon any man, or body of men, an exclusive power to exercise them, is only to deprive the rest of the community of their rights. The influence which any man, or voluntary association of men, may gain by their success in any kind of business, will always be sufficiently great and sufficiently dangerous without the recognition of law or the special favor of government. Every generation of men acts for itself and is uncontrolled by the acts of the former generation: so every legislature acts for its constituents, with the same power and prerogatives that its predecessor possessed; and no act of one legislature can of right curtail the power of its successor. Therefore, except in the fulfillment of a lawful contract, such as the reimbursement of debts contracted or payment for services performed, any act of one legislature may be repealed by a subsequent legislature. The preservation of public faith in legitimate acts, is a duty; and beyond this, the obligation of one legislative body cannot devolve upon another. All obligations are reciprocal; and as the acts of the present legislature cannot revert, so the acts of the former cannot bind the present.

I have considered it an unfortunate circumstance that we are become a banking nation. If the original proposition could recur, I should hope that the decision would be given unqualifiedly against the introduction of any other circulating medium than that of specie.

A paper circulation, by increasing the amount, lessens its nominal value; and the bankers derive the benefit.

If the evil cannot be immediately eradicated, we should endeavor by all honorable means to prevent its extension, in the hope that public sentiment will eventually become so universally in favor of the specie medium, that without a general shock to all public confidence "the golden age" may be restored. With great respect and esteem, your friend and fellow citizen,

RH. M. JOHNSON.

RAIL ROADS.

The president and directors of the New Orleans and Nashville rail road company have made their first report. This report gives a favorable view of the prospects of the company. The report of the engineer gives assurance that the country between New Orleans and the Tennessee river will not require grades more than twenty feet to the mile, with a minimum radius of curvature of 10,000 feet, and from that river to the point of destination, a route can be made nearly as favorable, but at an increased cost. After speaking of the utility of rail roads for transporting the mails, the board adds: "The use of them as a means of defending the country is relied on in the able report of the present secretary of war, and the work we are now prosecuting is referred to, when that officer tells us, that 'Nashville may succor New Orleans in sixty hours.'" And it is further stated, that "the mere proposition to execute the work, has given to the land on the line of the road an additional value, greater than the estimated cost of the undertaking." With a view to economy in transportation, the board have yielded to the suggestions of the engineer to use engines of great power, and therefore the width of the track between the rails is to be 5 feet 6 inches, and the rail 3 inches wide and 1 5-8 in thickness. This, it is thought, will produce an eventual saving in the expense of transportation and repairs.

The opening of the rail road from Newark to New Brunswick, took place on Wednesday the 6th instant, with appropriate ceremonies. The cars went through in an hour and thirty minutes. The only link which remains to be supplied in the chain of rail road communication from New York to Philadelphia, is the distance between New Brunswick and Trenton. When this is done, Philadelphia and New York will be within five hours of each other, and it is calculated that the whole distance between New York and Washington, may be regularly accomplished in 13 hours—equalling in speed, the achievements of a first rate horse express.

MEMORIAL OF THE "FRIENDS"

Presented to the senate, by Mr. Buchanan, April 25. See proceedings.

To the senate and house of representatives of the U. States of America, in congress assembled—

The memorial of the yearly meeting of the religious society of Friends, held in Philadelphia, for the greater part of Pennsylvania and New Jersey; all Delaware and the Eastern Shore of Maryland; by adjournments from the 11th day of 4th month to the 16th of the same inclusive, 1836,

Respectfully represents—That your memorialists are aware of the importance of approaching congress at this period, on the subject of slavery—impressed with a solemn sense of duty, and emboldened by that conscious innocence which integrity of intention and purity of motive inspire, they, as free citizens of our beloved country, avail themselves of their constitutional right, respectfully to address you.

The religious society of Friends for a long course of years, have held an unwavering testimony against slavery. Our forefathers were repeatedly and respectfully heard by yours, in the legislative halls of our nation, on this deeply affecting subject.

They passed through good and also through evil report in their Christian labors in this cause. Through all their trials they stood steadfast to their purpose, sustained by the consoling evidence that they sought in singleness of heart, the prosperity and real happiness of all their beloved citizens of a common country.

We, their descendants are animated by the same spirit, and actuated by the same motives which influenced them in pleading the cause of the oppressed.

We do not deem it required of us at this time to delineate the suffering and violation of human rights, which stand inseparably connected with the unrighteous practice of holding our fellow men in unconditional bondage.

It is with feelings of no ordinary character, we have observed recent efforts to lull the consciences of men into a state of false security, by endeavoring to prove the lawfulness of slavery from Christian authority—in the very face of Christ's sermon on the mount, and his positive command: "and as ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise;" and this too by some who make a high profession of Christianity.

We reverence the precepts of our divine Law Giver—these, combined with his spotless example, will forever stand, as a protest against all unhalloved attempts to render the influence of scripture authority subservient to the purposes of injustice and oppression.

In the application now pending before you, for the admission of the territory of Arkansas into the confederacy of these United States, we observe, with deep concern, a provision in her proposed constitution which admits of, and may perpetuate slavery. Against the admission of said state, with such provisions, we respectfully yet earnestly remonstrate.

If we, as a nation, act in accordance with the principles of justice, then we may we confidently hope that divine mercy will be spread as a mantle over our land.

Believing that righteousness alone exalteth a nation we most earnestly desire, that you may be directed in your deliberations by that wisdom which is from above.

Signed by direction, and on behalf of the yearly meeting.

MR. MADISON.

University of Virginia, June 29, 1836.

At a meeting of the faculty, professor Tucker offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

The faculty of the university of Virginia having this day learned the death of JAMES MADISON, formerly president of the United States, and late rector of this institution, would not do justice to their feelings if they did not record their profound sense of his exalted worth, of those talents and public services which made him the pride and ornament of his country, and of those mild virtues which proved an unfailing source of happiness to all around him.

On the services of this illustrious man it is unnecessary to dwell; for what American does not know the parts which James Madison acted in the public councils of his country? And what Virginian needs to be reminded of the unrivalled force of his tongue and his pen in defending her most cherished principles? These monuments of his political wisdom must endure as long as the love of country or of freedom shall find a place in their hearts. But at this moment, when his mortal career has just terminated, our minds are irresistibly drawn from the glory of the orator and statesman to the merits of the man—to that perennial cheerfulness which age could not dim, and not even disease could overcloud—to that delicacy and snivility, and kindness, which would still have made him one of the most amiable of men. Though his matchless powers of conversation had not made him also one of the most brilliant, our memories must always fondly dwell on the pure delight we have experienced in his society, and we can now only mingle our heartfelt regrets with those of his afflicted widow. In obedience to these feelings, therefore,

Resolved, That the faculty of the university of Virginia, in testimony of their respect for the memory of James Madison, former president of the United States, will wear crape on the left arm for two months.

Resolved, That a copy of this preamble and resolutions be sent to Mrs. Madison, as a feeble expression of their sincere and respectful condolence.

J. A. G. DAVIS, chairman of the faculty.

ALFRED T. MAGILL, secretary.

We have heard of but few particulars of the closing scene. Though reduced to the last degree of weakness, his mind continued unimpaired until within a few hours of his decease. We have seen a letter which he dictated, signed and franked, on Monday evening, the 27th, some 12 or 15 hours before his death. It is all the marks of his style, modesty and benevolence. The signature is somewhat confused and blotted, though legible—indicating a head tremulous from debility. It is certainly the very last time he had a pen in his hand.

We understand that he left, ready for press, to which it will be forthwith given, a report of the proceedings of the convention which formed the federal constitution, taken at the time with notes, &c.—and a compendious history of the events which led to the call of that convention. The work will make two large octavo volumes, and be published simultaneously in this country and in England. It is hazardous little to say that no work of greater interest and importance ever issued from the American press. His correspondence and other writings will be published, from time to time, and will constitute a mass of the most valuable political literature in the language.

He left—with the exception of legacies to the amount of $13,000, including one of $1,500 to the university, and another of $4,000 to the colonization society—the whole of his estate to Mrs. Madison, who is constituted sole executrix.

[Fredericksburg Arena.]

The brief but eloquent and touching address of Mr. Adams, on Thursday afternoon, the 30th ult. elicited by the news of the decease of the illustrious MADISON, not less affecting in its manner than in its substance, produced a deep impression on the house of representatives. Few who heard it were not affected by it; and down the cheek of more than one manly face the glistening tear was seen coursing its way. It was a tribute due to departed excellence, innate worth and unsurpassed private virtues.

We hope to be able, at no distant day, to offer to our readers a proper notice of the public life and character of Mr. MADISON. Meanwhile, we have thought that it would afford a melancholy gratification to them to peruse the following account of the state of his health and mind about a week before his death, extracted from a letter from one of his friends and neighbors, to a friend in this city:

"Orange, (Va.) June 20, 1836.

"The health of Mr. MADISON is somewhat improved, though his debility continues. A simple contrivance, carrying him on his couch from his bed to his sitting-room, and back in the same manner, relieves him from the fatigue of walking. To this avoidance of physical exertion, which is attended to on all occasions, rather than to any removal of the cause which create the inconvenience in its use, may be ascribed his slight apparent improvement. Mental fatigue and agitation seem equally injurious in their effects on his system, and require equal precautions against them. Reclining in a posture best adapted to free respiration, he shuns, as far as he may, the uneasiness and irritation of his infirm frame, and dictates, as far as his strength permits, on subjects as require his attention; hears some of us read to him, or converses with those around him. In no respect is a difference of aspect presented by his mind. In his views on important subjects, the same soundness, clearness, vigor, and felicity of expression now prevail that have ever distinguished his compositions; and the same richness and playfulness of imagination, the same draughts from the stores of memory, continue their zest to the latter. It is true that, in dictating, his weakness feels the weight of holding up his memory, and comparing the links already forged with those to be united to complete the chain of reasoning; and, although this awkwardness is felt in health also, in sickness it causes some hurtful irritation. The influx of company, and the excitement from too prolonged conversations, have seemed to me inevitable evils attendant on all his attacks of indisposition; and the present one has not been an exception. He is certainly very much reduced, attenuated to a degree beyond any thing you have witnessed in him; but, such has been the elasticity of his constitution heretofore, in recovering from the pressure of illness, that I still hope for a partial renovation, though his age precludes the expectation of an extended enjoyment of his presence here."

EDWARD LIVINGSTON.

Extract from a record of the proceedings of the grand chapter of royal arch masons for the state of Maryland, at its annual meeting held in the city of Baltimore, June 20th, 1836.

The M. E. grand high priest having communicated to the grand chapter, in an eloquent and pathetic manner, the loss which masonry had sustained in the demise of the general grand high priest, the estimable EDWARD LIVINGSTON—

On motion of comp. Gilman, it was Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to report a suitable notice of this bereavement, whereupon companions Charles Gilman, Samuel Keel, and Thomas W. Hall, were appointed, who reported as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the subject of an appropriate notice of our bereavement in the death of the M. E. companion EDWARD LIVINGSTON, general grand high priest of the G. G. chapter of the United States, ask leave to report:

That in the death of Edward Livingston the great family of mankind has sustained a calamity of no ordinary character; and that although ripe in years, and in full fruition of that reward bestowed upon a long life of usefulness by the gratitude of the good and virtuous of his fellow citizens, we cannot but feel that he has been called too soon from amongst us—too early translated to that rest prepared for those whose virtues here entitle them to a place of perennial bliss hereafter.

In him were united exalted genius, profound acquirements, and untiring industry. To ameliorate the condition of his fellow man, to guide and direct him in the paths best suited to his condition and wants was ever the first, the last, and the chief object of his life. What his virtuous mind conceived, his hand was ever ready to execute; and no difficulty or danger was sufficient to divert him from his object. As a patriot his character stands forth conspicuous with that of the firmest and proudest of America's favorite sons—as a civilian, he was profound and unrivalled—as a diplomatist, perspicuous and unyielding in his country's cause. In the science of jurisprudence his eagle eye saw the insufficiency, the misery and barbarity of principles handed down from the darker ages, and his pen pointed to the remedy. Under his guidance the prison house became what it ever ought to be, "a school of reform," and his code of laws may well be said to be the basis of a system by which instruction is promoted, crimes are diminished, and the sum of human happiness increased.

His mind was a store-house of varied, enlightened and useful knowledge, and his ready genius directed the proper time for energetic action. It is not with him as with many distinguished individuals, destined to be great in a single capacity only; for whether in the halls of legislation, the judicial tribunals, the cabinet councils of the nation, or at the courts of the potentates of Europe, his character has alike shone forth as a star of the first magnitude; and ages yet unborn shall hail the name of LIVINGSTON as that of a benefactor of mankind.

Such was Edward Livingston—the statesman, the scholar, the philanthropist—our companion and brother. But not such only do we deplore him. It is in another and more intimate relationship that this grand chapter, in common with the great masonic fraternity, lament his loss. At a time when darkness and doubt hung over the future prospects of masonry in certain parts of our country. When proscription and persecution went forth at noon day against all who dared vindicate his own or his brother's rights, when the evil passions of man, guided and directed by others, high in power and influence, for the worst of purposes, were exerted against the members of this institution, then it was that he came forward, in the strength of his own character, supported by the integrity of the cause, boldly and fearlessly breasted the torrent of wild fanaticism, took upon himself the highest and most responsible office of the order, and by his dignity and firmness put to silence the clamor of his assailers. To the last period of his earthly existence he never wavered in his attachment to the institution, but by his countenance and support gave evidence to the world that its tenets are founded upon the immutable principles of benevolence, truth and justice.

Impressed with these considerations, and as a memorial of respect for departed worth, the members of this grand chapter have caused this brief expression of their feeling to be spread upon their records, that future generations may know how sensible we, its present members, are of the magnitude of our loss, and how deeply his virtues remain engraven upon our hearts.

Which report was unanimously adopted and ordered to be published.

On motion,

Resolved, That the first four grand officers be a committee to forward a copy of this report, together with a letter of condolence to Mrs. Livingston, the widow of the deceased. A true copy. Attest, CHARLES GILMAN, G. secretary.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF THE CITY OF N. YORK.

The ninth annual fair of this institute will be held at Niblo's garden, 576 Broadway, in October next; opening to visitors on Monday, the 17th, at one o'clock in the afternoon, and continuing at least four days.

Articles designed for premium, must be delivered at the garden on Friday or Saturday, the 14th or 15th, previous. Those intended for exhibition merely, will be received at any time during the fair. The morning of Monday will be occupied by the managers in completing the arrangement of the articles for exhibition; and by the committees on premiums in deciding on their respective merits.

Premiums, consisting of gold and silver medals, diplomas, and other discretionary rewards, will be awarded to successful competitors—a public announcement of which will be made in the saloon, as soon as may be after the reports of the several committees are handed in.

The accommodations of the garden and buildings, though heretofore spacious, have been enlarged and improved since the last fair, affording more and better room for showing the various articles to advantage, particularly woollen and cotton fabrics. A steam engine, suitable for operating machinery of any kind, has been erected on the premises, and the managers confidently rely on our mechanics for sufficient machines to show a "moving spectacle" of their skill and ingenuity, and to impart greater animation to the general scene.

As woollens have now become a great staple of American manufacture, and as it is very desirable that the specimens exhibited should fairly represent the actual state of this important branch of industry, the managers particularly solicit woollen manufacturers to send in samples of such goods as they are usually manufacturing, of different colors and qualities; and in awarding premiums in this department, reference will be had not only to the quality of goods and variety of colors furnished by each contributor. The same remarks will apply also to calicoes, prints, and to cotton fabrics of every kind; and specimens of goods from every printing establishment and cotton mill in the country, will be thankfully received.

Specimens of silk, from the cocoon, to the manufactured article, will merit and receive particular attention, as it is the design of this institute to aid, every way in its power, the successful introduction of this important and beautiful auxiliary to our national commerce and manufactures.

New branches of brass, iron, steel and other metallic manufactures, will also be entitled to particular consideration.

In other respects, the premiums will generally be awarded on the principles adopted at former fairs, and to which experience and public sentiment have given sanction.

The immense number of persons, not from our own immediate vicinity only, but from distant and widely remote sections, who have visited these fairs, has furnished the strongest illustration of the public estimate of their merits, and shows that they afford important and effectual facilities for spreading throughout our country a knowledge of our own resources and capacities of producing the necessities and elegancies of life; and every succeeding year has given the most conclusive evidence of an increased and increasing emulation among competitors. The enterprise thus awakened, the inducements to competition thus created, bring with them, in their results, a tenfold reward to the artisan and inventor.

In furtherance of the leading object and design of our charter, the managers respectfully invite contributions of articles for competition from all parts of the United States, and from every department of industry, of choice specimens of American ingenuity and skill; all rare and valuable domestic productions, natural or artificial; useful labor-saving machines, implements of husbandry, and new models and machines, in all their varieties. Especially would they solicit the delicate and beautiful handiwork of females, (furnishing so much attraction, and commanding so much attention at former fairs.

The managers, in the name of the institute, invite a general attendance of all who feel a gratification in witnessing and contributing to the prosperity and independence of our country, that they may see what the skillful artist and the laboring man—the true patriots of the land—are doing in the grand cause of national advancement; being fully persuaded, from the interest already manifested, and the preparations already making, far and wide, that this great and truly national display will surpass any and all which have preceded it.

IS THE WHALE FISH OR FLESH?

This important question is thus summarily disposed of, in the following article in the Liverpool Mercury:—

"On the 3d of November, 1827, an immense species of the Greenland whale, (Balaena mysticetus) was found on the coast of Belgium, dead, about 12 miles distant from Ostend, by a crew of fishermen; their boat being of too small tonnage to move so enormous a mass, they hailed two other boats to their assistance and the three together towed the whale towards Ostend harbor, on entering which the warps by which it was towed, snapped, and it was cast on the sands east of the harbor, where it was dissected, and afterwards exhibited in Paris and London, I believe. Cuvier, and the professors of the Jardin des Plantes, estimated its age from 900 to 1,000 years, and one proof its great age is in the cartilages of the fingers of the hands or side fins, which are completely ossified, or converted into bone. The dimension, weight, &c. of this animal, were as follows:

	Feet.
Total length,.....	95
Breadth,.....	18
Length of the head,.....	22
Height of cranium,.....	4 1/2
Length of the vertebral column,.....	62 1/2
Number of ribs, 28, length.....	9
Length of the fins,.....	12 1/2
Length of the fingers,.....	4 1/2
Width of the tail,.....	22 1/2
Length of ditto,.....	3 lbs.

Weight when found, 249 tons, or.....480,000
Weight after dissection, 35 tons, or.....70,000
Quantity of oil extracted, 4,000 gallons, or.....40,000
Weight of rotten flesh buried, 85 tons, or.....170,000

A single glance at this stupendous skeleton, would convince any one of the vulgar error of terming the whale a fish. Upon this distinction a judicious writer observes, (vide Edinburgh Cabinet Library) speaking of cetacea, to which class of animals whales belong—"Although their home be entirely in the depth of the waters, they have several features in common with the larger quadrupeds. They belong to the Linnæan class of mammalia, or suck giving animals; they produce their young alive, their skin is smooth and without scales, their blood is warm, and their flesh tastes somewhat like coarse beef, they have a heart with two ventricles, and lungs through which they respire, and being unable to separate the air from the water, as fishes do by means of their gills, they must come to the surface in order to breathe. It is thus by no means strictly scientific to call the whale a fish, yet he is entirely an inhabitant of the sea, having a tail, though placed in a different position from that of other fishes, while his front limbs much more resemble fins than legs, and are solely used for pawing the deep; hence the vulgar, following a natural and descriptive classification, obstinately continue to give the name of fish to these watery monsters."

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

We this week publish the exposition of the Washington "Globe" which accompanied the treasury circular to the receivers of public money and the deposit banks—also a supplementary circular giving notice that receipts of the treasurer referred to in the original circular, will be granted upon payments in the treasury of gold or silver.

The stockholders of the Balt. and Ohio rail road have assented to the act of the legislature of Maryland passed on the 3d ult. providing for the subscription on the part of the state of three millions of dollars toward that work. And there is a strong probability that the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company will also assent to it; as it seems to be settled that a cross cut canal to the city of Baltimore by the valleys of the Monocacy and Patapsco, or by a route diverging from the main canal, at the mouth of the Seneca river, &c. is not practicable—and that, consequently, the canal to this city must be constructed from some point within the District of Columbia.

A cross cut canal, from a point other than in the District, the stockholders there contend would deprive them of their rightful advantages from the main work—but the results of the surveys thus far have dissipated their fears, and they will, no doubt, accept the bill, and thus remove the last obstacle to a measure of vital consequence to the prosperity of the people of this state.

The funeral of the late bishop White, of Philadelphia, whose death is noticed in a subsequent page, took place on Wednesday last, and was attended by a vast concourse of citizens of every denomination. The stores were generally closed in the streets through which the procession passed, and every indication of respect manifested for the memory of one of the most pure and useful ministers that ever labored in the cause of his Master.

The secretary of war has left Washington for Detroit, for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements for his departure for France. His absence, it is said, will not exceed three or four weeks, during which time his place will be supplied by Mr. C. A. Harris, the recently appointed commissioner of Indian affairs.

Major Gates, who was recently stricken from the rolls of the army, is on his way to Washington, and will, it is said, shortly publish the evidence taken before the court of inquiry in his case. His situation has excited much sympathy in the south.

THE CREEK WAR, it will be seen by our accounts, has been terminated, and general Scott called to Washington. He passed through this city on Tuesday last, and is now at the seat of government. During his absence the command devolves upon major general Jesup.

The toasts on the 4th July near the scene of military operations, in the south, are many of them complimentary to gen. Scott. As an instance, the governor of the state of Georgia, being called upon for a toast, gave the following:

Major gen. Winfield Scott—The accomplished soldier, the skilful general and the polite and polished gentleman.

TEXAS CELEBRATION. On Monday last a dinner was given at the American Hotel, New York, to certain zealous friends of Texas, then in that city. Samuel Swartwout, esq. the collector of the port of New York, presided. Among the guests were col. Wm. C. Preston, a senator in congress from South Carolina, general James Hamilton, recently governor of the same state, Messrs. Peyton and Forrester, members of congress from Tennessee, col. Lewis and major Norton, Texian commissioners, &c. &c. The first toast drunk was complimentary.

tary to Mr. Preston for his advocacy of the Texian cause on the floor of the senate—to which he responded in an eloquent speech, and concluded with the following sentiment:

By col. Preston. The western and Pacific progress of our language and our liberty.

The N. Y. Star, in speaking of col. Preston's address, says—"A deep stillness reigned throughout this compactly crowded audience during the whole time that they were listening to, or, more properly speaking, devouring with ecstasy the silver toned and all-absorbing beauties which glittered and dazzled like the course of a meteor through the heavens before those who had the incomparable happiness to be present on this occasion!"

Speeches were also successively delivered by general Ripley, gov. Hamilton, the hon. Mr. Peyton, the hon. Mr. Forrester, col. Lewis, &c. &c.

Gen. Houston's health was drunk with great enthusiasm.

A letter before us, published in the New Orleans Bee, says that about nine thousand Americans, in all, will take the field against the Mexicans!

MR. RANDOLPH'S WILL. We learn from the Richmond Whig, that the general court, on the 15th inst. affirmed the validity of the various wills and codicils of John Randolph of Roanoke, running through the years intervening between 1819 and 1831. The most important feature in the testament established, is the emancipation of his slaves, now numbering about 500, and for whom he makes provision. They settle the bulk of his estate on the hon. William Leigh, judge of the general court; but he having renounced all benefit in order to qualify himself as a witness against the last will of 1832, the effect will be intestacy as to what was bequeathed to him, amounting to about $150,000, which will go to Mr. Randolph's heirs at law. Eleven judges composed the court, and all concurred in the opinions, except one. An appeal, it is said, will be taken to the court of appeals, which will set in November. Much curious testimony was elicited showing the eccentric character of the testator. We will publish the will in our next.

On Wednesday morning last the printing office of the American Bible society, a five story building, situated in Nassau street, New York, was discovered to be on fire, and before it could be extinguished the contents, consisting of a vast quantity of type, eighteen or nineteen power presses, an edition of the Testament in modern Greek, of a Bible in German, &c. were destroyed. The loss of Mr. Fanshaw, the owner of the office, is estimated at fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. He is insured for five thousand. The bible society owned the building, on which they had an insurance of five thousand, and an equal amount on the property within—and in both cases the insurance will cover the loss.

THE NORTH WESTERN FRONTIER. The St. Louis Bulletin of the 4th inst. says that the difficulties with the Indians flanking our western frontier have assumed rather an alarming aspect. Information had been received at St. Louis by the last mail that an engagement had recently taken place in Carroll county, on the waters of Grand river, between a company of bee hunters, five in number, and a party of Indians, consisting of twenty armed warriors. The Indians attacked the white men without parley or apparent provocation, and killed two of them. One of the Indians was killed, and one or two supposed to be severely wounded.

The superintendent of Indian affairs was taking measures to arrest the Indians concerned in this unprovoked violation of treaties.

THE CHEROKEES. The Savannah Georgian states that a council of this tribe was held at Coosawattee, Murray county, (Geo.) on the 15th ult. at which Indians of both the Ridge and Ross, or treaty and no treaty parties, attended. A committee of 12 on the part of the Cherokees was appointed to meet a committee of the citizens of that county. At this conference the Cherokees stated through their committee, that no hostile movement whatever is contemplated by them, and hope that the difficulties which have grown up between the two parties of the nation, known as the treaty and anti-treaty parties, may be settled in a manner satisfactory to both, and that peace and good feeling will be restored.

TONNAGE OF THE UNITED STATES. According to the official reports lately published, the number of American vessels which entered the ports of the United States, from foreign ports was, during the year ending Sept. 30, 1835, 7,023, amounting to 1,352,653 tons. The number of vessels cleared for foreign ports was 7,285, amounting to 1,400,517 tons. This statement includes the repeated clearances of the respective vessels, when they made more than one voyage, and of course shows not the number of vessels employed in the foreign trade, but the number of foreign voyages made by American vessels.

The abstract of the tonnage of the United States, registered or enrolled in the several districts of the United States, shows the amount of tonnage owned in each district and port, on the 31st of December, 1834. This statement shows an aggregate of 857,438 tons registered, and 901,468 tons enrolled and licensed tonnage. Massachusetts continues to be the greatest owner of registered tonnage, but New York has a small excess of enrolled and licensed, viz: in Massachusetts 207,000 tons registered, and 166,000 enrolled and licensed; state of New York, 186,000 tons registered, and 193,000 enrolled and licensed. New York city, total tonnage 359,222, Boston 212,556, New Bedford 74,947, Salem 33,315, Barnstable 34,818, Nantucket 30,727, Plymouth 23,605, Newburyport 23,302, Gloucester 15,547, Portland 57,418, Bath 47,656, Providence 20,323, New London 31,499, Philadelphia 83,520, Baltimore 59,870, Charleston, S. C. 13,759, New Orleans 74,741. The amount built, registered, enrolled and licensed in the year 1834, was 118,330 tons, viz: 98 ships, 94 brigs, 497 schooners, 180 sloops and 88 steamboats; of these, 23 ships, 29 brigs, 115 schooners and 9 sloops were built in Massachusetts.

CORBETT. A speculation is on foot in England to raise money by subscription for the erection of a monument to the late William Cobbett, M. P. The secretary made an application by letter to sir F. Burdett, and announced that a public meeting on this head would be held on June 13, at the crown and anchor tavern, with O'Connell in the chair. This application drew the following keen reply from sir Francis:

"Leamington, June 1, 1836.

"Sir: A letter from you, dated the 16th of May, having followed me here, I lose not a moment in returning, according to request, an answer.

"You invite me to a meeting to be held on the 13th of the month, at the Crown and Anchor, at which Mr. D. O'Connell is to preside, for the purpose of raising a subscription for a monument to be erected to the memory of the late Mr. Cobbett. The application is unique, as the French say, seeing that whoever attends that meeting becomes a public voucher for the honesty, disinterestedness and patriotism of the said Mr. Cobbett. Now, as I believe, or, rather, know the reverse, and as all the world knows my opinion and experience thereon, it would be something worse than foolish in me to attend such a meeting, and I can only wonder at the application. At the same time, I cannot but acknowledge that the united empire could not furnish a more appropriate chairman. Nor can I offer to the committee any contribution more appropriate than Mr. Cobbett's bonds now in my possession, which, as considerably more than fourteen years have elapsed since the money was lent, will amount to considerably more than £8,000. I trust the committee will think this a handsome and suitable offer.

"I remain, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,
"F. BURDETT."

THE UNITED STATES AND VENEZUELA. The Globe of the 14th inst. contains a copy, (in English and Spanish), of a treaty of peace, friendship, navigation and commerce, between the United States of America and the republic of Venezuela, concluded and signed at Caracas, on the 20th January, 1836, by John G. A. Williamson, on behalf of the former, and Santos Michelena, on the part of the latter; the ratifications of which treaty were exchanged at Caracas on the 31st day of May, 1836.

The following is among the articles of the treaty, and is evidently intended to guard against a state of things which it was feared might occur in our recent disagreement with France.

"If (what indeed cannot be expected) unfortunately any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any other way whatever, it is expressly stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any act of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

DUTY ON BLANKETS. The editor of the Savannah Georgian has received from the collector of that port the following information in relation to the duty on blankets.

By a decision of the acting comptroller of the treasury, of 2d July, 1836, blankets measuring 38 by 58 inches, from their size, and being alleged to be much used in the berths of steamboats, particularly to the southward, are entitled to an entry at 5 per cent. the cost being less than 75 cents.

A crazy man named Samuel Bridge, from Philadelphia, arrived in Washington last week, and with all dignity drove up to the president's house, alighted, walked in, and demanded possession. Subsequently, he called upon the secretary of the treasury for the keys, and then proceeded to the house of the secretary of the senate, for the purpose of making arrangements for calling an extra session of the senate! He says it is the wish of the people of Philadelphia that he should assume the duties of president of the United States. He was taken up and committed for safe keeping. Alex. Gaz.

A FRENCH FRIGATE. The French frigate Artemise, attached to admiral Mackau's squadron, now on the West India station, arrived at New York a short time since, and has been highly extolled for the beauty of her architecture and the admirable style of her equipments. The editor of the New York American, who recently visited her, says, that in her construction strength and efficiency are combined with the utmost attainable degree of comfort for the officers and crew. The greatest cleanliness was observable, both in all that concerned the ship and her armament, and in the persons of the sailors. The latter seemed all to be young men, about 450 in number, cheerful, hardy and dexterous. The gun deck mounting 30 long 32 pounders, presents an admirable battery. Each piece is fired by a simple and well arranged percussion lock, an improvement which, for some inconceivable reason, remains yet to be introduced into our navy.

The magazine too is arranged in a manner worthy of our imitation. The powder is all in separate water tight and air tight packages, instead of being stowed in bulk, so that, except by a general fire, no apprehension need be entertained of an explosion of the magazine, nor can the powder be damaged by wet. The store rooms, water tanks, and indeed, the general disposition of the multitudinous resources of a ship of war, appeared to us all admirably arranged.

It so happened that at the time we were on board, the work of the day was finished, and the crew were amusing themselves on the gun deck in dancing quadrilles and waltzes, in a style and with an ease of manner that, we must say, would considerably astonish our old salts, and that might even be imitated with advantage by some of our more pretending landsmen.

To the Chevalier de la Pluice, the commander, who had the complaisance to accompany us through his fine ship, we can very sincerely make our compliment upon the admirable order and efficiency of his noble frigate; and with the more satisfaction, as we trust and hope that the flag she bears, will long float in friendly association with our own star-spangled banner.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT. The public confidence in our mail establishment is evinced by the unexampled extension of its business, as shown by the increase of the post office revenue. The increase of the first quarter of 1835 over the corresponding quarter of 1833, was about twenty per cent. equal to more than $80,000. We annex the income of a few of the post offices for the quarters in question, viz:

GO-A-HEAD! Go-a-head is the very expressive Jonathanism frequently in every man's mouth throughout the states; and therein Jonathan shows himself a worthy chip of the old block, a thriving offshoot of "the old country"—once sober, plodding, old England; but in which, of late years, every man is always trying to go-a-head of his fellows, and "devil tak the hindmost!" is the cry from one end of the kingdom to the other. Time was when your nobleman travelled in his own carriage, drawn by his own fat cattle, and attended by his own fat out-riders, in goodly cavalcade, progressing at the jog trot of some twenty or thirty miles per day, one stage before dinner, and one stage after dinner, and taking their repose o' nights in comfortable inns by the way side—the cattle up to their bellies in clean wheat straw, and the men over head and ears in sheets that smelt of lavender. Merchants and men of trade, and men and women of every grade, followed their staid example whenever by chance either pleasure or business moved them to move from one place to another; and thus every thing went on slowly, but surely; and the treasures of the wealthy were duly spread among the people, even as the careful farmer spreadeth his manure about his fields. But now, your nobleman leappeth into his chariot, and with one solitary fellow in his dickey, and four spur-galled, lean, and lash-maddened posters before him, he scoureth over a hundred miles of road like a whirlwind. His orders are "go-a-head of every thing!" and away he whirls from London to the Landsend, leaving nothing behind him but clouds of dust, a trifle of horse hire and the profits upon one hard biscuit and a bottle of soda water! Merchants, and men of trade; tailors and tinmen, clodpoles and costermongers, lawyers and lollypoppers, all imitate his lordable velocity; from the peer to the peasant, the universal cry is, go-a-head! while seedy innkeepers, by the way side, sigh after them in vain. On our downs, hundreds of thousands of pounds (as the Weekly Despatch observes) are daily gambled away on the interesting problem of which horse among a "rack" can first be induced, by lash and steel, to poke his nose past some particular post; while myriads of men and women, in all the pomp, pride, and circumstance of glorious "intellectuality," jump and gesticulate like excited lunatics, and split each other's ears with shrieking "go-a-head!" Nobles and gentles, soldiers and civilians make matches, and mammonize upon the capabilities of "favorite" horses; and then become jockies for the nonce, and ride their favorites to death in their burning desire to "go-a-head!" while other horses are ridden to death in conveying the important result to some evening newspaper, which builds its little fame merely on its consumption of horse-flesh, and its desire to "go-a-head!" In the metropolis swarms of cabs and omnibuses rush along the crowded streets, unmindful of the lives of the lieges in their way, and reckless of every thing but how to give every body the go-by, and "go-a-head!" In short, every man, woman and child has, some how or other, acquired the bump of scamperaboutness, the age of horse-flesh has got ahead of the age of intellect; the age of horse-flesh will speedily give place to the age of railways; and, by and by, the whole country, from Duncan by Head to Lizard Point, will be one interminable whirl of locomotion, or, rather, low commotion, and the only sound distinguishable above the whiz, whirl and din of machinery, will be, "go-a-head, and de'il tak the hindmost." [Late English journal.

FLORIDA ORANGES. It is known to every one, that during the severe frost of the winter previous to the last, every orange grove in Florida was destroyed. It was believed by the orange growers in the city of St. Augustine alone, that a receipt of two millions of dollars would be the result of the crop of that city. A week previous to the frost which terminated so fatally, a gentleman purchased 4,000 young trees at ten cents each, for the purpose of removal and transplanting in a distant city. These were placed in mats and preserved, and are believed to be the only living ones in the territory. The purchaser, Mr. Butler, for his disbursement, $400, was offered $6,000, which was declined. This gentleman is since dead. Some of the trees have been since purchased, again removed to St. Augustine, and will probably in a few years become prolific.

The Buffalo papers state that, on the 30th ultimo, two men in a boat went over the Niagara Falls. It is not known who they were, but they were seen a considerable distance above the falls, and exertions were made to save them, which were twice nearly successful. But they finally passed the point of hope, and were carried on to eternity amidst the roar and rush of waters. They were seen, and answered to the waving of hats, just as they made the fatal descent into the abyss below, and into another world.

A little girl about 8 years of age, daughter of Herman Thorn, late of Paris, accidentally fell from the precipice at Trenton Falls, on Friday the 15th inst. and was drowned.

THE CREEK WAR.

On the 5th of July, gen. Scott and staff returned to Columbus. The next day, gen. Sanford and staff, and a part of the army of Georgia, returned also, all in excellent health, and encamped in the vicinity of Columbus. The army had scoured the swamps, searching for the enemy, but without success. The army was to be disbanded and paid off at Columbus, as soon as the rolls could be made out, except a sufficient force to overawe the Indians.

The governor of Alabama has refused to give up Jim Henry to the executive of Georgia. The reason for the refusal is, that Jim Henry is a citizen of Alabama, and that he must be tried first by the laws of that state. However, nine Indians, among them the notorious Dave Hardridge, are in jail in Columbus, and will be tried by the laws of Georgia.

With regard to the Indians escaping to Florida, we copy the following information from the Columbus Sentinel of last Friday week:—

We have at length received some definite information from cols. Beall and Holmes, who were in pursuit of the runaway Indians. Gen. Scott received this morning (Wednesday) an express from colonel Beall, a copy of which we have obtained, and publish for the information of the public. Gen. Scott has ordered immediately to the scene of action, the Columbus guards, under capt. Urquhart, Cadet riflemen, capt. Evans. The artillery, capt. Lawhon, and by the earnest solicitation of the Muscogee blues, major Hoxie, who has the command of the whole, has consented to let them have a chance in the expedition. They have left on board the steamers Matamora and Reindeer. Easter Chatta's look out.

Head quarters, near Chickasahatchee swamp, Baker co. Ga.
SIR: In obedience to "orders," I have pursued the Indians to this place, where I find them encompassed in a swamp, said to be 25 miles long, and varying from one to four in width. At 12 o'clock, A. M. the 1st inst. I learned that the Indians were encamped within four miles of this place, but was unable to reach them short of sixteen miles march.

On yesterday about 10 o'clock, A. M. I made an attack upon the enemy, succeeded in driving them from their camp, with the loss of nine that were left dead, and from the signs of blood, I suppose 20 or 30 killed and wounded. The Indians fled precipitately in every direction, but I was unable to pursue them in consequence of the denseness of the bushes through which they retreated, the exhaustion of our men, and the state of our wounded, having seven of them, and two I fear mortally. I think there is no doubt that the Indians are still in the swamp, and from the most intelligent persons here, I am induced to believe they design remaining. We need one hundred friendly Indians, commanded by Paddy Carr, to pursue the Indians and ferret them out, and shall be gratified to receive them as early as practicable. In consequence of the incessant rains, we have had, and having fought in water, we need 3,000 cartridges. In the mean time, I may take the liberty of saying, that the expedition will be brought to a close, and as soon as it is, a full report will be made as early as practicable.

THOMAS BEALL,

col. com. 1st brig. mounted volunteers.

To major gen. Winfield Scott.

Extract of a letter received in Augusta, dated

Macon, 8th July, 1836.

"The war is over—the Creeks all to about eighty taken, and those surrounded in a swamp, by 900 volunteers. The regular troops will remain on the frontier during the summer."

Post office, Columbus, (Geo.) July 8th, 1836.

DEAR SIR: The enclosed slip is cut from the Columbus Sentinel of this instant. Will you be pleased to give publicity to the information it contains.

Perhaps it would be as well not to send any of the Alabama mails this way for a few days, and until I again write you. Yours, &c.

JAMES VAN NESS.

P. M. Augusta, Geo.

Head quarters, army of the south, Fort Mitchell, July 2d, 1836.

SIR: I am directed by major general Scott to inform you, that major general Jesup will, under his direction, establish, in a few days, two military posts on the post route between Columbus and Tuskegee. Very respectfully your obedient servant,

THOMAS J. LEE,

lieut. 4th U. S. art. aid-de-camp.

To the post master at Columbus, Georgia.

It will be perceived by a perusal of the above letter of gen. Scott, that the mail communication between Columbus and Montgomery will be re-established in a few days. We learn verbally from the postmaster here that, by the direction of gen. Scott, two small battalions of regular troops will move this day from Fort Mitchell, and take position on the post route. One battalion will establish itself Caswell's or McClellan's, fifteen miles this side of Tuskegee, and the other at Adams' or Elliott's, twelve miles from Columbus. After the posts are established the troops, or a portion of them, will be kept constantly moving between the posts, in order to arrest any straggling Indians who may be found upon or near the road, and also to inspire confidence as to the perfect safety of passing the road. In addition, capt. Garmany's company of mounted infantry left Columbus yesterday morning for Tuskegee, by the mail route, in order to open the way, as it is some time since the road has been passed over, and will return this day. A mail wagon, with a mail, will be despatched in company with the mounted infantry, and the mail will be continued to be transported regularly thereafter, although it may not be conveyed oftener than tri-weekly for the first week or ten days after the line goes into operation, owing to the loss of stock, and the bad condition of the road.

To all which the National Intelligencer of Monday adds—

We learn that major general Scott and his staff returned to Columbus, in Georgia, on Tuesday, and the next day major general Sanford, of the militia, with a part of the Georgia troops. The Indians—(those who were friendly or who had been captured), were departing on their journey of migration westward, and the troops were to be paid off and discharged.

From Fort Mitchell, on the Saturday preceeding, the contractors for the removal of the Creeks had started sixteen hundred Indians, men, woman and children, for Arkansas. "The hostile warriors, hand-cuffed, marched in double file—a long train of wagons conveying the children, and such of the old women as were unable to walk, followed in their wake."

Head quarters, army of the south, Columbus, Geo. July 6, 1836.

SIR: I came up from Fort Mitchell last evening on business with his excellency gov. Schley, and shall return this evening.

I have had no report from maj. gen. Jesup since he left Fort Mitchell to join the Abiamians, 22 miles west, on the 3d inst.

By a letter just received from colonel Beall, I learn that he has the party of Indians he was sent in pursuit of shut up in a large swamp, in Baker county, about 110 miles below this, and a little south east of Fort Gaines. He has had several affairs with that party, killed nine and wounded many more. The swamp being long and deep, he has called for reinforcements, and I am in the act of sending off, in two steamboats, which will probably ascend the Flint river some twenty or forty miles, about 160 foot volunteers, and forty friendly Indians, to him. The Indians in the swamp, who may amount to about 150 warriors, are supposed to have with them not only nearly all the Creek slaves, but most of the blacks taken in the war from our people.

I think it impossible for the hostile fugitives to escape. Below the swamp, towards Florida, there is a wide tract of open pine wood country, and colonel Beall will have, by to-night, about 400 volunteer horse with him, besides many individuals, volunteers, of Baker county.

I send copies of letters addressed by me to brigadier general Moore and lieutenant Johnson of the navy. It seems, however, that I have not brought with me the copy of my communication to brigadier general Wool, which was despatched from this place yesterday morning.

In that letter I gave him a statement of affairs in this quarter, and said that I should probably be able to send him, if needed, the detachment of United States marines and some companies (belonging to the upper country of Georgia and Alabama) of volunteers.

I have no report from the parties of horse ordered to pursue the sixteen hostile Creeks, who got across the Chattahoochee on the 3d instant, eighteen miles below this. This party of fugitives cannot escape. In haste, I remain, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

WINFIELD SCOTT.

Brigadier general Jones adjutant gen. U. States army.

ORDERS—NO. 28.

Head quarters, army of the south, Columbus, Geo. July 6, 1836.

The second regiment of Georgia foot volunteers, under col. Williamson, will be immediately mustered for an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, by the acting inspector general of the army, major Ansart. The companies will be paid off in succession as fast as mustered, or as fast as practicable, by paymaster major Randall.

The officers of every grade will lend such assistance, in writing, to majors Ansart and Randall, as will facilitate the discharge and payment.

The commanding general hopes to be able, in a few days, to discharge the other regiments of volunteer infantry of the Georgia line, and at a period a little later to begin the discharge of the mounted troops. But he can give no pledge to that effect, and he is sure that no patriotic Georgian will murmur at any little delay which may be dictated by the high considerations of public safety and public good.

Paymaster major Muhlenberg will report himself to major general Jesup for duty in the pay department.

Col. Williamson's regiment will upon being discharged, turn over to the United States quartermaster and United States ordinance officer all the public property in its possession.

By order of major general Scott.

(Signed) FELIX ANSART, acting inspector general.

ORDERS—NO. 29.

Head quarters, army of the south, Columbus, Geo. July 7, 1836.

Major general Scott has been called to Washington, and the command of this army devolves, from the publication of this order, on major general Jesup, to whom, in future, all reports and applications will be made.

The Creek war, though yet to be wound up, may be considered as virtually over. Two parties of the hostile Indians, which have escaped to this side of the Chattoahoochee, are now hotly pursued. The larger of those parties is shut up in a swamp, and from the strength of col. Beall's detachment, that under capt. Jernigans, and the reinforcement sent hence, under major Hoxie, a capture of the whole body of the fugitives seems to be inevitable. The other hostile party will, probably, from the measures in operation, share the same fate. In the late Creek country the number of the enemy to be captured or forced to surrender, is considered quite inconsiderable. Major general Scott regrets that, from the suddenness of his separation from the army, the opportunity is lost to him of doing that full justice to all the corps he has had the honor to command, which their patriotism, zeal and gallantry claim at his hands, and indeed from the highest sources—the government and country.

To his excellency, the governor of Georgia, who has remained on the frontier in order to lend himself in every way powerfully to the prosecution of the war, the particular thanks of major general Scott are due. Before the Georgia line could be mustered into the service of the United States, his excellency had made dispositions of his armed troops, not only to protect his own frontier, but to prevent the escape of the enemy in the direction of Florida. This was the great danger to be guarded against, and all that zeal and ability could effect on his part, has been put in practice and accomplished. It is hoped that this slight acknowledgment, made to the chief magistrate of a powerful and patriotic state, may not be deemed impertinent because coming from a military functionary of the United States. It is eminently deserved. Of the Georgia line, which has constantly acted under the immediate observation of major general Scott, he will ever be happy to speak in terms of the highest approbation. That line has, under its immediate and able commander, major general Sanford, throughout evinced the best dispositions—a readiness to obey orders, to march against the enemy, and to win honor for itself, for Georgia and the union. The greater part of it, for a long time, was held inactive for the want of arms, which, by a series of strange incidents, failed to arrive, while other portions of the same line, in positions on the river, had frequent and severe combats with the enemy. In these, if the Georgian detachments were not always successful, they at least were ready to oppose an obstinate resistance to superior numbers. Captains Garmany, Jernigan, Ball and Fluellen, with their companies, won for themselves much distinction on those occasions, whilst captains Dawson and Pearson, cruising with their companies on board steamboats, rendered highly valuable services. Capt. Dawson, on several occasions, displayed the greatest judgment and intrepidity in marching to the relief of the fixed posts, and landing in the presence of the enemy, in order to destroy his means of passing the river.

Of the Alabama line, with the exception of brigadier general Moore's brigade, major general Scott cannot speak either from his own observation, or on a direct correspondence. Major gen. Jesup, himself an able commander and a competent judge, in his reports speaks highly of major general Patterson and his division, and it is directly known that brigadier gen. Moore, placed on the lower line of operations, has, acting almost independently, made able dispositions of his brigade, and has captured more than two hundred prisoners.

To the regular troops, including the United States marines, the usual praise is due; they have exhibited steadiness, discipline and an eager desire to come in contact with the enemy. Although disappointed in that favorite wish, they have, in all other respects, rendered themselves highly useful.

It is known that the friendly Indians, acting as auxiliaries under general Woodward and others, have rendered valuable services. To them, a great number of the captures and voluntary surrenders are to be attributed.

With his temporary staff—colonel Kenan, volunteer aid-de-camp; major Ansart, acting inspector general, and lieutenants T. J. Lee and Betts, aids-de-camp; also surgeon, Dr. Lawson, medical director of the army, major general Scott cannot take leave without expressing his hearty thanks for the zeal, ability and courtesy which each has displayed in the performance of his particular duties.

Major Ansart, 3d art. having tendered the resignation of his commission, which will be forwarded to Washington, he has permission to repair to that place after having performed the special duties in which he is now engaged, and await the decision of the government.

Colonel Kenan, duly mustered into the service of the United States on the 1st ultimo, is hereby discharged with honor and thanks from that service.

Lieut. T. J. Lee, at the expiration of a week, and lieutenant Betts, at the expiration of a month, will join their respective companies for duty.

Surgeon Lawson will report by letter to major general Jesup.
WINFIELD SCOTT.

FROM FLORIDA.

By the steam packet John Stoncy, captain Freeland, arrived yesterday afternoon from Gary's Ferry, Black creek, we learn that captain Merchant, the commanding officer at Gary's Ferry, (which post captain Merchant named on the 4th instant, Fort Heileman, after the lamented colonel Heileman), had received orders from major Kirby to proceed to Fort Drane and break up that post, agreeably to instructions from gov. Call.—Capt. M. was to leave Fort Heileman on the 13th (yesterday) with the company under his command, and a detachment of capt. Curry's mounted (Florida) volunteers, with a provision train, and expected to remove the officers and men to the nearest healthy spot, contiguous to Fort Drane, (probably to Micanopy, where capt. Lee is at present in command).

The James Boatwright, with the three companies of United States troops from the north, via Charleston, was at Jacksonville on Monday night last, on her way to Gary's Ferry. No Indians had been seen for some time in the vicinity of the St. Johns. Two Indians, part of a small party which lieut. Tyner, (of captain Ward's company of Florida volunteers) fell in with between Newnansville and Suwannee, Old Town, on the 4th inst. were killed by lieut. T's party—the others escaped. We are indebted to a young friend for the following copy of an order, recently issued by gov. Call. [Savannah Georgian.]

GENERAL ORDERS.

Tallahassee, July 4, 1836. The commander-in-chief, with deep regret, announces to the troops stationed in Florida, the death of major J. F. Heileman, late commanding officer of Fort Drane. The loss of this valuable officer will be severely experienced by the whole army. In consequence of the unhealthiness of Fort Drane, and the recommendation of the surgeon and other officers that it be immediately abandoned, the senior officer now stationed in East Florida, will repair without delay to that post and assume the command. Should the ill health of the garrison continue in its present distressing condition, and a removal be absolutely necessary, he will cause a reconnaissance to be made of the neighboring country, with a view of selecting a more favorable position, to which the garrison and public stores may be removed. From the difficulty of removing the large amount of public property at that place, it is important that the nearest position promising good health should be selected. The garrison of Fort Drane, enfeebled by disease, may not be able in its present condition, to change its position and erect another fortification without great hazard both from fatigue and exposure, as well as from the attacks of the enemy. Should the commanding officer entertain this opinion, he will cause a sufficient reinforcement to be drawn from St. Augustine and other posts from which troops may be spared, to enable him to effect this change in his position with safety to the garrison and the public stores. In the performance of this duty, the commanding officer will exercise a sound discretion, bearing in mind at the same time, that this removal must take place in the presence of an active and watchful enemy, ever ready to avail himself of any want of vigilance on our part. The new position which may be assumed will be only temporary, and intended to promote the health of the garrison. Preparations are now making for an expedition into the enemy's country; and so soon as they shall have been completed the regular troops, except a small garrison at each post, will be concentrated at a point hereafter to be designated—when they will be joined by 1,200 Tennessee volunteers, and the forces of this territory. It is expected that the expedition will be ready to move early in August. From the report of the strength of the garrison of Fort Drane it appears there is but one captain and six lieutenants present, while there are four captains and sixteen subalterns absent. Four of the officers present are on the sick report, leaving but three to perform the arduous and responsible duties of the post. If any of the officers belonging to this station are within the territory, and the services in which they are engaged can be dispensed with, they will be ordered to join their respective commands without delay.

If they are abroad, the commanding officer is requested to state whether they are on furlough or special duty, that the proper measures may be taken to procure their attendance. If the services of lieut. Clark, the assistant quartermaster at Fort Drane, can be dispensed with, the commanding officer, ———, will order him to Black Creek to take charge of the public property at that place.

(Signed)

R. K. CALL,
commanding the troops in Florida.

The last Charleston Courier contains the following additional particulars.

"St. Augustine, July 8. We have heard but little of the Indians since their attack on Micanopy. An express arrived here on Wednesday last, from Fort Drane, which brings us the intelligence up to the 5th instant. An officer of the army writes to a friend here, that colonel Warren with 50 mounted men, surprised six Indians at captain Priest's house, about 9 miles from Micanopy, and killed 5 of them, the sixth made his escape. The Indians were comfortably ensconced in a luxurious manner under mosquito nets. Among the killed was an Indian of bad character, named Billy John, a chief of some influence. He begged for quarter very humbly, but it was refused, and he was instantly put to death.

"A letter from Suwannee, Old Town, dated 25th June, states that the plantation of Alex Watson, esq. was destroyed by the Indians on the 18th at midday. A party of men the day previous had a skirmish near there, with the enemy—they lost 1 killed, and reported 4 or 5 Indians killed. The latter kept the field. They are augmenting their numbers daily; but whether they are the Creeks or Seminoles is a matter of conjecture. Mr. Watson's loss is between 30 and 40,000 dollars. The Indians obtained about 2,500 pounds of lead at Watson's, the others plantations in the vicinity will be abandoned.

TEXAS.

The following letters are from the Texian commissioners who were ordered to Matamoras to receive some prisoners as stipulated by a treaty made with gen. Filasola, by whom they were furnished with passports. According to a letter in the New Orleans Bee, immediately on their arrival at Matamoras they were arrested and imprisoned, and their passports taken from them and destroyed. We learn from the same source that gen. Urrea had joined Filasola with 4,000 soldiers, which, with 3,000 under the command of the latter, makes 7,000 men in all now on their march to Texas. The Texans are making vigorous efforts for a determined resistance, and it is stated that about 9,000 Americans will take the field.

A late New Orleans Bee also contains a letter dated Matamoras, May 11th, which announces the release of the Texian prisoners who were confined there under sentence of death. The respite granted them at the earnest solicitations of the natives and foreigners resident at Matamoras, was on the eve of its expiration, when the news of the capture of Santa Ana arrived, and under his decree of amnesty, they were immediately set at liberty.

Matamoras, Tamaulipas, June 9th, 1836.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I am sorry to inform you of our situation. We are detained here for nothing but to keep you ignorant of the enemy's intention; they will soon be down on you in great numbers. Four thousand will leave here in four or eight days for La Bahia, it is supposed via Nueces or San Patricio, and as many more by water, in 15 or 20 days from Vera Cruz, to land at Copano, or Braso, it is not yet ascertained at which place, they will make a war of extermination and show no quarters. My dear friend, you see what treating with a prisoner is, but you must make the best of it; you can fall back to the Colorado, and call all the men to the field, for if you do not, Texas is gone. They have heard that the president is at Velasco with a very small guard, and they say they will have him in less than two weeks. I think you ought to send all the prisoners through to San Augustine for safe keeping. You will have from 7 to 10,000 troops to contend with, many of them cavalry, well mounted, to murder women and children. Now, soldiers, you must not spare any pains for the sake of saving us; we are willing to be lost to save Texas. We are not in prison yet, but to-morrow we shall have quarters in the calaboose. We have good friends, which prudence at present forbids me to mention for fear of detection. Urrea is commander-in-chief of the Mexican army, and says he will not stop short of the Sabine river. You must now work head work as well as fighting. Blow up Goliad and Bexar; you have a sufficient force in the field at once, and will whip them again—be united—let the people of the United States know what kind of a war they make of it, and they will certainly come to our assistance. I do not consider our lives in danger, if in close quarters. To give you as much information as possible, my letter is in this small hand. I bid you adieu in haste. Our cause forever, your friend,

A. TEAL.

I concur with all that has been stated above and foregoing. Your ob't serv't

H. M. RAMES.

Matamoras, June 9.

The messenger who carries this, is strongly recommended by all the friends of this place—the news he carries is of the greatest importance to Texas. In God's name be governed by it. I expected to have carried the news to Texas myself, but to have been made prisoner was not what I expected: I was to have left this evening, through the assistance of the friends to our cause; at 12 o'clock this day, I was called up by general and obliged to give security that I would appear at any time I was called upon, or that I would not leave the city, or else be imprisoned in the Cartel. Captains Teal and Carnes are prisoners also. I hope if their bad faith at the mission at Goliad and elsewhere, will not fully open your eyes to the perfidiousness of these unprincipled wretches, in the detention of our commissioners in this place, as well as myself and four of my men, all with passports from general Filasola, you will hereafter act on principles of retaliation, regardless of consequences to us. If you had shot the officers already taken, I have no doubt the second attack would not have been made.

The information is so full in the other documents and letters that it is unnecessary for me to go into detail; the advice in them pay all attention to, and for heaven's sake pay strict attention and profit thereby. To Galveston and Matagorda, and your prisoners look well. Our situation is bad, but death can ease our troubles. I am your enemy's prisoner,

Maj. W. P. MILLER, legion cavalry.

I certify the foregoing to be true copies of the communications sent by general T. S. Rusk, to this department.

A. SOMEVILLE, secretary of war.

War department, Velasco, June 20, 1836.

Copy of a letter addressed to gen. Dunlap, handed by capt. Mather, steamboat Privateer, dated, Near Sabine, July 2, 1836.

TO GEN. DUNLAP: SIR: Your favor of the 1st of June, reached me last evening, I regret so much delay will necessarily result before you can reach us, we will need your aid, and that speedily, the enemy in large numbers are reported to be in Texas, their force is estimated at from 3 to 12,000. It is impossible to ascertain, but I think it somewhat exaggerated. We can meet and beat them with one-third the number. The army with which they first entered Texas is broken up, and dispersed by desertion and other causes. If they get another army of the extent proposed, it must be composed of new recruits, and men pressed into service. They will not possess the mechanical efficiency of discipline which gives the Mexican troops the only advantage they have, they will be easily routed by a very inferior force, for a portion of that force, we shall be obliged to look to the U. States. It cannot reach us too soon, there is but one feeling in Texas, in my opinion, and that is to establish the independence of Texas, and a most deplorable aspect. Priestcraft and fanaticism have been united against all liberal principles, to establish and maintain this, it is necessary that despotism should be created. The God of liberty will crush it, liberal principles will triumph, and Texas must be free.

March as speedily as possible with all the aid you can bring, and I doubt not but you will be gratified with your reception, and situation. Come the most expeditious route, and do not encumber yourself with baggage. Bring with you arms, and forward such aid to Texas as you can. The troops who were driven from Texas, I understand, refused to return under any circumstances. They returned home miserable, naked and disheartened. For minute particulars of our situation and much important information, I refer you to the rev. S. Bacon, the bearer of this, who has been actively engaged in the cause of Texas. The path of honor and wealth in Texas, is open to the patriotic and chivalrous. I am, your ob't serv't and friend.

(Signed.)

Gen. R. G. Dunlap, Nashville, Tenn.

SAM. HOUSTON.

The president of Texas, David G. Burnet, has issued his proclamation, in which he exhorts the people of Texas to be united in their movements towards the enemy. The following are the orders issued to the people of Texas.

"I, David G. Burnet, president of the republic of Texas, by and with the advice and consent of the cabinet, have ordered and decreed, and do hereby order and decree, that every able-bodied man in Texas, being over the age of sixteen and under that of fifty years do forthwith report himself to the proper muster-officer of his respective municipality, and enrol himself for military duty; and that so soon as a company of 55 men shall be enrolled in any municipality, they shall proceed to the election of their several officers, and shall forthwith march to head quarters, first reporting their organization, and a complete company, to the muster office of the municipality.

And it is further ordered and decreed, that the muster officer in each municipality, shall make out a full list of the names and ages of every male citizen in his municipality, whether absent or present, a certified copy of which list shall be transmitted to the war department. And he shall also keep a list of every man within his municipality, who enrolls himself for military duty, a copy of which record shall be forwarded to the department of war, at the end of every month, from the promulgation of this decree. He shall also send to the same department copies of the several companies returned to him.

It is further ordered and decreed, that all officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, belonging to the Texian army, who may be absent on furlough or otherwise, do immediately repair to their respective posts, and report themselves for duty, on pain of forfeiting their commissions, if commissioned officers, and their pay and bounty, if non-commissioned or privates.

Done at Velasco, the 20th day of June, 1836.

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JULY 4, 1836.

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, from the committee on foreign affairs, to which the subject had been referred, made the following report:

The committee on foreign affairs, to which were referred certain resolutions of the legislature of the state of Connecticut, and the petitions of many citizens of the United States, asking the recognition of the independence of Texas, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report: That the committee have not been able to procure such information of the condition of Texas, as to determine whether the people of that state have in successful operation a civil government, capable of discharging the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power. By the constitution of the United States, the duty of conducting negotiations, and of superintending our relations with foreign states, is devolved on the president. That, as necessarily incident to this duty, subject to the control of congress, he has authority to collect information of the civil, military and political condition of such foreign states with which the United States may have, or may desire to maintain, a friendly intercourse.

Your committee are satisfied that the president has taken the proper prudent measures to enable congress, with a just respect to the several rights of Mexico and Texas, to decide on the interesting question presented by the resolutions and petitions under consideration.

When this necessary information shall be received in any satisfactory form, it will be the duty and interest, as it is the right, of the United States, promptly to adopt the proper measures to establish with Texas, as an independent member of the family of nations, relations of peaceful and friendly intercourse.

Of the recognition of her independence, under such circumstances, resulting from the principles on which our own institutions were established, and which induced our recognition of the existing authorities in Mexico, no government will have just cause to complain.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

2. Resolved, That the house of representatives perceive with satisfaction that the president of the United States has adopted measures to ascertain the political, military and civil condition of Texas. [Agreed to.]

THE LATE TREASURY CIRCULAR.

On publishing the treasury circular to the receivers of public money and the deposit banks, inserted in our last, the editors of the "Globe" preceded it by the following article, as explanatory of the views which induced the president to give directions to the secretary of the treasury to issue it:

From the Washington Globe.

Prevention of fraudulent speculation, and the conversion of the public domain into paper.

The public mind has been occupied for some months past with reports of frauds, speculations and monopolies in the public lands. Associations of individuals, and even public men, have been charged with these practices; and bank loans, bank certificates of money deposited, and public money in the deposit banks, have been the imputed means of their operations. The land offices, in some instances, have been charged with connivance, and with aiding these associations, to the prejudice of settlers and cultivators. These reports have reached the floor of congress, and have been reiterated in speeches, and made the subject of proceedings in both branches of the federal legislature. In the senate a bill was reported from the committee on public lands, proposed to prevent frauds in the sales of the public lands, and particularly levelled at the combinations of individuals, who, availing themselves of facilities to obtain quantities of what is called land office money, that is to say, bank notes receivable for public lands, attend the sales, put down competition, monopolize purchases at low rates, and then compel settlers to purchase of them at advanced prices; but the provisions of the bill were not deemed to be well adapted to its intended object, and, after a discussion in which the evil was admitted to exist in some states, but the efficacy of the remedy contested, the bill was laid upon the table, with assurances of renewed attention to the subject at the ensuing session. In the house of representatives a more formal movement, and one of more comprehensive scope and grave import, was commenced, but too late in the session to admit of the investigations and matured reports which the subject required. On the 20th of June, Mr. Hunt, of New York, submitted a resolution to raise a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers, to examine into the use of public money, by public men, in speculating in the public lands; which resolution was immediately adopted by the house; and on the 21st day of July thereafter, being the Saturday before the adjournment of congress, Mr. Hunt made a brief report from the committee, indicating the necessity for thorough and extended investigations, and praying for an enlargement of the number of the committee, an extension of their inquiries, and leave to sit during the recess of congress. This application was not granted. A large number of members are opposed, on principle, to recess committees; but the strong vote given for the inquiry, notwithstanding this objection, must be taken as a strong manifestation of the sense of the house in favor of Mr. Hunt's propositions. Notice of intention to pursue the subject, remitted to the next session of course, was given; and thus, in the house of representatives as well as in the senate, the session closed without any final action of congress to detect or arrest imputed violations of law, abusive practices, and improper proceedings in the important concern of the national domain, the national treasure, and the paramount interest of the cultivators of the soil. Congress having thus adjourned, the duty devolved upon president Jackson, as the chief magistrate of the republic, charged by the constitution to guard against the abuse of executive trust, and vested with a supervisory guardianship over the faithful execution of the laws, to examine into the complaints, and to satisfy himself whether a case be made out, either by direct proof or strong presumption, which would require the interposition of any remedy within the reach of his constitutional powers. For this purpose, and in addition to the current reports, and to what was said in the public debates of both houses of congress, the president took into consideration the resolutions reported by the select committee of the house, of which Mr. Hunt was chairman, which seemed particularly to challenge his attention for the extent of the abuses which they inferred, the official character of their origin, the serious weight which the vote of the house attributed to them, and the defeat of final action in that house from want of time and from well grounded objections to a recess committee. Those resolutions were in these terms:

"Mr. Hunt, from the select committee, appointed to inquire whether members of congress or others had procured public moneys of the deposit banks for the purpose of speculating in the public lands, made a report accompanied by the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the select committee appointed by this house on the 20th June, 1836, be increased to nine, and that said committee have power to sit during the recess of this house.

"Resolved, That said committee embrace in their inquiries any connection between deposit banks and others and the land offices for the purposes of speculation.

"Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to whom, for speculation in public lands, the deposit banks have issued certificates of deposit without an actual deposit in cash, and to what extent they have been received in payment for purchases of public lands at the several land offices.

"Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to what extent, combinations in the purchase of the public lands have been formed, or are forming, sufficiently strong, from interested motives, to control to any extent the legislative action of congress."

Here was grave matter, very proper at any time, and especially in the absence of congress, to engage the consideration of the executive. Speculations in the public lands—connexion between the deposit and other banks, and land officers, for the purposes of speculation—certificates of bank deposits, without actual deposits, to aid speculators in purchasing public lands—combinations to engross the purchase, and to control the legislative action of congress in relation to the public lands; such were the serious implications, and startling suggestions, resulting from the proposition of these resolutions; and although they might be merely resolutions of inquiry, and conclusive of nothing, yet they were resolutions emanating from a committee which had commenced an investigation into the subject, and whose application for enlarged powers, increased numbers, and leave to sit in the recess, sufficiently attested their belief in the sufficiency of the grounds for an extraordinary proceeding on the part of the house. Without at all deciding the question how far the implications resulting from these resolutions might be well or ill-founded, as they regarded individuals, the president felt himself called upon by the gravity of their character, reinforced by current reports and public debates, to look into all the points of violated law and abuse of trust, which were accessible to his examination. The most prominent of these evils obviously connected themselves with that which, in the vague jargon of the paper system, is called "bank facilities," comprehending loans of bank notes, certificates of deposit, letters of credit, leave to draw, and all that kind of invisible machinery by which combinations of speculators and associations of official and influential characters would be able to accumulate what is called "land office money," that is to say, any thing except real money, and every thing in the shape of paper, which could be exchanged for public land; and by this accumulation of paper funds, and combination of active members, to be able to become engrossers in the land market, outbid and deter resident cultivators, oust settlers from their selected spots, beat down or buy off competition, monopolize the sales, and then retain a barren possession over the whole, or retail inferior parcels to settlers and cultivators at advanced prices and for real money. Of all these "bank facilities," the certificates of deposit, and the drafts drawn upon them, presented themselves in the most questionable form. Even if legal, they were liable to gross abuses, even to fictitious issues, as implied in one of the committee's resolutions, and would have given to strangers and speculators the undue advantage of making payments on distant banks in their own drafts, while settlers and cultivators would be required to pay down in money counted. This would be a reversal of the rules of propriety; for surely, the cultivator of the soil should have the advantage in the purchase of what he was acquiring for the purpose of using, and that for the public good as well as his own. But this description of "bank facilities" did not happen to be legal. It turned out to be a practice without law, and in contravention of law, and a strange degeneracy from the legal payment authorized to be made to the treasurer of the United States. This is the law:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That credit shall not be allowed for the purchase money on the sales of any of the public lands which shall be sold after the first day of July next, (1830), but every purchaser of land sold at public sale thereafter, shall, on the day of purchase, make complete payment therefor; and the purchaser at private sale shall produce to the register of the land office a receipt from the treasurer of the United States, or from the receiver of public moneys of the district, for the amount of the purchase money on any tract, before he shall enter the same at the land office; and if any person, being the highest bidder, at public sale, for a tract of land, shall fail to make payment therefor, on the day on which the same was purchased, the tract shall be again offered, at public sale, on the next day of sale, and such person shall not be capable of becoming the purchaser of that or any other tract offered at public sale." [Act of April 24, 1820.]

This is the last act upon the subject, and certainly nothing can be more plain than its enactments and its intentions. To stop the credit sales, to reduce the price of lands, (which is done in the 3d section), and to authorize payments to be made to the treasurer of the United States in addition to the receiver of the district, are the objects and enactments of the act. Not one word about deposits in banks, and drafts drawn upon them. Here then was illegality clearly detected in one branch of these "bank facilities;" and a specific order directed to this point might readily lop off one branch of the evil; but the abuse would not thereby be cured. The source of the evil was too wide and deep, and had too many issues, to be cured by lopping off branches. The fountain had to be reached; and that fountain lay in the paper system, in the multiplication of banks, in the floods of bank notes which they issued, and in the general receivability of these notes for the public lands; a receivability which virtually converted the national domain into a fund for the redemption of all these bank notes, and a capital for seven or eight hundred banks to bank upon. To stop the certificates, and leave the notes receivable, would only put the speculators to the trouble of packing the notes instead of carrying the certificate, and the evil to the public would be the same as before. Having reached the source of the evil, the next inquiry was into the nature of the remedy which that evil required. Here the field, so far as the law was concerned, was completely open. No law of congress, now that the 14th section of the U. States bank charter is repealed, and the treasury notes are redeemed, requires any description of bank notes to be received in payment of public dues. The joint resolution of 1816, which relates to the point, is merely permissive of such reception, and refers the selection of bank notes, under limitations to restrict and not to enlarge his action, to the discretion and responsibility of the secretary of the treasury; and this brings the whole matter under the supervision of the president, as the constitutional sentinel over the executive trusts, to whatever agent confided.

The joint resolution of 1816 was intended to restrain, not to unbind, the secretary—to improve, not to deteriorate the currency—to secure, not to endanger, the revenues—to repress, not to enlarge, the power of the banks. At that time very few banks paid specie. There was, in fact, a general suspension of specie payments in the south and west, and throughout the middle states. The federal government by the strange error and deplorable fatuity of not re-establishing the constitutional currency at the expiration of the old bank of the United States in 1811, and becoming dependent upon the local banks for their paper currency, which was received in payment of all federal dues, soon experienced the fate of a dependant; it had to continue the receipt of this paper after the banks ceased to redeem it—it had to submit to their violations of law—it had to treat with them as independent sovereignties—it had to pocket, in the unavailable funds, a loss of a million at least—and what was far worse, ended with agreeing to the necessity of re-establishing the bank of the United States!—that tyrant institution, stronger than an army, which congress cannot disband; and which, under disguise, retains all its original character, and with a state charter retains its national organization, preserves its branches under the title of agencies, and confidently awaits the moment when the people, thrown off their guard, shall permit a bank president to be elected, or a majority of two-thirds of bank senators and representatives, to occupy the floors of congress. These are some of the evils which the general receivability of local bank paper occasioned a few years ago, and which the joint resolution of 1816 was intended to prevent; but they are not all. Monopolies and speculations in land had their reign then as now, and the years 1816, '17, '18, have more parallels than that of surplus revenue, to the present times. The banks to which the joint resolution of 1816 was applicable, at the time of its passage, were comparatively few and of small capital; yet speculations, monopolies, surpluses and unavailable funds were the result. Now the same resolution is applicable to three or four times the number of banks which then existed, with capitals of millions where they then had thousands, and all multiplying and increasing with the annual assemblages of the state and territorial legislatures. With this legion of banks and their floods of paper flowing into the pockets of speculators, and all receivable for federal dues under the joint resolution of 1816, but receivable at the discretion, and upon the high responsibility, of the secretary of the treasury and of the president, a renewal of the scenes of 1816, '17 and '18, was among the results to be regularly counted upon; and, according to the debates in congress, the resolutions of Mr. Hunt's committee, the fraud bill of the land committee of the senate, and the current reports, some of the worst of these scenes are now in full exhibition—speculation, monopoly, fraud, combinations to cheat the government and to oppress the settler—aggravated by suspected connexions between public men and public money, deposit banks and land officers, and giving birth to powerful associations "to control the legislative action of congress," in relation to the national domain and the national treasury! These are serious matters, and brought forward in a way to command inquiry, to arrest public attention, and to require the faithful exercise of high and responsible duties. The general receivability of bank notes for public lands is the root of the evil, the head source and fountain of the mischief. To discriminate between the banks, and to limit the number whose notes should be received, might seem at first blush, a natural and suitable remedy, but brought to the touch stone of practice, would certainly fail. Discrimination between seven hundred and fifty institutions, all paying specie, and all equal in the eye of the joint resolution of 1816, could not but be arbitrary, would certainly be invidious, would incur the censure of favoritism, and, after all, would not extinguish the evil. The favored banks would have their favorites, and the public lands would still be the prey of the speculators favored by them. There are cases in which half-way measures, so tempting to timid minds, only aggravate the mischief they are intended to cure. There are cases which require strong remedies, and this is one of them. A strong remedy was wanting; one that would avoid favoritism and monopoly, while aiming to put all good citizens and all good banks upon a footing of equality, and to stop a fountain whose corrupt issues were supposed to be reaching the federal domain, the federal treasury, and the federal legislation. President Jackson had no difficulty in seeing this remedy. His attachment to the constitution, and to that money of the mint which it intended to guarantee, quickly led him to the medicine which the disease required! But to prescribe it at once, to order it off hand, and from a single view and a first impression, was another and a different question, and required much anxious and careful deliberation. The legal right was clear, but the expediency had to be considered. The effects of specie payments for public lands, on the body politic generally, had to be considered, as well as its effect upon the particular disease of which it was the antidote. Hence the important inquiries: Is the supply of coin and bullion in the country, sufficient for these payments? Will settlers and cultivators suffer? Will the new states be injured? Will the currency be affected? Will the banks be shocked? Will any public or general interest receive detriment? Answers to all these inquiries resulted in slowing,

First: That the supply of specie in the country was amply sufficient to commence the system of specie payments for the public lands. The supply of silver has more than doubled since the removal of the deposits from the bank of the United States on the first day of October, 1833; and the supply of gold has grown from nought to upwards of eight millions since the first day of August, 1834, when the new coinage commenced under the corrected standard. Both gold and silver are now flowing into the country from all quarters, and the product of the mint is unusually great. Upwards of a million of gold was coined in the last month, and about a million and a quarter of silver for the last three months. The new law for transferring money, without limitation of amount, from the deposit banks to the mints, for supplying metals for coining, will keep those establishments fully supplied; and as the branch mints from North Carolina, Georgia and New Orleans will be in operation in January next, the annual coinage will be more than double the amount that it now is; no deficiency of specie can, therefore, be apprehended, either to delay the commencement of specie payments for public lands, or to keep them up in time to come. The supply both of gold and silver, will be abundant. Their exportation will be prevented by creating a use and demand for them at home. To diffuse them through the country, and get them out of the vaults of the banks into the hands of the people, will be the only concern and trouble of the government.

Secondly: Settlers and cultivators will not suffer. An exception is made in their favor by which specie payment will not take effect upon them until the first of December; and after that, they will find their advantage in diminished competition from speculators and monopolizers, those masters of the land market, who engross by means of paper loans and "bank facilities;" who can now come into the market with any quantity of bank notes, but who, under the new regulation, will find themselves reduced to their actual capital, a comparatively small sum when counted down in gold and silver. As an act of justice, and real favor, to the settlers and cultivators, the new regulation will shine pre-eminent in depriving their arch enemies of the means of out-bidding, oppressing and tyrannizing over them. Their own wants will not be great. A few hundred hard dollars, into which they can speedily convert what good notes they have, will get them a home, or a settlement for a child, or an addition to their farms; while the speculator will and it difficult to raise and transport fifty or an hundred thousand dollars in the same good metal.

Thirdly: The new states will not be injured; on the contrary, they will be benefitted and blessed. In the first place, they will be freed from the intrusion of strange notes from distant banks, which would otherwise be forced into circulation through the credit obtained for them at the land offices by the importunate instances of interested parties. In the next place, they would be freed from all uncertainty about that never ending and forever changing subject of inquiry, vexation, loss, imposition, elucation and shaving in that most chameleon article called land "office money." Henceforth every body will know what land office money is. It will no longer be an article of discount and premium; and it will cease to be an article which paper machines can strike off in masses for their friends and favorites. All will know what land office money is, and every man that can get money at all, can get land office money. In the third place, it will improve the currency of the new states by pouring into them a perennial supply of the precious metals. Gold, especially, will be carried into their bosom by every emigrant, traveller and purchaser of land.

Fourthly: The general currency of the union will be radically and beneficially affected. It will increase the specie and diminish the paper part of the circulating medium. Bank notes will be less suitable for travelling; gold will be more required; and the incarcerated millions which now lie in the Atlantic banks will come forth, not for exportation, but for immigration to the interior. Great will be the advantage to the general currency by this certain increase of its specie basis.

Fifthly: Good banks will not be shocked, and bad ones ought to be. Under the late law, notes under ten dollars can no longer be paid out; those under twenty dollars cannot be paid out after the third of March next; none of these denominations of notes, or any other, can be paid out, unless they are payable and paid on demand in gold or silver, at the place where issued, and equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and as such convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without loss or delay to him. This last provision is the most important one. Unless violated, no bank note of any kind can be paid out by the federal government except at the place where the bank has provided specie to redeem it, and for which the holder of the note, as a matter of right, not of favor, can exchange it for specie. Corresponding with this law against paying out bank paper, is the treasury regulation against receiving it; so that without a double violation of law and regulation, the general use of local bank paper is already greatly restricted; and the importunate prayers of some banks to have their paper made land office money so as to give it credit abroad, and extend its circulation, would only be prejudicial to themselves if granted; and the laws and regulations be observed by the officers; for it would only be collected in masses and returned upon their hands for redemption. The injury to banks then can only turn upon the idea that their paper was to become the currency of the country, without restriction of any kind—an idea utterly reprobated, entirely at war with the policy of the administration, wholly incompatible with the theory of a gold currency, and leading to the disastrous scenes of twenty years ago; banishment of specie, depreciation of paper, derangement of the currency, explosion of banks, subjection of the federal government to local institutions, a fresh accumulation of unavailable funds, loss of all confidence, and the re-establishment of the bank of the U. States.

Sixthly: No public or general interest will receive any detriment. The sales of the public lands will be less, but the pay will be better. Settlers and cultivators will buy as much as ever; and they are the only purchasers the government should desire to see. Speculators, monopolizers, bank favorites, and their friends alone, will be checked; and this is precisely what the fraud bill of Mr. Ewing, in the senate, and the investigating resolutions of Mr. Hunt, in the house of representatives, assumed that it was necessary to prevent. Associations of public men, if any, to monopolize public land with public money; combinations, if any, to control the legislative action of congress in relation to the federal domain and the federal treasury; bank facilities for the aid of the speculator and the oppression of the settler; illegal drafts upon deposit certificates; the public complaints and the general dissatisfaction, will all cease, and the federal domain become what it ought to be, the fruitful property of the cultivator, and not the barren possession of the speculator.

Times every question of expediency, as well as the question of legal right, was solved in favor of the exclusion of bank paper from public land payments; and happily, the republic possessed in president JACKSON the chief magistrate which the occasion required; a chief magistrate exclusively devoted to the public good, cautious in his councils, circumspect in his deliberations, firm in his resolves, vigorous in his actions, and fearing no responsibility when duty and conviction require him to act. Now, as in the great measure of the removal of the deposits, the president has felt it his duty to exercise the powers delegated to him by the constitution and direct the adoption of the present measure, for which he holds himself responsible to his countrymen, and upon their judgment and the unerring test of time he confidently reposes.

With these introductory remarks, we conclude the subject by presenting to our readers the circular of the secretary of the treasury.

The following, which takes the form of an advertisement published in the official papers, may be considered as a supplement to the decree of the executive, promulgated recently, in the form of a circular, from the treasury department.

[Nat. Int.]

Treasury of the United States, July 15, 1836.

The second section of the act of congress entitled "an act making further provision for the sale of the public lands," approved 24th April, 1820, having provided "that the purchaser at private sale shall produce to the register of the land office a receipt from the treasurer of the United States, or from the receiver of public moneys of the district, for the amount of the purchase money on any tract, before he shall enter the same at the land office," and the president of the United States, in his decision relative to the exclusive receipt of gold and silver by the receivers of public moneys in payment for the public lands, having directed that "in case of payments made for lands to the treasurer of the United States under the act of 24th April, 1820, his receipt shall also express the amount received in gold, and the amount in silver"—notice is hereby given, that the receipts of the treasurer of the United States to be issued in pursuance of the above act, and to be applied in payment for public lands purchased at private sale, will be granted only upon payments in the treasury of gold or silver.

P. G. WASHINGTON, acting treasurer U. S.

July 16.

TREASURY CIRCULAR.

Treasury department, first comptroller's office, July 11th, 1836.

SIR: You will receive, herewith, for your information and government, copies of the two following acts, both approved the 4th instant:

1. "An act to repeal so much of the act of March second, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, as respects the issuing of certificates on the importation of wines."

2. "An act to suspend the discriminating duties upon goods imported in vessels of Portugal, and to reduce the duties on wines."

The first mentioned act, and the first section of the latter, took effect the day on which they were respectively approved; and the two remaining sections of the latter are to go into operation from and after the 30th instant. For the duties which may be refunded by you on wines, you will take receipts in the usual form, and render separate abstracts thereof.

From an examination of the acts, their provisions appear to me to be so clear and explicit as not to require any other explanation than that which has already been given. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed)

GEO. WOLF, comptroller.

An act to repeal so much of the act of March second, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, as respects the issuing of certificates on the importation of wines.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That so much of the act of congress, passed second of March, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, as requires that the surveyor or chief officers of inspection of any port, where wines may be landed, shall give to the proprietor, importer or consignee thereof, or his or her agent, a certificate, as mentioned in the fortieth and forty-first sections of said act, is hereby repealed.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

An act to suspend the discriminating duties upon goods imported in vessels of Portugal, and to reduce the duties on wines.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That so much of the several acts of congress as imposes a discriminating duty upon goods, wares and merchandise imported in foreign vessels be, and hereby is, suspended, so far as respects the produce or manufactures of Portugal proper, including Madeira, Porto Santo and the Azores, when imported in vessels wholly and truly belonging to the subjects or citizens of said places; so that such produce or manufactures shall be subject to the same duties only as if imported in vessels of the United States: Provided, however, And this suspension shall continue no longer than this section remains in force.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirtieth day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, the duty on all kinds of wine imported into the United States shall be reduced one-half, so that no more than one-half the amount now assessed shall be thereafter passed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all kinds of wine, whether imported before or after the passage of this act, may be put into the custom house stores, under the bond of importer or owner; and such of the said wines as shall remain under the control of the proper officer of the customs, on the thirtieth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, shall be subject to no other duty than if the same were imported after that day; and if the duties, or any part thereof, on the wines deposited as aforesaid, shall have been paid previous to the said thirtieth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, the amount of excess of duty shall be refunded to the person importing and depositing the same: Provided, That no wines shall be so deposited unless in the casks or bottles as imported: And provided, further, That the benefit of this act shall not be extended to any wines not entitled to debenture.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

PENSIONS.

From the Globe.

The following circular, addressed to the agents for paying pensions, is published for the information of the United States pensioners:

CIRCULAR.

Treasury department, 2d comptroller's office, June 30, 1836.

Agent for paying pensions:

Sir: You will perceive by the annexed act of congress that the law there referred to will not be construed to authorise the pension of any pensioner of the United States to be withheld, and that the intention of congress in enacting the explanatory law of 20th May, 1836, was to place the claims and rights of pensioners on precisely the same footing as if the act "to prevent defalcations," &c. had never been passed; and consequently, that all money due to pensioners which have been and are yet withheld under the construction heretofore given to that law, and for that reason only, ought to be refunded to them.

You will please withdraw all stoppages directed to be made against the United States pensioners since the passage of the act of 25th January, 1828, and upon the forms and instructions being complied with, as in all other cases, pay the six month's pension due on the 4th March last.

JOHN N. MOULDER, acting comptroller.

An act explanatory of the "act entitled an act to prevent defalcations on the part of the disbursing agents of the government, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the act entitled "an act to prevent defalcations on the part of the disbursing agents of the government, and for other purposes," approved the 25th of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-eight, shall not be construed to authorise the pension of any pensioner of the United States to be withheld.

Approved, May 20th, 1836.

REGULATIONS FOR MILITIA WHEN IN SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

GENERAL ORDER, NO. 49.
Head quarters of the army, adjutant general's office, Washington, July 12, 1836.

The following revised regulations on the subject of returns, reports and detachments of militia, when called into the service of the United States, are published for general information, and the guidance of the several officers concerned:

I.—POST MONTHLY RETURNS.

1.—The commanding officer of every post or separate station* will transmit to the adjutant general of the army, on the 1st day of each month, an exact return, according to the form prescribed, of all the troops under his command during the preceding month; specifying the name and station of each officer present, and also of each officer absent, with the reason for, and the time of his absence.

2.—When a post or station is garrisoned by different regiments, or parts of different regiments, the troops will be reported on the monthly return by regiments; but if the troops be of the same regiment, they will be reported by companies.

3.—Commissioned officers at the post will be accounted for by name, in order of rank, and are to be classed and arranged under separate heads, as follows:

1st. "Present at the post." 2d. "Absent:" as those who may be on "staff duty," "recruiting service," "ordnance duty," "military academy," "topographical duty," "other special duty," "with leave," "without leave," &c.

4.—Whenever any change takes place in the position or location of troops, the fact will be reported by the immediate commanders to general and department head quarters, specifying the date of departure of the whole or any part of the troops, or the date of arrival of the same, as well as all other circumstances connected with the movement. These special reports will always be accompanied by an exact return of the troops, according to the established printed forms. A similar report of such changes will be noted on the next regular monthly return of the post or station.

*The senior officer, serving with any body of troops, wherever he may be, will, on the last day of the month, forward a return of his command, as required by this paragraph.

II.—FIELD RETURNS—ACTIVE SERVICE.

During a campaign, or any active operations in the field, the general or other commanding officer will transmit to the adjutant general regular monthly returns of all the troops under his orders; and sometimes weekly field returns may be necessary, in order that the executive may, at all times, or at short intervals, be made acquainted with the exact condition and strength of his command.

III.—FIELD REPORTS.

Reports relative to battles, or an affair in which a loss may be sustained, will always be accompanied with a separate return of the killed, wounded and missing, in which the name, rank and regiment of each individual will be specified, with such remarks set opposite the names, respectively, as may be requisite for the records of the department of war, or be necessary to establish the just claims of any survivor, who may have been wounded, (taking care to specify the nature of the wound, the time and place of its occurrence, the name of his captain, colonel or other officer, &c.) or of the heirs and representative of any killed in action.

ABSENT—ON LEAVE.

1.—Officers absent with leave are to report their address to the adjutants of their regiments, and to the adjutant general, monthly.

MILITIA AND VOLUNTEERS.

1.—“Whenever detachments of militia are called into the service of the United States, by any officer authorised to make such call, the number of officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, will be stated in the requisition, and the proportions between them will be the same as is prescribed by the act of congress. Requisitions will never be made for companies, regiments or brigades.

2.—“Such detachments as are called or received into the service of the United States, will be mustered before they shall be considered in service, by an inspector general, or some other officer of the regular army, to be designated by the officer requiring such militia aid.

3.—“It shall be the duty of the officer designated to muster and inspect militia detachments, to organize them into companies, regiments and battalions, and to forward muster rolls of each company, and of the field and staff of each organized regiment, direct to the adjutant general of the army, Washington; and he will also immediately forward a consolidated return, by regiments and crops, of the force so received into service, for the information of the war department.

4.—“Officers charged with the duty of mustering militia, properly ordered into the service of the United States, preparatory to payment, will take care that the muster rolls contain all the information that may in any way affect their pay; the distance from the place of residence to the place of rendezvous or organization, and the date of arrival, must be stated in each case; the date and place of discharge, and the distance thence to the place of residence; all stoppages for articles furnished by the government must be noted on the rolls; and in cases of absence at the time of discharge of the company, the cause of absence must be stated. When the necessary information cannot be obtained, the mustering officer will state the cause, otherwise he will be held accountable for the defect.

5.—“No general staff officers will be mustered or received into service except such general officers, with their aids-de-camp, as may be required to complete the organization of brigade or divisions, when the strength of the detachment renders such organization necessary.

6.—“All supernumerary officers will be rejected, and the organization of each department will correspond with the acts of congress regulating the militia.

By order of major general MACOMB:

R. JONES, adjutant general.

THE NEW POST OFFICE LAW.

Which effects some important changes in the post office department, is so long that we cannot find room for it, and are, therefore, glad to avail ourselves of a synopsis made by the Baltimore American.

From the Baltimore American.

Post office organization. The Globe publishes the law passed at the late session of congress, entitled “an act to change the organization of the post office department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof.” As there are few laws which bear so frequently, actively and directly upon so large a portion of citizens, we give our readers an abstract of its provisions by sections.

Section 1st provides that all moneys received by the post office department shall be paid, under the direction of the postmaster general, into the treasury of the United States.

Sec. 2. The postmaster general shall submit to congress specific estimates, under separate heads, of the sums expected to be required for the service of the department in the subsequent year, and shall at the succeeding session render an account of the amount annually expended.

Secs. 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7, contains provisions made very guardedly for the modes and forms in receiving and paying money in the department.

Sec. 8. There shall be appointed by the president, with the consent of the senate, an auditor of the treasury for the post office department. His duties are prescribed in detail.

Sec. 9. Defines the duties of the postmaster general, giving him control over all the officers and agents of the department.

Sec. 10. The auditor shall report quarterly to the postmaster general accounts of the moneys paid pursuant to appropriations, in each year, by postmasters, out of the proceeds of their offices, towards the expenses of the department.

Sec. 11. The postmaster general shall, within sixty days after the making of any contract, cause a duplicate thereof to be lodged in the office of the auditor of the post office department. He shall also cause to be promptly certified to the auditor all establishments and discontinuance of post offices, and all appointments, deaths, resignations and removals of postmasters, together with all orders which may originate a claim or affect the accounts of the department.

Sec. 12. The accounts of the department shall be kept in such a manner as to exhibit the respective amounts received from and expended upon particular objects.

Sec. 13. Bonds and contracts shall hereafter be made to and with the United States of America, and all suits be instituted in the name of the same.

Sec. 14. The auditor shall superintend the collection of all debts due to the department.

Sec. 15. Copies of the quarterly returns of the postmaster, and of any papers pertaining to the accounts of the auditor, certified by him under his seal of office, shall be admitted as evidence in the courts of the United States.

Sec. 16. Defines the duties of the attorneys of the United States in the prosecution of suits in behalf of the department, and in making their returns.

Sec. 17. The postmaster general shall cause suit to be brought to recover back, in all cases of over payment.

Sec. 18. The auditor shall settle all balances due from postmasters on account of transactions prior to the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, prosecuting to judgment and execution if necessary.

Sec. 19. The auditor, or any mayor of a city, justice of the peace, or judge of any court of record in the United States, by him especially designated shall be authorised to administer oaths or affirmations, in relation to the examination and settlement of the accounts committed to his charge.

Sec. 20. There shall be employed by the postmaster general a third assistant postmaster general; with a specified number of clerks.

Sec. 21. Provides for the number and pay of the clerks and other officers in the office of the auditor.

Sec. 22. The postmaster general shall make annually to congress, five several reports;—namely, 1st, a report of all contracts for the transportation of the mail, with particular details; 2d, a report of all extra allowances to contractors, and of whatever relates thereto; 3d, a report on the incidental expenses of the department, methodically arranged under specified heads; 4th, a report on the finances of the department; 5th, a report of all fines imposed, and deductions from the pay of contractors for failures to deliver the mail, or any other cause.

Sec. 23. The postmaster general shall, before advertising for proposals for the transportation of the mail, form the best judgment practicable as to the mode, time and frequency of transportation on each route, and advertise accordingly. No consolidated or combination bid shall be received, and the conditions of contracts and principles on which extra allowances may be made, are defined.

Sec. 24. Proposals for all mail contracts shall be delivered to the department sealed, and shall be kept sealed until the biddings are closed. The contracts in all cases shall be awarded to the lowest bidder, except when his bid is not more than five per cent. below that of the last contractor, on the route bid for, who shall have faithfully performed his contract. The postmaster general shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who shall have wilfully or negligently failed to execute a prior contract.

Secs. 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30 and 31, all relate to contracts for transporting the mail. The thirty-second section determines a point which has been much agitated for some months past. We give it entire.

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That if any postmaster shall unlawfully detain in his office any letter, package, pamphlet or newspaper, with intent to prevent the arrival and delivery of the same to the person or persons to whom such letter, package, pamphlet or newspaper may be addressed or directed in the usual course of the transportation of the mail along the route; or if any postmaster shall with intent as aforesaid, give a preference to any letter, package, pamphlet or newspaper, over another, which shall pass through his office, by forwarding the one and retaining the other, he shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, and imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, and shall, moreover, be forever thereafter incapable of holding the office of postmaster in the United States.

Sec. 33. In those offices where the commissions allowed to the postmaster are equal to or exceed one thousand dollars, there shall be appointed by the president and senate a deputy postmaster.

Sec. 34. Assistant postmasters and clerks shall be exempt from militia duty and serving on juries.

Sec. 35. Provides for the advertising letters remaining in the post offices.

Sec. 36. No postmaster shall receive free of postage any letter or package containing any other than paper or money, under a penalty of fine and dismissal.

Sec. 37. Provides for the releasing of the original sureties of a postmaster by substituting others.

Sec. 38. Any person who shall be accessory after the fact to the offence of stealing any letter or packet from the mail of the United States by any person whatever, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding one thousand dollars and imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years.

Sec. 39. The postmaster general is authorised to establish an express mail, in addition to the ordinary mail, and to charge triple the amount of postage for letters carried by it.

Sec. 40. In case of the death, &c. of the postmaster general, his powers shall ad interim devolve on the first assistant postmaster general.

Sec. 41. Subjects the letter carriers in every city to the control of the postmaster general.

Sec. 42. Provides for the transportation of the mail by canals.

Secs. 43 and 44. Define the amounts of the salaries of the assistant postmaster general and his clerks, and of the auditor and his clerks.

Sec. 45. Three millions, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be appropriated for the service of the post office department for the year commencing on the first day of July, 1836.

DEATH OF BISHOP WHITE.

The annexed extra from the office of the U. S. Gazette, realizes the apprehensions which have been for several days entertained, that the patriarch of the Episcopal church in this country, the venerable bishop White, was about to disappear from the midst of us.

The time of his dissolution was, it will be seen, identical with that in which the various Episcopal congregations of this state, were, at the request of the bishop of the diocese, uniting their voices on behalf of the venerable patriarch in the beautiful supplication of their ritual for a sick person:

Office of the U. S. Gazette, Sunday, 4 o'clock, P. M.

DEATH OF BISHOP WHITE. We have this morning the painful duty to announce to our readers, the death of the venerable William White, D. D. bishop of the Episcopal diocese of Pennsylvania, and senior of that church in the United States, and at his death believed to be the oldest Protestant bishop in the world. Bishop White was born (we believe) in Maryland, on the 4th of April, 1748, so that he is more than 88 years of age. He was a sound whig in political principles at the time when the profession of such principles involved important considerations. He was for a long time the chaplain of congress, and when that body, to avoid the victorious British, removed from one place to another, Mr. White shared in its removals and its perils.

In the year 1786, Mr. White and two other Episcopal clergymen repaired to England to receive the office of bishop. Mr. White, and we think his reverend companions also, were consecrated on the 4th of February, 1787, by the arch-bishops of Canterbury and York—other prelates being present.

Bishop White has consecrated every bishop of the Episcopal church in the United States excepting only the bishop of Michigan, who has received consecration since the confinement of this venerable friend to his church.

Bishop White has been remarkable in his long life for the faithful discharge of all his duties as a citizen, not less than those of a clergyman; and if neither heat nor cold prevented his appearance in the sacred desk, so also the mutations of weather were equally inoperative to keep him from the ballot box—from public meetings or religious or philanthropic occasions—or even from a scene of conflagration, while he had strength to be of service to his fellow men.

The majestic form of the venerable deceased was seen, until a short time before his death, in our streets, with gratification by every citizen, and the respectful salutations of all that addressed him, showed how general and how deep was the respect which his long life of piety had inspired.

The bishop was one that seemed to connect the present generation with the great and good that had passed away, and our citizens, (we need not confine the remark to the Episcopal denomination), our citizens felt the degree of justifiable pride in the consciousness that a man so loved and so revered, was of their number. It is not strange, then, that during his last sickness, they should have inquired with eager expectancy for his health—or that at his death there should have been a general gloom: a great and a good man had been taken away, and it was seemly that the people "should take it to heart."

Bishop White, after lingering for a few weeks, died yesterday, about 15 minutes before 12 o'clock, noon—retaining his mental faculties to the last moment. In the morning, several clergymen on their way to church called to see him. He inquired after their health with his usual urbanity of tone; and while surrounded by a few friends, not of his immediate family, he ceased to be of them. There was no struggle to mark the moment of his spirit's dissolution; but he passed from life as he passed through it—calm and serene, and full of edification.

THE CROPS.

From the Baltimore American.

The unfavorable reports which have been made in the course of the present summer in reference to the grain crops have created apprehensions that the yield of the harvests would be so materially lessened as to cause a considerable advance in the prices of bread stuffs during the ensuing year. The season has been marked by complaints—much more numerous and decided than those which we are accustomed annually to hear—of the injury sustained by the wheat during the severity of the winter, and more recently by the ravages of the Hessian fly, and these complaints have not been confined to any particular quarter, but have issued from almost every grain growing section of the middle states. As we have already intimated, reports of this character have for years past regularly attended the development of the growing crop, and in most cases the fears of those who have uttered them have, happily, not been realized. The frequency, universality and loudness of the complaints of the present season, however, evidently indicated that they were better founded than usual, and in order to ascertain as clearly as possible their true character, an enterprising and intelligent citizen took the trouble of addressing a copy of the annexed circular to each of the postmasters in the various counties and towns of the grain growing states:

"Baltimore, June 13th, 1836.

"SIR: Considering it a matter of much importance that correct information on the subject of the grain crops throughout the country should be collected, and with a view to the dissemination of such information in the case the fears of those who apprehend an unproductive yield in the approaching crop should be likely to be realized, I take the liberty of requesting that you will be pleased to inform me of the probable result in your immediate neighborhood. By filling up the blanks in the annexed half sheet, with such one of the following words, viz: good, average, indifferent, bad, very bad, as may be applicable to the case, adding any other matter that you may deem important, and returning it to me, under your frank, you will much oblige, &c."

The object of the circular was to obtain correct information, and in seeking for it over so wide and extended a field, no better, more intelligent nor more disinterested sources could be referred to than the postmasters. In very many instances prompt replies were returned, the whole of which have been kindly placed in our hands for the purpose of being given to the public. We have therefore proceeded to classify them according to the states to which they belong, and submit them to the reader without further remark:

In various instances the postmasters have accompanied their returns with remarks going more fully to explain the condition of the crops. Portions of these remarks are subjoined, in order that the reader may have all the light on the subject which they furnish.

NEW YORK.

Angelica, Alleghany co. Unless something more happens, there will be a tolerably fair crop in general.

Bedford (N. Y.) and vicinity, West Chester co. Wheat, rye and oats look very well, and a prospect of good crops.

Bath, Steuben co. In the counties east of us, large fields of wheat have been ploughed up and corn planted. The grain was smothered by the deep and long continued snow of last winter.

Martinsburg. Wheat is winter killed—there will not probably be over half a crop.

Albion, Orleans co. The wheat crop in this county not considered more than two-thirds of an average. Much injured by deep snow in the winter.

Penn Yan. This is probably one of the best districts for wheat in the union, and I think crops will be abundant, but more from the quantity of ground occupied. Wheat is, in this section, the main crop. [The yield of wheat is put down at about two-thirds of a good crop.]

Auburn. The wheat crop in this section of the state east of a line drawn north and south through Cayuga lake, is not likely to produce more than two-thirds of the usual quantity. West of that line the wheat crop is much better, and will probably amount to an average.

Riverhead. Wheat is very much winter killed—probably there will not be over two-thirds of an average crop.

Binghamton, Broome co. Wheat and rye very much winter killed. The crops will be hardly middling.

Syracuse, Onondaga co. Wheat will produce less than one-fourth of last year's crop—hardly enough for bread and seed. Last year this county produced probably 500,000 bushels. This is the first year since 1825, that our wheat crop has failed. It being known early in the season, that the wheat was killed, our farmers turned their attention more vigorously towards coarse grains, of which it is pretty safe to anticipate a large yield. Wheat, however, is our staple, but in all the counties east of Cayuga lake, the harvest must be exceedingly small.

Essex county. Not much wheat raised in this county—what there is looks well.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Wellsborough, Tioga co. The wheat and rye have been injured by the snow, but the weather has since been favorable for the winter grain, and we have a prospect of a fair average crop.

Williamsport, Lycoming co. I have never seen so general a failure in the wheat crops.

Reading, Berks co. The fly has perhaps never been in our country so destructive to the wheat as this season. The rye crops look tolerably well.

Greensburg, Westmoreland co. Wheat will be a fair common crop—about one-fourth less than last, which was abundant.

Carlisle, Cumberland co. The late and long continual rains have injured the crops in some parts of this county, but recently they have much revived in appearance.

Mifflin, Pike co. The prospect for wheat is supposed to be hardly half a crop.

Lancaster. The wheat crops have so completely failed, that many of the farmers who have disposed of their last year's crops, have purchased for the coming year. Farmers who raised last year from 1,000 to 1,500 bushels will this year scarcely have sufficient for seed.

Chambersburg, Franklin co. From the best information I can obtain, this valley, from the Potomac to Philadelphia, will not give more than the seed and bread. Many of our farmers will not have their seed. We have a good deal of old wheat in this county.

DELAWARE.

Georgetown, Sussex co. There is very little wheat raised in this county, and the last winter destroyed the small crops that were sown. Corn is our staple, and the present prospect is that there will not be half a crop.

Dover, Kent co. Wheat and rye much injured by the winter and fly. Oats remarkably fine, and very good prospects for a large crop of corn.

MARYLAND.

Elkton, Cecil co. Many of our farmers will not have more than their seed from their wheat fields, and some think they will not have even that.

Denton, Caroline co. Of wheat there is not enough to half sow the same ground.

Snowhill, Worcester co. The crops of wheat will not much more than yield the seed.

Cambridge, Dorchester co. Throughout this county there is not one farm that will yield a fair average crop of wheat; the late rains improved the appearance of the wheat crop very much, but the prevailing winds during the whole time, bruised the heads to such an extent that nearly one-half of what has headed out will be destroyed by the blast. In our low lands the opinion prevails that the corn crop will be almost entirely lost; on the uplands, the prospect is fair.

Hagerstown, Washington co. Our wheat crops were never so poor throughout the whole county. There will scarcely be enough raised for seed and bread. Rye is a shade better, but very indifferent. The oats and corn crops look well. Farmers are sowing buckwheat and millet in their wheat fields.

Frederick, Frederick co. Wheat is very bad—not more than one-fourth of an average. The rye crop in this immediate neighborhood will be less than half a crop. The appearance of the corn and oats has materially improved within the last ten days, and with a continuance of favorable weather, both will be very large, as many wheat fields were ploughed up and planted in corn and oats.

Leonardtown, St. Mary's co. The crop of wheat is not an average of the last five or ten years, though more promising than last year.

VIRGINIA.

Suffolk, Nansemond co. Corn crops much injured by constant rains, but the last ten days of good dry weather has improved them much.

Scottsville. Some farms will not make as much wheat as was sown.

Chesterfield court house. The wheat seeded in this county will not average more than two or three for one.

OHIO.

Tiffin, Seneca co. The general impression is that our crops of wheat, rye and corn will be more abundant than they ever have been heretofore.

Wilmington, Clinton co. More wheat sown last fall than usual. I am of opinion this county will produce more wheat than last season.

Wooster. The drought in April and May, and the constant rains which succeeded, it was feared would destroy the prospects of the farmer, but for the last two weeks the weather has been fine, and all sorts of grain look promising.

New Lisbon, Columbiana co. We rarely have any but good crops in this region, and the present promises about as usual.

To render more full and complete the information which we desire to lay before our readers on this interesting subject, we annex paragraphs which have passed under our notice within the last ten days:

From the Genesee (N. Y.) Farmer.

WHEAT. The season is now so far advanced that a tolerable conjecture may be formed as to the state of the wheat crop, and the effect produced upon it by the past winter. From our limited observation and from what we have been able to learn from various authentic sources, it appears that in what is called western New York, which is emphatically the wheat district of the state, the wheat has suffered to an extent quite equal to what was first apprehended. The western counties extending to Wayne and Seneca, may expect a medium crop—in Wayne, Seneca and Cayuga counties there is much wheat that promises well, but as a whole, it has been a good deal thinned, and many pieces entirely destroyed—while farther east, Onondaga, Oswego, Madison and Oneida counties, the wheat has suffered still more extensively. In the most favorable section of Onondaga, where the crops have rarely if ever failed, but few first rate pieces are to be seen; while in the less favorable sections hundreds of acres have been totally destroyed, and have been ploughed up for spring crops. The same remarks, but in greater extent, are applicable to Madison and Oneida.

But though the past winter has destroyed much of the wheat, if what remains produces an ordinary yield there need be no apprehension of a deficiency of bread stuffs. There is at the present moment a vast amount of wheat in the country of last year's harvest, greater perhaps than has often been known, and farmers are in every section industriously endeavoring, by an extended culture of the coarser and spring grain, to supply any apprehended deficiency that may arise from the defect of the winter on their wheat fields.

The agricultural report of the crops in the vicinity of the city of New York, for the month of June, says—

In the early part of the month the rains continued unabated, and many were fearful the crops would be destroyed. At the close of the month however, there was a change and fine weather commenced—before the month closed the hopes of the farmer were gladdened.

Wheat and Rye appear well, stocks large with every appearance that the bolls will fill well, in wet spots it is thin, no fly or blight has injured it in the least; on the whole—there will be a fair crop.

Corn looks the worst of any thing else, and is very backward, and may be injured.

In Pennsylvania, west of the mountains, the accounts are decidedly favorable. A late Pittsburgh Advocate says—

"We perceive that our eastern brethren are loud and lugubrious in their complaints of the crops, particularly the wheat. The crops in this section of country have not failed or come short of their exuberance. On the contrary, our farmers tell us that they are promising beyond any former season, and bid fair richly to reward their toils."

The Wilkesbarre Farmer says—

"In our last we spoke of the unfavorable appearance of the crops in various parts. We have since had an opportunity to view the fields in this neighborhood, and are happy in being able to say they are the most promising we have seen in any quarter."

The recent convention at Harrisburg brought together citizens from various parts of Pennsylvania. The result of the inquiry addressed to them on the subject of the crops of grain was, that the fears which had been entertained a few weeks since of a considerable failure, will not be realized."

In Maryland, from all the information we can gain on the subject, we have no doubt there will be a very material falling off in the wheat crops—not only in the western counties but throughout the eastern shore.

In Ohio there is the promise of an abundant crop of all kinds of grain. The Tuscarawas Advocate states that the crops in that region never presented a better appearance for a bountiful harvest. The Cincinnati Gazette of the 6th inst. says that the harvest had commenced in the Miami country, and that the wheat is considered below an average.

Respecting the crops in Virginia, we have the following account in the Farmer's Register, published at Fredericksburg. This account is up to the 27th June, and it is likely that the favorable weather since experienced may have improved the crops. The statements here given are confirmed by numerous letters published in the Register.

The season and state of crops. From all the accounts before us, public and private, it is inferred that the wheat crop throughout Virginia, will fall short of half an average crop—and that the whole wheat crop of the United States will be not much better than that of Virginia alone. We subjoin, in extracts from private letters, many of the facts that have reached us: but none of these, except the one from Halifax, Virginia, even refer to the latest and worst calamities, caused by the inundation of most of the rich and extensive river bottoms of Virginia and North Carolina. The great source of injury to the wheat, and which was anticipated as far back as last October, and expected then to be unusually destructive, was the Hessian fly. In addition to this, and to other minor evils, the very wet season latterly has done great damage, either by filling the soil with water, or entirely overflowing its surface. In the latter part of May, and first half of June, there were 21 days in succession, on which more or less of rain fell—and some of these rains came in floods: and even since the close of this uninterrupted series, there has been an unusual quantity of rain. On high land, the usual estimates of crops expected, vary from one-fourth to three-fourths of an average. In some fewer cases, they are worse and better than these ordinary extremes, varying from nothing worth reaping, to nearly a fair product. Of the latter cases, very few have been heard of—and those not very lately. From the newspapers, we learn that in Buckingham and the nearest adjacent counties, the wheat was tolerably fair, and near Wheeling still better: if so, these are the only parts of Virginia as much favored, of which we have heard. On our own farm, we cannot estimate the crop of wheat at more than the fourth of what the land could produce: and where the damage from the fly was the least, and the general growth the best, there the damage was greatest from scab, or empty or dead parts of heads. The quality of the grain will be very bad.

But the rich bottom lands on our rivers have suffered most. They have all been covered by freshets, and to very unusual depth. The Roanoke bottom lands have suffered most. The wheat there is almost entirely destroyed, as well as other crops—and the soil itself, in many parts, has been carried off by the floods, so that the damage to the land is even of more amount than the entire loss of the year's crops.

Two more days, (the 25th and 26th), have passed since the foregoing remarks were written, and on both rain had fallen profusely and heavily: the consequent increase of damage to wheat will be necessarily great. Where ready for the scythe, it must be much beaten down and tangled by the heavy rain of last night; and where still green, there is danger of the rust coming to destroy much of the quantity and value of the small product previously expected.

RAIL ROADS AND LOCOMOTIVES.

From the Albany Argus.

Letter from James Seymour, division engineer of the New York and Erie rail road; in respect to the curvature and graduation of that and sundry other roads.

New York, Jan. 11, 1836.

SIR: Having recently, in pursuance of your directions, visited and examined the several rail roads between this city and Washington, I beg leave to submit the following account thereof for the consideration of the board of directors.

1st. The Patterson and Jersey city rail road length 16 miles. The train of cars was drawn by one locomotive engine from Patterson to the Bergen Ridge, with forty passengers, at the rate of 12 miles per hour, passing over curved lines varying from 400 to 600 feet radius, and ascending a grade for a distance of half a mile, at the rate of 45 feet per mile upon a straight line. The engine ascended this grade with a velocity of 11 miles per hour; over the remainder of the distance, not yet completely finished, the cars and passengers were drawn by horse power.

2d. The Amboy and Camden rail road, length 65 miles. Over this road the daily train of cars, containing from 60 to 150 passengers, are drawn by an engine weighing 75 tons, at from 12 to 15 miles per hour, ascending a grade of from 40 to 50 feet per mile, for a distance of about 3 miles, upon a part of which ascent, there is a curved line of 750 feet radius; the remainder of the road slightly undulating.

3d. The Philadelphia and Trenton rail road, length 30 miles. This road is nearly level. A train of cars containing 60 passengers, was drawn over this road at the rate of 14 miles per hour, by a locomotive engine weighing 8 tons.

4th. The Philadelphia and Columbia rail road, length 82 miles. Upon this road there are two inclined planes located for stationary steam power. The first is located immediately west of the Schuylkill river, near Philadelphia. One train of the cars was drawn up this plane by the stationary steam engine, another by horses, and the delay in passing was half an hour. Its length 3,300 feet, vertical height 165 feet. Trains containing 40 passengers (20 in each) are drawn from the head of this plane by a locomotive engine 8½ tons gravity. The road presents acclivities of 30 feet, and in one instance of 45 feet to the mile, and numerous curves, many of which are from 600 to 800 feet radius. An inclined plane of 1,800 feet long, and 90 feet vertical height, descends to the Susquehanna river at Columbia. Arrangements are in progress to supersede one or both of these places, by a new location, presenting grades of about 80 feet to the mile, to be traversed by locomotive engines. Vexatious delays are experienced on this road, owing to the fact that the state of Pennsylvania provides the motive power managed by state agents, and gives to transportation companies only the privilege of attaching cars. This destroys that systematic arrangement throughout the line which is necessary on a work of this kind, and which uniformly can only be adequately secured by subjecting the whole business of transportation to the sole management of one set of agents.

5th. The New Castle and Frenchtown rail road, length 16 miles, and no ascent over 25 feet per mile. The train of cars containing 60 passengers was taken at the rate of 18 miles per hour. The greater portion of this road is either straight line or curved upon a large radius.

6th. The Baltimore and Ohio rail road, which is in operation only as far as Harper's Ferry, length 82 miles. In travelling over this road, I was favored with the company of P. E. Thomas, esq. president of said road, to whom I am indebted for the following information. Between Baltimore and Elliott's mills, a distance of 15 miles, the road is level from 7 to 8 miles, and the remainder ascends from 13 to 21 feet per mile. From this point 23 miles west, the line ascends from 18 to 38 feet per mile. This part of the line presents generally a succession of curves to the right and left, varying from 318 to 700 feet radius, and many of them as small as 400 feet. The grade in the next 4 miles rises from 38 to 45 feet per mile. A part of this is straight and the remainder curved 600 to 1,000 feet radius, with the exception of a few of the curves, which are larger, making the distance 42 miles to the foot of plane No. 1, on the east side of Parr's Ridge. An engine of 7 and a half tons gravity took two passenger cars 30 feet long, containing 50 passengers, from Baltimore to this point, at the rate of 14 miles per hour; and passed over the ascents and curved lines with the same velocity as upon the straight lines and levels, and upon the last mile which has an ascent of 45 feet, at the rate of 16 miles per hour.

We could have travelled over the 42 miles with a greater velocity, had not the general regulations of the company limited the speed to 14 miles per hour.

The principal ridge encountered between Baltimore and Harper's Ferry, is called Parr's Ridge, the summit of which is distant 44 miles from that city, and present an elevation of 817 feet above the tide level. At the time when this road was located over this ridge, about the year 1820, it had not been supposed to be practicable to ascend with locomotive engines with loaded trains, upon grades exceeding 30 feet to the mile, and therefore in order to pass this ridge, four inclined planes arranged for stationary engines, were adopted at grades respectively of 76, 87, 176 and 253 feet per mile. Since the recent improvements, however, in the Baltimore locomotives, much exceeding in power the comparatively feeble engines imported from England, the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company have resolved to locate anew this section of their road, as to dispense with these plains, and to adopt a more circuitous route over the ridge, upon which the grades will be reduced to 80 and 100 feet per mile, and will be passed exclusively by locomotive engines. The planes as now located are passed by applying auxiliary horse power, but they have been lately surmounted with one of the Baltimore locomotive engines, drawing 33 passengers and other freight. The length of the planes are respectively as follows: 2,150, 3,100, 3,400 and 1,900 feet, and the aggregate distance from the foot of the most easterly to the most westerly plane about four miles.

I was informed by Jonathan Knight, esq. chief engineer of that road, that it is proposed to pass the ridges of the Alleghany mountains lying west of Cumberland, exclusively with locomotive power, encountering grades from 50 to 100 feet to the mile, and containing an aggregate length of about 55 miles. That company estimates the actual cost of traction on those heavy grades at two cents per ton per mile, and on the grades less than 30 feet per mile, at less than one cent per ton. The road with the planes as now located is very extensively used for the transportation, not only of passengers and merchandise, but also of flour, lumber, tobacco, and the general agricultural products of the country.

The net revenue for the year 1835, arising from the section of 82 miles of this road now finished, after deducting all expenses of transportation on and repairs of the road and machinery, amounted to $106,163 71, being an advance of about 35 per cent. on the net revenue of the preceding year, which was $72,574 14.

7th. The Baltimore and Washington rail road, which diverges as a branch from the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, at a point 9 miles west from Baltimore. The length of this road from Baltimore to Washington is 40 miles, and is traversed by a locomotive engine of $7\frac{1}{2}$ tons, drawing passenger cars which are 34 feet long, and usually commodious, containing 70 passengers, together with the baggage car, at a velocity of 16 to 20 miles per hour.

On my return from Washington to Baltimore, the same engine drew three of these large passenger cars containing 140 passengers, together with the baggage and baggage car, at the same speed before mentioned.

The locomotive engines are able, however, to travel much faster upon this road, having passed a number of times from Baltimore to Washington in one hour and a half, conveying from 75 to 100 passengers, passing over a part of the road at the rate of 40 miles per hour upon a straight line. An agreement was made to deliver the president's message in Baltimore in 40 minutes, or at the rate of 60 miles per hour, and it would have been accomplished but for the circumstance that after the engineer had started and obtained the velocity proposed, the fireman became alarmed at the speed, and put out his fire. The engines upon the different rail roads above mentioned, have horizontal boilers, and generally burn wood. Those upon the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, and the Baltimore and Washington rail road use anthracite coal, and have vertical boilers. This plan of engines I consider preferable to those with the horizontal boiler, particularly upon steep grades, as it prevents the water from varying from its place. The use of coal is also preferable, as well on account of bulk, as in maintaining a more uniform and regular amount of steam; and in avoiding the smoke and sparks, which are found exceedingly inconvenient, unpleasant, and even dangerous, on the roads where wood is used.

Notwithstanding the very great improvements which the locomotive engine has experienced within the last seven years, I have no doubt that it is destined to undergo alterations which will still further augment its power and usefulness, and enable it to travel with safety at the rate of 30 miles per hour, with passengers, over grades varying from 10 to 30 feet per mile, where the curves are of not too small a radius.

I consider the engines made at Baltimore better than those that are imported from abroad. An English engine arrived at Baltimore a few days since, which was destined for a rail road in Virginia; but being tried upon the Baltimore road, ran off the track once or twice. The foreign engines appear much better calculated for very straight and level roads, than those which must be constructed in this country.

The state of Pennsylvania has expended $100,000 for English engines, but has recently concluded to abandon the use of them, and hereafter to order their engines made in this country.

It has been ascertained by actual experiment, upon the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Baltimore and Washington rail roads, that one of the American locomotives, weighing 8½ tons, will draw upon a level road, 200 tons of freight, at the rate of ten miles per hour; that the same engine will draw upon an ascent of 25 feet per mile 100 tons, and 50 tons on a grade of 50 feet at the same rate of speed; and that by adding another auxiliary engine of the same power, the same weight may be propelled with the same velocity on a grade of at least 90 feet to the mile.

By a comparison of the facts above ascertained, with the table of the grades and curvatures on the New York and Erie rail road, the advantages will be found much in favor of the latter. There is no grade on the New York and Erie rail road which will exceed 90 feet per mile, and that only for one and a half miles in distance upon the western slope of the Shawangunk Ridge. There are a few places where a grade from 60 to 80 feet per mile for a short distance will be required; but on much the greatest portion of the road the grades will be reduced within 30 feet per mile. There will be no curves on any part of the road less than 700 feet radius, and but one as small as that; and we have fortunately been able in all cases where we have been compelled to adopt curves which would have otherwise diminished the usefulness of the engine, to regain the portion of power thus lost, by reducing the grade in that part of the road, and thereby to equalize the loss by curvature by a corresponding gain in acclivity.

The loss of power on a curve of 700 feet radius, at a speed of 12 miles to the hour, is found in actual practice to be about equal to an increase of acclivity of 18 feet to the mile, so that it is only necessary to flatten the grade to that extent wherever we have been obliged to submit to a curvature as sharp as that presented by a radius of 700 feet—and in that proportion for curves more gentle. It is by pursuing this plan, and thereby avoiding the excessive and useless expense incurred in attempting, as it were to force a line to a course which will be absolutely straight and level, that we have been able to avoid the mistakes in that respect of the English engineers, and to reduce within so moderate an amount the estimate cost of the New York and Erie rail road. You will perceive that the curves upon the Baltimore and Ohio rail road are much more severe than those upon the New York and Erie rail road, being frequently on a radius of 400 feet, and once as high as 315 feet; and nevertheless their locomotives pass over these curves without difficulty, at the rate of from 14 to 16 miles per hour.

The rail used on that road is the flat plate rail laid in part on wood and in part on stone. The different modes of superstructure presented by the modes above mentioned, together with the plan which will be most expedient for the New York and Erie rail road, I propose to make the subject of future communication, and I beg leave to conclude by stating, that an examination of the difficulties overcome on the road above mentioned, compared with the facilities as to graduation and curvature presented by the New York and Erie rail road, cannot but remove any doubts as to the feasibility or usefulness of the latter work.

All of which is respectfully submitted, your obedient servant,

JAMES SEYMOUR.

To Jas. G. King, esq. pres. of N. Y. and Erie rail road com.

MORAL MANAGEMENT OF THE INSANE.

We published not long since an account of the charge of treatment in the cases of insanity effected by the courage and humanity of a French physician of the name of Pinel. We perceive that the enlightened and intelligent Bostonians are pursuing the same system of management with great success. The following is an abstract of the report of the trustees of the McLane hospital, in Charlestown, taken from the Boston Transcript.

There were remaining in the asylum for the insane, and admitted from the 1st of May to the 1st of January last, 136 patients—84 males and 52 females—of whom 69 were old cases and 67 recent. There were 55 admissions and 59 removals—of the latter 6 were by death—3 not improved, 3 convalescent, and 35 recovered.

The system of moral management is still successfully pursued, and in addition to the usual diversion, and occupations, weekly dancing parties have been introduced, and religious services on the Sabbath. These stated observances are of incalculable benefit to the patients, the mind is thus provided with something to fix upon, and to anticipate, and the labor of preparation is seen and heard for days in advance; the females in preparing their dresses, and both males and females in practising the figure of the dance. Thirty to forty have daily attended on family worship; and in no instance has there been any disturbance, nor any injurious effect; on the contrary, the influence has been highly salutary, and many who have recovered have spoken of these exercises, as having contributed to their restoration. The patients rise and dress about half an hour before breakfast. After which, they are taken out to walk, or to ride, or are engaged as far as possible, in useful labor, as farming, sawing, splitting and piling wood, or assisting their attendants; and a few are engaged in mechanical employments. A large number are occupied more or less in the amusements of bowling, quoits, throwing the ring, and in chequers, chess, back-gammon and other games; and in the interval of these amusements, reading books from the library, newspapers and writing, serve to fill up the time. After tea they are assembled in the oval room, for family worship, which consists in reading a chapter from the Bible singing two hymns and a prayer.

Once a week all the female patients who are well enough, assemble in the house, and spend an afternoon in sewing; while thus employed, some interesting book is read, or they are engaged in conversation, and are indulged in occasional relaxation and amusement; these stay to tea with the family and to attend the "Belknap (so named, in honor of Miss Mary Belknap, a munificent donor to the institution), sewing society," is a privilege, which nearly all are anxious to enjoy; the work for which they received pay the last quarter, amounted to sixteen dollars and thirty-nine cents. Quiet and convalescent patients, are also taken to church; to visit places of interest and amusement; dine at the family table; and sit in the parlors; they are made to feel as far as possible, that in going here, they have only found a new home, new friends, new brothers and sisters. The asylum must be a blessing indeed.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

FOURTH SERIES. No. 22—VOL. XIV.] BALTIMORE, JULY 30, 1836. [VOL. L. WHOLE No. 1,297

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

By the advices inserted under the proper head, it will be seen that gen. Gaines has projected a march into the province of Texas. From the temper manifested in this movement, we anticipate an angry collision with the Mexican government, which will have strong grounds of complaint against the infraction of the treaty of peace and amity existing between her and the United States.

EXPRESS MAIL. By reference to an article from the "Washington Globe," published in the present sheet, it will be seen that the post office department contemplates the establishment of an express mail from New York to Mobile, Alabama, where it will fall into the great mail and be carried by steamboats to New Orleans. The time proposed to be occupied in the conveyance between New York and New Orleans is about six days and a half; the regular time for the present mails is little over thirteen days.

SMITHSONIAN REQUEST. It is stated in the Philadelphia papers that Richard Rush, esq. has been selected by the president of the United States to carry into effect the bequest left by Mr. Smithson, of England, to the people of the United States, for the purpose of establishing a university in the city of Washington.

GEN. SCOTT, it is stated in the Intelligencer of Thursday last, has returned from New York, whither he went, it is said, in the hope of overtaking the secretary of war, and is now on his way to join his family in Richmond. It is rumored that gen. Scott has applied for a court of inquiry to investigate the circumstances attending his operations in Florida and in the Creek country. The fact that there was no person at the seat of government to whom he could report himself, on his arrival there, has caused much and severe comment: and the manner of his recall, which, it is said, was somewhat summary and harsh, has also caused much feeling among his friends.

All the heads of department, with the exception of the secretary of the navy are, or were recently, absent from the seat of government.

TEXAS. Mirabeau B. Lamar, late secretary of state, has been appointed major general and commander-in-chief of the Texian army, and has issued an address to his troops, which we publish. Gen. Rusk retires from the field to the cabinet. The cabinet is said to be distracted by jealousies, and several changes in the government are spoken of. Dr. Archer, it is said, will be the next president, to succeed Burnett, who is becoming unpopular.

The Texans and the Mexicans both seem to be animated by enthusiasm. The former were, almost daily, receiving reinforcements from the United States, and the latter were rising en masse, and forming into military bodies for the purpose of proceeding to Texas. The Mexican forces, about 5,000 strong, remain stationed at Nueces, under the command of gen. Ganero. The Texian army, estimated at about 3,000 men, were in the neighborhood of Victoria.

Santa Ana has been taken to Columbia and put in irons, with a strong guard over him. His suite are with him. The Texian soldiery are much incensed against the captive general, and an attempt to shoot him with a pistol, which was fired at him, was prevented by the timely interference of his guard. The excitement was occasioned by the return of the Mexican army into Texas.

It was rumored that Santa Ana had written to president Jackson, asking him, or the government, to be his security for any treaty which he may enter into with the Texans. He is said to have informed them that they have no reason to apprehend an attack from his countrymen, as he would issue a proclamation that would induce them to evacuate, without striking a single blow. But if the following article, from the "Washington Globe" of Thursday last, correctly represents the sentiments of the president, Santa Anna's request will not find much favor in his eyes—even if he feels himself authorised to consider it.

From the Washington Globe of Thursday last.

SANTA ANA.

The Georgetown Metropolitan takes a warm interest in the fate of Santa Anna, and by way of giving its sentiments in regard to him some importance, undertakes to utter them for the president of the United States.

"It is understood (it says) that the president of the United States has expressed the greatest solicitude for the fate of the illustrious prisoner, whom the fortune of war has thrown into the hands of the Texans."

Santa Anna's advocate directly inverts the opinions of the president, unreservedly expressed by him to all who have conversed with him, and repeatedly stated in our presence. So far from ever having "the greatest solicitude for the fate of the illustrious prisoner," the president has again and again declared that he deserved the most ignominious death; and that the only justification for the lenity shown him, was to be found in the condition of Texas, which might make it proper to subject the demands of justice to the policy of getting rid of the armies of Mexico, through the influence of their chief.

The New Orleans Advertiser of the 13th says, general Almonte, one of the Mexican prisoners, "was shot at by a soldier a few days since, and narrowly escaped, the ball passing two or three inches above his head. The gentleman who fired at him had lost one of his dearest friends and relatives."

CREEK WAR. For our summary of news relative to the Creek war, see page 364.

FROM FLORIDA. We have many rumors of Indian outrages. Their operations are chiefly confined to the sides of the St. Johns' river, on which, it is said, they have resolved to destroy all the settlements. They had killed a Mr. Bullum, who resided about four miles from Whitesville—his wife and children escaped to Gary's ferry. They had also fired upon col. Hallow and wounded him in the head, causing him to faint and fall. He, however escaped to the steamboat Essayons, with his friend Dr. Simmons and some negroes. His house was burned, as well as that of Dr. Simmons. On receipt of this intelligence at Picolata, the commanding officer sent a detachment of twenty men in pursuit of the marauders, who were stated by one of col. Hallow's negroes to be thirty in number.

Captain Curry, of the Florida militia, had been sent from Mandarin to Gary's ferry, to escort a train of baggage wagons, containing provisions and supplies for the troops, from thence to Fort Drane. On this expedition he found that the Indians kept in his immediate vicinity, frequently encamping within three miles of his troops. On his return to Gary's ferry, he discovered a number of Indian trails, from which he ascertained that they were proceeding towards Jacksonville.

Capt. C. says there were 140 of the troops sick at Fort Drane—among them five out of seven of the officers.

Fifty-two persons had died at Black creek, in forty days, from measles and diarrhoea.

The inhabitants of Jacksonville were in a state of great alarm, and were embarking, with their effects, on board the schooner Motion, capt. Willey, bound for St. Mary's.

The Tallahassee "Floridian" of the 16th inst. says, that arrangements are in progress for an expedition to the Wythlacoochee so soon as the requisite force can be assembled. It will be commanded by general Kall.

The object is to destroy the growing crops of the Indians. One thousand mounted men from Tennessee, are expected to arrive here by the 25th instant, who will be joined by the regulars, and the militia and volunteers of Florida. By an order of gen. Scott, dated July 2d, we observe that the Tennesseans have been mustered into service for three months only, though they volunteered under the law requiring them to serve six or twelve months.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AT THE NORTH WEST. The Detroit Free Press of the 14th instant says:

We are happy to announce the return of brigadier gen. Brady to this place from an official tour of duty on the northern lakes, and to state on his authority, that the recent reports relative to the hostile intentions on the part of the Menomonie and Winnebago Indians are without the slightest foundation.

Gen Brady has visited all the military posts on the northern lakes, from Fort Winnebago, at the portage of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, and has taken much pains to ascertain the feelings and disposition of different tribes of Indians inhabiting the section of country through which he passed, and he does not hesitate to say that he never found them more friendly, or more disposed to be at peace with the white people than at the present moment.

The Missouri Republican give the following as the key to the alarm of Indian hostilities, recently reported in that quarter:

We have been informed by a gentleman who was within thirty miles of the scene of this affair, that it originated in a drunken frolic at a grocery kept by one of the white men. There were several white men and several Indians at the grocery. They got drunk, fought, and two of the whites were killed. Afterwards the whites were reinforced and one Indian was killed. He had these particulars from a gentleman who came from the immediate neighborhood.

St. Louis, July 5th. We have seen a Mr. Jesse Ray, of Jefferson county, in this state, just returned from a visit to Kentucky, who informs us, that within a quarter of a mile of Paris, in Edgar county, Illinois, at the place where they had encamped, he saw twelve Indians who had been slain by the inhabitants of the town. The party, on their arrival at that point, consisted of fourteen men, who had obtained whiskey from the people of the town, and were intoxicated and noisy. In the attack, twelve of the number were shot, and the surviving two were pursued through the woods. The Indians, it seems, were going up the Wabash, and were all mounted, but had left their horses at the camp. We could not learn to what tribe they belonged. Our informant states that the number of white men assembled at the scene of slaughter was about sixty; that they were mostly intoxicated, and threatened the like fate to all Indians who should come to, or pass through their country.

CAPT. BACK is about to sail in the Terror bomb vessel to the Arctic ocean for the purpose of completing his former reconnoissances. He will proceed for Wogabay, when his ship will be laid up, and thence will proceed with boats constructed for the purpose, and which he takes out with him, to complete the survey of the coast from Cape Turnagain, where his first expedition terminated, to Victoria headland, the point where he made the sea on his last expedition. This enterprise will occupy, it is supposed, two years.

RAIL ROAD CONVENTION The Knoxville convention adjourned on the 8th instant, having been characterized throughout by the utmost harmony in its deliberations. The report of the general committee of forty-five, recommending that the rail road from Cincinnati to Charleston should run through the valley of the French Broad river, over the Blue Ridge into the heart of South Carolina, was unanimously adopted. The convention also unanimously determined to adopt the recommendation of the general committee, to admit the state of Georgia to construct a branch from any point in that state, to unite with the main road at or near Knoxville, admitting her to an equal participation of the advantages of the road with the parties to the original charter. The thanks of the convention were awarded to gen. HAYNE, its president, for the able manner in which he had presided over their deliberations, on which he returned his acknowledgments in a happy and impressive speech.

The road, it is estimated, will cost about nineteen millions of dollars.

THE UTICA AND SCHENECTADY RAIL ROAD has been completed and is now open for travel. This road, 77 miles in length, has been completed in 21 months, under the superintendence of Mr. Wm. C. Young, as chief engineer, and at a cost of $20,000 per mile, including every thing. The original estimate was one million and a half, and the Albany Journal states that this estimate will cover every expense, including $330,000 paid for real estate, and the cost of 8 locomotives, 100 cars, two extensive depots, and all the requisite machine and work shops.

The day the road was opened the train ran nearly 160 miles in 7 hours and 6 minutes, deducting the time consumed in stoppages!

LOUISIANA. The following is the whig electoral ticket of Louisiana, pledged to the support of White for president, and Tyler for vice president.

First district—Albert Hoa.

Second district—Alexander Barrow.

Third district—Narcisse Landry.

Fourth district—Jacques Dupre.

Fifth district—Francois Gaennie.

Professor Alexander Dallas Bache, of the university of Pennsylvania, has received the appointment of president of the Girard college, with a suitable salary to enable him to travel for some time in Europe to examine the different systems of education, procure information, &c.

By a report of the architect of the college, it appears that in the course of the next year, the accommodations for one hundred orphans, with their teachers, will be completed, and that buildings for the reception of two hundred more, will probably be ready as soon as the increase of the pupils will require the use of them.

RAPID TRAVELLING. The facilities for travelling in the new and old world are such, that the rapidity with which persons may be conveyed to the most distant places is truly astonishing: one instance out of the many, we notice is the following—

A family sailed from Vera Cruz, in Mexico on April 22d, and arrived in New York on May 5th. On the same day they embarked for France in the packet Utica, which reached Havre on the 27th May. They had time to transfer their effects to the Hamburg steamboat, and without stopping a day took their departure again. On arriving at Hamburg they continued their route by the steamer to Lubeck, and thence by a similar conveyance to St. Petersburg, where they no doubt arrived on the 14th of June. Thus in 53 days they passed from Mexico, by the United States, France and Germany, into the capital of Russia.

A NEW LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE. The Philadelphia National Gazette states that on the 19th instant a locomotive engine manufactured by Mr. William Norris, of that city, ascended the inclined plane on the Columbia rail road, drawing with great ease her tender, and two passenger cars with fifty-three passengers. The length of the plane is two thousand eight hundred feet, the grade three hundred and sixty-nine feet to the mile, or an ascent of one hundred and ninety-six feet in the length of the plane. The experiment was tried at a very early hour in the morning, while the rails were wet with dew and of course not in the most favorable condition. The time occupied in passing from the level at the base to that at the top of the plane, was two minutes and twenty-four seconds. The experiment was witnessed by many scientific gentlemen, among whom the opinion was general that the improvement of Mr. Norris promises a most important reduction in the expense hitherto attending the transportation on inclined planes. The weight of the engine with water, fourteen thousand nine hundred and thirty pounds—load dragged on the plane, including tender and fuel, cars and passengers, thirty-one thousand two hundred and seventy pounds. Pressure under eighty pounds to square inch. It is remarkable that the engine was blowing off, on her arrival at the top, having acquired speed and power during the ascent.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE GLOBE. It is stated upon what we deem good authority, that the bank of the U. States have made a loan with the house of Hottengour & co. of Paris, of twelve millions of dollars, at four per cent. interest, and that more can be obtained at the same rate, if wanted. It is also stated that an agent of the Paris house arrived here on Saturday, in the Silvie de Grasse, and proceeded immediately to Philadelphia.

[Courier & Enquirer.]

The New York Journal of Commerce contradicts the above, and says—The bank did, a month before the last dates from Paris, negotiate a loan there for twelve millions of francs at five per cent. No other loan has been negotiated, or, at any rate, the agent referred to knows of no other. Of course he is not here upon the business supposed. But he is here, and has not proceeded to Philadelphia on any business.

CINCINNATI, O. The Baltimore "American" has published the following interesting synopsis of a paper from the pen of Dr. Drake, of Cincinnati, which appeared in a late number of the "Western Monthly Magazine" giving a statistical view of the "queen of the west" at the close of 1835. The prosperity which has attended her, has also been realized, nearly in the same ratio, by many of the western cities and towns—offering the most striking illustration of the effects of our institutions in stimulating enterprise and developing the rich resources of our favored land.

The distances from Cincinnati to a number of cities, the principal of which are as follows: From New York, by the way of Lake Erie, 900 miles: from New Orleans, 860 miles: from Philadelphia 617: from Charleston 600: and from Baltimore 518. The city, which is built on an elevated plain surrounded by a noble amphitheatre of hills, is situated nearly midway down the Ohio river, being 455 miles from Pittsburgh, where by the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers the Ohio is formed, and 504 from the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi.

In 1810 the population amounted to between two and three thousand; in 1820 to ten thousand; in 1826 to sixteen thousand, and in 1836 to thirty-one thousand, to which ought to be added the suburbs opposite on the Kentucky shore containing four thousand. Dr. Drake estimates that in 1830 Cincinnati and suburbs will number one hundred thousand inhabitants. Nor is this expectation at all extravagant, for its unparalleled growth thus far, has taken place without the aid of any work of internal improvement but the Miami canal and two Macadam turnpikes, one of twelve and the other of sixteen miles. An enumeration is then made of the various works projected and in progress which when completed will feed the commerce of Cincinnati. Ten are there described, most of them extensive, and designed to be finished within six years.

The region inseparably connected with and dependent upon Cincinnati as its great commercial and manufacturing mart, is described as being that immediately round the city, embracing, besides Ohio itself, the eastern portion of Indiana, and a part of Kentucky, a surface containing about ten millions of acres of the finest grain-growing soil in the world, and capable of maintaining four millions of inhabitants.

The capital invested in manufacturing industry alone is estimated at five millions of dollars. No less than two hundred thousand hogs were slaughtered in Cincinnati during the present year. The exports are calculated to amount to six millions.

MORE LYNCHING. The Lexington, (Ky.) Intelligencer states, on the authority of the Paris (Ky.) Citizen, that judge Brown was lynched a short time since at Carlisle, in Nicholas county. It appears that the circuit court, judge Brown presiding, had been engaged in the trial of William Boyd, charged with the murder of William Smith, and that the jury found him guilty of manslaughter, and awarded as punishment, confinement in the penitentiary three years and two months. A motion was made by the prisoner's counsel for a new trial, which was granted, and the prisoner admitted to bail. The mob became incensed at this proceeding, and having stationed a fire engine near the court house door, filled with muddy water, gave the judge a "ducking," as the Citizen terms it, when he passed out of the house, after the adjournment of the court. The next morning the judge was hung and burnt in effigy. It is useless to comment upon such an outrage—for every American citizen, who properly appreciates the obligations due to the laws, must feel it as a deep and indelible disgrace.

THE YOUNG STATE OF INDIANA is about to put forth her energies for the development of her internal resources, in a way which may well put to the blush some of her older sisters on the Atlantic border. While the latter have been for years doing little else than talking and wishing—earnestly desiring to enjoy the golden fruits of canals and rail roads, without possessing the moral courage to assume the cost of their construction—the youthful members of the union in the west, before one is well assured that they have attained the first degree of maturity, are seen successively to take the most decided and vigorous steps in favor of the policy which, while it has crowned with enlarged prosperity every state that has adopted it, assures to them in particular an onward march at a giant's stride, and the early attainment of the wealth and strength of a giant community.

Last winter the legislature of Indiana determined to advance its credit to the amount of ten millions of dollars for works of internal improvement, and we observe that this wise policy is about to be brought into practical operation. The board of internal improvement have given notice that at stated periods during the ensuing four months, the following works will be let to contractors, viz:

Twenty-three miles of the Wabash and Erie canal, lying between Georgetown and Lafayette.

Thirty-four miles of the White Water canal, extending from Brookville to Lawrenceburgh.

Twenty-two miles of the Madison and Lafayette rail road, extending north from the Ohio river.

Fifty miles of the Central canal.

Forty-one miles of the New Albany and Vincennes Macadamized turnpike.

Twenty miles of the cross-cut canal, extending from Terra-haute to Eel-run. [Balt. Ame.]

THE SUSPENSION BRIDGE over the Niagara river, at Lewiston, for the construction of which charters were granted last winter by the legislature of the state of New York and the parliament of Upper Canada, will be one of the proudest triumphs of art in the known world. The banks of the river at Lewiston and Queenston, are 125 feet high, chiefly composed of limestone rock. The bridge will be in the form of an inverted arch. The flooring will be laid on the iron chains on suspension rods, the links of which, are to be nine feet nine inches long, capable of sustaining a weight of 1,000 tons. It has been computed by the engineer, that if the whole length and breadth of the bridge, should be covered with oxen standing close to each other, the whole weight would be 350 tons less than the estimated weight it will be capable of sustaining.

The cables will pass over freestone columns or abutments, on either side, and be firmly fastened to the rocks below. Two plans have been proposed for the construction of the bridge—one to place the columns close to the bank of the river, at the foot of the mountain—the other to place them at the top.

On the first plan, the columns will be 200 feet high; the length of the chord of the arch 1,000 feet—in this case there will be eight suspending cables—two carriage ways twelve feet wide, and one foot way five feet wide in the centre; the estimated expense in round numbers $131,000. On the second plan, the columns will be 90 or 100 feet high; the length of the chord 1,000 feet; expense $93,000. In either case, the lowest point in the inverted arch will be 120 feet above the water.

[Buffalo Com. Adv.]

INDIA. It is proposed to abolish the use of the Persian language, which it seems has been maintained in the courts of India, and to substitute the popular languages of the respective provinces. It is stated that the English language is rapidly spreading among the native population of India, and that there is a general inclination among the Hindus to send their boys to the English schools for education.

ITEMS.

Earthquake. On Friday evening, the 15th instant, a slight shock of an earthquake was felt in the neighborhood of Providence, R. I. to the north and west, about a quarter past 8 o'clock. It was so strong that it shook crockery and glassware in the houses, so as to be heard. It apparently proceeded from the north east, and passed off to the south west with a noise resembling thunder at a distance, and was of short duration.

It is estimated that the cost of the proposed rail road from Charleston to Cincinnati will be nineteen millions of dollars.

We understand, says the New York Gazette, that the late John B. Yates, of Madison county, New York, has, by will, bequeathed the great bulk of his fortune to the endowment of an institution, to be established upon a plan devised by himself, and that he has left all the details necessary for its government. He was one of the original partners of the well known house of Yates & McIntyre.

Orono. The first rail road in Maine is nearly ready to be opened, leading from Bangor to Orono. The Bangor Advertiser gives the result of a census just taken of the town of Orono. The whole population is 5,635. In 1830, it was 1,072—increase in six years 4,162. It is not a cotton spinning population, but consists of 3,660 males, and 1,975 females.

Canada. The Upper Canada elections recently held have resulted most disastrously for the radical reform party in that province, the conservatives having elected an overwhelming majority of members to the provincial parliament. Mr. BROWELL, the late speaker of the house, a gentleman whom all parties concur in speaking of with respect, was compelled to retire from the contest, leaving the field in the undisputed possession of his competitors. Rail Roads in New Jersey. It is stated that the best understanding now exists between all parties concerned in the late dispute about the passage of the several rail roads across New Jersey—it having been definitely arranged that the Camden and Amboy rail road company, instead of making the branch required by law, from their road at Spotswood to the New Jersey rail road in New Brunswick, are to construct the branch direct to Trenton, and after there connecting with the Philadelphia and Trenton rail road, to be extended to Bordentown, and united at that place with the Camden and Amboy rail road.

Trade of Buffalo, N. Y. July 29. The fine breeze of this morning, has brought a large number of vessels into our harbor for the most part fully freighted; among other extensive consignments, about fifteen thousand barrels of flour from Ohio, have been reported up to two o'clock, P. M. At one time this morning, thirty-six vessels were in sight from our pier.

We learn from the Buffalo Daily Advertiser, that, according to a statement from the collector's office of that city, during the year 1835, the whole number of entries at that port, were—of steamboats 720; brigs, schooners and sloops 920; total entrances 1,640. The average tonnage of the steamboats was 280 tons each, and of the brigs &c. 80 tons: making a total of 280,000 tons.

Trade of Cleveland, O. According to the Cleveland Herald of the 14th inst. thirty vessels, (exclusive of steamboats), were, on that day, taking in or discharging their cargoes in that harbor.

Chicago, Michigan. There is, says the Chicago American a piece of ground in Chicago which cost in 1830, sixty-two dollars, which has risen in value at the rate of one hundred per cent per day, on the original cost, ever since, embracing a period of five years and a half.

Desertion by wholesale. The Tallahassee Floridian of the 9th inst. contains a reward of $930, offered by major R. M. Sands, for the apprehension of 31 United States soldiers, who deserted from Camp Concord, near Tallahassee, on the 4th inst.

Cannel or Kendal coal in the United States. A vein of this superior quality of coal so celebrated in England, has been recently found, says the Beaver (Penn.) Argus, in that vicinity 12 feet thick, by professor Rodgers, while making a reconnaissance of the geology of that state. It is supposed the vein is inexhaustible.

THE CREEK WAR.

The Charleston Courier of the 22d instant states, on the authority of an officer who left Columbus on the 19th, that all the troops, with the exception of two companies, have left Fort Mitchell for Tuskegee. Major Lomax's battalion left on the 17th, the marines, under colonel Henderson, on the 19th, and the Washington volunteers on the 20th. A detachment of marines, under colonel Miller, are encamped on the Federal road, 15 miles from Columbus. The 4th artillery, commanded by lieutenant colonel Brooks, are encamped 30 miles from Columbus and 12 miles from Tuskegee. Mounted men from a portion of each detachment, have been furnished as escorts to the mails, and the neighborhood has been so effectually scoured that no danger may be apprehended. The road had been rendered impassable for carriages by the destruction of bridges and causeways, but the marines, under the command of that efficient officer colonel Miller, have made the necessary repairs, and the mail stages have commenced their trips.

The battle of Chickasaw, fought on the 2d instant, by the regiment of colonel Beall and the friendly Indians, under the direction of general Scott, has probably terminated the war. They have returned to Columbus. It is the opinion of Tom Carr, (to whom too much praise cannot be awarded), that the discomfited Indians will not attempt to go to Florida, but will return to Fort Mitchell, and surrender to general Fenwick. Gen. Jesup has issued an order requiring all the Indians to come in by a certain time for emigration, and threatens to consider all who do not as outlaws.

The Georgia infantry have been discharged, leaving now in the service col. Beall's regiment and major Alford's battalion of mounted men.

Several skirmishes had taken place with straggling parties of the Indians—on the 15th inst. a battle was fought on the head waters of the Swannee, between a body of the Georgia troops and a party of Indians, in which the former lost three and the latter nineteen men. Twenty Indians were also taken prisoners.

ORDERS—NO. 30.

Head quarters, south army, Tuskegee, July 9th, 1836.

Maj. gen. Scott having been called to Washington, the command of the southern army, devolves upon maj. gen. Jesup, to whom all reports and applications will be made through the proper channels of communication.

The army is divided into two corps: the first will be commanded by major gen. Sanford, and will consist of the Georgia militia and volunteers, of all regular troops, including the marines, serving in the vicinity of the Georgia troops, and of Paddy Carr's Indian warriors.

The second corps will be commanded by major gen. Patterson: and will consist of the Alabama volunteers and militia, the regular troops, including marines, serving in the vicinity, and such Indian warriors as may, from time to time, be taken into service from the bands of Opothle Yoholo, Jim Boy, Tuckabatchee Hargo and Elka Hargo. Generally orders will be sent from head quarters through the major generals commanding army corps, but whenever the major general commanding the army may happen to be present he will be considered the immediate commander for the time, and will give orders direct, or through the major general, or other senior officer, as the interest of the service may require. He will also send orders direct to separate posts or detachments of both corps when in his judgment the service may require it, but in all such cases duplicates of the orders will be sent to the major general commanding the army corps to which the post or detachment may belong. When detachments are ordered for special service the instructions will be given from general head quarters; and on the return of those detachments the reports must be made direct to the major general commanding the army.

THOMAS JESUP,

Maj. gen. commanding army of the south.

For maj. gen. Sanford.

From the following extract of a report, received from major general Jesup, at the adjutant general's office, on Saturday last, it will be seen that the Indians who had recently dispersed have nearly been recaptured, and doubtless, by this time, the residue have been secured.

"Tuskegee, July 12, 1836.

"We secured by the aid of the chiefs, about five hundred Indians, which, with those taken by general Patterson, and about sixty taken yesterday, make upwards of nine hundred of the thirteen hundred who had dispersed."

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

From the Washington Globe of Monday last.

"Official despatches from general GAINES, dated Camp Sabine, June 28, 1836, communicate the intelligence that the Mexican army at Matmoras, under general Urrea, had been reinforced to the number of 7,000 men, and was, on the 18th of June, on its march, and rapidly advancing towards Guadalupe Victoria, and the head quarters of the Texian army. The motto to which the Mexican army were sworn, was 'extermination to the Sabine, or death.'"

"Before receiving this intelligence, major STERLING C. ROBERTSON had reported to general GAINES that two men had been recently killed and another wounded, on the waters of the Navazota, in Robertson's colony, about twenty miles west of Nacogdoches, by the Indians of several different tribes (Caddoes, Kitchies and others), who had taken and carried away several women and children of the families of the men killed.

"General GAINES, considering that these recent acts of hostility on the part of the Indians were prompted by their having been advised of the large force approaching Matamoras, and by the expectation that the Texans would be driven off, and the country given up to them, has called upon the governors of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi and Louisiana, each, for a regiment of mounted gunmen, to co-operate with the regular force under his command, including the four companies of dragoons from Fort Leavenworth.

"It was his intention, if he did not in the interim receive satisfactory assurances that the Indians upon our borders had no hand in the late murders on the Navasota, to march to Nacogdoches as soon as he obtained the immediate co-operation of the three companies of dragoons and six companies of the 7th infantry at Fort Towson."

The following extract of a letter, bearing the date prefixed to it, is published in the National Intelligencer of Tuesday last; and whilst it throws some additional light on the subject, is somewhat imbued with the partisan feelings of the writer.

"Nacitoches, June 30, 1836.

"We are likely to have lively times upon the frontier. General GAINES, who is still on the Sabine, has, within a few days, issued despatches from General Rusk, the Texian leader, dated at Guadalupe Victoria, apprising him that the Mexicans are coming down upon him in great force. Rusk has issued a proclamation, and calls loudly for aid. General GAINES, for reasons best known to himself, has called upon the states of Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee and Louisiana, for a regiment of men each, and talks of executing his old instructions, of crossing into the Mexican territory, and taking possession of Nacogdoches. His plea is, that some vagabond Caddoes have committed two or three murders about eighteen miles from Nacogdoches. These murders, if they have been perpetrated, (which is likely), were committed seventy miles within the Mexican territory, and have happened very apropos if Rusk should be driven eastward. Should this turn out so, and his retreat be upon Nacogdoches, the consequences are obvious. The friends of peace hope that GAINES will have the good sense to stay where he is: the sort of game he is made to play for others is well understood here."

The following is the proclamation of the governor of Kentucky, issued in pursuance of the requisition of gen. Gaines, alluded to in the article extracted from the Globe.

PROCLAMATION.

Executive department, Frankfort, July 16, 1836.

I, JAMES T. MOREHEAD, lieutenant and acting governor of the commonwealth of Kentucky, do hereby make known, that in conformity with the request of the president of the United States, communicated through the secretary of war, and the request of major general Gaines, commanding the forces for the protection of the south western frontier, for a regiment of mounted gunmen, volunteers to be composed of ten companies of not more than one hundred men each, will be forthwith received into the service of the United States, from this state.

Relying on the characteristic readiness of my fellow citizens to meet the calls of their country, I have not deemed it expedient to resort to any other mode of raising the required number of troops, than a solicitation of their voluntary services. When the national honor or interests are to be sustained, it is confidently expected and believed that an appeal to the gallantry and patriotism of the citizens of Kentucky, is all that is necessary to insure a full and ready compliance with the requisitions of the constituted authorities, and that the present occasion will be attended with the same exemplary displays of public spirit and love of country, which have so conspicuously distinguished their past history. It need only be added, that it is due to the high character maintained by them in the estimation of our sister states, that this call for their services should be fully and speedily met.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and (L. S.) caused the seal of the commonwealth to be affixed.

JAMES T. MOREHEAD,

By the lieutenant and acting governor.

AUSTIN P. COX, secretary of state.

The governor of Louisiana has also issued a proclamation calling for volunteers in pursuance of the requisition of Gen. Gaines.

Dragoon head quarters, camp Benton, Near Fort Towson, on Red River, June 26.

Agreeably to orders from gen. Gaines, the three companies of dragoons, and six companies of the 7th infantry, left Fort Gibson on the 8th May, and after a rough and tedious march of 9 days, (a distance of 190 miles), we encamped near Red River, on the 17th of last month, where we have been ever since, waiting for further orders from the commanding general.

Our destination will be the Sabine river to join general Gaines' command now encamped there, and we are only waiting for an express to return from Fort Gibson, which passed by this post to general Arbuckle, to take up our march to the south west. There is a Spaniard here just from gen. Gaines' army sent up by him to pilot us on our march.

[Baltimore Patriot.

We will have a long and tedious march should we go on to Fort Jessup, 300 miles off, large rivers to ford, and a low marshy country to go through.

The Mexicans claim all the country as far this way as Red river; we claim all as far southwest as the Sabine river. We are encamped in the heart of the Choctaw nation. I think they have the finest country of any of the tribes I have yet visited; they are generally civilized, and Christianity has been in a measure instilled in many of their families. I have frequently seen the Bible in their houses, printed in the Choctaw and English language.

Every one here is rejoiced to see that Fort Gibson is to be broken up; it was indeed a grave yard for our soldiers. I expect we will take up our winter quarters there, and commence the new fort in the spring.

FROM MEXICO.

By the ship Mexican, captain Kimball, the editors of the New York Journal of Commerce have received Vera Cruz papers to the 1st of July, and the Diario del Gobierno of the city of Mexico of the 26th of June. The latter contains an official despatch from general Filisola, detailing the proceedings of the Mexican army in Texas, until Santa Ana's capture, the subsequent proceedings under the convention for the evacuation of Texas, concluded between Santa Ana and president Burnett, the adhesion given by Filisola to this convention, and an account of his retreat from the positions he occupied in compliance with its articles. The documents are very long.

Under date of the 25th June the Mexican secretary at war writes to general Filisola, that he had communicated his despatches to the president of Mexico ad interim, and that their contents had excited his profound indignation. That he would be called before a court martial to account for not having remained in positions which he had been ordered to retain at every hazard, and for having obeyed the orders of the commanding general, though he was a prisoner. That the president ad interim will not recognise the convention concluded at Velasco on the 14th May, 1836, (that between Santa Ana and president Burnett), the general who signed it having no power to do so. That he expressly disapproves, as an attack on the rights of the nation, the title of republic, given to an insurgent department of Mexico, and that of president, to the chief of the insurgents. In conclusion, the secretary orders general Filisola to surrender the command to general Jose Urrea, to repair to the city of Mexico, there to answer for his conduct.

There does not appear as yet to have been any serious disturbance in any part of the Mexican republic; though from various editorial remarks, the public mind is very unsettled.

The government of Mexico has resorted to a "forced loan" of two millions, in order to carry on the war against Texas. The legal form under which the citizens of the "republic" are thus levied upon, is as follows—

DECREE.

The president ad interim of the Mexican republic to its inhabitants. Know that the general congress has decreed as follows:

1st. The government is authorised to exact a forced loan throughout the republic to the amount of two millions of dollars, for the purpose of meeting in part the deficit in the national revenue.

2d. The maximum amount exacted from each individual shall not exceed one thousand dollars.

3d. The certificates given for this loan shall be received by the government after the lapse of one year, in payment of any tax that may be imposed.

Captain Kimball brought home, the rifle, powder horn, bullet pouch, &c. of the late colonel Crockett, which were obtained from colonel Bradbane of the Mexican army.

ADDRESS OF GEN. LAMAR TO THE ARMY OF TEXAS.

From the New Orleans Bulletin, of July 8.

The address of M. B. Lamar to the Texian troops upon his taking command as major general, is well calculated to infuse into them a spirit of zeal and patriotism. Such addresses should not be judged of by the cold eye of criticism—but looked at in the light only for which they are intended—and thus regarded, we do not think that the late Texian secretary at war could adopt a more felicitous manner and style than he has in his different communications to the Texans.

Under his skill and ardent zeal in his country's cause, we entertain no fears as to the result of the approaching second grand contest of the Texans with the Mexican forces. We honestly believe that an army of 3,000 Texans is fully equivalent to any force that Mexico can bring against them; and we will forfeit all claim to any knowledge of Texas, or her gallant soldiers, if the result does not bear us out in our belief.

SOLDIERS OF TEXAS: On assuming the glorious responsibility of leading you to the field of battle, I am deeply impressed with gratitude for the trust confided; and feel most vividly, that to command an army of heroes in the cause of freedom is the highest of all privileges, and to conduct it to victory is the most enduring and exalted honor.

The enemy who so recently retired, terrified from our borders, are about to counter-march upon us with reinforcements formidable in count, but feeble in spirit and puissance. They come for the hellish purpose of desolating the loveliest of a thousand lands, and staining our luxuriant fields with the blood of the cultivators.

Confident of numbers, they hope to gain by overwhelming force, that which they cannot achieve by valor. They boast that they will retrieve the late inglorious defeat of their arms, or perish in the attempt; that they will drive us beyond the Sabine, or give us a grave this side. You, soldiers, know the futility of their vain-glorious boastings, as well as the ferocious character of their warfare.

Their cruelty and perfidy were sufficiently exemplified in their horrid massacres at Bexar and La Bahia, while their shameful route and discomfiture at the San Jacinto stand as a perpetual monument of their unexampled pusillanimity and dastardly conduct. Audacious monsters! That they have the willingness to murder is apparent—their ability to conquer they never have shown. Their numbers can avail them nothing; and their threats of extermination, instead of intimidating, only invigorate the nerves of the bold and free. Let them come. Their return is hailed with joy by every manly voice in Texas.

Another opportunity is afforded to vindicate our rights and avenge our wrongs. The greater the force, the richer the harvest! Though every blade of grass on the banks of the Bravo bristle into a bayonet, it shall not save them. The very glance of a freeman's eye, is a blazing shield of Perseus to the monsters of tyranny. They have to fly, or fall, before the wrath of an injured people, nerved in the cause of liberty and of vengeance.

Soldiers! Your country calls you to her defence. Your homes, your fire-sides—the scenes of your former joys, and future anticipation; all the endearments of domestic happiness, and all the hopes of future competence and peace, summon you to the field. You are summoned too by the spirits of Travis and Fannin, and their gallant companions, whose blood has cemented the foundations of our freedom. Their flesh has been food for the raven, and their bones have been whitening on the prairies, until your pious patriotism gathered these scattered relics, with decent sepulchral honors, to a soldier's grave. But their glorified spirits still hovering around the home of their patriotic devotion, call upon you to sustain the independence which they have consecrated by their martyrdom, and to recompence, with merited vengeance, the wrongs they have endured from a perfidious and dastard enemy. Shall the call be made in vain? Shall we turn a deaf ear to the voice of our country, and the beseeching cries of our murdered brethren? Surely, there can be no one, so insensible to guilt and shame as to look with indifference upon the desolation of his own country. If there be so foul a blot upon humanity—if there be one in the whole limits of our land who is mean enough, when his home is invaded by an insolent foe, to seek safety in dishonorable flight, I would say to him, detested recreant! retire to the shades of infamy, and sully no more a beautiful land, whose blessings belong to the brave and virtuous.

Let then every patriot and soldier, every worthy citizen, who abhors the name of traitor, and condemns the vile epithet of coward, rally to the call promptly, around the unfurled banner of freedom—let him repair with impatient zeal to the theatre of his nation's glory, and there snatch upon the brink of danger, fame for himself and safety for his country. The dastard who lingers behind may live to fatten upon the fruits of his recreancy, but when he dies he rots in infamy, to the joy of all—while the noble hero who makes his bosom the bulwark of a people's liberty, will find a rich reward for toil and valor, in the thanks of a grateful land, and the smiles of its high-toned beauty. If he fall in the holy cause, he will still survive in the affections of his comrades, and his name will gather glory with the flight of ages—

"Each little rill, each mountain river, Rolls mingled with his fame forever."

Citizens of the red lands! You are looked to for aid in this second struggle for independence. Your contributions, heretofore, have not been proportionate to your population. Few of you have participated in the toils and glory of the strife. Your homes have been exempt from the calamities of war. For that exemption you are indebted to the gallantry of your more exposed and suffering countrymen. Whatever circumstances may have restrained you before, there can remain no reasons to withhold you now. We know your courage. Your skill in arms is familiar to us all. Your country requires the immediate exhibition of both—let both be displayed when the great and decisive battle which is pending shall be fought—and Texas is free, sovereign and independent! Hold not back, I adjure you, by every principle of honor, of gratitude and of patriotism. If any man among you prove recreant now, let him be stigmatized; treat him as an outcast, and let a nation's contempt rest like a black cloud upon his name. The call en masse let all obey, and all will be well. MIRABEAU B. LAMAR, Major general commanding the army of Texas.

Velasco, June 27, 1836.

MR. RANDOLPH'S WILL.

The following is the original will of Mr. Randolph and one of the codicils. Other codicils were made, but they have not been published in the Richmond papers.

"In the name of God, amen. I, John Randolph, of Roanoke, in the county of Charlotte, do ordain this writing, written with my own hand, this fourth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, to be my last will and testament, hereby revoking all others whatsoever.

"I give to my slaves their freedom, to which, my conscience tells me, they are justly entitled. It has a long time been a matter of the deepest regret to me, that the circumstances under which I inherited them, and the obstacles thrown in the way by the laws of the land, have prevented my emancipating them in my life time, which it is my full intention to do, in case I can accomplish it.

"All the rest and residue of my estate, (with the exceptions hereafter made), whether real or personal, I bequeath to William Leigh, esquire, of Halifax, attorney at law—to the rev. William Meade, of Frederick, and to Francis Scott Key, esq. of Georgetown, District of Columbia, in trust for the following uses and purposes, viz: 1st. To provide one or more tracts of land in any of the states or territories, not exceeding in the whole four thousand acres, nor less than two thousand acres, to be partitioned and apportioned by them, in such manner as to them may seem best, among the said slaves. 2d. To pay the expense of their removal, and of furnishing them with necessary cabins, clothes and utensils. 3d. To pay the expense, not exceeding four hundred dollars per annum, of the education of John Randolph Clay, until he shall arrive at the age of twenty-three—leaving with him my injunction, to scorn to eat the bread of idleness or dependence.

4th. To pay to Theodorick Bland Dudley ten thousand dollars.

5th. With the residue of said estate, to found a school or college, to be called Roanoke college.

"I give to Theodorick Bland Dudley all my books, plate, household and kitchen furniture, and all my liquors—also my guns and pistols, and the choice of six of my horses, or brood mares, and my single chair, with my best riding saddle and valise. It is my will and desire that my executors give no bond or security for the trust reposed in them. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my seal the day and year above written. JOHN RANDOLPH, of Roanoke.

"Codicil. It is my will and desire that my old servants, Essex and Hetty his wife, be made quite comfortable. It is my intention, that my reversionary claims on Mrs. Blodgett's and Mrs. Randolph's estate, should pass by the devised to my executors, who may sell any portion, or the whole of my said estate, of whatsoever nature it may be, the specified devise only excepted. J. R. of R. [seal.]

Among the testimony elicited by the following, which strongly illustrates the eccentric character of the testator.

Dr. Brockenbrough on being questioned as to Mr. Randolph's religious impressions in 1819, said he was enthusiastic on that subject, but he spoke and wrote on other subjects like a man of sense, and witness did not think his religious enthusiasm went to the length of derangement—at any rate, there are many who went fully as far on that subject who were not considered insane. Witness thought Mr. R. under this strong religious bias from 1818 to 1822. Thinks he did not use profane language during that period; that he was really pious, and that his conduct was unusually mild and forbearing. Witness was further examined as to various incidents of Mr. R.'s life, and certain extravagancies of conduct during his visit to Richmond, in the years 1819 and 1820, and the intermediate years. Questioned whether he thought Mr. R. deranged in 1826; witness said he differed from other persons who thought Mr. R.'s extravagancies arose from insanity. Witness never saw him, when, if money were concerned, he was not perfectly collected. If he had a bargain to make, he could be as cool as any man. In 1826, Mr. R. behaved wildly, and dressed in a strange manner; but he occasionally conversed as rationally as ever, which induced witness to attribute his conduct to eccentricity.

Mr. J. A. Chevalle states, that he was well acquainted with Mr. John Randolph, deceased, for thirty years preceding his death. He met with him on board a steamboat coming from Norfolk to Richmond on the 14th of April, 1820. Mr. Randolph on the preceding day had arrived at Norfolk from Washington or Baltimore. When he first saw him aboard of the boat, Mr. Randolph appeared to be very much excited, about something that had occurred on the day before. He stated that a Frenchman, who was a servant of Mr. Hyde De Neuville, the French minister, and who had stood behind his chair when he dined with them, had the audacity and impudence to sit down by his side at table aboard the boat the preceding day—that he had resented his insolence, and threatened to shoot him with his double barreled gun, which he had with him, (and which the witness saw), if he did not quit the table. Mr. Randolph abused the Frenchman very much, and said he had called him to his face coquin and polisson, &c. After breakfast Mr. Randolph came where the witness was sitting, took a seat by him, treated him with marked politeness, and engaged in a conversation with him respecting French literature, the etymology of French words, &c.; which conversation he conducted with much ability and learning, proving himself fully master of the subject. When they arrived at the City Point, Mr. R.'s carriage and horses were got out on the wharf for him to proceed (witness understood) to Petersburg—witness was then in the cabin, and a servant came and told him Mr. Randolph wished to see him—when he went on the deck, Mr. R. was standing on the wharf, and as soon as he saw the witness he saluted him, waived his hat over his head, and cried out three times "vive le roi," in a loud voice. During the day, after they left Norfolk and before arriving at City Point, Mr. Randolph drank a great quantity of porter. Questioned what his impression was at the time, of Mr. R.'s state of mind, says that Mr. Randolph was so variable in his conduct and conversation that he hardly knew what to think of his state of mind. When he first saw Mr. R. aboard the boat, and heard his account of the meeting with the Frenchman, he thought it very strange, and that Mr. Randolph talked wildly about it—that afterwards in their conversation respecting French literature and other topics, he seemed to him to be composed and rational—that when he took leave of him he acted like a madman, which might have been occasioned by the quantity of porter he drank during the trip from Norfolk to City Point.

Mr. B. W. Leigh was questioned as to Mr. R.'s attachment to a young lady who was married about 1806—says he thinks the lady's marriage took place in 1807. Witness thinks Mr. R.'s attachment to her a very enduring one. Should not say the effect upon his feelings was very obvious, but it had a strong impression upon him. It was well known to witness that he was attached to her, and that he felt the disappointment deeply; but he never spoke upon the subject irrationally. He never attributed the defeat of his matrimonial connexion to the intrigues of others. He said that if he and the lady had been left quite alone, he believed their union would not have been prevented. There were interferences he said, neither intended to break off the match, nor to urge it on, which had an inauspicious effect. He never spoke disrespectfully of the lady's relations, and one of them (major Eggleston) he always mentioned with respect and kindness. Major E. was one of the persons of whom he always spoke kindly. He did not ascribe his disappointment to the interference of his own relations. Witness is sure he did not attribute it to the relative to whom he has heard others ascribe it. Witness thought the attachment a strong one, that Mr. R. retained it after the lady's marriage, and dwelt upon it more than he should have done. Mr. R. spoke often to witness on the subject, but witness never said any thing in relation to it, as he thought it a matter which ought not to be talked about. Has heard of his speaking often upon the subject to a number of persons. Q. Did Mr. R. survive the lady? A. Yes. Q. What impression did her death make upon him? A. It was a painful one. The lady was remarkable for the charms of her person and manners."

In reference to a conversation between him and Mr. R. in regard to the Russian mission, Mr. Leigh says:

"Mr. R. asked witness his opinion of the propriety of his acceptance of the appointment. Witness endeavored to avoid expressing his opinion, but Mr. R. insisted upon having it—and witness gave it in strong terms. Questioned whether this conversation indicated that Mr. R. was not right—says no—it was his going about and exhibiting the correspondence between the department of state and himself on the subject of his mission. It was not strange that he should show it to his friends; but it was strange that he should show it to persons with whom he had little or no intercourse, and in whom he had no confidence.

Witness believed that his mind was highly excited on the question of the propriety of his acceptance of the mission, and that the conversation with witness served to aggravate that excitement. Witness therefore regretted that Mr. R. had forced him to express his opinion. Mr. R. gave as the reason for exhibiting the correspondence, that he wished to place himself rectus in curia; and that he had not solicited the mission, but that it had been forced upon him. This was his object in showing it to others; but he demanded from witness his opinion of the propriety of his course, insisting that he had a right to know it. Questioned whether Mr. R. was not remarkable all his life for irritability. Answer. He was—he seemed sometimes like a man without a skin—but this sensitiveness varied with the state of his health, and his health was bad all his life. When in pain he was irritable in the extreme. It was difficult to describe the effects of passion upon him. When in a public body he would sometimes be highly irritated, but he appeared perfectly cool—and it was this control over his feelings that enabled him to make those severe retorts for which he was distinguished. When he was angry he was very angry—he was quick to take offence, and he never proportioned the measure of retaliation to the degree of the offence. The slightest was as severely punished as one of the greatest importance.

EXPRESS MAIL.

From the Washington Globe.

In this day's Globe will be observed an advertisement of the post office department for the conveyance of an express mail from New York to Mobile, Alabama, where it will fall into the great mail, and be carried by steamboat to New Orleans. The time proposed to be occupied in the conveyance between New York and New Orleans is about six days and a half: the regular time for the present mails is a little over thirteen days.

The provision of the late act of congress under which this enterprise is put on foot, reads as follows, viz:

"In case the postmaster general shall deem it expedient to establish an express mail in addition to the ordinary mail, on any of the post roads of the United States, for the purpose of conveying slips from newspapers in lieu of exchange papers, or letters, other than such as contain money, not exceeding half an ounce in weight, marked 'express mail,' and public despatches, he shall be authorised to charge all letters and packets carried by such express mail with triple the rates of postage to which letters and packets, not free, may be by law subject when carried by the ordinary mails."

Regulations to govern the "express mail" will be published before it goes into operation.

It is the desire of the postmaster general to extend the benefits of this to the other sections of the country; but he thinks it not safe to attempt it until he is more fully apprized of the means which he shall be able to devote to the object. The improvements ordered since the first of January last and the new mails put into operation will cost about $100,000 a year. Congress at the last session established the unprecedented number of seven hundred and thirty-eight new mail routes, which will probably cost more than $300,000 annually. The express mail, now advertised, will probably cost $250,000 more, making an extension of expenditure equal to $550,000 a year. Although the postmaster general believes he can bear a greater extension without embarrassment, yet he does not think it right to hazard any thing by an attempt to place expresses on other routes, and he refrains from doing so until the expense of the new routes and the mail now advertised, shall be known. The day is not distant, however, when he expects to run an express to the west, starting probably from Baltimore and running on the national road through to St. Louis, throwing off branches or improving and expediting the existing lines, to the right and left, so as to diffuse its benefits to all the country upon the upper rivers and lakes.

An express cannot be run from New York to Boston, within the time now occupied by the steamboat and rail road line through Providence. It may, however, be useful to run one east of Boston to Portland. It may also be expedient to run one from Boston through Albany to Buffalo, which would operate, by connecting with the North river steamboats, as an express mail between New York and Buffalo.

From the southern express, now advertised, branches may be advantageously thrown off through Alabama into Mississippi and Tennessee.

The great outline of an express mail system would be completed by a line from New Orleans to Nashville; thence to Louisville, Kentucky; and thence connecting with the eastern and western line.

The present policy of the department is to run from New York to New Orleans by the route which can be most rapidly travelled, and scatter the benefits to the cities, towns and country, right and left, by improving the existing mail lines. The upper line advertised from Fredericksburg, Virginia, to Columbus, Georgia, is about 60 miles nearer than the lower line, which is now the great mail route; but on the lower line there are two rail roads, and if contracts shall be obtained with them on favorable terms, it will be expedient to run the express on that line. But if no contracts are obtained with them, it is probable the department will adopt the upper line, where the speed will be less rapid, and consequently the mail more certain and less expensive than on the lower line. The point will be decided when the lettings are to be made.

So far as the service of the post office department is concerned, one of the principal advantages expected from express mails is, that they will render it measurably independent of the rail roads. By running night and day, this mail will outrun their cars. The interest which the community now feel in the expedition of the great mail will measurably cease when the news shall be brought much sooner by the express. It will become a matter of comparatively little moment whether that mail be carried a little faster or a little slower; and if the rail roads will not carry it at a reasonable price, there will be no public inconvenience, and but little complaint, if it be carried in stages or wagons.

Yet, it will be a matter of interest that the rail roads should carry the great mail. Wherever they undertake to do so, and conform with the hours of the department, the whole mail will travel with the expedition of an express, and the triple postage will be saved to the citizen. Such will be the case between New York and Philadelphia, between Baltimore and Washington, between Fredericksburg and Richmond and between Petersburg and Blakely depot. Desirous of accomplishing that object as far as possible, the postmaster general has invited proposals on the portions of the line occupied by rail roads, for carrying the great mail and the express also in rail road cars. We trust there is a spirit on both sides which will lead to the formation of satisfactory contracts with the rail road companies, where their roads are completed on this great line.

THE SHOE TRADE.

From the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer.

It has been stated that the business done in Massachusetts annually, in leather as the chief material, amounted to the surprising sum of fifty millions of dollars. But the inquiry into the details seems to authorise the conclusion, at least, if we are warranted in supposing that its development is as great in other branches as in that of boots and shoes, which the following letter, furnished us by a gentleman in Boston, to whom it was addressed, from an intelligent and extensive dealer, with great particularity points out. Besides the authority of the writer, the letter contains internal evidence of truth in its details of the various kinds of articles which are made in the different towns. Evidently written hastily, and not for publication, the writer shows an intimate knowledge of his subject, and teaches us the cause of the very unusual increase of Lynn, from 6,000 inhabitants in 1830, to 9,000 at the present time.

Lynn lies but six miles from East Boston, and the eastern rail road which passes from one place to the other, will form so intimate a communication between the two places as greatly to benefit both. From the table of the amount of business, it appears that Lynn does one-tenth part of all the shoe business in the state, although its attention is directed solely to women's and children's shoes. But it also appears that Danvers, Haverhill and Randolph, manufacturing each a different article, are fast approaching the same result. We hardly knew how many different kinds of boots and shoes were worn, till our attention was called to the different varieties to which the attention of the manufacturers in the several towns is chiefly directed, which the reader's curiosity will discover as he reads the list the letter furnishes.

Lynn—manufactures exclusively ladies, misses and children's morocco and cloth shoes of every description; men's shoes for her own citizens are supplied by other towns. She produces one-tenth of all the shoes made in the state, and their value at a low estimate, is $2,000,000.

Marblehead—manufactures children's shoes mainly, and in the winter months, say $150,000.

Danvers—manufactures men's coarse shoes and boots mainly, worth, perhaps, $1,000,000.

Saugers, Salem, Beverly—manufacture $200,000.

Ipswich—men's and boys' thick booties, $103,000.

Rowley—men's and boys' coarse boots, booties and shoes are the leading articles, $400,000.

Andover—women's leather pegged shoes, $200,000.

Haverhill—men's pumps, women's low priced leather and morocco shoes, $1,200,000.

Bradford, opposite Haverhill—same work, $400,000.

Methuen—women's leather peg shoes, $200,000.

Grafton—men's fine peg booties and shoes, $1,200,000.

Westboro—same, $200,000.

Shrewsbury—same, $250,000.

Holiston—men's coarse peg booties and shoes, $250,000.

Medway—men's coarse boots and booties, $150,000.

North Brookfield—men's fine and coarse work, $350,000.

Randolph—men's and boys' kip booties and shoes, $1,500,000.

Stoughton—men's nailed and peg boots, $300,000.

Quincy—men's calf sewed boots, $100,000.

Weymouth—men's calf shoes, fine, $1,000,000.

Abington—men's calf shoes, $1,000,000.

Braintree, Bridgewater, Hingham, &c. are shoe towns in the vicinity.

Reading is celebrated for men's fine dancing pumps; Stoneham for children's fine shoes; Woburn for ladies' shoes, for Boston market.

April 13, 1835.

DEAR SIR: This abstract may inform you of the most important shoe towns in the state. Those towns which manufacture less than $100,000 I have omitted, and there are many. My estimate of the amount of each town, is made entirely from personal acquaintance and from a knowledge of the several manufacturers' business. It cannot be deemed accurate, but will fall short rather than exceed the full amount.

Massachusetts will export upwards of $20,000,000 of shoes this year, and her trade is rapidly increasing.

We received last year from New York and the ports south of that city 700,000 sides of sole leather to make into shoes, besides, a great quantity is tanned in this state, and we receive thousands of sides from Albany, New Hampshire and Maine.

Backed by such facts as these we cannot wonder at the rapid increase of population and demand of lots in the metropolis of New England, nor that the attention of capitalists and speculators is turned to that quarter for investment.

MR. MADISON.

The annexed biographical sketch of this illustrious man is said to be correct:

James Madison, late president of the United States, was the son of James Madison, of Orange county, Virginia, and Nelly Conway, his wife—and could trace back his parental ancestors as inhabitants of Virginia for about one hundred years previous to his birth, which took place at the house of his maternal grandmother in Port Conway, on the Rappahannock river, March 16, 1751. He was educated by Mr. Robertson, a Scotchman, in King and Queen county, and by the rev. Mr. Martin, a Jerseyman, at his father's house in Orange county. With these two learned and accomplished teachers, he studied English, Latin, Greek, French, Italian, &c. and prepared himself to enter college, which he did at Princeton, N. J. in 1769. He graduated in 1771, having studied the junior and senior classes in one year, but was induced to continue at Princeton till 1772, from a desire to learn Hebrew, and to extend his studies under the superintendence of Dr. Witherspoon, then president of the college, and to whom he was much attached. Having a delicate frame his close and excessive studies impaired his constitution, and he continued in bad health for many years. In the spring of 1776, he was elected by the people of Orange county a member of the general assembly of Virginia; but in 1777 he failed in his election in consequence of his refusing to treat and electioneer. In the following winter he was elected by the general assembly a member of the executive council, where he continued to serve until the winter of 1779–1780, when he was elected by the general assembly a member of the continental congress of which body he remained a member until the autumn of 1784. He was elected by the general assembly a member of congress in 1787, and in the same year to the Annapolis convention, which made the present constitution of the United States. He was elected by the people of his county in 1793, a member of the Virginia convention which ratified that constitution. He remained in congress from 1788 to March, 1797, the end of general Washington's administration. He was elected a member of the general assembly of Virginia in the spring of 1798, and an elector for president and vice president of the United States in 1800. On the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the presidency in 1801, Mr. Madison was appointed secretary of state; and eight years thereafter he succeeded his great friend and coadjutor as president of the United States, to which high station he was re-elected for a second term, at the end of which he retired in March, 1817, to his seat called Montpelier, in Orange county, Virginia, where he has ever since resided—except when attending an agricultural society, of which he was long president—as a visitor and rector of the university of Virginia—and as a member of the state convention to amend the constitution of Virginia—in which the people of his county elected him in 1839; until he took his departure on the 28th ult. in the 86th year of his age, from the theatre of his usefulness to that of his rewards.

GENERAL ORDER.

Navy department, June 30, 1836.

The president of the United States, with deep affliction, announces to the navy and marine corps the death of the illustrious statesman and patriot JAMES MADISON, late president of the United States, who died at Montpelier on the morning of the 28th instant.

As a testimony of the high sense of feeling for the loss which our country has sustained in the death of this great and good man, in which the navy and marine corps participate with the whole American people, the president directs that funeral honors be paid to him by the vessels of the navy in our own and foreign ports, by wearing their colors half-mast, for one week; that twenty-one minute guns be fired at each navy yard and in all public vessels in commission, at 12 o'clock, M. on the day after this order shall be received; and that the officers of the navy and marine corps wear cap on the left arm for six months.

INTERESTING CORRESPONDENCE.

The reminiscences of the revolution are always read with pleasure, and those particularly which have connection with the memory and the virtues of the illustrious Washington. The following beautiful and interesting correspondence, will be read, says the Albany Journal, with much gratification by the citizens of Albany, as it exhibits the good feeling and patriotism of their predecessors in the great struggle for liberty, and their affectionate regard for the father of our country.

The letters were found among the archives of the Reformed Protestant Dutch church, in this city, and are published by permission.

The humble address of the minister, elders and deacons of the Reformed Protestant Dutch church, in Albany, to his excellency Geo. Washington, esq. general and commander-in-chief of the American army, &c. &c. &c.

SIR: The auspicious visit of the illustrious commander-in-chief, fills the thankful hearts of the patriotic inhabitants of this city with extraordinary joy; whilst it indicates in the most pleasing manner your excellency's famous and justly celebrated attention to all, even the remotest corners of your extensive command, and your friendly intentions to faithful citizens, who have been in former days and dangers, and are yet, so remarkably preserved, under the benign influence of a gracious Providence, by your prosperous direction of our victorious arms, from threatened and impending ruin. We, the minister, elders and deacons, of the Reformed Protestant Dutch church in this city, beg leave to address your excellency on this joyful occasion, deeply impressed with sentiments of sincere gratitude and respect for your exalted merits, and justly dignified character; uniting our humble and earnest prayers to the God of all mercies and grace, that He will be pleased further to honor and crown your excellency with the choicest of His blessings; and to prosper your generous, distinguished and disinterested attempts to restore and establish to this injured and oppressed land of your nativity, that liberty, prosperity and happiness, which the Supreme Possessor and Ruler of the universe shall judge most subservient and conducive to high purposes of His own glory, and the perpetual happiness of the united, free and independent states of America.

May your excellency's precious health and inestimable life be graciously preserved and prolonged; and your excellency ere long enjoy the happy era when your unremitting zeal for the common prosperity of this bleeding country shall be crowned with never fading laurels of a triumphant and glorious peace.

By order of the consistory,

E. WESTERLO, V. D. et minister.

Albany, the 28th June, 1782.

To the reverend the minister, the elders and deacons of the Reformed Dutch Protestant church in the city of Albany

GENTLEMEN: I am extremely happy in this opportunity of blending my public duty with my private satisfaction, by paying a due attention to the frontiers and advanced posts of this state, and at the same time visiting the ancient and respectable city of Albany.

While I consider the approbation of the wise and the virtuous as the highest possible reward for my services, I beg you will be assured, gentlemen, that I now experience the most sensible pleasure from the favorable sentiments you are pleased to express of my conduct.

Your benevolent wishes and fervent prayers for my personal welfare and felicity, demand all my gratitude. May the preservation of your civil and religious liberties still be the care of an indulgent Providence; and may the rapid increase and universal extension of knowledge, virtue and true religion be the consequence of a speedy and honorable peace.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

Albany, June, 1782.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

We are happy in being able to lay before our readers, so opportunely, the following documents, in anticipation of their appearance among the many very important and interesting historical papers never before published, with which Mr. Sparks' most valuable work abounds. These papers show the extent of the agency of Mr. Madison, in the production of the farewell address, which was written four years after the date of the draft here given, at which time it is known the relations between gen. Washington and Mr. Madison were materially changed. To the editor of the Daily Advertiser.

SIR: In several of the public journals, remarks have been made respecting the agency of Mr. Madison in preparing Washington's farewell address, which have a tendency to produce an erroneous impression. It has been said that this address was originally drawn up by Mr. Madison, and that his draft, "with very slight alterations," was ultimately published.

As the papers relating to this subject will be contained in one of the volumes of "Washington's writings," there seems no impropriety in anticipating their appearance in that publication, so far, at least, as to correct the mistake implied in the above statement. For that purpose, gen. Washington's letter, and Mr. Madison's draft, are herewith communicated.

It will be perceived that the letter was written towards the close of the first presidential term, before Washington had made up his mind to be a candidate for another election; and also, that he had held a previous conversation with Mr. Madison on the subject.

Letter to Mr. Madison.

"Mount Vernon, May 20, 1779.

"MY DEAR SIR: As there is a possibility, if not a probability, that I shall not see you on your return home; or if I should see you, it may be on the road, and under circumstances, which may prevent my speaking to you on the subject we last conversed upon, I take the liberty of committing to paper the following thoughts and requests.

"I have not been unmindful of the sentiments expressed by you in the conversations just alluded to. On the contrary I have again and again revolved them with thoughtful anxiety, but without being able to dispose my mind to a longer continuation in the office I have now the honor to hold. I therefore still look forward to my fondest and most ardent wishes to spend the remainder of my days, which I cannot expect to be long, in ease and tranquility.

"Nothing but a conviction that my declining the chair of government, if it should be the desire of the people to continue me in it, would involve the country in serious disputes respecting the chief magistrate, and the disagreeable consequences which might result therefrom in the floating and divided opinions, which seem to prevail at present, could, in any wise, induce me to relinquish the determination I have formed—and of this I do not see how any evidence can be obtained previous to the election. My vanity, I am sure, is not of that cast as to allow me to view the subject in this light.

"Under these impressions, then, permit me to reiterate the request I made to you at our last meeting, namely to think of the proper time and the best mode of announcing the intention, and that you would prepare the letter. In revolving this subject myself, my judgment has always been embarrassed. On the one hand, a previous declaration to retire, not only carries with it an appearance of vanity and self-importance, but it may be construed into a manoeuvre, to be invited to remain; and on the other hand, to say nothing, implies consent, or, at any rate, would leave the matter in doubt; and to decline afterwards might be deemed as bad, and uncandid.

"I would fain carry my request to you father than is asked above, although I am sensible that your compliance with it must add to your trouble. But as the recess may afford you leisure, and I flatter myself you have dispositions to oblige me, I will, without apology, desire, if the measure in itself should strike you as proper, or likely to produce public good or private honor, that you would turn your thoughts to a valedictory address from me to the public, expressing in plain and modest terms, that, having been honored with the presidential chair, and to the best of my abilities contributed to the organization and administration of the government; that, having arrived at a period of life, when the private walks of it in the shades of retirement became necessary, and will be most pleasing to me; and the spirit of the government may render a rotation in the elective officers of it more congenial with their ideas of liberty and safety, that I take my leave of them as a public man; and, in bidding them adieu, retaining no other concern than such as will arise from fervent wishes for the prosperity of my country, I take the liberty of my departure from civil, as I formerly did at my military exit, to invoke a continuation of the blessings of Providence upon it, and upon all those who are the supporters of its interests, and the promoters of harmony, order and good government.

"That, to impress these things, it might among other topics be observed, that we are all the children of the same country, a country great and rich in itself, capable, and promising to be as prosperous and happy as any, which the annals of history have ever brought to our view—that our interest however diversified in local and smaller matters, is the same in all the great and essential concerns of the nation—that the extent of our country, the diversity of our climate and soil, and the various productions of the states consequent of both, are such as to make one part not only convenient, but perhaps indispensable necessary to the other part, and may render the whole, at no distant period, one of the most independent, (nations), in the world; that the established government being the work of our own hands, with the seeds of amendment engrafted in the constitution, may, by wisdom, good dispositions and mutual allowances, aided by experience, bring it as near to perfection as any human institution ever approximated, and, therefore, the only strife among us ought to be, who should be foremost in facilitating and finally accomplishing such great and desirable objects, by giving every possible support and cement to the union—that, however necessary it may be to keep a watchful eye over public servants and public measures, yet there ought to be limits of it, for suspicions unfounded and jealousies too lively are irritating to honest feelings, and oftentimes are productive of more evil than good.

"To enumerate the various subjects; which might be introduced into such an address, would require thought, and to mention them to you would be unnecessary, as your own judgment will comprehend all that will be proper. Whether to touch specifically any of the exceptional parts of the constitution may be doubted. All I shall add, therefore, at present is, to beg the favor of you to consider; First, the propriety of such an address; Secondly, if approved, the several matters which ought to be contained in it; Thirdly, the time it should appear; that is, whether at the declaration of my intention to withdraw from the service of the public, or to let it be the closing act of my administration, which will end with the next session of congress; the probability being that that body will continue sitting until March, when the house of representatives will also dissolve.

"Though I do not wish to hurry you, (the case not pressing), in the execution of either of the publications before mentioned, yet I should be glad to hear from you generally on both, and to receive them in time, if you should not come to Philadelphia before the session commences, in the form they are finally to take. I beg leave to draw your attention also to such things as you shall conceive fit subjects for communication on that occasion; and, noting them as they occur, that you would be so good as to furnish me with them in time to be prepared, and engrafted with others for the opening of the session. With very sincere and affectionate regards, I am ever yours,

GEORGE WASHINGTON."

At the time of receiving this letter, Mr. Madison was at his residence in Virginia. In compliance with the request contained in it, he drew up the following paper, carried it with him when he returned to congress, and gave it into the hands of the president.

MR. MADISON'S DRAFT.

"The period which will close the appointment with which my fellow citizens have honored me, being not very distant, and the time actually arrived at which their thoughts must be designating the citizen, who is to administer the executive government of the United States during the ensuing term, it may be requisite to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should apprise such of my fellow citizens as may retain their partiality towards me, that I am not to be numbered among those out of whom a choice is to be made.

"I beg them to be assured, that the resolution which dictates this intimation, has not been taken without the strictest regard to the relation, which as a dutiful citizen, I bear to my country; and that in withdrawing that tender of my service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am not influenced by the smallest deficiency of zeal for its future interests, or of grateful respect for its past kindness; but by the fullest persuasion, that such a step is compatible with both.

"The impressions under which I entered on the present arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In discharge of this trust, I can only say that I contributed, towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. For any errors, which may have flowed from this source, I feel all the regret which an anxiety for the public good can excite; not without the double consolation, however, arising from a consciousness of their being involuntary, and an experience of the candor which will interpret them.

"If there were any circumstances, which could give value to my inferior qualifications for the trust, these circumstances must have been temporary. In this light was the undertaking viewed when I ventured upon it. Being moreover still farther advanced in the decline of life, I am every day more sensible, that the increasing weight of years renders the private walks of it, in the shade of retirement, as necessary as they will be acceptable to me.

"May I be allowed to add, that it will be among the highest as well as purest enjoyments that can sweeten the remnant of my days, to partake in a private station, in the midst of my fellow citizens, of that benign influence of good laws under a free government, which has been the ultimate object of all our wishes, and in which I confide as the happy reward of our cares and labors? May I be allowed further to add, as a consideration far more important, that an early example of rotation in an office of so high and delicate a nature, may equally accord with the republican spirit of our constitution, and the ideas of liberty and safety entertained by the people.

[If a farewell address is to be added at the expiration of the term, the following paragraph may conclude the present.]

"Under these circumstances, a return to my private station, according to the purpose with which I quitted it, is the part which duty as well as inclination assigns me. In executing it, I shall carry with me every tender recollection, which gratitude to my fellow citizens can awaken; and a sensibility to the permanent happiness of my country, which will render it the object of my increasing vows and most fervent supplications."

[Should no further address be intended, the preceding clause may be omitted and the present address proceed as follows.]

"In contemplating the moment at which the curtain is to drop forever on the public scenes of my life, my sensations anticipate, and do not permit me to suspend, the deep acknowledgments required by that debt of gratitude, which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me, for the distinguished confidence it has reposed in me, and for the opportunities I have thus enjoyed, of testifying my inviolable attachment by the most steadfast services which my faculties could render.

"All the returns I have now to make will be in those vows, which I shall carry with me to my retirement and to my grave, that heaven may continue to favor the people of the U. States with the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that their union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free constitution, which is the work of their own hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and with virtue; and that this character may be ensured to it, by that watchfulness over public servants and public measures, which on one hand will be necessary to prevent or correct a degeneracy;—and that forbearance on the other, from unfounded or indiscriminate jealousies, which would deprive the public of the best services, by depriving a conscious integrity of one of the noblest incitements to perform them; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of America, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete, by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire them the glorious satisfaction of recommending it to the affection, the praise and the adoption of every nation, which is yet a stranger to it.

"And may we not dwell with well grounded hopes on this flattering prospect, when we reflect on the many ties by which the people of America are bound together, and the many proofs they have given of an enlightened judgment and a magnanimous patriotism.

"We may all be considered as the children of one common country. We have all been embarked in one common cause. We have all had our share in common sufferings and common successes. The portion of the earth allotted for the theatre of our fortunes, fulfils our most sanguine desires. All its essential interests are the same, whilst the diversities arising from climate, from soil and from other local and lesser peculiarities, will naturally form a mutual relation of the parts, that may give to the whole a more entire independence, than has perhaps fallen to the lot of any other nation.

"To confirm these motives to an affectionate and permanent union, and to secure the great objects of it, we have established a common government, which being free in its principles, being founded in our own choice, being intended as the guardian of our common rights, and the patron of our common interests, and wisely containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, as experience may point out its errors, seems to promise every thing that can be expected from such an institution; and if supported by wise councils, by virtuous conduct and by mutual and friendly allowances, must approach as near to perfection as any human work can aspire, and nearer than any which the annals of mankind have recorded.

"With these wishes and hopes I shall make my exit from civil life; and I have taken the same liberty of expressing them, which I formerly used in offering the sentiments which were suggested by my exit from military life.

"If, in either instance, I have presumed more than I ought, on the indulgence of my fellow citizens, they will be too generous to ascribe it to any other cause, than the extreme solicitude which I am bound to feel, and which I can never cease to feel, for their liberty, their prosperity, and their happiness."

Such is Mr. Madison's draft, which was evidently consulted in preparing the final farewell address, but on a comparison of the two it will be found that there is but little resemblance between them. In a conversation on the subject, Mr. Madison said to me, that he aimed chiefly to express the ideas contained in Washington's letter, with such additions only as were required to complete the form of an address. He spoke in high praise of the letter, as touching on the most essential topics in a condensed and pointed manner. The draft met Washington's entire approbation at the time. And indeed there was no man, whom he consulted for many years more freely than Mr. Madison, or in whose talents, judgment and fidelity, he had a stronger confidence, which is abundantly proved by the written correspondence that passed between them.

JARED SPARKS.

ERIE AND CHAMPLAIN CANAL DEBT.

The history of the world so far as relates to canals, will not furnish a more gratifying statement than the following. Those of us who are familiar with its early history, cannot but look back with astonishment at the result, at the period when the legislature was discussing the propriety of constructing the canal, it was boldly asserted that the then generation would never live to see it finished, that the expense would bankrupt the state, and that it was a political hobby for De Witt Clinton to ride into power upon. Those who made these predictions, have long since repented of, or been ridiculed for their folly. Although the work soon after its commencement fell into the hands of its bitterest enemies, yet it has triumphed over every embarrassment, and we now have the cheering fact, that a sufficient fund is already accumulated, to pay for the whole work, extinguish the debt, and leave the state possessed of the most valuable legacy that has ever fallen to any independent state. The following, which we copy from the Albany Argus, deserves to be read by every intelligent person, either in or out of the state.

An amendment to the constitution, which was ratified by the people in 1835, provides that whenever a sufficient amount of money is collected and safely invested, to extinguish the debt created for the construction of the Erie and Champlain canals, the 10th section of the 7th article of the constitution, so far as it pledges the auction and salt duties to the payment of the canal debt, shall cease, and that thereafter the revenues derived from auction and salt duties shall be restored to the general fund.

It is shown by the following statements that the commissioners of the canal fund have collected and invested an amount sufficient to cancel the Erie and Champlain canal debt.

Total interest, $185,032 62

The amount of interest receivable annually on the investment of the canal fund moneys, is less by $18,605 75, than the interest payable on the outstanding debt. A difference to this extent, however, will exist only for one year. On the first of July, 1837, interest will cease on $1,520,535 05 of the debt, this being the amount which was payable at that time.

Assuming that the canal fund investments will yield an interest of 5 per cent. on the whole sum remaining after the debt of 1837 is paid, and the interest receivable annually after the first of July next, on the investment for the payment of the debt of 1845, will amount to $114,167 24. The interest on the outstanding debt of 1845, is $119,457 77. Showing that the interest annually receivable on the investment, will be less by $5,290 52 than the sum necessary to pay the interest on the outstanding debt. This difference multiplied by 8, the number of years the stock will then have to run, makes a total difference of $42,324 16. Add to this the difference between the interest on the debt and on the investment, from July, 1835, to July, 1837, $18,605 75, and it makes a total of $60,929 91. To provide for this, the commissioners have set apart and invested an amount of principal, beyond the amount of outstanding debt, equalling the difference between the interest on the debt and the investment, for the whole period referred to.

In 1825, when the Erie and Champlain canals were finished, the canal debt, for which stock had been issued, amounted to the sum of $7,737,770 99

The following amounts of stock have since been redeemed, viz:

In 1826.....	$270,000 00
" 1827.....	94,514 00
" 1828.....	20,000 00

$3,803,879 90

In January, 1833, the commissioners had in their hands $3,250,000 of the surplus canal fund moneys; and as none of the stock was payable until the first of July, 1837, they were presented with the alternative of purchasing up the stock at a high premium, or allowing the surplus to accumulate to an amount of seven or eight millions of dollars, before the period would arrive when any portion of the stock could be redeemed at par. In order to keep down the surplus, and also to diminish gradually the amount payable in 1837, the commissioners adopted the course of redeeming the stock at the highest market price, and in 3½ years they have paid for principal and premiums the sum of $3,450,599 22, averaging about one million of dollars for each year. Notwithstanding the application of this large amount to the payment of the debt, and the disbursement of about $400,000 annually for canal expenses, it will be seen that the balance in the hands of the commissioners on the first of January, 1833, has been increased from $3,250,000 to $3,869,439 42, on the first of July, 1836; showing that if the surplus had not been applied to the payment of the debt, in the manner before stated, there would have been a surplus in the hands of the commissioners, on the 1st of July, 1836, of $7,320,038 64. This amount of money, placed in any situation to yield an interest to the fund, would necessarily have become intermingled with the transactions of the banks and all the business operations of the state; and the withdrawal of $3,489,000 at one time, to pay the debt of 1837, would have produced much inconvenience to the banks and the trade of the country. The sum payable in 1837 has been reduced to $1,520,000; a sum which can be paid by draft of 40 per cent. of the amount invested for the payment of the whole canal debt.

The following is a summary of the moneyed operations of the commissioners of the canal fund, from the first organization of the board in 1817, to the first of July, 1836, showing the sources from whence the canal revenues have been derived, and the general objects of their expenditures.

The act of 1817, which authorised money to be borrowed for the construction of the Erie and Champlain canals, set apart the duties derived from the salt springs and auction duties, &c. as a fund to pay the interest on the money borrowed. It will be seen by the preceding statement, the canal fund has derived from auction and salt duties, and tax on steamboats, the sum of $5,710,361 94

While the interest paid on all money borrowed has amounted to

Excess of auxiliary found beyond the interest, $503,480 95

The whole sum received for premiums on stock issued by the commissioners, amounts to $223,368 76

The commissioners have paid in premiums, in order to redeem this stock, the sum of 267,222 46

The payments on account of premiums, exceeding the receipts, by the sum of $43,833 70

The revenues of the canal fund beyond the expenditures for the interest on the debt and repairs of the canals, began to accumulate in 1826, and in that year the plan was adopted of loaning the surplus to banks on stipulated interest. In a period of ten years, the canal fund has been increased, by payment from the banks for interest on loans and deposits of the surplus, to the amount of $646,851 96

And from interest on other investments, 113,227 19

Total increase from interest on investments, $750,079 45

When this mode of investment was first adopted, the interest paid was 3½ per cent. At the present time the banks are paying 5 per cent. on nearly two millions of dollars and 4½ per cent. on more than a million and a half.

The choice of electors must be made within thirty-four days of the said first Wednesday of December. All the states choose by general ticket except South Carolina, which chooses by the legislature. It will be seen that Pennsylvania and Ohio open the ball three days in advance of any of the other states. These great states, if they go against Mr. Van Buren, as it is confidently expected they will, will defeat his election. Nous verrons [Boston Atlas.

TREATY WITH VENEZUELA.

By the president of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, a treaty of peace, friendship, navigation and commerce, between the United States of America and the republic of Venezuela, was concluded and signed at Caracas, on the 20th day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, which treaty is word for word as follows:

Treaty of peace, friendship, navigation and commerce between the United States of America and the republic of Venezuela.

The United States of America and the republic of Venezuela, desiring to make lasting and firm the friendship and good understanding which happily prevails between both nations, have resolved to fix, in a manner clear, distinct and positive, the rules which shall, in future, be religiously observed between the one and the other, by means of a treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation. For this most desirable object, the president of the United States of America has conferred full powers on John G. A. Williamson, a citizen of the said states, and their charge d'affaires to the said republic, and the president of the republic of Venezuela on Santos Michelena, a citizen of the said republic, who, after having exchanged their said full powers, in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

There shall be a perfect, firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States of America and the republic of Venezuela, in all the extent of their possessions and territories, and between their people and citizens, respectively, without distinction of persons or places.

ARTICLE 2.

The United States of America and the republic of Venezuela, desiring to live in peace and harmony with all the other nations of the earth, by means of a policy frank and equally friendly with all, engage, mutually, not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

ARTICLE 3.

The two high contracting parties being likewise desirous of placing the commerce and navigation of their respective countries on the liberal basis of perfect equality and reciprocity, mutually agree that the citizens of each may frequent all the coasts and countries of the other, and reside and trade there in all kinds of produce, manufactures and merchandise; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which native citizens do, or shall enjoy, submitting themselves to the laws, decrees and usages there established, to which native citizens are subjected; but it is understood that this article does not include the coasting trade of either country, the regulation of which is reserved, by the parties respectively, according to their own separate laws.

ARTICLE 4.

They likewise agree that, whatever kind of produce, manufactures or merchandise of any foreign country can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into the United States in their own vessels, may be also imported in vessels of the republic of Venezuela; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel and her cargo shall be levied and collected, whether the importation be made in the vessels of the one country or of the other; and, in like manner, that whatever kind of produce, manufactures or merchandise of any foreign country can be, from time to time, lawfully imported into the republic of Venezuela in its own vessels, may be also imported in vessels of the United States; and that no higher or other duties upon the tonnage of the vessel and her cargo shall be levied or collected, whether the importation be made in vessels of the one country or of the other. And they agree that whatever may be lawfully exported or re-exported from the one country in its own vessels, to any foreign country, may, in like manner, be exported or re-exported in the vessels of the other country. And the same bounties, duties and drawbacks shall be allowed and collected, whether such exportation or re-exportation be made in vessels of the United States or of the republic of Venezuela.

ARTICLE 5.

For the better understanding of the preceding article and taking into consideration the actual state of the commercial marine of the republic of Venezuela, it has been stipulated and agreed, that all vessels belonging exclusively to a citizen or citizens of said republic, and whose captain is also a citizen of the same, though the construction or the crew are or may be foreign, shall be considered, for all the objects of this treaty, as a Venezuelan vessel.

ARTICLE 6.

No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any articles, the produce or manufactures of the republic of Venezuela, and no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the republic of Venezuela of any articles, the produce or manufactures of the United States, that are or shall be payable on the like articles, being the produce or manufactures of any other foreign country; nor shall any higher or other duties or charges be imposed in either of the two countries, on the exportation of any articles to the United States or to the republic of Venezuela, respectively, than such as are payable on the exportation of the like articles to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles the produce or manufactures of the United States or of the republic of Venezuela, to or from the territories of the United States, or to or from the territories of the republic of Venezuela, which shall not equally extend to all other nations.

ARTICLE 7.

It is likewise agreed that it shall be wholly free for all merchants, commanders of ships and other citizens of both countries; to manage themselves their own business, in all the ports and places subject to the jurisdiction of each other, as well with respect to the consignment and sale of their goods and merchandise by wholesale or retail, as with respect to the loading, unloading and sending off their ships; they being in all these cases to be treated as citizens of the country in which they reside, or, at least, to be placed on a footing with the subjects or citizens of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE 8.

The citizens of neither of the contracting parties shall be liable to any embargo, nor be detained with their vessels, cargoes, merchandises or effects, for any military expedition, nor for any public or private purpose whatever, without allowing to those interested a sufficient indemnification.

ARTICLE 9.

Whenever the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be forced to seek refuge or asylum in the rivers, bays, ports or dominions of the other with their vessels, whether merchant or of war, public or private, through stress of weather, pursuit of pirates or enemies, they shall be received and treated with humanity; giving to them all favor and protection for repairing their ships, procuring provisions, and place themselves in a situation to continue their voyage, without obstacle or hindrance of any kind.

ARTICLE 10.

All the ships, merchandise and the effects belonging to the citizens of one of the contracting parties, which may be captured by pirates, whether within the limits of its jurisdiction or on the high seas, and may be carried or found in the rivers, roads, bays, ports or dominions of the other, shall be delivered up to the owners, they proving, in due and proper form, their rights before the competent tribunals; it being well understood, that the claim should be made within the term of one year, by the parties themselves, their attorneys or agents of their respective governments.

ARTICLE 11.

When any vessel belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties shall be wrecked, foundered or shall suffer any damage on the coasts or within the dominions of the other, there shall be given to them all assistance and protection in the same manner which is usual and customary with the vessels of the nation where the damage happens, permitting them to unload the said vessel, if necessary, of its merchandise and effects, without exacting for it any duty, impost or contribution whatever, until they may be exported, unless they be destined for consumption.

ARTICLE 12.

The citizens of each of the contracting parties shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by sale, donation, testament or otherwise, and their representatives being citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal goods, whether by testament or ab intestato, and they may take possession thereof either by themselves or others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such duties only as the inhabitants of the country wherein the goods are, shall be subject to pay in like cases. And if in the case of real estate, the said heirs would be prevented from entering into the possession of the inheritance on account of their character of aliens, there shall be granted to them the term of three years, to dispose of the same as they may think proper, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, nor any other charges than those which are imposed by the laws of the country.

*Killed in Florida, in the action of the 28th December, 1835.

ARTICLE 13.

Both the contracting parties promise and engage, formally, to give their special protection to the persons and property of the citizens of each other, of all occupations, who may be in the territories subject to the jurisdiction of the one or the other, transient or dwelling therein, leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice, for their judicial recourse, on the same terms which are usual and customary with the natives or citizens of the country in which they may be; for which they may employ in defence of their rights, such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents and factors as they may judge proper, in all their trials at law, and such citizens or agents shall have free opportunity to be present at the decisions and sentences of the tribunals, in all cases which may concern them; and likewise at the taking of all examinations and evidence which may be exhibited on the said trials.

ARTICLE 14.

The citizens of the United States residing in the territories of the republic of Venezuela, shall enjoy the most perfect and entire security of conscience, without being annoyed, prevented or disturbed on account of their religious belief. Neither shall they be annoyed, molested or disturbed in the proper exercise of their religion in private houses, or in the chapels or places of worship appointed for that purpose, with the decorum due to divine worship, and with due respect to the laws, usages and customs of the country. Liberty shall also be granted to bury the citizens of the United States who may die in the territories of the republic of Venezuela, in convenient and adequate places, to be appointed and established by themselves, for that purpose, with the knowledge of the local authorities, or in such other places of sepulture as may be chosen by the friends of the deceased; nor shall the funerals or sepulchres of the dead be disturbed in any wise, nor upon any account. In like manner, the citizens of Venezuela shall enjoy within the government and territories of the United States, a perfect and unrestrained liberty of conscience and of exercising their religion publicly or privately, within their own dwelling houses, or in the chapels and places of worship appointed for that purpose, agreeably to the laws, usages and customs of the United States.

ARTICLE 15.

It shall be lawful for the citizens of the United States of America and of the republic of Venezuela, to sail with their ships, with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port, to the places of those who now are, or hereafter shall be in enmity with either of the contracting parties. It shall, likewise, be lawful for the citizens aforesaid to sail with their ships and merchandises before mentioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports and havens of those who are enemies of both, or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy before mentioned to neutral places, but also from one place, belonging to an enemy, to another place, belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of one power, or under several. And it is hereby stipulated, that free ships shall also give freedom to goods, and that every thing shall be deemed free and exempt, which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the citizens of either of the contracting parties, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either, contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed, in like manner, that the same liberty shall be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect, that, although they may be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship, unless they are officers or soldiers, and in the actual service of the enemies. Provided, however, and it is hereby agreed, that the stipulations in this article contained, declaring that the flag shall cover the property, shall be understood as applying to those powers only who recognise this principle; but if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ARTICLE 16.

It is likewise agreed, that in the case where the neutral flag of one of the contracting parties shall protect the property of the enemies of the other, by virtue of the above stipulations, it shall always be understood that the neutral property found on board such enemy's vessels, shall be held and considered as enemy's property, and, as such, shall be liable to detention and confiscation; except such property as was put on board such vessel before the declaration of war, or even afterwards, if it were done without the knowledge of it but the contracting parties agree, that two months having elapsed after the declaration, their citizens shall not plead ignorance thereof. On the contrary, if the flag of the neutral does not protect the enemy's property, in that case, the goods and merchandises of the neutral, embarked in such enemy's ship, shall be free.

ARTICLE 17.

This liberty of navigation and commerce shall extend to all kinds of merchandise, excepting those only which are distinguished by the name of contraband; and under this name of contraband or prohibited goods shall be comprehended:

1st. Cannons, mortars, howitzers, swivels, blunderbusses, muskets, fuzees, rifles, carbines, pistols, pikes, swords, sabres, lances, spears, halberds and grenades, bombs, powder, matches, balls, and all other things belonging to the use of these arms.

2d. Bucklers, helmets, breast-plates, coats of mail, infantry-belts, and clothes made up in the form and for a military use.

3d. Cavalry-belts, and horses with their furniture.

4th. And generally all kinds of arms and instruments of iron, steel, brass and copper, or of any other materials, manufactured, prepared and formed expressly to make war by sea or land.

ARTICLE 18.

All other merchandises and things not comprehended in the articles of contraband explicitly enumerated and classified as above, shall be held and considered as free, and subjects of free and lawful commerce, so that they may be carried and transported in the freest manner, by the citizens of both the contracting parties even to places belonging to an enemy; excepting, only, those places which are, at that time, besieged or blockaded; and to avoid all doubt in this particular, it is declared, that those places only are besieged or blockaded, which are actually attacked by a belligerent force capable of preventing the entry of the neutral.

ARTICLE 19.

The articles of contraband before enumerated and classified, which may be found in a vessel bound for an enemy's port, shall be subject to detention and confiscation, leaving free the rest of the cargo and the ship, that the owners may dispose of them as they see proper. No vessel of either of the two nations shall be detained on the high seas on account of having on board articles of contraband, whenever the master, captain or supercargo of said vessel will deliver up the articles of contraband to the captor, unless the quantity of such articles be so great or so large a bulk, that they cannot be received on board the capturing ship without great inconvenience; but in this, and in all other cases of just detention, the vessel detained shall be sent to the nearest convenient and safe port for trial and judgment according to law.

ARTICLE 20.

And whereas it frequently happens that vessels sail for a port or places belonging to an enemy without knowing that the same is besieged, blockaded or invested, it is agreed that every vessel so circumstanced may be turned away from such port or place, but shall not be detained, nor shall any part of her cargo, if not contraband, be confiscated; unless, after warning of such blockade or investment from any officer commanding a vessel of the blockading forces, they shall again attempt to enter; but she shall be permitted to go to any other port or place she shall think proper. Nor shall any vessel of either, that may have entered into such port before the same was actually besieged, blockaded or invested by the other, be restrained from quitting such place with her cargo; nor, if found therein after the reduction and surrender, shall such vessel or her cargo be liable to confiscation, but they shall be restored to the owners thereof.

ARTICLE 21.

In order to prevent all kind of disorder in the visiting and examination of the ships and cargoes of both the contracting parties, on the high seas, they have agreed, mutually, that, whenever a vessel of war, public or private, shall meet with a neutral of the other contracting party, the first shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send its boats with two or three men only, in order to execute the said examination of the papers concerning the ownership and cargo of the vessel, without causing the least extortion, violence or ill-treatment, for which the commanders of the said armed ships shall be responsible, with their persons and property; for which purpose the commanders of the said private armed vessels shall, before receiving their commissions, give sufficient security to answer for all the damages they may commit; and it is expressly agreed, that the neutral party shall, in no case, be required to go on board the examining vessel for the purpose of exhibiting his papers, or for any other purpose whatever.

ARTICLE 22.

To avoid all kind of vexation and abuse in the examination of the papers relating to the ownership of the vessels belonging to the citizens of the two contracting parties, they have agreed, and do agree, that in case one of them should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the citizens of the other must be furnished with sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property and bulk of the ships, as also the name and place of habitation of the master and commander of said vessel, in order that it may thereby appear that said ship truly belongs to the citizens of one of the parties; they have likewise agreed that such ships being laden, besides the said sea-letters or passports, shall also be provided with certificates, containing the several particulars of the cargo, and the place whence the ship sailed, so that it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place whence the ship sailed, in the accustomed form; without such requisites, said vessels may be detained, to be adjudged by the competent tribunal, and may be declared legal prize, unless the said defect shall be proved to be owing to accident, and satisfied or supplied by testimony entirely equivalent.

ARTICLE 23.

It is further agreed, that the stipulations above expressed relative to the visiting and examination of vessels, shall apply only to those which sail without convoy, and when said vessels shall be under convoy, the verbal declaration of the commander of the convoy, on his word of honor, that the vessels under his protection belongs to the nation whose flag he carries; and when they are bound to an enemy's port, that they have no contraband goods on board shall be sufficient.

ARTICLE 24.

It is further agreed, that in all cases the established courts for prize causes, in the country to which the prizes may be conducted, shall alone take cognizance of them; and whenever such tribunals, of either party, shall pronounce judgment against any vessel, or goods or property claimed by the citizens of the other party, the sentence or decree shall mention the reasons or motives on which the same shall have been founded, and an authenticated copy of the sentence or decree, and of all the proceedings in the case, shall, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of said vessel, without any delay, he paying the legal fees for the same.

ARTICLE 25.

Whenever one of the contracting parties shall be engaged in war with another state, no citizen of the other contracting party shall accept a commission or letter of marque, for the purpose of assisting or co-operating hostilely with the said enemy, against the said party, so at war, under the pain of being considered as a pirate.

ARTICLE 26.

If, by any fatality, which cannot be expected and which God forbid, the two contracting parties should be engaged in a war with each other, they have agreed, now for then, that there shall be allowed the term of six months to the merchants residing on the coasts, and in the ports of each other, and the term of one year to those who dwell in the interior, to arrange their business and transport their effects, wherever they please, giving to them the safe conduct necessary for it, which may serve as a sufficient protection until they arrive at the designated port. The citizens of all other occupations, who may be established in the territories or dominions of the United States and the republic of Venezuela, shall be respected and maintained in the full enjoyment of their personal liberty and property, unless their particular conduct shall cause them to forfeit this protection, which, in consideration of humanity, the contracting parties engage to give them.

ARTICLE 27.

Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to the individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in public funds, nor in public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or of national difference, be sequestered or confiscated.

ARTICLE 28.

Both the contracting parties being desirous of avoiding all inequality in relation to their public communications and official intercourse, have agreed, and do agree to grant to the envoys, ministers and other public agents, the same favors, immunities and exemptions which those of the most favored nation do, or shall enjoy; it being understood that whatever favors, immunities or privileges, the United States of America or the republic of Venezuela may find it proper to give to the ministers and other public agents of any other power, shall, by the same act, be extended to those of each of the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 29.

To make more effectual the protection which the United States and the republic of Venezuela shall afford in future to the navigation and commerce of the citizens of each other, they agree to receive and admit consuls and vice-consuls in all the ports open to foreign commerce, who shall enjoy in them all the rights, prerogatives and immunities, of the consuls and vice-consuls of the most favored nation; each contracting party, however, remaining at liberty to except those ports and places in which the admission and residence of such consuls and vice-consuls may not seem convenient.

ARTICLE 30.

In order that the consuls and vice-consuls of the two contracting parties may enjoy the rights, prerogatives and immunities which belong to them by their public character, they shall, before entering on the exercise of their functions, exhibit their commission or patent in due form to the government to which they are accredited, and, having obtained their exequatur, they shall be held and considered as such by all the authorities, magistrates and inhabitants in the consular district in which they reside.

ARTICLE 31.

It is likewise agreed that the consuls, their secretaries, officers and persons attached to the service of consuls, they not being citizens of the country in which the consul resides, shall be exempted from all kind of taxes, imposts and contributions, except those which they shall be obliged to pay on account of commerce or their property, to which the citizens and inhabitants, natives and foreign, of the country in which they reside are subject, being in every thing besides, subject to the laws of the respective states. The archives and papers of the consulates shall be respected inviolably, and, under no pretext whatever, shall any magistrate seize or in any way interfere with them.

ARTICLE 32.

The said consuls shall have power to require the assistance of the authorities of the country for the arrest, detention and custody, of deserters from the public and private vessels of their country, and for that purpose, they shall address themselves to the courts, judges and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing; proving by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel's or ship's roll, or other public documents, that those men were part of the said crews, and on this demand so proved, (saying, however, where the contrary is proved,) the delivery shall not be refused. Such deserters, when arrested, shall be put at the disposal of said consuls, and may be put in the public prisons, at the request and expense of those who reclaim them, to be sent to the ships to which they belonged, or to others of the same nation. But if they be not sent back within two months, to be counted from the day of their arrest, they shall be set at liberty, and shall be no more arrested for the same cause.

ARTICLE 33.

For the purpose of more effectually protecting their commerce and navigation, the two contracting parties do hereby agree, as soon hereafter as circumstances will permit them, to form a consular convention, which shall declare especially the powers and immunities of the consuls and vice-consuls of the respective parties.

ARTICLE 34.

The United States of America and the republic of Venezuela, desiring to make as durable as circumstances will permit the relations which are to be established between the two parties by virtue of this treaty of peace, amity commerce and navigation, have declared solemnly, and do agree to the following points:

1st. The present treaty shall remain in full force and virtue for the term of twelve years, to be counted from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, and further, until the end of one year after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same; each of the contracting parties reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at the end of said term of twelve years; and it is hereby agreed between them that, on the expiration of one year after such notice shall have been received by either from the other party, this treaty in all its parts relative to commerce and navigation, shall altogether cease and determine, and in all those parts which relate to peace and friendship, it shall be perpetually and permanently binding on both powers.

2d. If any one or more of the citizens of either party shall infringe any of the articles of this treaty, such citizen shall be held personally responsible for the same, and harmony and good correspondence between the two nations shall not be interrupted thereby, each party engaging in no way to protect the offender, or sanction such violation.

3d. If, (what indeed cannot be expected), unfortunately any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any other way whatever, it is expressly stipulated, that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any act of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended, shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed.

4th. Nothing in this treaty shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns and states.

The present treaty of peace, amity, commerce and navigation, shall be approved and ratified by the president of the U. States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof, and by the president of the republic of Venezuela, with the consent and approbation of the congress of the same; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Caracas, within eight months, to be counted from the date of the signature herof, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries of the U. States of America and of the republic of Venezuela, have signed and sealed these presents.

Done in the city of Caracas, on the twentieth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, and in the sixtieth year of the independence of the United States of America, and the twenty-sixth of that of the republic of Venezuela.

JOHN G. A. WILLIAMSON, [L. S.]
SANTOS MICHELENA. [L. S.]

And whereas, the said treaty has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratification of the same were exchanged at Caracas, on the thirty-first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, by John G. A. Williamson, charge d'affaires of the United States to Venezuela, and Jose Eusebio Gallegos, secretary of foreign relations and of the treasury of that republic, on the part of their respective governments:

NOW, THEREFORE, BE IT KNOWN, THAT I, ANDREW JACKSON, president of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end, that the same, and every clause and article thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this twentieth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and [L. S.] thirty-six, and of the independence of the U. States the sixtieth. ANDREW JACKSON.

By the president:
JOHN FOSYTH, secretary of state.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE KING OF FRANCE. Just as our paper was ready for the press, we received the N. York papers of Thursday last, containing foreign advices to the 28th June. The most interesting news, is an account of an attempt to assassinate the king of France on the 26th June. The king had entered his carriage, to return to Neuilly, and was passing under the gateway leading to the quay, when a young man who had placed himself on the side opposite to that of the post of the national guard, lifted up a cane in which a pistol barrel had been fixed, placed it on the carriage door, and fired it at the king.

Louis Phillipe was at that moment bowing to the national guards through the other window. Whether the assassin felt agitated or, as it is stated, was pushed while engaged in taking aim, the ball did not touch the king, who, immediately after the explosion, made a sign that he was not wounded, and ordered the coach to be driven on to Neuilly. The king was with the queen and his sister madame Adelaide, and a detachment of dragoons escorted the carriage. The young man was instantly seized and conducted to prison, and underwent an examination—but nothing of importance transpired. The attempt is condemned by all parties.

Another interesting piece of intelligence received by this arrival is, that the British house of lords have taken into consideration the amendments of the commons to their amendments in the Irish municipal bill, and the result was that the amendments of the commons were rejected, the numbers being for the amendments 78, against them 142.

One of the most flagrant outrages which has yet disgraced the courts of this country, is detailed in the account, from the Boston "Courier," of the rescue of two runaway slaves, on Monday last, in that city, in presence of the court to which their case was submitted, and in opposition to the personal efforts of the judges to detain them! This profligate disregard of the sanctuaries of the law, not only indicates a most revolting degree of fanaticism among the perpetrators of the outrage, but will seriously alarm the fears of the south, which will construe it into a settled determination to disregard all constitutional and legal objections, when such cases are brought before the northern tribunals for adjudication. See page 387.

At the last accounts the slaves had not been recovered.

On Thursday the 28th ult. the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal assembled in general meeting at the city of Washington, and formally assented to the improvement bill passed by the legislature of Maryland in June last—ayes 4,101, noes 2,333. The corporations of Georgetown and Alexandria and the state of Maryland voted in the affirmative—the corporation of Washington in the negative. The governor and council had previously decided that a cross cut canal is not practicable. A full report of the proceedings shall have a place in our next sheet.

We stated in the last "REGISTER" that "all the heads of departments, with the exception of the secretary of the navy, are, or were recently, absent from the seat of government." The Washington, "Globe," with its characteristic courtesy, says, that, in publishing that statement, we were so warped by opposition bitterness that we have been guilty of a gross misrepresentation, &c.—and that "neither Mr. Woodbury, the secretary of the treasury, nor Mr. Kendall, the postmaster general, is now absent; nor has Mr. Woodbury been recently: he has not been a day absent the present year; while gov. Dickerson, the secretary of the navy, who alone is excepted, as being here, has been sometime absent, to select a site for a dry dock at Newport."

This explanation is worthy of the "Globe." Instead of honestly admitting the fact that all of the heads of departments, with one exception, were recently absent, it has sought to conceal it by ambiguous phrases. We will, however, frankly confess our error, and say that we should have written "secretary of the treasury" instead of "secretary of the navy." We do not make this confession in the hope of profiting the "Globe"—but it may satisfy others, that, if "warped by opposition bitterness," we are not, like that venal print, chained to falsehood.

New light is thrown upon the recall of gen. Scott by the letter of gen. Jesup to the editor of the "Globe" inserted among the Creek news. The letter of general Jesup is defended on the ground, that he was an old friend and neighbor of the editor of the "Globe," who, as such, it was fair to suppose, would be willing to do him justice. But it is the first time we have seen a private letter invested with an official character, and made the basis of such an important procedure as that contained in the endorsement upon it by the president.

The United States Telegraph says that the order for gen. Scott's recall was issued two days before general Jesup's letter was received, and that it was made upon a private communication from capt. Page of the army.

We insert a number of official papers in relation to the invasion of Mexico by the United States, from which it will be seen that gen. Gaines was authorised to take this step, and, if the extracts below can be relied on, has actually carried it into execution. The responsibility of this movement must, of course, rest upon the parties to it; but its consequences will be felt in a lessened respect for treaty obligations, so clearly violated by the American commander—and will be the source of much regret and humiliation, if not pregnant with practical evils, to the people of this country.

From the New Orleans Bee, July 15.

New movement. By a gentleman who came passenger in the steamboat Choctaw, which arrived from Natchitoches yesterday afternoon, we learn that gen. Gaines, with the United States troops, has crossed the river Sabine and marched into Texas as far as Nacogdoches, at which place he had, for the present, fixed his head quarters. The intention of this move had not transpired.

From the same, July 16.

The statement that we published yesterday of general Gaines having crossed the Sabine, is confirmed by the arrival of the Caspian last night, from Natchitoches. It is further stated that six companies of infantry and three companies of dragoons were daily expected to join him from Fort Towson.

REWARD OF MERIT. On the 26th the governor of New York, in the capitol of that state, presented to col. Wm. J. Worth, of the United States army, a splendid sword, which had been voted to him by the legislature of that state, for his gallantry in the late war. Among the distinguished individuals present was the major general in chief of the U. S. army.

GREECE. A letter published in the New York Commercial Advertiser, dated Athens, April 27, says—

"The country, I am happy to say, is perfectly tranquil, except the usual, and to us quite unimportant and really insignificant, border troubles, which always have existed, and will exist, in a greater or less degree. The really formidable looking insurrection that broke out just before you went away, has been entirely suppressed, and by the Greek irregular Palikari, without the aid of a single Bavarian. The best proof I can give you of the state of tranquillity now existing, is, that the king himself is going to pay a visit to his mother. Yesterday he gave a farewell dinner to the diplomatic corps. It is supposed he will be absent four months, during which time count Armanseperg will have extraordinary powers entrusted to him. Antonio Miaulis and Catsakos Marmouchialis, two of the king's aids, accompany him. Gen. Church has established his head quarters at Thebes, having been appointed commander-in-chief of the army. His phalanx is a beautiful corps, and is very popular."

CARTHAGENA. The brig Marcellino, at New York, from Carthage, whence she sailed on the 6th ult. reports to the editor of the Courier that nothing of interest had occurred in New Grenada. The country continued tranquil, and every thing indicated its permanence. Congress was to adjourn on the last of June, but the greater part of the legislative proceedings were unknown in Carthage.

The object which had occupied the public mind was the choice of electors for the coming presidential election, to take place in April of the ensuing year. Greater interest had been manifested on this occasion, than was ever known before, and in the provinces of Carthage and Mompox, where the parties are nearly divided, the excitement was very great, but had happily, peaceably subsided. There are a great number of candidates for the presidency, but the most popular are Marques, the present vice president, and general Obando, the administration candidate, one of which will certainly be elected.

COLOMBIA. This republic, now divided into three, viz: Venezuela, New Grenada and Equador, has been, i. e. its several parts have been, endeavoring for some years past, to arrange the matter of the old national debt, most of which is due to citizens of Great Britain and the U. States. The efforts at an adjustment have however failed, thus far, and a correspondent of the Washington Globe, who writes from Bogota, expresses his opinion that the matter will not soon be arranged, (and of course all unsettled claims will remain in statu quo), unless some friendly nation interferes as mediator between the parties. He adds—"I do not know any government that would be more likely to succeed or more acceptable than that of the United States; and I hope that its mediation may be tendered."

TRADE OF NEW ORLEANS. The exports from New Orleans during the three months ending the 30th June last were as follows:

To coast wise ports,	$5,544,379
To foreign ports in American vessels,	7,597,543
To do. in foreign vessels	3,561,511

Total amount of dollars	16,703,433
The exports of foreign manufactures not yet made up supposed to be	2,296,567

Total amount of exports for the second quarter of 1836 19,000,000

LUMBER TRADE OF BANGOR, MAINE. A correspondent of the Springfield Journal, at Bangor, says, that the town of Orono, 12 miles from Bangor up the Penobscot, is one of the most thriving places in the eastern country. It contained in 1830 but 1,072 inhabitants. By a census just completed, it now numbers 5,634. It derives its importance from the lumber manufacture, which is perhaps not equalled in extent in an equal space in the world. There are now in operation night and day, within a few miles of Bangor, principally within the limits of Orono, more than 200 mill saws for boards, and a proportionate number for laths, shingles and clapboards, manufacturing considerably more than 1,500,000 feet of lumber daily. This is cutting up lumber on a scale, which no one, who has never been "down east," can have an adequate conception of.

MANUFACTORIES AT THE SOUTH. We find this paragraph in the Fayetteville (N. C.) Observer of the 4th ultimo:

A new cotton factory. We have the pleasure of stating that a cotton factory, with 500 spindles, has been erected in this town, by Charles P. Mallett, esq. and is now in full operation. The first work upon this establishment was commenced about eight months ago, and the rapidity with which it has been completed, not less than the practical character of the owner, leaves no doubt of its complete success. The machinery is all new, of the latest improvement, and highest finish. The building is calculated for 1,000 spindles, and it is the intention of the proprietor to procure the additional 500 as soon as possible.

We hope that this is only the first of many such establishments here; and when we take into consideration the immense water power in this neighborhood, the cheapness of labor and of living, the convenience of a market both for the raw material and for the yarn; and, not least, the fact that all such establishments are in a highly flourishing state throughout the country, we cannot but hope that our citizens will not much longer remain indifferent to this important subject.

DISCOVERY OF NORTH AMERICA. It is announced abroad that the Royal society of Northern Antiquaries, at Copenhagen, are about publishing by subscription a work which is to throw new light upon the discovery of America; it will be entitled "Antiquitates Americanæ," or a collection of the accounts extant in Icelandic and other Scandinavian manuscripts relative to voyages of discovery to North America, made by the Scandinavians in the 10th and following centuries. It is declared that it will comprise testimony, the most authentic and irrefragable, that North America was actually discovered by the northmen towards the close of the 10th century, visited by them repeatedly during the 11th and 12th, (some of them even making settlements as colonists), re-discovered towards the close of the 13th, and again repeatedly resorted to in the course of the 14th. It is said, moreover, that what serves in no small degree to enhance the value of these documents is the great apparent probability, amounting, indeed, almost to certainty, that it was a knowledge of these facts that prompted the ever-memorable expedition of Columbus himself! We give this report as it reaches us in a Paris paper, and look eagerly for further information. [National Gazette.]

BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL. The following anecdote of general Pomeroy, of Northampton, Massachusetts, is from the address delivered at Charlestown, on the 17th of June, by Alexander H. Everett:

"The veteran Pomeroy, to whom I have already particularly adverted, and who at this time held no commission in the line, when he heard the pealing artillery, felt it as a summons to action, and could not resist the inclination to repair to the field. He accordingly requested general Ward to lend him a horse, and taking his musket, set off at full speed for Charlestown. On reaching the neck and finding it enfiladed by a hot and heavy fire of round, bar and chain shot from the British batteries, he began to be alarmed, not fellow citizens! as you might well suppose, for his own safety, but for that of general Ward's horse! Horses, fellow citizens! as I have already remarked, were at this time almost as rare and precious as the noble animals that rode them. Too honest to expose his borrowed horse to the 'pelting of this pitiless storm,' and to dream for a moment of shrinking from it himself, the conqueror of baron Dieskau dismounted, and delivering gen. Ward's horse to a sentry, shouldered his musket and marched very coolly on foot across the neck. On reaching the hill he took his place at the rail fence. His person was known to the soldiers, and the name of Pomeroy rang with enthusiastic shouts along the line."

DEATH OF AN OLD INTERPRETER. We notice with regret, in the Canandaigua Repository, the death at that place of Jasper Parish, esq. 69. His life is full of romantic incidents. An emigrant with his parents from Connecticut to Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, he was captured in 1778, at the age of 11, by a party of Delaware, a few days after the massacre at Wyoming, and remained a prisoner among the Six Tribes for seven years, acquiring their language perfectly, and also their manner and gestures, impressed upon his mind at that early period, easily recognizable to those who knew him in after life, and were familiar with the peculiarities of the Indian character. He was released at Fort Stanwix (now Rome) in 1784. Speaking five different Indian languages he was appointed interpreter and sub-agent under Washington, and so continued for 30 years. He thus turned his former misfortune to a profitable account, and has left behind him not only a fortune, but an unblemished reputation, to be cherished by a numerous family who deplore his loss.

“THE GREEN CORN DANCE.” From the St. Augustine Herald of the 25th ult. This is now about the season when the Seminoles celebrate their annual festival of the “green corn dance” in honor of gathering the first fruits of the harvest. This festival is the commencement of their new year and its celebration is entirely adhered to. Every individual in the nation is obliged to undergo the ceremony of purification and must be present. As soon as the corn is sufficiently ripe, the ceremony commences: The “medicine man,” or priest of the town or tribe, administers to all a decoction, which they term a “black drink,” for three days successively, and all their fires are extinguished. The ceremony of purification being ended, new fire is produced by the medicine man, by rubbing two sticks together, from which every one procures fire for the ensuing year. A season of feasting and dancing follows: which is kept up for several days and nights without intermission. An interesting description of the dance is given by the younger Bartram, in his travels in Florida in 1775.

The ensuing corn dance will doubtless be one of the greatest festivity and rejoicing—they will have a great quantity of corn and beef, and flushed by their recent success, will take occasion to make one of peculiar interest to themselves.

We believe that there cannot be a better time to prosecute a campaign, and terminate the war, than the present. They soon will concentrate themselves in the neighborhood of their crops, and they may be found now better than at any other time; probably as soon as this dance is over they will scatter forth in small bands to commit new excesses, and extend their ravages still further within the remaining settlements of our unfortunate territory.

SINGULAR CASE. The Paris correspondent of the Albany Advertiser writes—“In July next, a curious case will be brought before the tribunal of first instance of Paris. M. Naundorff, who has resided a long time in Prussia, where he worked as a clock maker, has undertaken to invalidate the obituary act of Louis XVII, dated 8th June, 1795, and to prove himself to be Charles Louis, the dauphin of France and son of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette. Inquiries have been making by order of the French government to discover the family and birth place of this supposed imposter in Prussia, but until now they have led to no satisfactory result. It has been ascertained that M. Naundorff had arrived in Prussia in 1810; that he enjoyed, during two years, the rights of citizenship in Spandau, and that he married in Berlin in 1818, without being able to produce a certificate of his birth. The demise of the real dauphin, in the prison of the Temple, is any thing but well established, and the uncertainty prevailing with regard to M. Naundorff's origin, promises at any rate some very interesting disclosures.”

FIRST INVENTOR OF STEAM BOATS IN AMERICA. A writer in the United States Gazette claims for Rumsey, of Virginia, the honor of first propelling boats by steam in this country. It was many years before Fulton, and Rumsey was considered a wild enthusiast. With the assistance, however, of a drunken blacksmith at Shepherdstown, he constructed a boat which went up the Potomac against the current at the rate of half a mile the hour. The legislature of Virginia granted him some privileges, it is said, which his poverty prevented him from embracing. He afterwards went to England, where he was patronized, but died suddenly, leaving his family in indigence, the usual melancholy fate of those who have enriched the world with their genius. But as to the matter of priority in the great invention alluded to, we believe it is pretty well ascertained that the first experiment in this country which had any thing like the merit of success, was by Fitch, on the Delaware river. The periodicals of the time contain a sketch of the boat, and an account of the experiment. Lieut. Slidell, however, in his excellent work on Spain, found, in the archives of Barcelona, authentic evidence that experiments in steam navigation were successfully attempted in that harbor several centuries since. To the indolent and voluptuous Spaniard, therefore, and neither to learned and enlightened England or France, are we indebted for the first conceptions of this immortal invention. [N. Y. Star.]

NARROW ESCAPE. On Friday morning, at 2 o'clock, a stage left Troy for Boston. When about a mile and a half east of the former city, one of the passengers sitting upon the box with the driver, discovered that the stage was out of the road and on the top of an embankment, several feet in height and of considerable width, designed as a protection from an abyss of over one hundred feet which yawned below. After the passengers had left the stage, and the driver had backed it a little farther, the hind wheels ran off the bank, the king-bolt came out, and the body of the coach was precipitated down the bank and rocks about 120 or 130 feet, and literally dashed to pieces on the dry rock by the side of the water. The baggage was mostly lost, and the proprietors, Messrs. Baker & Walker, have paid five hundred dollars to the passengers as a remuneration. [N. Y. Com.]

HONORS TO MR. MADISON. On Monday the 25th ultimo, the citizens of Richmond, Va. paid the most marked honor to the memory of the illustrious Madison; The capitol bell was tolled every minute in the morning; and a little after 10 o'clock, the procession of the volunteers, officers of the government, and citizens, was formed in the Main street, opposite to the Union hotel, and marched to the Capitol square, where a platform and seats had been arranged in the eastern ravine, and the numerous company of ladies and gentlemen sat embosomed in the shade of the trees.

The ceremony commenced with a very appropriate prayer from bishop Moore—then followed Mr. Macfarland, the orator of the day—and the proceedings were closed by a brief but impressive prayer from the rev. Mr. Taylor, of the Second Baptist church.

The “Richmond Enquirer” in speaking of the oration, says, it was “a beautiful picture of a great and good man; presenting the character of Mr. Madison in new lights and beauties.”

The hon. John Quincy Adams has been appointed by the city authorities of Boston to deliver an eulogy on the deceased.

The following anecdote is related of Mr. Madison in the Washington Telegraph:

When the debates upon the adoption of the federal constitution were occupying the attention of our patriotic fathers, and when wisdom, like a daily visitant, hovered over the hall where genius and virtue breathed fire into the hearts of the sages who were there assembled, Mr. Madison wished to speak, but was almost afraid from his great physical debility to make the attempt. However, he begged a gentleman who was sitting near him to pull him by the coat when he perceived that he was becoming exhausted.

Mr. Madison rose and opened his speech—his voice was feeble at first, it became stronger as he progressed—passage after passage of brilliant and illuminating thought came from his almost inspired lips; every point of the great subject he touched upon, he left for men of all future times to look upon as if he had blown the clouds from the summit of the hills—he went on and concluded. “Why,” as he sunk back exhausted in his chair: “why did you not pull me when you saw me go on as I did.” “I would rather have laid my finger upon the lightning,” was the reply. This anecdote we have obtained from a gentleman who was present.

THE PUBLIC MONEY. In pursuance of a salutary provision in one of the acts passed at the late session of congress, the amount of public money subject to draft, on the 1st instant, in the several deposite banks, is shown by the subjoined notice. In conformity with the resolution of the senate, passed July 1st, 1836, directing that “during the ensuing recess of congress, the secretary of the treasury cause to be published, at the commencement of each month, a statement of the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft, and also the amount standing to the credit of disbursing officers,” the undersigned hereby gives public notice that “the amount of money in the treasury subject to draft,” as shown by the running account of the treasurer, was, on the 1st instant $36,554,845 95, and “the amount standing to the credit of disbursing officers,” as shown by the latest returns received, was $3,675,730 23.

HYDROPHOBIA. A work has appeared in Italian recently, entitled “Reflections on the bite of vipers as a remedy for hydrophobia, by Dr. Palazzini.” One of our late foreign journals says:

“The proposition of suspending the hydrophobia action, by the intervention of a poison not absolutely incurable, was a suggestion of despair. A favorable result was not impossible; and on this possibility, led by certain hasty inferences, Dr. Palazzini, so long ago as the year 1819, proposed the attempt: (Seeing (he says) the extreme failure of all efforts at cure, the little industry and judgment brought to the trial of an infinity of different remedies, and moved by compassion and fright at the death of two females, bitten, the one by a cat, and the other by a dog, who became hydrophobic, notwithstanding a long treatment by hot and cold baths, aconite, belladonna, mercury, and other similar drugs, it came into my mind to try, in any case of declared hydrophobia, the bite of the viper, and I communicated the thought in writing to the sanitary commission of the province of Mantua.”

“In this idea, Dr. Palazzini had, without his knowledge, been anticipated. So long since as 1782, D. De Mathias, a Sicilian army surgeon, was induced by accident to try the remedy on a dog, which he was told had been attacked by the disease, and he succeeded; but the subject was not pursued farther. In 1791, Dr. Gilbert published the cases of two hydrophobiacs so treated, in whom the disease was suspended for a few hours, but who eventually died in convulsions. Dr. Virieol also caused a boy to be bitten by a viper, for hydrophobia, who nevertheless died. Dr. Des Granges tried the same experiment on a dog, which met with the same fate. Dr. Valentine relates, that signor Gauche, maire de la priorite, had proposed the viperising animals, as a sort of protection against hydrophobia; ‘his experience having taught him that dogs who have been bitten by vipers, never afterwards became hydrophobiacs.’ To our notion, the weight of evidence, such as it is set forth by Dr. P. is altogether against the attempt; and were we reduced to the dreadful necessity of judging for ourselves in this case, we should prefer looking to some remedy, less carbone notatus, and less repulsive than that which he thus recommends.”

LYNCHING AMONG THE INDIANS. Extract of a letter to the editor of the St. Louis Bulletin, dated Fort Union, mouth of Yellow Stone river, June 26, 1836.

“I have only time to add a brief account of one of the most tragic scenes that this land of lawless violence ever produced.

“We were startled about 2 o’clock in the morning by a report of guns in a small fort occupied by half-breeds from Selkirk’s colony. On inquiring the cause, we were told that a half-breed family by the name of Duchamp, had murdered another half-breed, (Jack Ram), and that the French voyageurs, headed by the half-breeds, were determined to exterminate the whole of the Duchamp family. Daylight soon after dawned, and we beheld the little fort surrounded by the French and half-breeds, who kept up a continual fire on the Duchamps, who had taken refuge in one of the block houses after vainly imploring that their lives might be spared—and, finding that there was no mercy for them, they seemed to become desperate and reckless of consequences, and resolved to sell their lives as dear as possible. The conflict was long and desperate—both parties seemed to thirst for revenge. A Frenchman soon succeeded in setting fire to the fort, and the wind being high, the flames spread with fearful rapidity. The Duchamps defended themselves with a gallantry worthy of a better fate; their yells of defiance might be heard rising high above the fierce roaring of the flames; and even whilst surrounded by such appalling horrors, they possessed a calmness and deliberation that was but too evident from their deadly aim. The scene was now awful and sublime. The block house was completely enveloped in smoke and flame, and yet the inmates, salamander like, seemed to be in their native element, and to defy the power of their vindictive enemies. The dark form might be seen flitting through the fire; and gazing eagerly around to catch the slightest glimpse of a foe, on whom his gun might be brought to bear. Let the smoke and flames by which they were surrounded serve as a curtain to hide the horrid catastrophe.

“There were eight killed, and several wounded. The Duchamps* were completely exterminated, with the exception of a few small children.”

CULTURE OF COTTON IN INDIA. We have received a file of Calcutta papers to the beginning of March. An extract from the Bombay Courier of Feb. 15th, states that the quantity of cotton land under cultivation in Surat district, which was last year 43,912 begahs, is this year 53,799; being an increase of about 25 per cent. In Dharwar and Candeish districts the increase is at least 20 per cent. From the other districts the information was such as to justify the belief that throughout the presidency the average increase of cotton land under cultivation this year, is 25 per cent. greater than in 1835.—As regards productiveness, all accounts agree in representing the present crop as greatly above an average one, if not indeed unprecedentedly good. Estimating the improvement, in this respect, at 20 per cent. there will be a general increase of 45 per cent. upon the year. Now the exports of cotton for the last six years from Bombay to Great Britain and China, have been as follows:

	Great Britain.	China.	Total.
1830 bales	39,113	142,272	181,385
1831	63,576	136,198	199,774
1832	23,978	125,115	219,093
1833	88,155	128,414	214,566
1834	82,079	118,473	200,552
1835	103,598	51,739	155,337

The average yearly export, therefore, including last year, in which the crop totally failed in many districts, is bales, 195,118; 45 per cent. which will make the production of the present year 283,021 bales.

CONSUMPTION. In an able article on this subject in the last number of the Knickerbocker, by Dr. Brigham, of Connecticut, it is estimated that there are at least fifty thousand deaths in this country from consumption every year! This is astounding intelligence. If the discase which causes such appalling mortality, were small pox, cholera, or the plague, what consternation would be produced by its effects! From a table furnished by the author, it appears that the proportion of deaths by consumption to the whole number of deaths is, in Portland, one in 3.53; in Portsmouth, one in 7.73; in Boston, one in 5.79; in New York, one in 5.89; in Philadelphia, one 7.17; in Baltimore, one in 6.18; in Washington, one in 8.51; in Charleston, S. C. one in 7.08. It thus appears that the mortality of this disease is greatest the farthest north, and decreases as we advance to the south, or from the seaboard, consumption being most prevalent in large maritime towns.

POST OFFICE LAW. The following section is from the new post office law:

"Section 32. And be it further enacted, That if any postmaster shall unlawfully detain in his office any letter, package, pamphlet or newspaper, with intent to prevent the arrival or delivery of the same to the person or persons to whom such letter, package, pamphlet or newspaper may be addressed or directed in the usual course of the transportation of the mail along the route, or if any postmaster shall with intent as aforesaid, give preference to any letter, package, pamphlet or newspaper, over another, which may pass through his office, by forwarding the one and retaining the other, he shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not to exceed $500, and imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months, and shall, moreover, be forever thereafter, incapable of holding the office of postmaster in the United States"

It is hoped that an example will be made of the first postmaster who violates this law.

ATTEMPT TO ROB THE U. S. MAIL. On Tuesday morning about two hours before day light, according to the Newark Daily Advertiser, an attempt was made to stop the U. S. mail on the rail road about 4 miles this side of East Brunswick. Three ruffians suddenly sprung from the woods and demanded the driver (for the mail car in the night is drawn by horses) to "stop the mail." The driver called to the guard in the car and put whip to his horses. The guard promptly fired at the ruffians upon which they disappeared as suddenly as they came, and no trace of them has been discovered since. Several obstructions had been placed on the track in different places. A large stone was swept off by the broom in front of the fore wheels, near where the attack was made. Some distance further on, a plank was seen by the light of the lamps across the whole railway, and at different distances beyond two others, making altogether four obstructions, which might have produced serious and fatal consequences if the train had been under steam power, but for the lamps. The rail road company have offered a reward of $500 for the perpetrators of this shameless and unpardonable offence.

COHEN'S BANKING HOUSE. Among the beautiful buildings recently erected in Baltimore, one of the most worthy of notice is the new marble banking house built by Messrs. J. I. Cohen, jr. & Brothers on the north east corner of Baltimore and Calvert streets. Its architecture is elaste and handsome, and its interior arrangements admirably adapted to the purposes for which it was designed.

SHEEP IN PENNSYLVANIA. According to the census of 1810, the whole number of sheep in Pennsylvania amounted to 61,823. Of this number 47,294 belonged to Washington county. At the present time, the stock in Washington county exceeds 700,000, nearly all of the most approved breed, producing on an average 2½ lbs. wool each, or a total of 1,925,000 lbs.

EXAMINATION OF SOUTHERN HARBORS. The Army and Navy Chronicle says—"Under a resolution of the senate, passed on the 24th May last, requesting the executive 'to cause to be made the necessary examinations and surveys of the several harbors south of the mouth of Chesapeake bay, and a report of the comparative facilities and advantages of the same for the establishment of a navy yard, to the next session of congress,' commodore M. T. Woolsey, captains A. Claxton and E. R. Shubrick, have been appointed commissioners to make the necessary examinations. They will proceed to Boston, and take passage on board the new brig Porpoise, lieutenant Ramsay. This vessel will probably sail in the course of next week on this service."

THE CREEK WAR.

From the Globe.

Fort Mitchell, Alabama, June 20, 1836.

DEAR SIR: We have the Florida scenes enacted over again. This war ought to have been ended a week ago. I commenced operations on the Alabama side, and have succeeded in tranquilizing the whole frontier. Our principal hostile chief, Enea Mico, came in with many of his people to a camp which I had formed for the purpose of feeding the starving Indians, preparatory to their removal. Another, Enea Mathla, is a prisoner in my camp, and I was in full march with a force sufficient to have terminated the war in five days, when my progress was arrested by an order from general Scott. He has censured me in the most unmeasured and unwarrantable manner, and I shall be compelled to have the whole subject of this campaign investigated. There was force sufficient at Tuskegee, Columbus, or this place, one week after our arrival, to have put an end to this war, if it had been properly used; but it was thought necessary to adopt a splendid plan of campaign upon paper, and make every thing bend to it. To have waited the developments of that plan would have left nothing to defend; bloodshed and conflagration would have pervaded entire counties of Alabama. If not arrested by general Scott, I shall apply to be relieved, for I disapprove entirely the course he has thought proper to pursue, and believe that his delay has been destructive of the best interests of the country.

Let the president see this letter; he, I am sure, will approve the promptness with which I have acted, when he shall be sensible that I have, by the movement I have made, tranquilized the whole Alabama frontier.

With my respectful compliments to Mrs. Blair and your family, yours, most truly,

THOMAS S. JESUP.

Francis P. Blair, esq. Washington city.

Endorsement on the back of the letter.

Referred to the secretary of war, that he forthwith order general Scott to this place, in order that an inquiry be had into the unaccountable delay in prosecuting the Creek war, and the failure of the campaign in Florida. Let general Jesup assume the command. A. J.

Head quarters, army of the south, Tuskegee, July 17, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to report for the information of the secretary of war, and the general in chief, that in pursuance of my orders, major Webb of the Alabama volunteers, commanding a line of post in Chambers county, about thirty miles north of this position, has just sent in one hundred and forty-five prisoners of Neo Mico's party, which he captured in the last few days; this party increases the number of prisoners taken to about two thousand eight hundred.

The war is entirely at an end, and so far as regards Indian hostilities, the inhabitants might return to their farms in perfect security; but their houses have been burnt, their means of subsistence destroyed, and their crops on the ground will yield them nothing. It will probably be many months before the majority of them return; for all necessary supplies must be brought from a distance, and at an expense beyond the means of any but the wealthy.

I shall concentrate the regular troops and marines in the vicinity of the principal Indian force, for the purpose of preventing any danger from them, when the militia and volunteers shall be withdrawn; and without orders from Washington, shall continue them there until the Indians emigrate. A part of that force is now stationed on the mail road between this place and Columbus, for the protection of the mail; but the contractors have not yet placed stages on that route.

The discharge of the greater part of the Georgia force has been ordered, and I have directed the discharge of fourteen companies of infantry, and eight mounted companies of the Alabama volunteers and militia. The greater part of the mounted force now under general Patterson was raised in the northern counties of Alabama, and I propose to order them to move through the Creek and Cherokee country to their homes, and should gen. Wool require their service they will be in a situation to co-operate with him before their discharge.

The Tennessee brigade has reported, and I have directed general Armstrong to take a position near Montgomery, with that part of it not ordered by gen. Scott to Florida, whence subsistence and forage be may readily obtained, and where he can join me in a single march, should the Indians manifest a hostile disposition. I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP.

Brig. gen. R. Jones adjt. gen. Washington city.

Notwithstanding the annunciation of general Jesup that "the war is entirely at an end," the Creeks and their allies do not let an opportunity pass of encountering the whites, if they can do so with a hope of success. The Charleston papers of the 30th ult. state that a battle was fought in Stewart county, near Fort McCreary, on the preceding Sunday, between a party of hostile Creeks, amounting to 250, and two companies of Georgia troops, in all about 90 men, which resulted in the defeat of the latter with the loss of five killed and several wounded. The loss of the Indians is said to be thirty killed. As soon as the news reached gen. Sanford, he issued the following order:

ORDER—No. 130.

Head quarters 1st army corps, army of the south, Columbus, July 25th, 1836.

The apprehensions of the major general that the enemy would reassemble in force on the disbandment of the troops, has been too sadly verified; a party of Indians amounting probably to 200, have invaded our soil: they are doubtless seeking a covert in the Chickasawhatchee swamp.

An energetic pursuit must be immediately adopted and the enemy must be overtaken and overcome; captains Delaplaner, Sledge and Bostick, with their companies, will immediately proceed to the reinforcement of the detachment now at Fort McCreary; the instructions contained in order No. 129 will be rigidly pursued by the senior officer of the whole force, who will take command of the detachment. In addition to the instructions, he will consider himself as not being confined to the limits of one county, but if necessary pursue them to the Florida line—he will remember the Indians must not escape. Supplies of arms, ammunitions and subsistence, will be immediately forwarded to Fort McCreary, and every disposition made to check the escape of the enemy.

By order of major general Sanford.

W. S. ROCKWELL, aid-de-camp.

The troops had marched for Fort McCreary at the last advices.

The stages have resumed their regular trips, the road being well guarded by U. States' troops. The mail leaves Columbus every morning at 4 o'clock, and arrives at Montgomery next morning at nine o'clock, thus connecting with the mail for Mobile. Returning will leave Montgomery at six o'clock, P. M. so as to connect with the mail going east.

Montgomery, (Ala.) July 20. Fifteen hundred Tennessee mounted men arrived here on Saturday last, and are now encamped upon the borders of our town. We understand that Yoholo and Jim Boy, the two friendly chiefs who rendered such important service in the Creek war, are becoming dissatisfied with the whites and with general Jesup particularly. It is said they petitioned Jesup for leave to keep their relatives, who were hostile prisoners, with them, and that they might not be carried westward with the other hostiles, nor sent to Georgia for trial. This request Jesup refused, which is said to have rendered Yoholo and Jim Boy very much dissatisfied. In consequence of it, general Jesup intends keeping a large force in the nation until the result of the chiefs' resentment is more fully ascertained. Some danger is apprehended also from the department of the friendly Indians upon their being informed that they were to be sent off to the west immediately with the hostiles. They can raise 3,000 fighting men at least, and some say more. They had lately 1,100 under arms who are all still in the nation; and there are a large number besides residing in Taledaga, Chambers and other upper counties who took no part in the campaign.

Since our last, another (a third) party of Creeks were brought to our town on their march to the west. They consist of about 500 men, women and children.

Governor Schley has demanded Jim Henry of general Jesup, to be shot in Georgia, for his numerous offences there; and Jesup has answered the governor by informing him that Jim has been demanded first by governor Clay, and is therefore handed over to the sheriff of Russell county.

From the New Orleans Bulletin, July 20.

The Creeks amounting to some 12 or 1,500, including men, women and children, reached our city by the way of the lake Monday last. Until the departure of the boats, which are to convey them to their place of destination, west of the Mississippi, they have made a temporary lodgment along the bank of the new canal, below the basin at the foot of Julia street. The excessive rains of Monday night, and which continued nearly without intermission all of yesterday, have proved peculiarly unfortunate to these poor savages in their marshy situation, some 30 or 40 having died, as we are informed, since their arrival.

With the aid of a few staves and boards, some tattered canvass and soiled blankets, they have put up a few rude tents, which afford them however but feeble protection against the driving rain. Should the present wet weather continue, and farther delay be occasioned prior to their departure, it certainly would be an act of humanity on the part of the city authorities to appropriate to their use some more comfortable habitations than those which they now have. The barracks, or new city prison, might be used for such a purpose.

These Indians are not chained, as was reported, but are quite at large. They do not appear to be destitute of the proper clothing, and are without arms. We noticed among the group some fine looking warriors, who with their well chiselled frames, strongly developed muscles, dark hair, hazel eyes, high cheek bones, and noses that would rival the Greek, in precision of outline, showed a combination of manly beauty and strength, that we have rarely seen surpassed by the pale faces. There are Indian damsels too, who need only the habiliments and decorations of a more refined state of society, to create no little envy among even more polished dames, the observed of all observers.

THE CHEROKEES.

From the Miners Recorder.

DECLARATION OF PEACE, BY THE CHEROKEES OF VALLEY TOWN.

On Friday July 1st 1836, at Highwassee town house, delegates assembled from the principal towns of Aqualhee and Jaquahoe districts, in the Cherokee nation; comprising that part of the nation lying within the chartered limits of North Carolina, and in Union county, Georgia.

The meeting was called for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of making a public declaration of the views and sentiments of the people, of their several vicinities on the subject of Indian hostilities which has recently excited so much alarm. The following was unanimously adopted.

Whereas, We have learned with regret that rumors of Indian hostilities are producing much excitement among the citizens of the United States, and many persons unacquainted with the dissimilarity of the condition and character of the several nations of Indians are apt to confound the Cherokees with other tribes, less advanced in civilization, and less pacific in their habits; by which an influence is exerted injurious to our people, and calculated to excite unfriendly feelings in the breasts of our white brethren. With an earnest desire, therefore, to allay excitement, and to cultivate those friendly relations, which have long subsisted between us and the citizens of the United States, we make the following representation.

Our people have, by the favorable guidance of a kind Providence, made considerable advancement in the arts of civilized life. They have begun to taste the sweets of home and to cherish the charities of domestic and social intercourse. Dependence on the chase for a precarious subsistence is no more known among them, their dwellings and their cultivated fields, every where, bear marks of industry. Their interests and predilections and institutions are all on the side of peace. They have no military system nor military supplies of any description. Their reliance is not on the sword. They have no connexion whatever with the belligerent tribes, and to confound the Cherokees with them, is altogether unjust; and we hope the editors of papers will forbear to publish pieces written by misinformed or thoughtless men, tending to excite unnecessary alarm.

With us the tomahawk and the scalping knife have been buried for nearly half a century, and the love of war and the practice of it have become obsolete. A number of old men, indeed, still live, who spilled their blood and saw their brothers fall in defence of their white brethren, beside the present chief magistrate of the United States; but their young men, their youth, have never known war; they have never uttered the war-whoop of the savage, nor heard the furious yell of the battle field, nor viewed the pitiless carnage that daughters, husbands, fathers and brothers; makes widows and orphans, and wrings with hopeless agony, the hearts of mothers, sisters and friends.

By war, we have nothing to gain, but every thing to lose. Our whole population would regard indications of hostilities, with as much alarm and as deep regret, as our white neighbors would.

We conclude by assuring our friends that whatever grievances we may be destined to suffer, we shall never think of resorting to any other than pacific measures, to obtain redress.

Signed on behalf of the meeting,

SITUAGI, GALSATTEHEE,
ROMAN NOSE,
OGANAYA alias PETER.

FROM FLORIDA.

In consequence of the extreme unhealthiness of Fort Drane, the commander-in-chief directed the abandonment of that station. A removal of the sick and stores to Micanopy was accordingly commenced on the 19th ult. and when the first train, composed of about 80 men, arrived within less than a mile of that station, it was attacked by a body of Indians estimated at 200 strong. A battle ensued, which lasted nearly an hour, at the end of which time our troops were reinforced by a detachment of forty men from Micanopy, the officer in command having heard the firing, when the Indians retreated. During the engagement captain Ashby of the 2d dragoons, the commander of the troops from Fort Drane, and Dr. Richard Weightman, army surgeon, were severely wounded, and twelve privates killed and wounded. The loss of the enemy is not stated.

There were 150 men sick at Fort Drane and Micanopy, and many of those reported for duty were in a feeble and debilitated state.

It was reported that the Indians were in force at Cape Florida. The revenue cutter Dexter had gone to Indian Key for the protection of the inhabitants. The schooner Motto, with a detachment of marines and sailors from the sloop of war Concord, had gone to Cape Florida. Ocoola is alive and unwounded. A negro who had been taken by the party of Indians which destroyed col. Hallow's plantation, and escaped from them, says they told him that the Indians were 7,000 strong. Some alarm existed at St. Augustine, on account of a supposed plot among the negroes to run off and join the Indians.

WESTERN INDIANS.

From the St. Louis Commercial Bulletin, July 13.

A gentleman from Lafayette county informs us that, in the neighborhood of Grand river, the Indians have taken the lives of several persons. Two men were found dead in a harvest field, and, at a short distance off the bodies of three women were found; and several children have been carried off.

In view of the anticipated Indian disturbances on our western borders, orders have been issued to the several volunteer companies in the state to hold themselves in readiness to march whenever called for.

The following is a copy of the order received by capt. Easton, of the "St. Louis Grays."

Adjutant general's office, city of Jefferson, June 28, 1836.
To the commandant of "St. Louis Grays," in 1st reg.

4th brigade 2d division:

From information of an outrage committed by Indians within the limits of the state, the commander-in-chief considers it necessary that the volunteer companies should hold themselves in readiness for the protection of our frontier.

He therefore orders that you will report to the adjutant general, without delay, the strength of your company, rank and file, together with the number and description of arms, accoutrements, &c. You will also keep your command prepared to march whenever called for.

By order of the commander-in-chief:

HENRY SHUKLDS, adjt. gen. Missouri militia.

Extract of an official letter from major J. Green, dated Head quarters, Fort Winnebago, 30th June, 1836.

"Sir: I have the honor to inform you that nothing new in this neighborhood has occurred to cause any alarm or apprehension to the whites on the part of the Indians, nor indeed have the Indians given the past cause of alarm that I have been able to discover since I have been in command of this post. Colonel Taylor has visited this post from Prairie du Chien, with a detachment of three companies, in consequence of the alarm that was given from some quarter or other. For this alarm, I am in no way accountable. Of this, I hope I have given you assurance in all my correspondence. I have again to apprise you, that the Indians are much distressed for the want of provisions. They have all crossed the Oursconsin, with the exception of a small number that intend going among their friends over the Mississippi."

Extract of a letter from a gentleman at Richmond (Missouri), to his friend in Philadelphia, dated July 8, 1836:

"Our town is all commotion to-day. Indian hostilities have commenced on the frontier of our state, about sixty miles from this place. The Indians have killed two men, one of whom they literally cut to pieces. The Iowa is the only tribe that is yet known to be hostile, but there is no doubt in the minds of the people of this country but there will be a general rise among the Potawattonies, Shawnees, and many other tribes. Our governor has ordered out one thousand horsemen from the counties of Ray, Clay, Jackson, Fayette and Carroll. The two hundred of our county are ready, and will take up the line of march in about two hours; they are all volunteers, and well understand the use of the deadly rifle. The citizens of this town are now giving them a public dinner, and as soon as that is over they take up the line. They will march directly to the Iowa towns."

Extract of a letter from lieutenant B. S. ROBERTS, 1st regiment of dragoons, commanding at Fort Des Moines, to the secretary of war, dated 14th July, 1836.

"I see by reports in the eastern papers that a letter has been received at the war department stating that Black Hawk has again become hostile, and has circulated the wampum belt amongst the western Indians, and consider it my duty to inform the department that the report is without the slightest foundation. Black Hawk and his family are at this time in their lodge within two hundred yards of my quarters, and have been, for the last year, encamped within five miles of this post. He has only been absent, during this time, five or six weeks, on the Des Moines river, near Kookucks town, raising corn. The old man is becoming very infirm, and should he be disposed, would not be able to carry on another war against the whites. He, however, is perfectly conquered and knows too well the force of the whites, to involve his own or any other nation in war with them."

TEXAS.

By accounts received at New Orleans from Texas, we learn that it had been ascertained that the Mexicans had not advanced—and an opinion is expressed that the army will not prosecute further operations against Texas, for the present at least. It is also said, that the Mexican army is diminishing by desertion, and that the Texans are in fine spirits and daily receiving volunteers. By the latest accounts it is stated that Santa Ana has been, for greater security, carried under a strong guard to Nogogdoches. It is added, that he was to be tried there by a military commission and shot. Another account says, that he has written to the Mexican government, ad interim, giving his opinion that success against the Texans is not to be hoped for; and that the best thing the Mexicans can do, will be to recognize the independence of Texas.

The bark Charles P. Williams recently arrived at New Orleans from Texas having on board ninety passengers, chiefly women and children; the major part Mexican families, from the country adjacent to Texas. The removal is said to be in conformity with an order from gen. Rusk, who is going to lay waste that part of the country, in order to harass the Mexican army on their march, as by this means they would be left without food for themselves or forage for their horses.

Head quarters, Victoria, 17th June.

To general Thomas J. Green—

Sir: My spies have just brought information from Matamoros, to the date of the 9th and 10th inst.

It consists of letters from captains Carnes and Tra, and maj. Miller, who were arrested after having received passports from gen. Filasola. The information is of the most important character, it details the fact that Filasola was ordered to turn back with his troops, about half way between Matamoras and San Patricio. Urrea had been appointed commander-in-chief, and had arrived in Matamoras, on his march to Texas, with 4,000 new troops. Four thousand more were to embark at Vera Cruz in a few days.

Urrea took up the line of march from Matamoras for La Bahia, about 4 days ago. They have all sworn to exterminate the Texans, or never to return to Mexico. My force does not exceed three hundred and fifty men. I have ordered in the cavalry that were directed to join you, and have also ordered major Ward with his command, to join me immediately.

You will immediately see the necessity of joining me with all the force you can raise; you had best march by way of Casey's, on the Colorado, it would be well to detail all the cavalry you can in advance, as they are the most important troops for immediate service.

I have directed all supplies, &c. to Cox's Point, on the opposite side of the La Bacca.

I have the honor to be, with greatest respect, your obedient servant,

Brigadier general commanding.

Issue proclamations and bring on all the volunteers you can raise on the march, as there is not one moment to lose.

MEXICO AND THE UNITED STATES.

Extract of a letter from gen. Gaines to gen. Bradford, of the Tennessee volunteers.

Head quarters, western department, Camp Sabine, June 28, 1836.

MY DEAR GENERAL: The chivalry of Mexico are flying to the rescue of their president. A letter received by express from gen. T. J. Rusk, dated "Head quarters, army of Texas, Guadalupe Victoria, 18th June, 1836," informs me that the enemy were then rapidly advancing towards his position from Matamoras—that their motto was, "extermination to the Sabine, or death," and that the motto of the Texas army was, "liberty or death." These mottos taken in connexion with the bloody scenes of the Alamo, Goliad and San Jacinto, indicate hard fighting. But the above intelligence was preceded by an account of Indian hostilities on the Navisoto, 120 miles west of Nacogdoches. These facts, added to others hitherto published, of decided indications of hostilities on the part of the many tribes of Indians near and upon the disputed territory, have prompted me to request of your excellent governor Cannon, a regiment of mounted gunmen to join me as speedily as possible, by companies, or in a body, as it may be deemed most convenient. I have also desired a similar corps from the governor of Kentucky, another from the governor of Mississippi, and another from gov. White of Louisiana. If you come, come quickly; and say so to all my young friends near you. I am resolved, in case the Mexicans or Texans employ the Indians against the people of either side of the imaginary line, to inflict on the offenders summary and severe punishment.

E. P. GAINES.

Extract of a letter from the secretary of war to major general Gaines, dated,

War department, July 11, 1836.

"I have received and submitted to the president your letter of June 7th, together with the report made to you by captain Dean.

"I am apprehensive from the tenor of this report, as well as from your observations, that the frontier has much to fear from the hostilities of the Indian tribes living in Texas. On this subject it is proper to call your attention to the instructions previously issued to you, and to say to you that if the conduct of the Indians in Texas threatens the frontier whose defence is entrusted to you, and you consider it necessary, with a view to its protection, to advance as far as Nacogdoches, you will do so without hesitation. If the authorities of that country cannot prevent bodies of savages from approaching our frontier in arms, the necessary precautionary measures must be taken by you. This is the view of the president."

War department, May 11, 1836.

SIR: The president is very solicitous that you should act cautiously in carrying into effect your instructions, and do nothing which can compromise the neutral relations of the United States. Your great objects, as I have before stated, are to defend our frontier and to fulfil the neutral obligations of the government. If the Indians are not employed immediately upon the border, there will be no need of your advancing beyond the territory in the actual occupation of the United States, unless armed parties should approach our frontier so near as manifestly to show that they mean to violate our territory. Such a state of things is scarcely to be anticipated from either of the contending parties in Texas. But it is otherwise with the Indians. In the excitement of war they will not be restrained by boundary lines, but will seek scalps wherever they can find them. The whole history of the employment of Indians, in the contest between civilized communities, proves this fact.

It was principally with a view therefore to this state of things, that you were authorised to cross the line dividing the country actually in the occupation of the United States, from that heretofore in the possession of Mexico, if such a measure be necessary for the defence of the frontier. But I must impress upon you the desire of the president that you do not advance unless circumstances distinctly show this step is necessary for the protection of the district of our country adjoining the scene of operations in Texas. And shall you find it necessary to advance, you will not fail to communicate to any armed parties in the country your orders and objects. But you will, under no circumstances, co-operate with any of them or suffer any of them to join you, nor interfere in any manner with any military operations in Texas, except such as may be necessary for self-defence.

Should you pass beyond the above mentioned boundary line, you will return as soon as the safety of the frontier will permit. Very respectfully your most obedient servant,

LEWIS CASS.

Maj. gen. E. P. Gaines, Fort Jesup, Louisiana.

From the New Orleans Bee.

ORDERS.

Head quarters, July 12, 1836.

Major general Gaines, under the special authority of the president of the United States, has required of the state of Louisiana, ten companies of mounted gunmen, "volunteers if practicable," to serve for six months from the day they reach their rendezvous, to be discharged at any time by the United States.

As no companies of mounted gunmen now exist in this state, it is only by the voluntary formation of such companies, that this requisition can be complied with.

The citizens of the state subject to militia duty, are therefore invited to enroll themselves in volunteer companies of that description, and to organize themselves in conformity with the law. The following instructions, founded on the laws of the United States and of this state, will govern them.

Each company will be composed of one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, one cornet, four sergeants, four corporals, one saddler, one farrier, one trumpeter and sixty-four privates—in all seventy-nine.

When the requisite number of each company is enrolled, an election for commissioned officers will be held, under the direction of the colonel commanding the regiment where the election is to take place, as provided in the twenty-second section of the militia law of 1834.

The formation of the company, and the result of the election will be reported to the adjutant general, at New Orleans, in order that the officers may be commissioned.

If a company already organized, whether complete or not, and having its officers already commissioned, should volunteer their services, no new election will be necessary.

When each company is organized, the commandant thereof will report to general Gaines, at Camp Sabine, beyond Natchitoches, or to such officer, and at such place, as general Gaines may have designated; and will ask instructions where to apply for arms, equipments, transportation and camp equipages, and for such information as may be desirable relative to buy clothing and allowances. Information will be obtained from the same quarter, as to when and by whom the troops are to be mustered into the service of the United States.

If the companies should be organized into a regiment or battalion, before tendering their services to the United States, then the commander and other field officers chosen by themselves under the state laws, will continue to command, as provided by the act of congress of 23d of May, 1836, sec. 3. But if they are not organized into a regiment or battalion before the tender of services, then the commander-in-chief will either select the commander of the quota, from among the officers of sufficient rank who volunteer their services, or order it to be determined by the officers of the proper grade in the state, or who volunteer. The other field officers will be chosen by the officers of the corps, among those of a proper grade who volunteer, under the provisions of the 71st and 72d sections of the militia law of 1834.

The officers commanding the different corps in the state, within whose command any volunteer companies may be formed, in compliance with this requisition, will report to the adjutant general's office, from time to time, the progress made in organizing them, and the time of their departure for the place of rendezvous.

By order of the commander-in-chief,

PERSIFOR F. SMITH, adjut. and maj. gen.

GEN. GAINES TO GOV. CANNON OF TENNESSEE.

Head quarters, western department, camp Sabine, June 6, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I take much pleasure in tendering your excellency my grateful acknowledgments for the prompt and efficient measures which you have taken to comply with my request of the 8th of April, to furnish for the protection of this frontier, a brigade of volunteers.

The perusal of your letter of the 28th April, with your proclamation, together with the spirited address of your talented and patriotic staff, could not but awake in my mind many delightful recollections of the past 46 years of my life, in which I have been a Tennessean—counting from her infancy as a territory, to her present greatness as a state—though not yet half grown—during which time she has been unsurpassed by any of her sisters, spirited and patriotic as they are, in her promptitude and devotion to her own and the national defence—recollections which will never cease to make my heart glad, till it ceases to vibrate, that my lot was cast when a small boy upon the territory which now forms the state—and that I was thus early favored with an opportunity of obtaining as her adopted son, and her healthful schools, a knowledge of the arts of free government and of war, or in other words, a knowledge of the rights and practical duties of self-government, embracing the right and duty of self-defence as a state or as a nation. Those who clearly understand these kindred rights and duties, will never hesitate—the people of the state of Tennessee have never hesitated, to fly to the frontier for its protection menaced by a gathering foe; they pause not first to learn that their border brethren are laid in the dust and ashes.

The reports from the neighboring Indians, which I had the honor to communicate to you, have been but in part confirmed. The most formidable tribes are doubtless disposed to keep up appearances of a pacific disposition towards us, under the present depressed condition of their western friends, by whose agents these Indians have been excited to a spirit of hostility, against our white inhabitants on the Texas side of our unmarked boundary line, and within the disputed territory, until a more favorable change occurs in the affairs of those pretended friends.

I am convinced, that no one in this quarter doubts that the United States troops at this place and at Fort Towson, followed by the late extraordinary change of affairs in Texas, has saved the whole of this and the adjacent country, (near four hundred miles in extent along the unmarked, and for some distance of the way, imaginary line), from an Indian war, fomented by persons, now known to have acted under the authority of president Santa Ana, notwithstanding he was the acknowledged head of the government of Mexico, and hence solemnly bound to respect the treaty requiring the United States and Mexico to employ force to restrain the Indians from committing acts of hostility on either side of the line.

I find that the report, to which the capture of the president Santa Ana gave rise, that the independence of Texas would be immediately acknowledged by the Mexican government, is not now so confidently credited as it was when I last addressed you. The Indians may therefore again be required to act against that portion of our inhabitants residing within the disputed territory. In this apprehension I cannot but feel some reproach, that I should so hastily have denied myself the pleasure of receiving at this place and retaining in the service of the public, until every difficulty among the Indians and their allies had been permanently settled, the brigade of Tennessee volunteers. This painful feeling would be greatly heightened by any disaster which may possibly result from their absence. If they were here, I felt convinced that the moral effect of their presence, even should there be no fighting, would be of more value to the country and the service, than ten times the amount of their pay; and that a comfortable as well as a profitable tour of service might be calculated on. We occupy a high healthy country, having excellent springs, and pure air, without mosquitoes, with an abundant supply of excellent flour, pork, beef, sugar and coffee, with corn for 3,000 horses six months, or for fifteen hundred horses for twelve months. To which I may add the important consideration, that I have nowhere seen better instructed troops, particularly the 6th U. States regiment, than those now with me. Indeed, this frontier, should we have some active movements in the presence of an enemy, or even in reconnoitring the military school, where a few months' tour of service would give to the Tennessee volunteers, a perfect knowledge of all the tactics, and other duties of the company and the battalion, necessary to make them in the highest degree efficient in battle. They would then, when added to the regular forces, under any probable change of circumstances, afford complete protection; that sort of protection which is guaranteed by the constitution of the United States to the people of the United States—the whole of the people, including the pioneer, the orphan and the widow, inhabitants of the frontier camp or cabin, as well as the polished and wealthy citizen of the great emporium of party politics, of commerce and fashion—that protection, which should, if possible, commence before the work of destruction on the frontier has begun—protection to the living citizens rather than to the ashes of the slain.

The Tennessee volunteers would moreover have the advantage of studying and acquiring a knowledge of the topography of this all-important border of our national domain, which, with their military knowledge and known powers, would fit them as veterans for great future usefulness, when some foreign power, in order to cripple or divide us, shall again tamper with our Indians, or send to Texas an overwhelming force to operate against us. Under all these circumstances of the service, I think it my duty to request your excellency, to authorize the brigade of Tennessee volunteers, enrolled agreeably to your proclamation, to calculate on the probability of another call to this frontier. Should I have occasion for volunteers, as I apprehend I shall, those enrolled under your proclamation shall have a preference to all others.

Accept, I pray you, renewed assurances of my respect and friendship. EDMUND P. GAINES, maj. gen. com.

We published in the last "REGISTER," page 365, the proclamation of the governor of Kentucky, calling for volunteers for the United States service, and now publish the requisition of the war department and the letter of general Gaines, under authority of which the governor acted.

CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS.

War department, May 6, 1836.

SIR: I am instructed by the president, to request that you will call into the service of the United States, such number of militia as may be required by general Gaines, to whom has been entrusted the command of the forces for the south western frontier, to serve not less than three months after their arrival at their place of rendezvous, unless sooner discharged.

Very respectfully, your most ob't serv't, LEWIS CASS.
His exc. J. T. Morehead, act. gov. of Kentucky, Frankfort, Ky.

Head quarters, western department, Camp Sabine,

Tuesday morning, 28th June, 1836.

SIR: I last night received information from a high official source in Texas, that the Mexican army at Matamoras, under general Urrea, had been reinforced to the number of 7,000 men, and was, on the 18th instant on its march, and rapidly advancing towards Guadalupe Victoria, the head quarters of the Texian army, under general Thomas J. Rusk; that the Mexican motto was, "Estermination to the Sabine, or death," to which the soldiery were sworn, and that the motto of the Texian army was "Liberty or death."

This intelligence was preceded by the report of major Sterling C. Robertson, sustained by the deposition of two facts deposed, that two men were recently killed, and another wounded on the water of the Navasota, in Robertson's colony, about 120 miles west of Nacogdoches, by the Indians of several different tribes (Caddoes, Kuchies, and others), who had taken and carried away several women and children, of the families of the men killed.

The above intelligence, taken into connection with the history of the bloody conflicts of the months of March and April last, at the Alamo, at Goliad, and at San Jacinto, sufficiently indicate the character of the approaching events, as well as the necessity of increasing vigilance on the part of the United States, to maintain our neutral relations, and stay the work of devastation in the disputed territory, and preserve this frontier from the horrors of savage war.

To effect these important objects, a mounted force fully equal to that of the principle belligerents is necessary. For this purpose I have to request of your excellency, a regiment of mounted gunmen, volunteers if practicable, to consist of ten companies, to be enrolled and repair to this place by companies or in a body, as may be most convenient, via Little Rock, Arkansas. Subsistence, forage and transportation for the route, will be furnished by capt. J. P. Taylor, similar supplies, with camp equipage, arms, &c. will be furnished at Fort Jesup and this place. The companies to continue in service for six months from the day they reach their rendezvous, to be discharged at any time by the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant, EDMUND P. GAINES, maj. gen. com.
To his excellency the governor of Kentucky.

Extract from the journal of a military journey to the Sabine:—

In consequence of apprehended difficulties on the Mexican frontier, and as a protection to our citizens who live in that region, our government has established a large military force there, which is now encamped near the Sabine river. It was advisable also to keep an eye to the Indians in the neighborhood, particularly the Camanches, a restless tribe, and, on our continent, the Arabs of the prairies. They are excellent horsemen, leading a roving life, ever ready for war.

The sixth regiment United States infantry received orders last spring to proceed in this direction; accordingly, leaving their old station in Missouri, passing down the Mississippi and up the Red river, they reached Natchitoches near the end of March last, two hundred miles below "the raft." It contains about five hundred settled inhabitants, black and white, the former being more numerous. Between Natchitoches and Fort Jesup there is a little Spanish town of some fifty inhabitants, and although they appeared to have an abundance around them, they would not sell a single chicken to support us on our journey. Their houses are built in the Spanish style of logs, and a small chapel, of the same materials, containing half a dozen broken bells.

On the arrival of major Thompson, who commands the regiment, he used every exertion to get it out to Jesup. It was extremely difficult to obtain transportation, and the roads were so bad, that the soldiers in marching had to lift the oxen bodily from the mud holes, and afterwards the wagons—poor fellows, it was a hard march!

Fort Jesup, so called, though it looks like a little hamlet in the midst of the forest, without system or regularity, and no enclosure around it, is near the Spanish border, in a middle distance between Natchitoches and the Sabine, and one cannot reach it from either place in one day, except on horseback.

We had not been long at the fort, when an express for the troops to be ready for marching by 3 P. M. of the same day, was received, and the day following they proceeded towards the Sabine—fourteen companies of infantry, being the whole of the sixth infantry, and four companies of third infantry, with two pieces of artillery. The line, as it led through the forest, made a noble appearance.

We encamped near the Sabine. Hundreds of families were returning from Texas, and there was more misery among them than could well be imagined. All, throughout the woods, were living under sheds, those going to Texas, who had been stopped by the accounts which they heard, and others who were returning to their old homes. Under the same sheds were to be seen blacks and whites, who had sickened with the measles, some of whom were constantly dying, and the whole destitute of the means of relief. It made one's heart sick to witness these spectacles.

Yet it is with the prospect of encountering such troubles that many leave their peaceful homes for an unsettled and adventurous life. Fancy has painted golden prospects in Texas, and men risk untold dangers to reach it. Arrived there, they find a beautiful country which is justly called the garden of the earth; but in its midst are war and plunder, desolation and death, and a multitude of worthless men who are prepared to commit any outrage which their ungovernable propensities may indicate.

EXPORTATION OF COTTON.

Official.—From the Globe.

Department of state, Washington, August 2, 1836.

The following regulation regarding the admission of vessels laden with cotton to the ports of the Baltic sea, having been recently communicated to this government by baren Krudener, the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the emperor of Russia, is now published for the information of those concerned.

[TRANSLATION.]

Regulation for the admission of merchant ships laden with cotton into the ports of the Baltic sea.

I.—Respecting the passage of vessels through the Danish sea.

1. Vessels laden with cotton, bound for the Russian ports in the Baltic, passing through the sound, the Great or the Little Belt, or the Holstein canal, and coming from a place not known to be entirely healthy, are required by the ukase of May 22, 1828, to present, before entering into the Baltic, a certificate, in due form, delivered by the Danish quarantine establishments, declaring them to have been purified, or to be in a satisfactory state of health, in virtue of the regulation of May 25, 1816.

2. Every vessel arriving laden with cotton, at a Russian port in the Baltic, from a place known to be entirely healthy, by the ukase of May 22, 1828, must exhibit, on its passage through the Danish seas, specific proofs of the satisfactory condition of the cotton.

3. Satisfactory proofs of the condition of the cotton are—

a. The passports delivered by the custom house in ports which are not suspected, indicating also the quantity and the origin of the cotton laden at such ports.

b. Certificates to the same effect delivered by our consuls, or by the consuls of the powers to which these vessels belong, if such documents have been delivered in the ports where the cotton was laden.

4. On exhibition of these certificates by the vessel, the Danish custom house will attest upon the receipt which it gives for the payment of the sound duties, that the proofs required with regard to the satisfactory condition of the cotton have been furnished.

5. When the vessels are provided with neither a custom house passport, nor a consular certificate, stating the quantity of the cotton, and that it comes from a place not suspected, or that it has been purified by quarantine, and when these vessels (if have not even a quarantine certificate, they shall be obliged (if they come with cotton from a place entirely healthy, and are bound for a Russian port) to perform a quarantine in Denmark, and to provide themselves there with requisite certificates in due form, without which they will not be allowed to continue their voyage, as they will not be received in Russian ports.

II.—Respecting the admission of vessels into Russian ports.

6. In consequence of the foregoing rules, no vessels laden with cotton shall be admitted into the Russian ports, except those which exhibit a certificate from one of the Danish quarantine establishments, or a receipt from the Danish custom house as mentioned in the fourth article, with the endorsement of the custom house declaring that the satisfactory proofs as to the condition of the cotton have been furnished.

7. Simple receipts for the payment of the sound duties, without the abovementioned endorsement, will not be considered sufficient, when exhibited by vessels laden with cotton; and these vessels shall be treated like all those which are not provided with sufficient certificates as to their healthy condition; that is to say, they shall be sent back to Elsinore.

A SCRAP FROM HISTORY.

From the Columbia, (N. Y.) Republican.

A few years previous to the war of the revolution, and while opposition to the encroachments and wrongs of the mother country was threatened by the colonies, certain members of the house of representatives of Massachusetts bay—seventeen in number—rendered themselves menubriously notorious on the following occasion. The legislature had addressed a circular to the speakers of the respective houses of representatives in the colonies, proposing a plan of opposition to the encroachments of the English parliament upon the rights of the colonies. This matter reaching the ears of the king, the governor, by his directions, required the legislature to revoke said circular. The question of revoking coming up in the house, 17 members were found that would succumb to the king.

In the year 1824, shortly after 17 of our state senators had rendered themselves equally notorious by their vote against the choice of electors by the people, Alexander Coffin, esq. of this city, who occasionally corresponded with the late president John Adams, both before and since the revolution, addressed a letter to Mr. Adams requesting a particular statement of the historical event above alluded to; remarking "that the seventeen rescinding members correspond so exactly with our seventeen senators who had the hardihood to deprive the people of the state of N. York of a voice in the choice of electors of president and vice president, that I am anxious to know their names, that they may be coupled together upon all future occasions."

The following is the reply to the letter of Mr. Coffin—

Quincy, 31st May, 1824.

MY DEAR SIR—Agreeably to your request, I send you some memoranda respecting a very important event in the history of our colonial opposition to the measures of the British government in 1768.

A circular letter dated 11th February, 1768, was addressed "by the house of representatives of Massachusetts bay, to the speakers of the respective houses of representatives and burgesses on this continent," proposing a plan of opposition to the encroachments of the British parliament, which was expressed in such terms and sentiments as gave great offence to the ministry. On the 21st June following, governor Bernard sent a message to the house of representatives, in which he asserted that he had his majesty's orders to require them to rescind the vote respecting said circular letter. On the 30th of the same month, the house sent a message to governor B. explanatory of their rights, and refused to rescind, notwithstanding the mandate of the king. This important vote was determined by ninety-two to seventeen, nineteen members absent.

You no doubt, sir, well remember the excitement which this measure occasioned. The majority were celebrated in toasts and huzzas as the "glorious ninety-two," and the minority were execrated as the "infamous seventeen." The Tories cried out rebellion! rebellion! In no part of the British dominions was the Scotch rebellion execrated more than in New England. Loyalty to the king was at that time undiminished; but opposition to the parliament was almost universal, even in the face of rebellion itself.

Agreeably to your wishes, I send you a list of the names of the minority who were in favor of obeying the mandate of the king. I remain, dear sir, with affection and respect, your friend, &c.

[The names of the persons we of course omit. Ed. Rep.]

OUTRAGE IN COURT.

From the Boston Courier of Tuesday last.

Considerable excitement has been made in this city since Saturday morning last, in consequence of the arrival at this port, in the brig Chickasaw, capt. Eldridge, from Baltimore, of two colored women, named Eliza Small and Polly Ann Bates, claimed as slaves of John B. Morris, of Baltimore. Mr. Morris, hearing of the flight of the two females, sent his agent, Mr. Matthew Turner, to this city, with power of attorney to hold them on their arrival. In pursuance of this order, Mr. Turner went on board the brig last Saturday, while she lay in the stream. He saw the females on board; they freely admitted that they were the property of Mr. Morris, and gave him reasons for making their escape. Mr. Turner then requested captain Eldridge to detain them, until he could obtain a warrant for their arrest. At that time there was a large collection of colored people upon the wharf, all very much excited. During Mr. Turner's absence, the females were rescued from the custody of the captain, by a writ of habeas corpus, in the hands of a colored man named S. H. Adams.

They were taken on Saturday before judge Wilde, who, in consequence of a technical objection, did not proceed in the hearing, and the case was postponed till yesterday morning, at 9 o'clock. At the opening of the court, yesterday morning, the chief justice Shaw took the bench. A. H. Fiske, esq. counsel for captain Eldridge, read the captain's answer, which stated that he had brought them as passengers in the brig, but that before she arrived at the wharf the owners sent him orders to have her anchored in the stream; that he had been applied to by the agent of their owner, who claimed the two women as his slaves, and that he has detained them, in order to get a warrant to carry them before one of the United States judges.

Mr. Fiske then read an affidavit in confirmation of this statement, and moved that the hearing might be postponed, in order to bring evidence from Baltimore that they were slaves. The court was addressed by Mr. Fiske in support of his motion, and by Mr. Sewall in opposition to it. The judge thought that under the circumstances, capt. Eldridge had no right to detain them, as he did not bring himself within the provisions of the United States statute, and that the women must be discharged.

The judge concludes his opinion by saying, "the prisoners must therefore be discharged from all further detention," when Mr. Turner rose and intimated that he should make a fresh arrest of the women, and inquired of the judge whether it would be necessary to have a warrant for that purpose. At the same moment a constable was sent to lock the door which led down stairs. This created instantly a tremendous excitement among the colored people with whom the court was thronged. Under the mistaken impression that the words of the judge amounted to a discharge of the prisoners, and supposing that the claimant was about to make a fresh seizure on the spot, which might be intercepted, a general rush was made, prisoners and crowd together—down the stairs of the court house, at the door of which the prisoners entered a carriage and were driven off, before any one could prevent it.

The judge stated that they must be brought back to be regularly discharged in open court. The counsel for the women expressed to the judge his regret that any violation of the decorum of the court should have been committed. The colored people present had, however, acted under a mistake, and a delay of five minutes would have seen the prisoners at liberty, unless, indeed, they had been taken on a fresh process from some other court.

This account of the scene in the court room, yesterday morning is from the Transcript. It is not believed by any body that the slaves were rescued under a "mistaken impression," as it was boasted of two hours before the affair took place, that whatever the decision might be, the slaves would be rescued by the blacks and would not be allowed to go to jail. A large number of acknowledged abolitionists were on the spot, and two or three of the members of the Female Anti-Slavery society were in the court room, giving their countenance to the blacks in their outrage upon the court.

Judge Shaw, it is said, was obliged, not receiving sufficient support from the officers of the court, to descend from the bench and personally defend the door of the court room. He and the officers were, however, overpowered and the slaves escaped.

The scene in Court square and School street about 10 o'clock yesterday forenoon, baffles description. The slaves were hurried from the court room down two flights of stairs to a carriage which stood ready, with the door open, and a black driver, into which they were pushed. Then a number of black women divested themselves of shawls, bonnets, &c. and offered them to the slaves, after which the carriage drove off, followed by the crowd, consisting of four or five hundred blacks of all ages and both sexes, shouting "hurrah for freedom," &c.

What steps have been taken by the judge and sheriff to bring back the slaves, we have not learned, but strong imputations are cast upon the latter for not having a sufficient force ready to protect the dignity of the court, and his own authority.

FORMATION OF A NEW REPUBLIC IN S. AMERICA.

By the following translations from the Lima Peruano of the 10th of April, it will be seen that a new independent state, called South Peru, has been formed in South America the name indicates its situation. It probably owed its political existence to the following circumstances:

The state of Bolivia south east of Peru seems destined from its extent, its situation, its fertility and its mines, to be the most important power in South America; it has also been better governed, particularly with regard to the administration of its finances, than any other; the president, Santa Cruz, indeed possesses what we should consider very extraordinary prerogatives, but he seems to have used them wisely and moderately; though he holds them firmly. Bolivia labors under one disadvantage; it possesses about 300 miles of coast on the Pacific, but the whole of its territory, between that ocean and the Andes, is a sandy desert, and there is but one spot—Cobija or Puerto Lamar—which offers any facilities for the entrance of vessels, or for communications with the interior. North of this desert, a long slip of Peru extends between Bolivia and the sea, containing several ports, one of which, Arica, is admirably adapted for the commercial communications between the latter republic and the rest of the world.

This slip has been the cause of much ill feeling between the two states, Bolivia desiring to possess it, and Peru being determined to retain it. This ill feeling has, however, exhibited itself only in legislative enactments and executive decrees. Peru insists on laying a transit duty on all goods entering her territories. Bolivia endeavors to invite foreign trade to Port Lamar, by the advantages held out there. A Bolivian decree declares Port Lamar a free port, the advantages expected from this measure are soon neutralized by a Peruvian law, reducing the transit duties on goods arriving at Arica for Bolivia; these duties are again raised as soon as the current has been well turned towards the Peruvian port.

The bloody war which has been for some time going on in Peru, between the partisans of Orbigozo, the regularly constituted chief of the government, and Salaverry the commander of the rebels, afforded an opportunity for the interference of the Bolivians. Santa Cruz joined the South Peruvians in favor of the regular government, and, after several sharp actions, the united forces were completely victorious at Socabaya, on the seventh of February last. Salaverry was taken, and, with many of his adherents, shot.

The division of Peru into two states, the southernmost of which is placed entirely under the protection of Bolivia, will doubtless enable the government of the latter to arrange its commercial affairs more satisfactorily than heretofore.

SOLENN DECLARATION OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE STATE OF SOUTH PERU.

The assembly of South Peru, in the name of the departments of Arequipa, Ayacucho, Cuzco and Puno, CONSIDERING.

I. That the people of the south have been convinced, by long and sad experience, that their union under the same government with those of the north renders their organization difficult if not impossible, and consequently prevents them from attaining that happiness which depends so essentially on the form of their institutions:

II. That the revolutions of which all Peru has been the victim, have arisen from this forced union; that they have dissolved the general compact; that the people of the south as well as those of the north have a right to provide for their future security, by the only means which can contribute to it, which means are indicated in the summons issued by his excellency the president of Peru, who was induced to act thus by the most just and serious considerations, no less than by the unanimous voice of the people of the south.

III. That the government of Peru and Bolivia have engaged to respect, to execute and to guarantee the deliberations of the assemblies, convoked by the decree of June, 1835, in compliance with the treaty concluded at La Paz on the 15th of the same month, and solemnly ratified on the 24th; his excellency the provisional president of Peru, having, in consequence surrendered to that assembly, in his message of December 7, 1835, the command which he exercised over these departments:

IV. That his excellency Andres Santa Cruz, the captain general and president of Bolivia, and supreme chief of the united army, has engaged, in the name of his nation, by his declaration made at Puno on the 1st of July, 1835, to guarantee the deliberation of the said assemblies:

V. That Bolivia has engaged by its congress, and by the said declaration of Puno, to enter into bonds of confederacy with the states of North and South Peru, as soon as they have been organized:

VI. That the memorable victories obtained by the united army in the fields of Yanacocha, Ananta, Camaracas, Callao, Gramadal and Socabaya, by restoring peace and repose to Peru, have afforded an opportunity for the expression of the will of the people with regard to their own interests, by means of their legitimate representatives—

SOLENNLY DECLARES AND DECREES:

Article 1. The departments of Arequipa, Ayacucho, Cuzco and Puno, declare and constitute themselves an independent state under the denomination of the state of South Peru (Estado Sud-Peruano), adopting for its government the popular representative form.

Article 2. The state of South Peru engages forthwith to enter into bonds of confederacy with the states which may be formed in the north, and with Bolivia: the basis of such confederacy to be fixed by a congress of plenipotentiaries, named by each of the three states which are to form the union.

Article 3. The exercise of the whole public power of the state is for the present committed to his excellency Andres Santa Cruz, the captain general and supreme chief of the united army, who will bear the title of supreme protector of the state of South Peru.

Article 4. The protector of the state of South Peru will invite the other states to enter into the proposed confederacy, and will take every measure which may tend to carry that object into effect in a manner conformably with the desires of the people.

Article 5. The protector of the state shall, as soon as he considers himself authorised by circumstances, convocate a congress, by which the fundamental constitution of the state shall be formed.

In faith whereof—we, the representatives of the four departments, do make and sign, in their name and in our own, the present declaration, as the will of our constituents, who for themselves and we for them, do engage to sustain, preserve and defend it with all our might, pledging thereunto our honor, and invoking the protection of the Supreme Being, as well as that of our sister, the republic of Bolivia.

Done in the hall of session, at the city of Sieuana on this 17th day of March, 1836.

CANALS, RAIL ROADS, STEAMBOATS, &c.

A canal is to be made by the state of Illinois, and is called the Illinois and Michigan canal. It commences at Chicago and continues to the navigable waters, by steamboats all seasons of the year, to the Illinois river, a distance of 93 miles. The estimated cost of making this canal is seven millions of dollars—within 36 miles of Chicago, they have to cut twenty-four miles through solid rock, from 7 to 28 feet in depth and sixty feet in width, the estimated cost of making this 36 miles of this canal, is four millions of dollars. The commissioners advertise for ten thousand laborers, and offer from 20 to 26 dollars per month.

St. Lawrence and Atlantic rail roads. A rail road is proposed from St. Andrews, N. B. to Quebec. The contemplated route passes through the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain. The Maine folks don't like to have it go there, as they mean to have a rail road from Quebec to Belfast, with which the former would interfere. The cost of the Quebec and St. Andrews road is estimated at about $4,000,000; length 250 miles. The British government has sanctioned its construction by a grant of £10,000 from the land revenue of New Brunswick. The legislature of Lower Canada and New Brunswick have also given it their official approbation. In the mean time the survey of the Quebec and Belfast rail road is going forward under the direction of col. Long, U. S. engineer, with 35 assistants. Fourteen miles nearest Belfast, were finished on the 6th inst. and the whole will be done by the 1st of October. It is proposed to apply to the legislature of Maine for a slice of the surplus revenue. The rail road up the valley of the Connecticut and Assumpsit rivers, of which surveys are about to be made, will also come in for a share of the business. So if all these projects succeed, there will be three lines of rail road communications from the St. Lawrence to the Atlantic.

Dr. Nott, of New York, has recently successfully applied an oblique coal to the steam engine of the boat Novelty,—and some pains have been taken by the New York editors to impress the public with the belief that Dr. Nott was the first to use such fuel for generating steam. But a Philadelphia editor, jealous of the honor of his state, says—There is abundant evidence to show, that 25 years since, anthracite coal from the Lehigh mines was used as fuel under the engine at the centre square for supplying this city with water, under the direction of Frederick Graff, the intelligent superintendent of the Fairmount water works. On the Union canal, two steam engines of 80 horse power each, with pumps 20 inches in diameter and 6 feet stroke, have been in use for more than nine years, to raise water to the summit level, a distance of 95 feet. Their only fuel has been anthracite coal, of which each engine consumes daily about 6 71-100 tons. The quantity of water raised in 24 hours by these engines is 1,734,000 cubic feet. These engines were built after drawings furnished by Mr. Graff.

Again, the steamboat Pennsylvania, constructed for the Philadelphia steam tow-boat company, for the express purpose of towing vessels between this city and the capes of the Delaware, at all seasons, commenced operations about the 10th of March last, breaking the ice in the Delaware to near Chester, and thus opening the navigation which had for months been entirely impeded. Although the ice was from 7 to 12 inches in thickness, the Pennsylvania succeeded in opening a passage through it. As this kind of service requires extraordinary weight and strength, she has been constructed with a view to these qualities, and cannot therefore be expected to compete in speed with lighter and sharper boats; but when occasionally, she pass up or down the river without having vessels in tow, she has performed the distance between this city and New-castle, 40 miles, in 2 hours and 26 min. or at a rate of more than 16 miles an hour. The fuel used on board the Pennsylvania is anthracite coal exclusively, after the fires are kindled. She is propelled by two high pressure engines with cylinders 20 inches in diameter and 6 feet 3 inches stroke. They are amply supplied with steam at a tension of 75 lbs. to the square inch, by three boilers of the form usually employed for locomotive engines, each of which is 5 feet in diameter and contains 96 tubes, each 3 inches in diameter and 8 feet in length. The boilers of the new steam tow boat and the steam packet States Rights, now building, to run between this city and Charleston, will contain tubes 2 and $\frac{3}{4}$ inches in diameter. The contracts for these boilers were made some months before the Novelty made her first trip. We trust that these facts will satisfy the most sceptical, that anthracite coal has been used for years as fuel for steamboats on the Delaware river, however much of a novelty it may be on the North river.

LAW OF CONGRESS

Granting half-pay to widows and orphans, &c.

An act granting half-pay to widows or orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That when any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician or private of the militia, including rangers, sea fencibles and volunteers, shall have died while in the service of the United States, since the twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, or who shall have died in consequence of a wound received whilst in the service, since the day aforesaid, and shall have left a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow, or if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death or receiving such wound, for and during the term of five years; and in case of the death or marriage of said widow before the expiration of said five years, the half-pay for the remainder of the time shall go to the said decedent: Provided, That the half-pay aforesaid shall be half the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates of the infantry of the regular army, and no more. Provided also, That no greater sum shall be allowed to the widow, or the child or children of any officer than the half-pay of a lieutenant colonel.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, soldier, Indian spy, mariner or marine, whose service during the revolutionary war was such as is specified in the act passed the seventh day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution," have died since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, and before the date of said act, the amount of the pension which would have accrued from the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, to the time of his death, and become payable to him by virtue of that act, if he had survived the passage thereof, shall be paid to his widow; and if he left no widow, to his children, in the manner prescribed in the act hereby amended.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person who served in the war of the revolution, in the manner specified in the act passed the seventh day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution," have died leaving a widow whose marriage took place before the expiration of the last period of his services, such widow shall be entitled to receive, during the time she may remain unmarried, the annuity or pension which might have been allowed to her husband, by virtue of the act aforesaid, if living at the time it was passed.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment or transfer of any right, claim or interest in any money or half-pay granted by this act, shall be utterly void and of no effect; each person acting for and in behalf of any one, entitled to money under this act, shall take and subscribe an oath to be administered by the proper accounting officer, and retained by him and put on file, before a warrant shall be delivered to him, that he has no interest in said money by any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment or transfer, and that he does not know or believe that the same has been so disposed of to any person whatever.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the secretary of war shall adopt such forms of evidence, in applications under this act, as the president of the United States shall prescribe.

Approved, July 4th, 1836.

War department, pension office, July 9, 1836.

In order to carry into effect the act of congress of the 4th July, 1836, entitled "an act granting half-pay to the widows or orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of wounds, received in the military service of the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes," the following rules have been prescribed by the president of the United States, and adopted by the secretary of war; and they are now published for the information of applicants under that law.

1. Applicants under the first section of the act must produce the best proof the nature of the case will allow, as to the service of the deceased officer or soldier; the time when he died, and the complaint of which he died, and the supposed cause of his disease. It must be clearly shown in what company and regiment or corps he served, and the grade he held. Such proofs must be had, either from the records of the war department, the muster rolls, the testimony of commissioned officers, or the affidavits of persons of known respectability. From similar sources evidence must be derived as to the period and cause of the death of the officer or soldier.

2. The legality of the marriage, the name of the widow with those of her children, who may have been under sixteen years of age at the time of the father's decease, with the state or territory and county in which she and they reside, should be established. The legality of the marriage may be ascertained by the certificate of the clergyman who joined them in wedlock, or the testimony of respectable persons having knowledge of the fact. The age and number of children may be ascertained by the deposition of the mother, accompanied by the testimony of respectable persons having knowledge of them, or by transcripts from the parish registers, duly authenticated. The widow at the time of allowing the half-pay, or placing her on the list for it, must show that she has not again married; and must moreover repeat this at the time of receiving each and every payment thereof, because in case of her marrying again, the half-pay to her ceases, and the half-pay for the remainder of the time shall go to the child or children of the decedent. This may be done by the affidavits of respectable persons having knowledge of the case.

3. In cases where there are children and no widow, their guardian will of course act for them; establish their claims as prescribed in the foregoing regulations, and receive their stipends for them.

4. Applicants under the second section of the law will make a declaration before a court of record, setting forth according to the best of her or their knowledge or belief the names and rank of the field and company officers, the day (if possible) and the month and year when the claimant's husband or father (as the case may be) entered the service, and the time when he left the same; and if under more than one engagement, the claimant must specify the particular periods, and the rank and names of the officers under whom the service was performed, the town or county and state, in which the claimant's husband or father resided when he entered the service; whether he was drafted; was a volunteer or substitute; the battles, if any, in which he was engaged; the country through which he marched, with such further particulars as may be useful in the investigation of the claim; and also, if the fact be so, that the claimant has no documentary evidence in support of the claim.

5. The same description of proof as to the relationship of the claimant to the deceased officer or soldier will be required as the rule under the first section points out.

6. Claimants under the 3d section of the law must not only produce such proof as the foregoing regulations direct, in relation to widows' claims, but they must in all cases, as an indispensable requisite, show when they were legally married to the deceased officer or soldier, on account of whose services the claim is presented, and that the marriage took place before the last term of service of the husband expired. They must also prove that they were never afterwards married.

7. In a case where the service of the deceased officer or soldier is clearly proved, by recorded or documentary evidence, or the affidavit of a commissioned officer, showing the grade and length of service of the deceased, the particulars in relation to the service are not required to be set forth in the claimants' declaration, except so far as to show that the claimant or claimants is, or are, the widow or children of the deceased.

8. The claimant must in every case where there is no record or documentary proof of the revolutionary service of the deceased officer or soldier, produce the testimony of at least one credible witness. Traditionary evidence will be deemed useful in every such case.

9. Applicants unable to appear in court by reason of bodily infirmity, may make the declaration before required, before a judge or justice of a court of record of the county in which the applicant resides, and the judge or justice will certify that the applicant cannot, from bodily infirmity, attend the court.

10. Whenever any official act is required to be done by a judge or justice of a court of record, or by a justice of the peace, the certificate of secretary of the state or of the territory, or of the proper clerk of the court or county, under his seal of office, will be annexed, stating that such a person is a judge or justice of a court of record, or a justice of the peace, and that the signature annexed is his genuine signature.

11. The widows of those who served in the navy, or as Indian spies, will produce proof, as nearly as may be, conformably to the preceding regulations, and authenticated in a similar manner, with such variations as the different nature of the service may require.

12. The form prescribed for claimants under the 3d section of the act will be observed by every other description of claimants, so far as the same may be applicable to their cases. The judge or justice who may administer an oath, must in every instance certify to the credibility of the affidavit.

13. In every case in which the deceased officer or soldier was a pensioner, the fact should be so stated, and the deceased pensioner so described as to enable the department to refer immediately to the evidence upon which he was pensioned, and thus facilitate the investigation of the claim of his widow or children.

JAMES L. EDWARDS,
commissioner of pensions.

POLITICS OF THE DAY.

Mr. Jarvis, one of the representatives in congress from the state of Maine, has in the following letter, declined being a candidate for re-election.

Washington, June 25, 1836.

To the electors of Hancock and Washington district:

FELLOW CITIZENS: When elected a representative in the first congress which assembled after the election of our present chief magistrate, I determined, if I retained your favor, that I would continue to serve you in that capacity during the time Andrew Jackson would be president. The period I assigned to myself is verging to its close, and as you will in less than three months be required to elect a representative of the 25th congress, I beg leave to decline the honor of being again a candidate for your suffrages. During the time I have been your representative, I have steadfastly supported the administration, and, in so doing, have acted not only in accordance with my own feelings, but with the views and intentions of a majority of my constituents. Permit me to indulge the hope that whosoever you may elect for my successor may serve you with equal zeal and greater ability; my heart assures me that he cannot serve you with more disinterestedness, devotion and fidelity.

LEONARD JARVIS.

Hon. Bellamy Storer, of Cincinnati, member of congress, is now on a visit to Portland, his native city. A number of the most respectable gentlemen of that city invited him to a public dinner, a few days since, but he declined the honor in the following letter:

Portland, July 18, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: On my return to the place of my birth, after so long an absence, it affords me unmingled satisfaction to meet once more my early friends. This pleasure, let me assure you, is rendered still greater, when the citizens of my native town, as well my seniors as my former companions, have united to express their approbation of my public conduct and private character. Such kind, such generous feeling, while it meets the gratitude of an overflowing heart, will furnish, in all after-time, a new incentive to duty.

You have referred to the distinguished man who is now the candidate of a numerous and proud-spirited portion of the American people for the presidential chair, in a manner which indicates your patriotic sacrifice of all personal preferences to sustain the principles of constitutional liberty. Your resolution, thus taken, is a proud tribute to the favorite son of the west, and will add new zeal to the already enthusiastic efforts of his friends.

The vindication of gen. Harrison to which you allude is before the world; if it shall tend to refute the ungenerous, the unmanly attacks which party spirit has made upon his well-earned fame; if it shall assist to inform the young, that the reputation of a gallant soldier has been vilely traduced, or to revive in the bosom of the aged the recollection of his services at a time when the whole union did him honor—I should feel that I had done some service to our common country. I leave the issue with the enlightened, the patriotic American people.

While I must be permitted to decline the honor of a public dinner, so feelingly tendered by my friends and fellow citizens, I cannot part with them without indulging the ardent hope, that no son of Portland, wherever his destiny may be cast, will ever forget his birth-place. The living and the dead are alike to be honored and venerated.

With the most sincere regard, permit me to subscribe myself your friend and servant,

B. STOREE.

WM. B. KINKAID, &c.

Ashland, July 15, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter, inviting me to a public dinner, near Versailles, on the 26th inst. in pursuance of a resolution adopted at a public meeting held in that town, has been duly received; and I am highly sensible of the honor then done me, and of the great value of the testimony which it renders to the fidelity of my services in the senate of the United States; and I request you to make known to my fellow citizens of Woodford county, whom you represent, the grateful obligations under which they have placed me.

I had wished on my arrival at Ashland to have remained in, perfect quiet, but considering the shortness of the distance to Versailles; that I shall there meet with relations whom I have not seen for a long time, as well as friends and fellow citizens; and anticipating much satisfaction from sharing with those whom you have also invited, an entertainment tendered by some of my earliest and steadiest friends, I have the honor to accept the invitation and will attend, unless prevented by some unexpected occurrence.

I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your friend and obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

Samuel M. Wallace, and others, committee.

The 4th of July was celebrated by the democratic party in Philadelphia, by a public dinner, &c. In reply to an invitation to join in the celebration there, the president of the United States sent the following sentiment:

"The constitution of the United States—What it does not authorize is forbidden to those who act under it. A constitutional right to apply, and a necessity for such application, are the true sources and limits of the power to tax. When the taxes produce more money than can be rightfully applied, the appropriate remedy is reduction or repeal. To continue a tax without necessity, and for the sake of distribution, is to subvert the principles of the constitution, and must end in destroying the liberties of the people.

Mr. Woodbury sent the following, in reply to a similar invitation.

The cause of democracy—The greatest good to the greatest number.

The following was also received from Mr. Kendall, postmaster general.

The new bank of the United States—The monstrous off-spring of an unnatural connection, it walks abroad with a lie on its forehead. If palpable wrongs can be made vested rights by corrupt legislation, what security have the people for any right they possess?

The "republicans" of Sullivan county, N. H. had a celebration on the 4th at Newport, at which the governor was invited to be present, but being unable to attend, he sent the following toast.

By Isaac Hill—The best governmental protection and encouragement to the American people—No taxation beyond the wants of the most economical administration—no principle of distribution acknowledged which shall induce to a treasury surplus—a substantial constitutional currency established, taking the place of that system of inflated credits which tempts to speculation only to destroy confidence and ends in bankruptcy.

MR. VAN BUREN'S OPINIONS.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

The following letters have been sent us for publication:

New York, 13th June, 1836.

To Mr. Van Buren, vice president of the United States:

SIR: Pursuant to the instructions of a general convention of the democratic party of the city and county of New York, in favor of equal rights, and opposed to all monopolies, we submit to your consideration, as the candidate of the Baltimore convention for the office of president of the United States, the following "declaration of principles," for the purpose of receiving an expression of your views in relation to them.

1st. The true foundation of republican government is the equal rights of every citizen, in his person and property, and in their management.

2d. The rightful power of all legislation is to declare and enforce our natural rights and duties, and to take none of them from us. No man has a natural right to commit aggressions on the equal rights of another; and this is ALL from which the law ought to restrain him. Every man is under the natural duty of contributing to the necessities of society, and this is all the law should enforce on him. When the laws have declared and enforced all this, they have fulfilled their instructions.

3d. "That the idea is quite unfounded that on entering into society, we give up any natural right."

4th. "Unqualified and uncompromising hostility to bank notes and paper money as a circulating medium, because gold and silver is the only safe and constitutional currency."

5th. Hostility to any and all monopolies by legislation, because they are a violation of the equal rights of the people.

6th. Hostility to the dangerous and unconstitutional creation of vested rights by legislation, because they are a usurpation of the people's sovereign rights. And we hold that all laws or acts of incorporation passed by one legislature can be rightfully altered or repealed by their successors.

Whilst we express individually the greatest respect and esteem, it gives us pleasure to acknowledge the exalted opinion entertained of your career as a statesman, and the pride with which you are claimed as a citizen of the state of New York by those whom the convention have the honor to represent.

ALEXANDER F. VACHE,
STEPHEN HASBROUCK,
ALEX. MING, JR.,
E. W. GRAHAM,
M. JACQUES.

Washington, July 6th.

Gentlemen: I have had the honor to receive your letter, with an accompanying "declaration of principles," adopted by a "general convention of the democratic party of the city and county of New York, in favor of equal rights, and opposed to all monopolies," and return you my sincere thanks for this mark of your respect. In the great principle with which you set out, viz: "that the true foundation of republican government is the equal rights of every citizen in his person and property, and their management," I fully concur, and honor and respect all temperate and well directed efforts to protect and enforce it. For my views in regard to other propositions contained in the declaration, and especially to those which relate to the subjects of banks, paper money, specie currency and monopolies, you must allow me to refer you to a public course of no inconsiderable duration in the state and federal governments, and to a succession of public declarations heretofore made by me. On some of the latter subjects I shall also have an occasion for a further public expression of my opinions in reply to a call made upon me before the receipt of your letter. To these acts and expressions I respectfully invite your candid consideration, and if they should be found to bring my principles sufficiently near to those you espouse to entitle me to your confidence, I shall be proud of possessing it.

Accept, gentlemen, my thanks for the kind expressions contained in your letter, and believe me to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, M. VAN BUREN.

To Alex. M. Vache, M. Jacques, Stephen Hasbrouck, Alex. Ming, jun. and E. W. Graham.

WILL OF THE LATE JOHN B. YATES, OF MADISON COUNTY, NEW YORK.

The late John B. Yates died possessed of a princely fortune. "A large estate," says the Albany Argus, "between three and four hundred thousand dollars, over and above a very ample support for his widow, and other legacies, he has set apart for the purposes of literature and science. He has shown, in his dying moments, his regard for the morality, happiness and character of his country. Indeed, this was his 'master passion, strong in death,' and posterity will enrol his name among its noblest benefactors. During his life, he evinced the same unceasing solicitude for the general good. At his own expense he established the Polytechnic school at Chittenango, which was ably conducted, and continued in successful operation for ten years. His financial operations and unremitting exertions, in connection with his partners, raised Union college from a state of comparative insolvency to that of opulence and distinction. He conveys all his property to Mrs. Yates, his widow, Charles Yates, William K. Fuller and George K. Fuller, in trust; and after providing for certain bequests, he directs as follows:

Extract from the will of the late John B. Yates, esq.

"I direct farther that my said trustees apply the remainder of my property, my real and personal estate, if any there shall be, to the endowment and support of a school embracing literary instruction, combined with the pursuits of real life of every practical description. The institution to be called the Polytechny, upon the plan as near as may be, laid down in the memorial presented by me to the legislature of the state of New York, and the report of a committee and draft of a law founded thereon, during the session of the year 1830. If after winding up my affairs, it shall be ascertained that there are funds sufficient left to commence and found such institution, I then wish my trustees aforesaid to petition the legislature of this state to accept this devise for the object named, to confirm its permanency by a legislative act, and make the necessary arrangement for its uniform and steady government by the appointment of a governor or director, who shall not be liable to removal by the fluctuations of party or the miserable charlatanism of political jugglers.

"If such a law, to the satisfaction of my said trustees, cannot be obtained in this state, I then direct that as soon as may be, without incurring unnecessary loss, my whole estate left after the legacies and devices be disposed of, on the terms and in the manner that shall be thought most advantageous, and as it shall from time to time be disposed of or sold in such portions as may be offered at the various times and the money received therefor, that the same be invested until the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be funded, and they are requested in that event to form such an institution in any state which a majority of them please to select, which is willing to give the proper irrevocable legal guaranty for its permanency, and appropriate not less than one thousand acres of land for the purpose. The income only of the one hundred thousand dollars to be applied in this last case to the support of the institution, and the principal to be transferred to the state and kept by it invested for a school of this description. If afterwards a greater residuary sum than this shall be realized, I then direct that the balance, not exceeding 100,000 dollars, be offered on the same terms to another state, and if more be left, that the same course be pursued with the balance and a third state, and so on until the whole residuary estate be thus applied and absorbed in amounts not exceeding as above $100,000 to each.

"Having ascertained with certainty to my own mind, that almost all political men of all parties are more particularly anxious for personal aggrandizement than any permanent arrangements by which the general standard of popular information may be raised, and thus greater stability be given to the political institutions of our country, I am apprehensive of the same secret opposition which I have experienced and which I know exists to every project of the sort. It is therefore my wish that a printing press, and weekly paper at least, devoted to the purpose of advocating the diffusion of literary information among all classes of people, be established, connected with the institution, and printing and book binding in all its branches, form a branch of the mechanical occupation of a portion of the students in the institution. It also is my will that a professorship of law be established, and that every student be made familiar with the constitution of the United States and each state in the union, at as early an age as possible, and to be connected throughout with the moral and religious instructions of the institution. Being also firmly persuaded that the safety of society and its proper moral government cannot be sustained without a high regard for the present legal domestic relations of life, it is therefore my wish, that no illegitimate child shall be admitted into the institutions whose parents shall not have legally intermarried, either before or after the birth of the child, and that such prohibition be made a fundamental law of each institution which may be established under this will. If my life shall not be spared to settle my estate myself, and ascertain its value, so as to know accurately what may be left for this purpose, and also enable me to form a more full and detailed plan for the government and management of the institutions, and the specific appropriations for each object, which from the uncertainty of the amount I cannot now do, I leave the manner and extent of the arrangements to the sound discretion of my said trustees, in conjunction with my friends John Savage, chief justice of the state, John Van Ness Yates, of Albany, and John C. Spencer, of Canadaigua, whom I solicit to aid my trustees by their counsel and advice in organizing and establishing the said institutions."

WALLED BANKS OF THE SABLE.

From the Rochester Intelligencer.

If my reader has ever sailed through the length of Lake Champlain in either of the admirable steamboats which daily ply between St. Johns and Whitehall, he cannot fail to have been delighted with the extraordinary beauty of each shore; but may very possibly have failed to learn that he should quit the steamboat at Port Kent, a small village in Essex county, New York, opposite Burlington, for a view which would pay one for a voyage across the Atlantic.

Four miles north westwardly from Port Kent is the village of Birmingham, through which flows the Au Sable river, forming here a most beautiful cascade of 70 feet fall. About half a mile from Birmingham, in the bosom of a deep forest, is the wonder of which I have been speaking. It consists in the perpendicular banks of the river which rise like walls on each side of the stream to the height of two hundred feet. The river, which at Birmingham is thirty yards across, is here narrowed to the breadth of twenty feet, and rushes furiously along at the bottom of this enormous chasm. To stand on the bank and listen to the torrent dashing and foaming along its narrow way is terrific. There are several lateral fissures branching from the channel, as deep as the chasm itself, and so narrow that you may step across. One of these affords the only access to the bottom of this magnificent passage. You enter at the extremity and pass down a narrow way which admits but one person at a time, until descending partly by a rude ladder, you reach a sort of "table rock," nearly on a level with the water. Here you first become sensible of the great depth of the chasm. You look up with astonishment at the almost endless height of the walls which enclose you; and you are filled with admiration at seeing the regularity and symmetry which art can never surpass, combined with vastness which it may not dream of emulating. The walls of this specimen of nature's masonry, are as accurately perpendicular as the chisel and plumb could have made them, and the numerous strata are laid with faultless regularity and exactness. Adjacent to the table rock of which I have spoken, is an angle of wall remarkable for being protected by a round column of mountainous size and two hundred feet high.

The whole length of this extraordinary rock passage is nearly a mile. The walls are highest at the place of descent, but in no place is their height less than one hundred feet, except perhaps at the extremities. My reader is assured that should he ever visit the wall banks of the Au Sable, he will view a scene of rare and wonderful interest, scarcely inferior, in the opinion of many, to Niagara itself.

IMPORTANT LAW CASES.

Transportation of the U. S. mail on a turnpike road.

A case was recently decided in the Fayette circuit court of Kentucky, which, as it involved points of general interest, deserves to be noticed. It was brought before the court on the petition of M. W. Dickey, a contractor for the transportation of the U. S. mail to and from Lexington and Maysville, who prayed for a mandamus directing the Maysville and Lexington turnpike company to open their gates and permit the mails to pass the same free of toll. The grounds on which Dickey based his claim are thus stated by the judge:

"The petitioner suggest that there is established from the city of Lexington, to the city of Maysville, a post road for the carriage of the mail of the United States—that on said road are established at various points, post offices; that on the route leading from the one point to the other by the way of the various post offices, there is no road except the turnpike road, known commonly as the Maysville, Washington, Paris and Lexington turnpike—that said turnpike, to a great extent, runs over the same ground over which has passed a public road for a great length of time, to wit: for thirty years, last past, and during all which time, the United States mail has been regularly and freely transported on said road, from Lexington to Maysville aforesaid, until the construction of said turnpike—that the petitioner has contracted with the government of the United States to transport or carry the mail daily in stages, from Lexington to Maysville, and from Maysville to Lexington, by the various post offices on said road—that the president and directors of said turnpike road company, have on said road in the county of Fayette by their agents, stopped and threatened to continue to obstruct the passage of said mail unless the petitioner will pay them sundry heavy tolls and illegal exactions on the carriage and horses in which the mail is carried—that they by charging toll on the mail stage, both as a carriage of pleasure and a carriage of burden, collect double tolls on the mail stage, whereas it should rightfully pass free of toll. By which illegal exactions the said company have extorted and continued daily to extort from the petitioner, large sums of money. He prays a mandamus to said corporation, to open their gates and permit the United States mail to pass the same free of toll."

The turnpike company, regularly incorporated under a general law of Kentucky, admitted the facts stated in the petition, including that of their refusal to permit the mail to pass over their road without payment of the tolls allowed them by their charter. In the discussion of the case, the court decided in the first place that it had jurisdiction over it, and it then proceeded to consider the main question—"has the petitioner a right by the law of the land, as a carrier of the mail in the employment of the postmaster general of the United States, to pass upon said turnpike road, free of toll?" The various points involved in the consideration of this question were discussed at length, and, to our apprehension, with great clearness, and the decision of the court was that the petitioner had not the right which he claimed, and consequently that his petition be overruled.

[Balt. Jmer.]

Liability of turnpike corporations. The Springfield (Massachusetts) Gazette publishes a case which was lately decided before the supreme court, while in session in that town, which is interesting to the public in general.

Yale vs. Hampden and Berkshire turnpike corporation. This was an action to recover damage for an injury done to the plaintiff's horse in passing over the road belonging to the defendants. The defendants' counsel rested the defence on the alleged fact, that it was through no fault or negligence of the turnpike corporation that the accident happened, and offered evidence to show this—but the court rejected the evidence, and ruled that turnpike corporations are liable at all events for accidents happening through any defect in their roads—that in every case they guarantee to the traveller, on his paying the toll, a safe passage over the turnpike, so far as the road itself is concerned. In the common pleas, Judge Cummins, on this point, gave a different decision, ruling in favor of the defendants. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff, damage $90, subject to the opinion of the full court on the above point. Leonard for plaintiff—Knox and Chapman for defendants.

Towns, too, should take heed, and mend their ways. Another paper gives an account of a case tried at Northampton, in which Seth Williams recovered $400, in an action against the town of Cummington, for an injury sustained in consequence of his team and loaded wagon running off the highway and bridge, two miles west of the village in a dark night.

[Sentinel of Freedom.]

Slave case. In the district court of the United States, for the western district of Pennsylvania, held at Pittsburgh before Judge Irwin, two cases of interest have lately been decided.

Baylor et al. vs. Elijah Heath, J. N. Steadman, esq. and A. Pearsoll—and Stephen Dalgarn vs. the same defendants. The plaintiffs were citizens of Virginia and the defendants of Pennsylvania. The plaintiffs were owners of two negro slaves, who absconded and came to Venango county in this state, where they were arrested, and after a judicial investigation, handed over to their owners. On their way home through Brookville, Jefferson county, on the evening of Sunday, the 14th Sept. 1835, the negroes were placed in the jail for the night. A large and excited crowd collected, the defendants being among them and leaders of the multitude.

A singular contrivance for their liberation was devised. A shain prosecution against the masters for travelling on Sunday was held before Steedman, who is a justice of the peace. Brady for the prosecution and Pryne for the defendants, were to make their speeches as long as possible, so as to afford the slaves time to escape beyond the reach of their owners. The whole contrivance seems to have been carried into effect, and the negroes, although pursued by their masters for several days, were never retaken. Verdict for the plaintiffs in both cases. Damages in the first $600. In the second $840. Motions for new trials were refused by the court.

NORTH CAROLINA GOLD MINES.

The following statement from the Rutherford (N. C.) Gazette, would seem to remove the impression pretty effectually, that the southern gold mines are becoming exhausted:

BECHTLER'S GOLD COIN.—Mr. Bechtler has politely furnished us with the subjoined statement of money coined by him from the 18th of January, 1834, to the 12th December, 1836, together with the amount of gold fluxed during the same period. Most of the gold was taken from the mines in Rutherford and Burke counties, although much of it is stamped Georgia gold.

It will be seen that the subjoined statement extends no later down than 12th December, 1835. Since that time, instead of being a falling off, there has been an increase of business. We paid him a visit on last Saturday, when he had just polished off the last $3,000 for a day's work. Mr. B. has promised to furnish us with a statement of the amount coined and fluxed since that period, at as early a date as possible.

Statement of the amount of gold coined and fluxed by Christopher Bechtler, near Rutherford, N. C.

Amount coined in $5, $2½ and $1 pieces, from the 18th January, 1834, to 22d December 1834	$109,732 50
Amount coined in $5, $2½ and $1 pieces, from the 22d December, 1834, to the 12th December, 1835	695,895 00
Total	$805,627 50
Number of dwts. fluxed from the 22d December, 1834, to the 12th December, 1835	711,533½
Number of dwts. fluxed from the 18th January, 1834, to the 22d December, 1834	395,804

Total $1,107,387½
These statements prove the immense extent of the mining interest in this section of the state. We do not know to what proportion this forms to the amount collected from the mines, perhaps a half, perhaps not one-fifth. Yet mining has not fairly commenced with us. Deposit mining is more profitable than ever, and vein mining, though it has been but barely tested, is yet sufficiently so to induce several large capitalists to embark in the experiment extensively.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

We publish the particulars of an attack upon an abolition printing office in Cincinnati on the night of the 30th ult. They evince a settled determination on the part of the people of that city not to tolerate incendiary attempts to excite the fears of sister states, but they have taken a direction hardly less censurable than the course pursued by the abolitionists themselves—and besides, have given the fanatics new ground on which to stand. For persecution begets sympathy—and the tears of sympathy blind the eyes of truth. The frailties of martyrs are not recorded—their sufferings alone are emblazoned. Thus with the fanatic abolitionists: the evils they would meet to others are lost sight of in the personal injury received—though the consequence of their acts is infinitely greater than their present sufferings. Brute force is not a missive of truth—and the enemies of immediate abolition will only add strength to the cause they oppose by using it. Let it be opposed by reason and justice—by the barriers which the constitution has thrown around the question; and by genuine love for our brethren of the confederacy, and its advocates will soon sink into the contempt they merit.

MEXICO AND TEXAS. According to the Charleston Courier of the 5th instant, late accounts render it probable that the Mexicans will not attempt another campaign against the Texans, until the fall. The United States sloop of war Warren and schooner Grampus had arrived at Tampico, and the Mexican government, through the new commandant, had apologized for the insult offered the American flag and the officers of the Jefferson. Gomez, the commandant who gave the insult, had been removed. The movements in Mexico against centralism, and to restore the constitution of 1824, are increasing in importance, and there is a disposition to remove all the high functionaries friendly to Santa Ana. A forced loan of 2,000,000 had been declared in the city of Mexico, against which the English and French ministers had protested, calling on foreigners not to contribute. Later accounts from Vera Cruz represent Santa Ana's party as out of power, the federal party as succeeding every where, with little bloodshed, and as indisposed to prosecute the Texian war. Houston had not yet joined the Texian army, and was not likely to do so. He was said to be as his residence near Nacogdoches. Lamar, the new Texian commander, possessed the entire confidence of both the army and the cabinet.

The treaty entered into between Santa Ana and gen. Houston reached Mexico in the latter part of June, and was immediately laid before congress; no definite arrangement had been entered into at the last advices.

A FAILURE! Great excitement has been created in Buffalo, N. Y. and its vicinity by the failure of Benj. Rathbun, one of the greatest speculators and business-men in that region of enterprise. Rathbun was an extensive property holder, owned a number of stores and employed twelve hundred workmen and three hundred teams—and was engaged in the erection of a large number of buildings and a splendid exchange at Buffalo, and a large hotel at Niagara falls. His liabilities are estimated at nearly $3,000,000, and his property at $2,600,000. But the most extraordinary fact developed is, that, of the vast amount due by him, upwards of $1,500,000 is of paper with forged endorsements, which has been shaved at ruinous rates. To meet his liabilities Rathbun has assigned his property to five trustees, viz: Hiram Pratt, Lewis F. Allen, Joseph Clary, Thomas C. Love and Millard Fillmore, who have given notice to that effect, and directed all persons in the employ of, or indebted to, the insolvent to make payment to them, &c.

Among those who are to be first paid, (after defraying the charges of executing the trust), are "the clerks, mechanics and daily laborers in his employ at Buffalo and Niagara Falls, the amounts that may be due to them respectively," and also "all persons residing in Buffalo, or in the counties of Erie, Niagara and Chautauque, to whom he was indebted for building materials, horses or other personal property purchased for the purpose of carrying on his business operations, such sums as he was indebted to them therefor;" with a numerous list of confidential creditors named in the trust deed.

On the 4th inst. the hands employed by Mr. Rathbun in his various establishments—amounting to upward of 1,200—held a meeting for the purpose of adopting such measures as might be deemed most advisable to secure the payment of the amounts due them. They were addressed by the assignees, and informed of the course intended to be pursued toward them, and full assurance given them that they would ultimately be paid. With these explanations and assurances the hands were fully satisfied, and the meeting was adjourned without farther action.

On the 3d inst. Lyman Rathbun, the brother of Benjamin, was arrested on the charge of forgery, and on the 4th Benjamin was arrested on the same charge; both were fully committed for trial. A clerk, who was suspected, has fled.

It is rumored that several banks will suffer severely by this extraordinary event, and it is certain that it will fall heavily upon individuals. But the recuperative energies of Buffalo will soon overcome the shock she has received, and the "speculations" of Rathbun be only remembered as a caution for the future.

FROM FLORIDA. The Indians have destroyed the light house at Cape Florida, and killed a negro man. The keeper made a most miraculous escape by ascending the light house and holding on the lightning rod while the building was burning, the Indians firing at him while in that position, and wounding him in the foot. A revenue cutter hove in sight at the time, when the Indians made off, and he escaped with his life. Nothing of importance had transpired in the vicinity of the military stations in the interior.

THE CREEK WAR. By an arrival at Baltimore the editors of the American have received Charleston papers of a late date. Accounts from Fort Mitchell had been received there up to Saturday, 30th ult. which communicated no news of any importance. Slight skirmishes continued to take place almost daily between the Indians and the troops, on the Georgia side, but they produced no important results. Gen. Jesup's head quarters were at Tuskegee.

REVOLT OF NEGROES AT HAVANA. The Providence Courier contains an extract of a letter from Havana of July 19th, which says—

"Yesterday afternoon there was a revolt among the negroes outside of the wall. They fired a wax manufactory and killed a corporal of the army. They were attacked by the cavalry and soon put to flight—6 negroes being killed and 10 taken prisoners, who will be garroted in a few days. A skirmish also took place between six highway robbers and a party of soldiers, about 20 miles from this city, which resulted in the capture of 4 of the robbers. One soldier was badly wounded. The prisoners were brought here and will be served the same as the negroes.

"The weather is very hot, and there is much sickness; business is entirely paralyzed, and there is nothing doing."

NEW ORLEANS, was exempt from disease at the last accounts, and there were no premonitory symptoms that occasioned alarm. The Bulletin states that since the almost depopulating epidemic of 1833, the bills of mortality show as few deaths, in proportion to the resident population, as any other of the large cities of the union. This improvement in the health of the city is attributed to the clearing of the country and the reclaiming of swamps in the vicinity, and the introduction of a more rigid sanitary police.

UNITED STATES BANK. A very large and respectable meeting of the planters, merchants and other citizens of Charleston, S. C. was held in that city on Thursday, the 28th ult. in pursuance of public notice, to take into consideration the propriety of the establishment of an agency of the United States bank of Pennsylvania in the city of Charleston. After the meeting was organized, Mr. Robinson offered a series of resolutions expressing surprise and regret at the effort recently made by some of the citizens of Charleston, to procure such agency in that city, and declaring that the measure should be deemed nothing more nor less than "an effort to plant in the state of South Carolina, under the seductive appellation of an exchange agency, a branch of the said bank, called the bank of the United States, totally irresponsible in its corporate capacity to our laws, and enjoying in effect the highest financial privileges, without the payment of one cent in the way of bonus, to the treasury of our own state."

The resolutions also provided for the appointment of a committee to memorialize the legislature, with a view to subjecting the said agency to prohibitory taxation, in case such agency should be established there. After an address from gen. Hamilton, in support of the resolutions, they were unanimously adopted, and ordered to be published in the several papers of that city.

NAVAL. The United States ship Peacock, capt. E. P. Kennedy, was, according to the New York Courier and Enquirer, at Batavia on the 16th of February last. She sailed from the United States on the 12th of July, 1835, and crossing the south Atlantic ocean, doubled the cape of Good Hope, and ran through the Mozambique channel to the island of Zanzibar, where she anchored on the 2d of September. On the 8th she again sailed. On the 21st got ashore in the Gulf of Mazaira and got off again on the 25th. On the 29th anchored at Muscat, and sailed for Bombay on the 10th October, where she arrived on the 24th; there she found the United States schooner Enterprise, capt. A. S. Campbell. On the 26th, the ship was received into dry dock and damages repaired. On the 4th December she got under weigh, and steering along in sight of the coasts of Hindostan, doubled round cape Comorin; and on the 15th anchored in the roads of Colombo, island of Ceylon. On the 24th sailed from there and crossing the equator for the third time since leaving the United States, passing through the straits of Sunda on 11th January, and anchored at Batavia on the 12th. She was to sail from there on the 17th February, supposed for Siam.

The American squadron under com. Elliot, composed of the frigates Constitution and Potomac, corvette John Adams, and schooner Shark, arrived at Leghorn from Genoa on the 17th June.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE and family recently left the U. States, with an intention of remaining in Europe. The cause of his removal has not been stated, but the following, from a Havre paper of the 16th ult. is calculated to throw some light on the subject.

"The beautiful estate of Prangin, in the Canton de Vaud, to which Joseph Bonaparte retired in 1814, has lately become the subject of litigation in the courts of justice. When the count de Surville's resolved on quitting Europe, he sold Prangin to Madame Gentil de Chavanac, who, in making the purchase, intended to ent it up like Malmaison, and sell it in detail. Disappointed, however, in her expectations of profit, she authorised a Mr. Hartman to dispose of it as a whole, engaging to allow him 3,000 francs of commission, if the price should not amount to 830,000 francs, and if it exceeded that sum to abandon to him the whole of the surplus. Two months were allowed him to effect the sale, but before the lapse of that period, the lady had found a purchaser herself, on which Mr. Hartman sued her for 20,000 francs of damages, but has been defeated, in consequence of a saving clause in her contract with the purchaser. Such is the uncertainty of human affairs, that the estate of Prangin, the princely retreat of a fallen sovereign, is now the property and the place of residence of a watch-maker of Geneva, Mr. Junod, who in 1814 was a common beggar."

LUCIEN BONAPARTE. The London Metropolitan for July informs us that prince Lucien Bonaparte's memoirs are now in the press at London and Paris. As the entire manuscript is completed, and in the hands of Messrs. Saunders & Otley, whom the prince has appointed his publishers in England, France and America, no delay in the progress of the work will take place, beyond that which may be required for preparing the several editions.

CANAL TOLLS. The tolls collected on the New York canals from the 15th to the 31st of July, 17 days, amount to the sum of $108,608 73. The whole collections for July amount to $194,010 95, being $33,013 04 more than the collections for July of last year.

From the 22d to the 31st of July, 10 days, there was collected for tolls at Buffalo, the sum of $13,573 87, being twice the amount collected for the corresponding ten days in 1835. The whole amount of tolls received at Buffalo for July, was $29,075 73

MICHIGAN. The Detroit Daily Advertiser of July 27, contains the following notice of the proceedings of the legislature of Michigan:

"The act to provide for the election of delegates to a convention, has been passed and approved. It was determined, after full argument, to withhold from the people the right of giving a direct vote on the boundary question. This right of the people was resisted by that portion of the members who are known as "the Norvell section." They are a majority in both houses. The people will be likely to eject them at the next election. They were unwilling to trust the people. It is therefore just and reasonable that the people should not trust them."

A state convention is to meet on the fourth Monday of September, at the village of Ann Arbor, to decide upon

Postmaster general. The Globe of the 5th inst. says, that the health of some of the postmaster general's family has made it necessary for him to leave the city. His duties will be discharged in his absence by S. R. Hobbie, esq. first assistant postmaster general, in conformity with the following section in the ate act to change the organization of the post office department, viz:

"Sec. 40. And be further enacted, That in case of the death, resignation or absence of the postmaster general, all his powers and duties shall devolve, for the time being, on the first assistant postmaster general."

Resignation of the chief justice of New York. The Albany Evening Journal intimates that chief justice Savage will shortly resign his seat on the bench of the supreme court. The causes of his resignation are said to be entirely of a domestic nature.—"For fourteen years," says the Journal, "he has discharged the duties of this high office, in a manner which will cause his unexpected and premature withdrawal to be felt as a public calamity. He will retire from the bench where a Kent and a Spencer preceded him, leaving his high reputation undiminished—the purity of his ermine untarnished." [N. Y. Commercial.

Emigrants. There arrived at Quebec on the 18th to the 28th of June, 3,084 emigrants, of which 2,000 were from Ireland, 1,024 from England, 44 from Scotland, and 6 from the lower ports.—Including these, there have already arrived, 16,027 persons, being an increase of 9,376 in the number of emigrants to the same date last year.

Toledo, the famous scene of the recent hostilities between our sister states of Ohio and Michigan, is said to contain a population of 2,000 inhabitants—six hotels thronged with visitors, 7 warehouses, and 12 to 20 steamboats arriving and departing daily.

Beet root sugar. It appears that the manufacture of beet root sugar is taking a wide extension, not only in France, but in Germany. A traveller who has lately made a tour in that country, states that from Poland to the Rhine, nothing is to be seen but preparations for the culture of the root and the establishment of manufactories. This branch of industry has also excited attention in the states of the king of Sardinia, as the Royal Academic society of Savoy has just proposed a prize of 600 francs for the best memoir on the resources for the manufacture of sugar from beet root possessed by Savoy, and the advantages that may result from it.

New York. Jesse Buel, of Albany, and Gamaliel H. Barstow, of Tioga, are the whig candidates for governor and lieutenant governor of this state.

The New York Star states that three or four hundred thousand dollars have been taken from that city to send to the west to purchase public lands!

Mexico. Of her whole population, estimated at the present time to be about eight millions, not more than one-fourth, of so large a portion, consists of unmixed whites of European blood called Crales. What are called Mestizoes, of mixed Spanish and Indian blood, constitute another fourth. There are several hundred thousand Zambos, or those of Indian and African descent; about one hundred thousand negroes; and the remainder, nearly one-half of the entire population, are native Indians.

Fire in the woods. The woods in some parts of Lower Canada have been on fire. An article dated Sherbrooke, July 23d, mentions that the Drummondville woods had been on fire for the last ten days, and that great injury had been done to the crops. The progress of the flames had been fierce and rapid, and some of the inhabitants who were nearly surrounded by fire, were in a state of great alarm for their fences and buildings. There had also been fires in the woods between Cliff's Inn and Mesiskoui bay.

Turkish names. The Turks have very queer names for their vessels of war. One is called the "Opener of Triumph"—another "Old Luck"—another the "Protected of God." They have also, the "Aid of God"—"Vessel of Victory,"—"Salvation of Splendor," and so on. The pride of the Turkish navy, however, at this moment, is a schooner recently built by an American ship builder at Constantinople.

A Turkish newspaper has been established at Constantinople by the sultan, who is said to be a contributor to it.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From London papers to the 30th of June inclusive and Paris papers to the 2d of July.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The English news is unimportant. We stated in our last rejection, by the house of lords, of the amendments of the commons to the Irish municipal bill. The lords have appointed a committee to draw up a statement of their reasons for disagreeing to the amendments.

In the house of commons on the 29th of June, many petitions were presented on the subject of the Irish corporations bill, and for the abolition of tithes. Mr. S. Crawford represented that one of them implored the house to assist in promoting the views of the "universal liberator of mankind, Daniel O'Connell"—language that produced no ordinary entertainment.

The Polar expedition. Captain Back sailed on Tuesday night from Chatham, in command of his majesty's ship Terror, on his expedition to Wager river, on the south west of Sir Thomas Ross' Welcome, with a crew of 60 men. His return may either be expected next November, or the same month in the next year.

A Mr. Kearsley, who appears to be one of the butts of the radical members in the house of commons, was lately interrupted in a way offensive to his sense of his own importance. The following scene then took place:

"Mr. Kearsley rose, and assuming an extremely grave and earnest air, and placing his glass to his eye with one hand, and putting his hat under his left arm, looked very steadfastly across the house at Mr. Paul Methuen, and exclaimed: Sir, when the honorable member for North Wiltshire thinks proper so precipitately to interrupt me, I am tempted to exclaim, 'Paul, Paul, why persecutest thou me?' (Here the whole house was convulsed with laughter, which continued for several minutes, and which was much increased when the honorable member left his seat on the second row of the opposition benches, and walked down quietly to the floor of the house, where after bowing thrice, in a style, the solemnity of which made it irresistibly ludicrous, he made three efforts to retire, but being stopped at the bar, came back to his place amidst renewed shouts of laughter, and cries of 'chair and order.'")

Lord Melbourne, the British premier, has been tried for crim. con. with Mrs. Norton, a lady of some literary notoriety, and a member of the Sheridan family. The husband is a police magistrate, and it is said that the trial originated from political motives. The jury acquitted Lord M. without leaving the box, the witnesses against him being, from their own showing, prostitutes and drunkards, who lived in Mrs. Norton's family.

FRANCE.

The attempt of Louis Albeau to assassinate the king, briefly noticed in our last, engrossed the attention of all parties in France, and caused much speculation. All, however, condemn it, and it does not seem to have been the result of a conspiracy, or that Albeau had accomplices—yet forty or fifty persons have been arrested on suspicion, who, it is said, will probably be discharged in consequence of the insufficiency of the testimony against them. Albeau was committed to the conciergerie, and was lodged in the room formerly occupied by Fieschi, carefully guarded. When first committed he displayed much assurance and bravado; but when left alone he seemed depressed, and it is said he made an attempt to destroy his life by dashing his head against the wall. He generally made short replies to interrogatories, and he continued to give the impression that he was without accomplices. It was expected that the preparations would be completed for the commencement of his trial, within the first eight days of July. A friend of Albeau, named Freysse, with whom he had lodged in Paris, was arrested at Bourdeaux, by virtue of a telegraphic order, and sent immediately to Paris. It was thought that Freysse had no knowledge of the attempt.

The assassin is a native of Lyons, quite a young man, tall and slight, his hair black and his complexion pale. He was clad in a neat frock coat, but his shirt was dirty and in rags, and he was without stockings. Only 22 sous were found in his pocket.

During the evening of the day on which the attempt was made upon the life of the king, all the ministers, the peers and the deputies at Paris, waited upon him and congratulated him upon his escape. Among the addresses to him was the following from the chamber of deputies.

The address by the M. Dupin, president of the chamber of deputies.

"Sir! The chamber and the country are deeply indignant, but the public confidence is not shaken. We place it above all, sire, in the person of your majesty, who appears to be exposed to such proofs only for the purpose of displaying in the eyes of a nation, which is ever the friend of true courage, that magnanimity which so eminently distinguishes the king of the French. Sire, whenever your august head becomes a mark for assassins, each of us would willingly make a rampart of his body. The rebels attack, in the person of the king, the vital principle of order and peace on which depends the welfare of the country. This principle he will defend by closing more firmly around that dynasty which France has raised to the throne only because she considered it worthy of consolidating the revolution of July. Sire, the enemies of public tranquility were too deeply afflicted by seeing how, under the loyal government of your majesty, every thing was becoming stable in the midst of a prosperity which may almost be considered as a prodigy. It became a necessity for them to endeavor to stop the current. A fanatic has conceived the atrocious idea of a new crime, but an invisible hand averted the blow.

"Let us hope that a firm and vigilant administration may find the means of drying up the source of these disastrous attempts. Rely also upon the chamber, sire: the absent deputies will not disavow the sentiments of those who are present; we are all unanimous in detesting such crimes and we are all willing to combine in preventing a repetition of them. Amidst the most profound grief in those days of anxiety, sometimes reserved for the most tender and generous minds, Providence affords means of compensation! Our excellent queen will find them in the affection of the whole nation, in that pure love we bear towards her family. Her sons will soon return. Whenever they pass, they will be received with the same sentiments with which we are animated, and they will traverse France hailed by repeated cries of vive le roi!"

At this conclusion cries of vive le roi were repeatedly uttered by the deputies present.

His majesty's answer:

"I cannot express my emotion on the sentiments you have testified towards me. You have habituated me to receive them on very painful occasions, similar to the present. But I cannot refrain from telling you how deeply they have impressed my heart, and what consolation and confidence it derives from them. Yes, gentlemen, it is with your support and your concurrence, in contending against fiction, that we shall prevent a return of these deplorable attempts, which would be of little importance if they concerned me alone; but it is France that is attacked through me, as your president has said, it is social order, it is our laws."

Here his majesty was interrupted by a general acclamation of vive le roi! Yes! Yes! All! All! cried the deputies, with a force we cannot render.

"You know that I remain at my post, whatever may be the danger; that my devotion to France is unbounded; and that I am ever ready to die in the breach, in defending that which France has confided to me, and which I have sworn to maintain."

Here the cries of vive le roi, were repeated with an enthusiasm beyond all expression.

"I sufficiently repeat to you how deeply I am affected by your sentiments. I thank you in the name of the queen and my family. You may well conceive their sensations at the terrible moment. When the explosion was heard the queen was in my carriage, opposite to me, seated by the side of my sister. After such a shock they have both need of the consolations you have afforded them. Nothing can be more delightful than the manifestations of the sentiments with which you have surrounded me. I am deeply sensible of them, and the recollection of them will never depart from my heart, or from those of my family."

These words, which the king pronounced with great emotion, were followed by fresh acclamations.

The king had been urged, since the attempt of Alibeau, to establish a body guard, but would not listen to it, saying that bayonets had not been wanting, and that he would rather expose his life than to submit to such servitude. His majesty had addressed the following letter to the archbishops and bishops of France:

"REVEREND FATHERS: A new attempt has just threatened my life. Providence has preserved it. My gratitude is raised toward Him who has covered with his powerful hand a life entirely devoted to the welfare of France. I have the firm conviction that their persevering protection will aid me in maintaining in my country peace and respect for religion, order and law. My intention is that a solemn te deum and thanksgivings should be celebrated in all the churches of your diocese."

"LOUIS PHILIPPE."

"Paris, 27th June, 1836."

The court of peers was prosecuting its inquiries; but as the chamber of deputies has not been specially summoned in reference to this occurrence, it was thought that no new laws of a repressive character would be proposed. France, say the papers, comparing the impression produced by the last attempt upon the king's life, as contrasted with that of Fieschi, is now indignant, but not alarmed. It has been decided that the celebration of the fêtes of July, will not take place this year, as was intended.

It is stated in a Paris paper that M. Serurier will resume his post as ambassador from France to the United States, as soon as Mr. Livingston is again accredited to the court of Paris, or some other charge d'affaires appointed.

SPAIN.

Great anxiety was felt at Madrid for the situation of affairs in Valencia, where the queen's forces are greatly outnumbered by the Carlists. Upon the subject of Spain, the ministerial Evening Journal contains the following: "On the 24th inst. 13 Carlist battalions, commanded by Garcia, attacked Larrasoana with five pieces of artillery. A company of the foreign legion which defended a block house, blew it up after a vigorous resistance. The viceroxy, setting out from Pampeluna with six battalions, turned the enemy's position and drove him back upon Biratnain, after having killed or wounded nearly 400 of his men. The Christians set out in pursuit of the remainder the day after."

Advices from Madrid of the 23d June, speak of an arrangement about to be entered into by a re-union of the grandees to guarantee a loan. Should this fail, it is said, the queen will pledge the royal domains. Mendez Vigo, the new war minister of Spain, had arrived at Madrid. Cordova, the former minister of war, had returned to the army. Another account says Don Carlos's army was suffering greatly from desertion, and it was supposed that a majority of his troops would abandon him. He was still at Villa Franca.

ENGLAND AND TURKEY.

A serious difficulty has arisen between lord Ponsonby, the British ambassador at Constantinople, and the porte, in consequence of the injuries inflicted upon a Mr. Churchill, an Englishman, who was residing in the Turkish capital. It appears that Mr. C. on a gunning excursion, in the vicinity of the city, accidentally shot a small Turkish boy—the wound was very trifling, but the cries of the boy attracted the attention of some Turks, who, learning the cause of them, rushed upon Mr. C. and after assailing him with violent language, inflicted the punishment of the bastinado in the most severe manner. He was then committed to a vile prison and loaded with chains. The affair becoming serious the Turkish authorities became alarmed, a few days after the affair, and thrust Mr. C. into the street. He found his way to his lodgings and has remained quite ill ever since. As soon as he was able he communicated his case to lord Ponsonby, who forthwith commenced a correspondence with the porte and demanded redress. What has since transpired is not known, but from the following paragraphs we would infer that the affair has assumed a very grave character.

"Advices are received in Paris from Constantinople of the 9th inst. stating that the differences between lord Ponsonby and the porte had assumed such an angry appearance as to lead to the cessation of all intercourse. The Turkish fleet, which had passed the Bosphorus, was, in consequence of some vague fears that the British ships would make a descent upon some part of Turkey, recalled."

Private correspondence from Paris.

M. Boutaneff (the Russian ambassador) had forwarded to his court and to London remonstrances and protests against the charges directed against him and his imperial master by lord Ponsonby, justifying himself against the imputation of having had any thing to do in producing the treatment of which Mr. Churchill had been the object. The Austrian ambassador had also protested against those accusations declaring them to be unfounded.

The Austrian government has forwarded to its representative at the court of London a formal remonstrance against the conduct of lord Ponsonby in the respect in question, and stating unequivocally that it (the Austrian government) will consider as a declaration of war any act of hostility committed against Turkey by any power of Europe, and that it is determined, moreover, to maintain in its fullest extent and meaning the integrity of the Ottoman empire.

EGYPT.

The Swedish Mercury contains the following intelligence from Alexandria, dated April 25:—The army of Mehemet Ali has been completely annihilated near Djeddar; more than 60 officers in their flight have arrived in Egypt. A corps of 4,000 Egyptians had taken refuge in Arabia, after deserting the flag of the viceroxy. The character of these Fellahs ought to be known, in order to give a just idea of this strange dissolution of a military body. These men, transported into Arabia, against their inclination, rudely give way to the inspirations of fatalism, which they try in vain to repel, and they desert their satrap. The European officers and soldiers, to the number of 35, who had followed the army into Arabia, have resigned their posts; they propose returning to Europe, and have addressed themselves to their consuls, in order to obtain the means of so doing. The workmen at the arsenal of Alexandria have themselves set fire to the building, because their wages were not paid. Only one corvette fell a prey to the flames, and the fire was soon got under. The guilty persons are not yet discovered but every one knows that the fire originated in malice. The new decree relative to the monetary system has not produced a favorable impression. A report is current that all the consuls who accompanied Mehemet Ali in his expedition into Lower Egypt have received orders based on the firman granted to lord Ponsonby, to demand the abolition of the system of monopoly. This measure had been dictated by the certainty that England will neglect no means for insuring the execution of the firman. M. Alimaut, the French consul, has already asked for the same privileges as England, not only for France, but also for all the European states. News from Aleppo mentions that the European consuls, upon the giving of orders by Ibrahim Pacha for the abolition of the monopoly with regard to England, have demanded the same thing for their own states, but that Ibrahim refused, alleging, as an excuse, the order of the sultan and of the viceroxy. The young pacha still levies troops at Antab, and is on the point of setting out for a general inspection of the frontier fortresses.

MOB AT CINCINNATI.

About two months ago an abolition paper was established in Cincinnati edited by James G. Birney and entitled "The Philanthropist." It had not been issued but a few weeks before public excitement was felt in reference to it, and on the night of the 14th of July, the press room, being in a separate building, was broken open, and the press and materials found in it defaced and destroyed. The parties injured applied to the mayor to issue a proclamation, offering a reward to apprehend the perpetrators. This he declined until they should deposit the amount to be offered. The deposit was made, and on Monday morning July 18, the proclamation was published. Two or three days afterwards a notice was inserted in the daily newspapers, calling a public meeting of the citizens on the 23d July, to decide whether they would permit the publication or distribution of abolition papers in that city. At that meeting resolutions were adopted condemning the spirit with which the "Philanthropist" was conducted—and it was denounced as unjust to the other states, as at variance with the opinions of the great mass of the population, and in direct violation of the solemn pledges given by its conductor. The meeting also resolved to use all lawful means to suppress every publication of a similar character in the city, and appointed a highly respectable committee to wait upon Birney and his associates to remonstrate with them upon the dangerous tendency of the course they were pursuing, to communicate to them the actual tone of public feeling in the city, to request them by every motive of patriotism and philanthropy to desist from the publication of their paper, and to warn them that if they persist the meeting could hold themselves responsible for the consequences.

In accordance with their instructions, the committee through their chairman addressed a note to Mr. Birney, desiring an interview. This was answered by a note from Birney, of rather an evasive character, but referring the committee to the abolition executive committee. Several notes were passed between the respective parties before an interview could be obtained. At length the parties met, and, after a long interchange of sentiments, the committee of the meeting found it utterly impracticable to accomplish any of the primary purposes for which the interview was sought. The committee then passed a resolution desiring the abolitionists to give an explicit answer in writing, whether the abolition paper would be discontinued or not. To this resolution the committee received the following response:

Cincinnati, July 29, 1836.

SIR: Whilst we feel ourselves constrained altogether to decline complying with your request, as submitted last evening, to discontinue the Philanthropist, we think it but just to ourselves, and respectful to our fellow citizens generally, to offer a brief exposition of the reasons that persuade us to this course.

1. We decline complying, not so much from the fear that the particular cause in which our press is employed may be injured, but because compliance involves a tame surrender of the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS—THE RIGHT TO DISCUSS.

2. The Philanthropist is the acknowledged organ of some twelve thousand or more of our fellow citizens of Ohio, who believe that slavery, as it exists in our country, is altogether incompatible with the permanency of her institutions; who believe that the slavery of the south or the liberty of the north must cease to exist; and who intend to do what in them lies to bring about a happy and peaceful termination of the former, and this as speedily as facts and arguments and appeals to the consciences and understandings of slaveholders can be made instrumental to effect it.

3. The Philanthropist is the only journal in this city or neighborhood through which these facts and arguments and appeals can be lawfully addressed to the community. It has been conducted with fairness and moderation, as may be abundantly proved by the acknowledgments of those who are opposed to its object. It has invited the slaveholders themselves to the use of its columns for the defence of slavery, and has given up to a republication of their arguments a large share of its space.

To discontinue such a paper, under existing circumstances, would be a tacit submission to the exorbitant demand of the south that slavery shall never more be mentioned among us.

4. We decline complying with your request, because, if it has originated among our own citizens, it is an officious and unasked for intrusion on the business of others; if among the citizens of other states, it is an attempt at dictation as insolent and high-handed on their part, as a tame submission to it would be base and unmanly on ours.

5. We decline complying with your request—because we would not preclude ourselves and others from discussing in the most advantageous manner a subject which, by the acknowledgment of all, is of momentous consequence, and which is now occupying the mind of the whole nation.

6. We decline complying—because the demand is virtually the demand of slaveholders, who, having broken down all the safeguards of liberty in their own states, in order that slavery may be perpetuated, are now, for the fuller attainment of the same object, making the demand of us to follow their example.

With these reasons—to which many more might be added, did time permit—we leave the case with you; expressing, however, our firm conviction, should any disturbance of the peace occur, that you, gentlemen, must be deeply, if not almost entirely responsible for it, before the bar of social and enlightened public opinion.

Thereupon the following resolution was unanimously adopted by the committee:

Resolved, That the members of this committee reluctantly accepted the responsible trust committed to them with no other motive than the hope of being able to allay the excitement which they believed to exist, and to prevent the violence which they feared might be its result. That in discharging their duties they have used all the measures of persuasion and conciliation in their power. That their exertions have not been successful, the above correspondence will show. It only remains then, in pursuance of their instructions, to publish their proceedings and adjourn without day. But ere they do this, they owe it to themselves and those whom they represent, to express their utmost abhorrence of every thing like violence, and earnestly to implore their fellow citizens to abstain therefrom.

NOTE. John C. Wright, one of the committee, has been absent during all its proceedings, and Stephen Burrows, another member, declined acting.

The above report was published on Saturday morning, the 30th of July, and on that night the public feeling found vent in acts of open violence—the following particulars of which are published in the Cincinnati Whig of the 1st inst.

About nine o'clock on Saturday evening, between four and five thousand people (as is supposed) had assembled around the publication offices of the abolition paper, edited by James G. Birney and printed by A. Pugh, at the N. E. corner of Main and Seventh streets. In a few moments the types and printing materials of that establishment were seen dashing out of the windows into the street, amid the cheers of the immense mass of the people below.

In a very short time the windows of the building and every thing in the office were completely demolished and strewed about the streets. The printing press was broken to pieces, and the largest piece dragged through several of the principal streets and then thrown into the river. Thus far every thing was done in the most systematic order, and as is believed, was tacitly countenanced by a very large number of our most respectable citizens.

At this juncture, however, the names of Birney, Donaldson, Colby, &c. (all leading abolitionists) were shouted by numerous voices and immediately three or four hundred of the mob rushed to Birney's dwelling. The mob were well provided with tar and feathers. On arriving at Birney's house, the abolition editor was demanded—his son, a youth of about sixteen, came to the door and assured the multitude that his father was not at home.

It was soon satisfactory ascertained that he had left the city in the stage for Hillsborough several hours previously. The mob then directed their course to the house of one of the Donaldsons, (the other residing in the country), and demanded him to be delivered up to them. Some ladies came to the door, and pledged their word that Donaldson was not at home, and assured the multitude that no one but ladies were in the house. The mob immediately departed in search of, but did not succeed in finding him.

It was afterwards ascertained that he fled from the house a few minutes before the arrival of the mob, and had escaped through an alley or retired street to some unknown place.

The cry of "Church alley" was now resounded through the mob. This is a place where a quantity of black and white men and women, of infamous characters reside, huddled promiscuously together in five or six small buildings.

In a few minutes the inmates of these wretched brothels were turned into the streets, and the windows of the buildings, and every article which the building contained destroyed and scattered to the four winds of heaven.

Here by the peaceable interference of several citizens, the progress of the mob was arrested, (as was supposed, finally) every body, apparently, promising to disperse and go home.

An hour or two afterwards, two or three hundred again collected together and demolished the windows and all the furniture of 6 or 7 small negro houses of bad character on and near the corner of Columbia and Elm streets, in the part of the town commonly called the Swamp. In the course of this attack a gun was fired from the window of one of the houses, and a young man by the name of Kinsey was severely shot in the hip and leg with large sized pigeon shot. The wound we believe, is not considered very dangerous, though he was perforated with twenty odd shot.

The mob having accomplished all they intended, finally dispersed about three o'clock on Sunday morning.

Some further movements occurred on Sunday night, caused by an impression that Birney was concealed in a house in Fourth street. But a committee having examined the premises and reported that he was not there, the mob, after having been addressed by the mayor, dispersed. The city has since been quiet.

On the 2d of August a public meeting was called, which was addressed by Judge Burnet, Joseph Graham and Joseph S. Becham, esqrs. after which resolutions were adopted pledging the meeting to support the civil authorities in their efforts to preserve the peace, and expressing an opinion that the recent outrages were caused by the establishment of the abolition press.

—FROM FLORIDA.

From the Washington Globe.

We have been furnished with the following communication from governor CALL to the war department, and the accompanying report from the gallant captain LEE, giving a more particular account of the affair with the Indians on the 9th of June. The lamented col. HEILEMAN had promised a more circumstantial statement; but this duty has now devolved on the officer second in command—himself dangerously wounded. He is only now so far recovered as to be able to discharge this duty.

Tallahassee, 21st July, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to inclose a copy of the official report of Captain Lee, relative to the engagement with the Indians near Micanopy, on the 9th day of June last. Captain Lee explains sufficiently the reason why this report is now made, and why it was not made at an earlier period. The gallant major Heileman was brevetted for his conduct on that occasion, but unfortunately did not live to receive the intelligence of this acknowledgment of his worth. It appears to me, both from the report of major Heileman and captain Lee, that the latter officer and the two surviving lieutenants who acted under his orders, are equally entitled to this distinction. I would therefore respectfully suggest the propriety, as well as the justice, of conferring brevets on capt. Lee, lieutenants Humphreys and lieutenant Talcott for the gallantry and bravery with which they fought on that occasion. This just reward for their services would have a happy effect on the future operations of the army. I am, sir, very respectfully, &c. R. K. CALL,

Governor and commander-in-chief.

The honorable secretary of war.

Fort Defiance, Micanopy, East Florida, July 12.

SIR: On the day following the engagement near this place with the Indians on the 9th of June last, major Heileman made a hasty and imperfect report of the event to brig. gen. Eustis, who at that time commanded the troops in Florida, in which he merely gave a general outline of the occurrences of the morning, stating to me at the time that, as soon as the state of my wounds would allow me to give him a special account of my knowledge of the affair, he should make a detailed report of it, based upon the representations of lieutenants Wheelock and Humphreys and myself. Within three or four days afterwards, major Heileman was attacked with a severe illness that terminated in his death, which sudden and lamented event has deprived the army of one of its most valuable officers, at a time too when our country could ill afford to lose the services of such an accomplished and gallant soldier.

The death of major Heileman devolves upon me the duty of giving you a detailed statement of the occurrences of the engagement. In performing this duty, I shall confine myself to a plain relation of facts, leaving it to you to draw such conclusion as the circumstances of the case may seem to warrant.

On the morning of the 9th June last, about 10 o'clock, the enemy, in large force, having shown himself about three quarters of a mile from our picketing, in an easterly direction, the troops were immediately paraded under arms, and orders given by major Heileman to lieutenant Wheelock, in command of about twenty-five dragoons, and myself, in command of nineteen men of company I, 3d artillery, and a brave volunteer teamster, named More Bleck, to make a sortie and attack him. Being the senior officer, I was directed to take command; and having received major Heileman's final orders, I instructed lieutenant Wheelock in what manner to approach and assail the enemy. I then proceeded with my immediate command by a route concealed from the observation of the enemy, and after marching about half a mile to the right, to the point of a small hammock near the Tusawilla lake, unexpectedly found that the opposite extremity of this hammock, about 300 yards from my position, was occupied by a large body of Indians. Just at this time lieutenant Humphreys, who had been ordered out by major Heileman subsequently to my leaving the pickets, arrived with a detachment of 25 men, composed of detachments from companies D and E of the 2d regiment of artillery. I directed him to make a circuit to the left around the hammock, which order he promptly obeyed, and had not proceeded more than 250 yards before he found himself in contact with the enemy's left.

The dragoons, led on by their intrepid and gallant commander, lieutenant Wheelock, whose untimely death we have recently been called upon to mourn, were now warmly engaged with the enemy's right, charging on horseback and delivering their fire without dismounting—the Indians retreating before them. Having delivered their first fire, they reloaded on their ground, charged and fired again, and so on until the enemy were forced into the Tusawilla hammock, their strong hold. Meantime lieutenant Humphreys gallantly charged the left—the enemy keeping up a retreating fire. Lieutenant Humphreys made several efforts to bring them to close quarters, but in vain, they having the advantage in celerity of movements. As the enemy approached the hammock in retreating, the length of his front was necessarily diminished, and, as a consequence, the different detachments of our troops were brought nearer together. Lieutenant Humphreys at this time observed one or two attempts to outflank our left, which he as often defeated by a prompt and judicious movement in that direction.

Having given lieutenant Humphreys his orders, I proceeded to enter the hammock, moving in an oblique direction towards the rear of the enemy. The trees being sparse, and the undergrowth not sufficiently thick in many places to conceal my men, I was obliged to move with great caution and celerity. I soon found myself in the enemy's rear, at the distance of about 150 yard. I continued to move on until I reached the extreme verge of the hammock, being at that time about twenty paces in front of my company. It now became necessary to examine more particularly the position of the enemy, in order to attack him to the best advantage. I therefore crept forward about ten or twelve paces upon a small knoll, and found myself in full view of about fifty Indians, as many more being concealed behind the brow of a small hill, the nearest about twenty and the furthest about seventy yards off. Their backs were towards me, and they were eagerly and intently observing the movements the troops commanded by lieutenants Wheelock and Humphreys.

The dragoons under lieutenant Wheelock having a few moments previously become warmly engaged, I remained several seconds in this position, my men still advancing, during which time I observed two Indians, whom I supposed to be chiefs, from their earnest conversation and gesture which induced me to believe they intended to make a movement to the rear of lieutenants Humphreys and Wheelock, from whom they were as yet entirely concealed. My men had now arrived at the verge of the hammock, and I only required about five paces more to enable me to pour a volley amongst them before their knowing of my presence when we were unfortunately discovered. Being in advance of my men, and on elevated ground, and my dress being somewhat conspicuous, I soon became a general mark. Instantly I gave my command to charge, raised my rifle, and flashed it at one of the supposed chiefs.

The scene of panic and confusion which ensued on the part of the Indians baffles all description. Some fired at me without taking aim, some fled without firing at all, and some took to trees. My company were now clear of the bushes, and charging handsomely, throwing in shots wherever a good opportunity offered—myself leading about twelve paces in advance. I had proceeded only a few steps, when I felt a terrible concussion against my shoulder—a great difficulty in breathing—and was seized with bleeding at the mouth. I found that I was badly wounded, but having strength to keep my feet, determined to lead the charge as long as I could stand. I turned to my men, observed to them I was wounded, and ordered them to push ahead. I had scarcely resumed my front, and advanced three or four paces, when I was brought to the ground by a severe wound through the thigh given by an Indian who was about twenty yards distant behind a tree. Sergeant Hall, my orderly sergeant, came and asked whether he should have me carried from the field; I told him no—to charge with every man. It was not necessary to repeat the order—the men sprang forward at the word.

As the rear of the company was about passing me, one of my sergeants and several of my men came and urged me to be moved to a safer place; I ordered them to leave me where I was, and charge. One of them asked me to lend him my rifle; and in a moment more I found myself alone. Having remained in this situation upwards of an hour, and the battle being over, my orderly sergeant, with several men, returned, and informed me that the enemy were entirely driven off and silenced. The remainder of the company, under sergeant Bennett, moved to the left, and joined lieutenant Humphreys. Lieut. Wheelock and his command were the first to get into action; my company were the next; and lieut. Humphreys and his command were engaged immediately afterwards. Not more than five or six minutes elapsed after the first fire upon the dragoons before all three of our detachments encountered the enemy.

As soon as the action became general, major Heileman left the pickets with a six-pounder field piece, and advanced rapidly towards the scene of action, but when he had nearly arrived within reach of the enemy, some person reported to him that a body of Indians were moving towards the rear of the pickets. Apprehending an attack in that direction, and there being but a few teamsters and citizens, besides the sick left within the work, under the command of lieut. Talcott, major Heileman deemed it necessary immediately to return to the pickets with the gun; but finding on his arrival that the alarm was false, he directed lieut. Talcott to proceed at full speed with the field piece to where the troops were still engaged with the enemy. This order was promptly obeyed by lieut. Talcott, who arrived on the field just in time to render good service, in finally, silencing the fire of the retreating enemy, who after a few well directed shots from the artillery, sought shelter in an extensive and dense hammock, about two miles from the pickets and about a mile and a quarter from where the battle first began.

The engagement lasted about an hour and a quarter. The Indian force is supposed to have been at least 250: ours, you will observe, amounted to but 70 men, exclusive of those with the field piece, which arrived upon the field just at the close of the action. Three of our men were severely wounded, one of whom has since died, and another has lost an arm; three others are slightly wounded. Of the officers, I was the only one injured, having received two severe wounds, one in my left shoulder, and one through my left thigh. The enemy it is believed suffered severely, but to what extent cannot be ascertained, as those disabled by our fire were borne off by their retreating comrades.

In closing this report, I feel great pleasure in expressing in this public manner, at the unanimous request of the officers present, the high sense entertained by us of the unflinching exertions of Mr. George Center, a citizen of this place, in rendering every assistance in his power, both to the wounded and the well amongst our troops, not only on the day of our engagement with the enemy, but at all times. I cannot too highly applaud his generous and disinterested conduct. I am, sir, with much respect, your obedient servant.

R. B. LEE, brevet capt. 3d artillery.

His excel. gov. Call, commanding-in-chief, army of Florida.

THE HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

From the National Intelligencer.

To every American reader, not only to every statesman and politician, but to every freeman capable of rightly esteeming the institutions under which we live, no forthcoming work can be of greater interest than the only authentic history of the constitution of the United States, from the lucid and faithful pen of James Madison, the first (or one of the first) of its great founders and architects. Of the value of such a work no one could be a better judge than Mr. Madison himself, and he has in his will, providing for its publication, borne the most emphatic testimony on the subject, whilst directing the avails of the publication to be applied to purposes wholly disinterested, humane, and literary. We are indebted to a friend for a copy of so much of the will of the illustrious deceased (dated April 15, 1835) as relates to this work; in which, as follows, we are sure that our readers will find much to interest them:

"I give all my personal estate of every description, ornamental as well as useful, except as hereinafter otherwise given, to my dear wife; and I also give to her all my manuscript papers, having entire confidence in her discreet and proper use of them, but subject to the qualification in the succeeding clause. Considering the peculiarity and magnitude of the occasion which produced the convention at Philadelphia in 1787, the characters who composed it, the constitution which resulted from their deliberations, its effects during a trial of so many years on the people living under it, and the interest it has inspired among the friends of free government, it is not an unreasonable inference that a careful and extended report of the proceedings and discussions of that body, which were with closed doors, by a member who was constant in his attendance, will be particularly gratifying to the people of the United States, and to all who take an interest in the progress of political science and the cause of true liberty. It is my desire that the report as made by me should be published under her authority and direction; and, as the publication may yield a considerable amount beyond the necessary expenses thereof, I give the net proceeds thereof to my wife, charged with the following legacies, to be paid out of that fund only," &c. &c.

GENERALS SCOTT AND JESUP.

Extract from the Washington "Globe" of July 20.

"With regard to the 'intrigue of gen. Jesup,' it is proper that we should say a word in the absence of that officer. The representation made to disparage him through the opposition prints, since gen. Scott has obtained a copy of his letter from the department, leaves no doubt that the circumstance of its having been addressed to the editor of the Globe, is greatly relied on, to bias this controversy. We have had no communication from gen. Jesup since we received it, and can therefore only offer our own interpretation of his motive in writing to us.

"Gen. Jesup was our next door neighbor, while he remained with his family in the city, and from the friendly relation which always subsisted between us, he had reason to suppose that as a public journalist, we would be willing to do justice to him in the difficulty which had arisen between himself and gen. Scott. He knew that gen. Scott had transmitted to the war department, letters in which were lodged the heaviest charges against him—that he was charged with pushing the Alabama troops into the midst of the Creek country, against orders—that he was charged with bringing them into a situation where he had every reason to suppose that they would starve—that he was charged with bringing upon gen. Scott the danger of a mutiny among the Georgia troops, who were impatient for action, and were ready to break through the restraints of gen. Scott's plan, to reach the enemy; and finally, that he was charged with failing to communicate and of deranging the whole scheme of the campaign.

"Gen. Jesup had seen that we had published, from time to time, such of gen. Scott's official despatches as he desired to appear in the Globe; he had seen that we had published his violent official attack on major Reed of the Florida troops; he had seen that we had excused gen. Scott's unfortunate Florida campaign, and had brought forward every palliating circumstance to relieve him from its consequences; the indignation of the south, universal dissatisfaction among the people, and the chagrin of the president, whose confidence had preferred him to the command. Knowing these things, gen. Jesup certainly had some reason to take care that we should be apprised of his view of the transactions reported upon by gen. Scott, that we might not impart intelligence to the public without a knowledge of the whole case.

"It is apparent, from gen. Jesup's letter to us, that he expected to be arrested by gen. Scott on his charges; and if not, that he intended to retire from his command, and call for an investigation of them himself. It seems he wished to communicate the motives of his conduct to the president, and he felt that he could not do this through an official channel, without inculpating gen. Scott in such a manner, as would put him under the necessity of subjecting that officer to a court martial. Standing in the relation of second in command, we infer that gen. Jesup did not choose to take a course which could be construed into an attempt to supplant his superior. He therefore stated his determination 'to apply to be relieved,' and if not arrested by gen. Scott on the charges preferred against him, for his own vindication, to call for an inquiry into his own part, and have the campaign investigated. When we delivered this letter to the president, the secretary of war was at his house, and he apprised the president that gen. Scott had written a letter to gen. Jesup, full of charges, and upon explaining them, the president said he would recall gen. Scott. He disapproved of gen. Scott's conduct of the campaign. He approved of Jesup's; and as he was obliged to put down a dissent which threatened to mar the campaign, he instantly wrote his order on gen. Jesup's letter, without consulting the secretary or any one else. If there had been any difficulty in determining, as to the general whom he would employ in the further prosecution of the war, gen. Jesup's letter relieved him from the invidious office of choosing between them, and offending one or the other. Gen. Jesup's letter was an informal communication, intended to assure him that he would ask to be relieved. This voluntary retirement would at once have put an end to the divided councils, which were likely to produce disasters in the Creek campaign, and have left the field of glory to gen. Scott. In doing this, gen. Jesup, it seems, felt it due to himself, to indicate the ground on which he meant to defend himself against the charges which produced his resolution; and that he might not be considered as preferring official charges against his superior, which would call upon him to require his arrest in the midst of a campaign, he addressed his note to an unofficial person—the editor of the Globe.

"Upon reading the communication, the president thought fit to give a turn to the controversy which we did not anticipate on handing the letter. He considered it due to the public interest to reverse the positions assumed by the two generals. He deemed it proper to hold general Scott to accountability, and make general Jesup the accuser. And as his letter, although unofficial, was not confidential, he directed it to be filed, as a public document, with general Scott's letter, to apprise him of the whole foundation of the order upon which he was recalled."

Extract from the "Richmond Enquirer."

"A rumor has been put forth in the south, which does the greatest injustice to general Scott. It has been propagated by some of the presses, and directly countenanced by some of the toasters of the 4th of July. He has been suspected—indeed, openly charged, with intemperance. For instance, at a dinner given by a portion of col. Beall's regiment, in Baker county, Georgia, the following coarse and libelous toasts were drunk:

Fourth standing toast. "General Winfield Scott: A slave to the bottle, and a detractor from honest fame."

By the company: General Winfield Scott: More animated by the fumes of the Champagne bottle, than the love of country."

"The assertion that Winfield Scott is a slave to the bottle, in any sense of the term, is a calumny, base and unfounded. We know it—every man who is acquainted with his habits knows it to be false. When the public service demands it, no officer is more active, zealous and untiring. In the whole course of a long acquaintance, we have often seen him gay, animated and agreeable, but never a slave to the bottle, and never intoxicated by its fumes. The love of country and glory are his idols. That he is not the detractor of others' fame, let his late order on taking leave of the army of the south, and his compliment to gen. Jesup, attest for him. Would that gen. J. had better deserved it. Would that he had not appeared to play the part of the detractor! Far better would it have been for him to have suppressed all resentment on account of Scott's letter, to have consulted no private feeling, rather than compromised his own high character! If he had conceived it to be his duty to criticize gen. Scott's conduct, why did he not, as became an officer and a man, address himself frankly and at once to the president or the secretary of war, or the organ designated by the rules for the government of the army. Why did he send his complaint through a third party, and leave it to work in this underhand form, its effects against his superior officer? And why, when he and gen. S. made friends on the 23d June, did he not frankly tell gen. S. of the letter he had written, and promise to withdraw it? What gen. J. now owes to himself is, to request his own immediate recall. We regret that he has been driven by any considerations to commit such errors—and his duty is now to do all he can to repair them. He ought to show to the world that he did not design to effect Scott's recall by his private letter. He should scorn to profit by any such means—and he should convince his countrymen, that as he would blush to raise himself at the expense of another, so he will not be indebted for his promotion to any indirection. In a word, Jesup should say at once: 'I did not mean to rise at Scott's expense. I did not write my letter with any such design—but since it has wrought this effect, I will not hold the command upon any such terms. I will not subject myself to such imputations. I therefore ask to be permitted immediately to give up the command.' If he can, he should so speak, and he should so act. Such, at least, is our humble opinion.

As for general Scott, we would now cease all discussion—we would quietly leave his merits to be investigated by the court of inquiry, which will be called as soon as is compatible with the interests of the service—but some of the whig slangwhangers will not permit the subject to rest. The very men who were abusing the president for his selection of Scott, and were reviling him as the favorite and sycophant of the administration, are now attempting to make the most of his recall. They are seeking to turn it into a party question and effect to take his part against the president. They charge gen. Jackson with indulging an ancient grudge against him, notwithstanding the distinction which he has paid him in the Black Hawk war, the South Carolina crisis, the Florida war, the Creek war, and the French question. They are also attempting to barb the arrow by the most insidious insinuations against Mr. Van Buren and his son."

From the Washington "Globe."

We have been put in possession of a letter from gen. Scott to a gentleman, in relation to the mode in which his controversy with gen. Jesup has been drawn into the newspapers. He says,

"I have not written a word to the Bulletin; I have not, in fact, suggested a line or a fact for any newspaper whatever. So far from doing any thing in that way, I have taken care to converse but little, even with my friends on military matters, in controversy, lest my knowledge of circumstances and my feelings should find their way into the public papers, being aware that in the great political contest now raging, every thing, likely to change a vote would be seized upon for the purpose."

In reference to the particular publications of Webb and King, alluded to in the Globe, the general says,

"This day, Wednesday week, I went over to New York and met col. Webb close to Trinity church, after the ordinary salutation, I asked him whence he derived the particulars of an article on my subject, in his paper of the day or day but one before? In the act of evading the inquiry he was interrupted by Charles L. Livingston, who joined us. He then finished the answer, and stated to Mr. L. my question. After some jocose remarks, he invited Mr. L. and myself to spend the following Saturday evening and Sunday at his house, on Long Island, I declined, on the ground that I did not wish to associate with politicians, under my circumstances, as I might be led to speak of recent military events, &c. Mr. L. who is a strong supporter of Mr. Van Buren, and myself, then walked up Broadway, and colonel Webb down. The next day I again went over to New York, and chanced to meet Mr. Charles King. An article in his paper a day or two before, headed a general in search of the government, had been pointed out to me. I asked him particulars? &c. He gave me no satisfactory answer: when I remarked to him, as I the day before had said to Webb, all the world will attribute the article to me; I declare before God, that I am as ignorant of the source of either article, as Mr. Blair himself can be."

Upon the absolute and circumstantial denial made by general Scott himself, we unhesitatingly declare, that we acquit him of the suspicion of having prompted the attempt to divert his case into a political channel, and make it subserve party interests, and so avail himself of party support. General Scott will certainly, however, pardon the mistake, inasmuch as he foresaw that "all the world would attribute the articles to him." Webb's display of the letter, and King's sneer and cry of "a general in search of the government," being simultaneous with the arrival of gen. Scott, in New York, was calculated to fasten the impression on us more than others, because on inquiry at the department, we learned that no copy of the original letter on file had ever been made out, but that taken on by gen. Scott to New York; and also, that the general had reported himself to the acting secretary of war—had demanded a court of inquiry; and had his demand complied with, which, as it concluded his business with the department, left no doubt on our mind that if he had other objects, rendering the pursuit of the secretary necessary, he had communicated the exigency to those editors who represented the absence of that officer, as a wrong to gen. Scott.

We find the following in the "Fredericksburg, (Va.) Arena:"

"There had been difficulties between Scott and Jesup, and strong complaints had been forwarded by the former against his subordinate, for disobedience of orders, and disrespect. On the 23d June, three days after the date of Jesup's letter to Blair, a full explanation took place between them, which led to a thorough reconciliation, and Scott promptly addressed the department, to neutralize the effect of his previous representations, and, in his general order, after being recalled, spoke in handsome terms of Jesup. On this occasion, not one word was said by Jesup of the letter which he sent to Blair to be laid before the president. Until he reached Norfolk, Scott was in total ignorance as to the cause of his recall, or the individual who had procured it, and we know that it was with difficulty he could be brought to believe in the existence of the letter—so little was he capable of suspecting Jesup's duplicity.

The following account of the manner in which general Scott obtained a copy of the letter of general Jesup to the editor of the "Globe" is taken from a letter published in the Philadelphia United States Gazette.

"On the arrival of general Scott at Washington he at once repaired to the war department, and entering the audience room asked 'who represents the secretary of war?' Forth stepped Mr. Harris, who from being a subordinate clerk, has rapidly passed through sundry transitions, until he has become commissioner of the Indian bureau, and acting secretary of war, and replied that he was the representative of the great functionary. General Scott then demanded a sight of the letter of general Jesup, to which I have referred, from the files of the department. The files were accordingly produced and examined, and the offensive letter was drawn forth with the still more offensive endorsement, and laid before the general, who took a copy, and in an hour or two afterwards left Washington again, in search it is presumed, of the secretary of war, who has gone to some of the northern sprungs, and with a determination to demand immediately a court of inquiry to examine into the causes which led to the unsatisfactory issue of the war."

MR. VAN BUREN'S OPINIONS, &c.

In the last "REGISTER" we published a letter from Mr. Van Buren in reply to a communication from a committee of "the democratic party of the city and county of New York, in favor of equal rights and opposed to monopolies." At a general monthly meeting of the same party convened at the military and civic hotel, in the city of New York on the 1st instant, the following report of the convention in relation to its proceedings and correspondence with Richard M. Johnson and Martin Van Buren, was read, and after a long and animated discussion adopted, and ordered to be published.

REPORT.

The convention of delegates elected and convened pursuant to a resolution passed on the 15th April, 1836, at a general meeting of the democratic party of the city and county of New York, friendly to equal rights and opposed to all monopolies, having attended to the duties assigned to it, respectfully request leave to report:

That, on the subject of the first part of the aforesaid resolution, viz: "To advise and recommend a state convention," diversities of opinion have prevailed in your convention, both as to the practicability and utility of it. As respects its being practicable, although there is abundant evidence that the principles and measures advocated by the anti-monopolists, have in all parts of the state numerous friends and talented advocates, yet, as there is not an organization of the real and honest democracy, it would consequently require much time to disseminate circulars, to interchange sentiment, produce organization and concert of action, necessary to the formation of a convention.

As to the utility of the measure at this time, it is held by many of your delegates to be somewhat questionable, for the reason that there will be a general convention of mechanics and working men, at Utica, on the 15th of September next; and being satisfied that their objects must necessarily be founded on the same principles, and in favor of the same reforms in government, as are urged by the anti-monopoly democratic party, viz: equal rights, equal laws and equal justice, it is therefore believed that the one convention will supersede the necessity of the other.

With regard to the latter clause of the resolution passed on the 15th April, that is, "to address the candidates for the presidency and vice presidency, on the subject of the principles and reforms advocated by the anti-monopoly democracy," your convention has corresponded with the nominees of the Baltimore convention exclusively, because, either the consistency, or the ability, or the democratic faith of the other candidates, is a matter of great doubt in the minds of the people.

Your convention acknowledges, with the highest gratification, that the communication which has been received from R. M. Johnson, and already published, is in full accordance with our declaration of principles, of which it is an able and happily expressed exposition. The frank and unlimited avowal of his political tenets, is alike honorable to him as a democrat, a patriot and a man.

But the same encomiums cannot be justly applied to the answer received from the candidate for the presidency, Martin Van Buren, and which has also been published. It is evasive, unsatisfactory and unworthy of a great statesman. The world, however, will judge of the motive which dictated it.

The 8th article of our constitution of organization, and recorded resolution passed on the 20th of January, 1836, prohibit our support of any candidate who will not avow his entire concurrence with our declaration of principles, in article V. The letter of Richard M. Johnson being amply satisfactory, while that of Martin Van Buren is not so to any true democrat, the constitution of the United States in this case, leaves us only a choice of evils, as it respects the presidential election, either to give up the fundamental tenet and objects of our organization, or not vote at all, and thereby withhold our support from Richard M. Johnson, the man whom we would delight to honor. Such alternatives exhibit the anomalous political absurdity of that clumsy aristocratic machinery, the electoral colleges, by which the citizen is deprived of the inalienable right of voting directly for officers in whose hands the government is placed, and particularly where that right is clearest and strongest, as in the case of the highest functionaries of the republic, where legislative power is united with executive. Your convention, therefore, strenuously recommends that memorials be constantly and perseveringly presented until the constitution be so amended, as that the citizen can vote directly in the election of president and vice president of the United States.

A committee has been chosen by the convention to draft an address to the people of the state of New York, in relation to the ensuing election. This committee, pursuant to its appointment, reported an address which has been amended and adopted. Another committee has also been appointed to correspond with our friends in the county of Suffolk, with the view of advising them to nominate one of their fellow citizens as a candidate for the office of lieutenant governor. The latter committee is also instructed to communicate to the electors of the counties comprising the first senatorial district, a resolution of the convention requesting them to appoint delegates to a district convention, for the purpose of nominating a senator to be supported at the ensuing election. This committee is engaged in the duty assigned to it, and will duly report to a future county meeting.

In compliance with a resolution of the county meeting, the convention has had under consideration the propriety of permanently establishing a democratic newspaper. Subscription papers have been ordered, and are now in circulation for signatures.

With regard to the unfinished business of the convention above stated, the committees will report to the county meetings the duties they have yet in charge. The following resolution is therefore offered for adoption:

Resolved, That the second convention of the democratic party in favor of equal rights and opposed to all monopolies, is hereby, as a convention, dissolved. By order of the convention,

E. G. BARNEY, president.
DANIEL GORHAM, }
B. F. HALLOCK, } vice presidents.

James L. Stratton, }
John A. Riell, } secretaries.

UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

From the Globe of the 6th instant.

We have been furnished for publication with copies of the following order, issued by gen. Gaines, and of his instructions to the officer commanding the United States troops near Nacogdoches:

ORDER—NO. 29.

Head quarters, western department, camp Sabine, 11th July, 1836.

The present posture of affairs in Texas indicates the probability of Indian disturbances on the western and southwestern borders of the United States, in the course of the summer and autumn. On this hypothesis must be predicated all military movements on this frontier. It is therefore directed that, on any service requiring a detachment of the troops at any military station or camp, to be sent on duty in the wilderness on which they may be absent more than two days, and out of supporting distance, not less than two hundred infantry, or one hundred and fifty mounted men, be detached. The fate of major Dade's command in Florida illustrates the importance of a strict attention to this order.

By order of major general Gaines.

(Signed)

GEO. A. McCALL,
A. D. C. and act'g assistant adj't general.

Head quarters, western department, camp Sabine, July 10, 1836.

SIR: Having received satisfactory information that, among the Indians who have recently committed depredations upon the frontier inhabitants of Texas, in Robertson's colony, there were some of the tribes residing within the limits of the state of Louisiana or Arkansas, I have deemed it proper, in order to ascertain to what extent these Indians have participated in these depredations, and, at the same time, to restrain their hostile incursions into Texas, to direct your attention to the matter; for which purpose you will repair, with the forces under your command, to the town of Nacogdoches, where you will, for a time, be occasionally stationed until otherwise directed; and to which place I have ordered seventeen thousand four hundred rations of flour, with the like quantity of the small parts of the ration, together with eight thousand five hundred rations of pork, with authority for a supply of beef, sufficient to complete the whole supply to 17,400 rations.

Your position at Nacogdoches must combine the several advantages of strength, health and comfort, and it must be fortified by a small breast work constructed of light materials, with a block house or two, at the opposite angles.

The primary object of the present occupancy of that post is to enable me to carry into effect instructions of the president of the United States, embraced in the letter from the department of war, dated 12th of May, 1836, of which I inclose herewith a copy for your information and government.

Should you find any of the Indians, of our side of the supposed national boundary, manifesting a hostile spirit, you will urge them to return to their villages and be peaceable. But should they, or any other Indians, or other armed forces, be found in a warlike attitude, or in the act of any decided hostility against the United States troops, or against any of the inhabitants of this frontier, or of the disputed territory to the south or east, or north of Nacogdoches, you will in that case employ the forces of your command to arrest or otherwise restrain them from such hostility, notifying the commanding officer here of their position, probable numbers and conduct; to the end that the forces at this place may promptly support and co-operate with you, in their arrest or punishment. But you will not attack them without evidence of their hostility, demonstrated by their conduct rather than by their threats, taking care to conform strictly to the precautionary measures prescribed in the instructions herewith enclosed, as well as the general regulations of the war department.

You will keep the commanding officer at this place, and at Fort Towson; informed of every movement, and every measure, connected with or embraced in the directions and duties assigned to you.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) EDMUND P. GAINES,

Major general commanding.
To the officers commanding the U. S. troops at or near Nacogdoches, near Texas.

CORRESPONDENCE ON TEXIAN AFFAIRS IN PHILADELPHIA.

To the editor of the Inquirer and Courier:

South Ninth street, August 3, 1836.

SIR: The article published in your paper of the 29th ult. appointing me an agent in the Texian affairs, so far as respects myself is improper. No one was warranted to appoint me.

To correct the error, I request you to insert in the Pennsylvania Inquirer and Daily Courier the paper that accompanies this. It is a copy of a letter addressed to "John Swift, esq. or any member of the committee," and was delivered to John Hicpliff, esq.

As I see no notice taken of the request it contained, I find it due to myself, and opinions in this case, to ask this act of justice at your hands, and I present the same request to the editor of such papers as published the appointment, to insert in their papers the letter addressed to Mr. Swift. Very respectfully, I am your obedient servant, JAMES RONALDSON.

The following is a copy of the paper referred to by Mr. R. in the above letter.

South Ninth street, July 29, 1836.

SIR: In this morning's Pennsylvania Inquirer, I observe that at a meeting, where you presided as chairman, I was appointed a member of a committee connected with the affairs of Texas.

I am sorry that the person to whom I am indebted for the nomination, overlooked that courtesy we owe to each other.

On occasions such as this, it is proper to inquire of the proposed agent if it would be agreeable for him to accept the office. Had such an inquiry been made on the present occasion, there would not have been cause for troubling you or the public with an individual's private reasons for declining the appointment.

I have yet to be informed that the projected independence of Texas is to benefit the United States as a nation, or add to the happiness of my fellow citizens; and as to its accession to the United States doing good, that is out of the question. We have already a territory tolerably compact, and quite as large as can be used for many centuries to come, and which has a diversity of interests sufficient to give occupation to all the skill and patriotism we possess, applicable to the mighty duties of government. And I see in this affair the elements of great injury to one of our important branches of industry.

Every reflecting man must see that Texas, whether as an independent state or an integral part of this union, or cultivating cotton with slaves, the effect must be to bring more rivalry into the selling market, by which prices will be reduced, at the same time the Texian market will increase the price of slaves; and, consequently, the cost of making cotton will be enhanced in the United States, and the planters be subjected to a two-fold loss.

My feelings are for the comfort and happiness of the people of this union, and I cannot see that the enhancing the cost of making cotton here, and increasing the quantity grown in other countries, is to do us good. This is one reason for my not interesting myself in Texian affairs.

In the next place, we must recollect that like causes produce like effects. Heretofore our republic has excited in the European powers no fretful jealousies of our acquisitions; influencing the "balance of power," this Texian affair has in it much of the elements of causing such a ferment; the treaties, quarrels and wars this principle has caused, and their effects are well known. Let us ask, what would be the condition of Turkey if Russia had not been held in check by the fears of European powers keeping her Czars from extending their empire to the Dardanelles?

I have no desire that there should be cause for any power suspecting the United States of intentions to carry their rule to Mexico. I hope no such idea will be entertained, because such an intention would not add to the durability of the United States, and of a certainty it would injure the general happiness, virtue and independence of my fellow citizens. This is another reason for my declining the appointment you have made.

It is possible that citizens may differ in their views of foreign policy, and at least some of the parties be wrong. But as it respects ourselves, I hope we will be perfectly united in efforts to keep from our land distress or dishonor—recollecting the good example we have in Washington, Franklin, Jefferson and others, whose virtues I hope will not be lost as examples for ourselves, or the Washingtons or Franklins, if such there be, either in Texas or Mexico.

Be pleased to notify the gentlemen who are interested in the affairs of Texas, that I respectfully decline the appointment referred to. With sentiments of respect, I am your obedient servant, JAMES RONALDSON.

To John Swift, esq. chairman of a meeting held in the Masonic Hall, July 29, 1836, or any other of the committee.

P. S. Please have the goodness to cause this communication to be inserted in those papers that published the appointment.

MILITARY ADVANTAGES OF RAIL ROADS.

General Gaines, of the U. S. army, in a long letter respecting certain proposed rail roads in Tennessee and the neighboring states, takes the following professional view of the subject. It probably has not occurred to most people to consider it in this light.

"In reference to the military aspect of the subject of rail roads with steam power applied to vehicles of land transportation, I have much to say, more, more indeed, than I can flatter myself with a hope that the committee of the legislature would feel inclined during the present season to hear. It is a subject so entirely within the unquestionable sphere of my professional vocation—a subject, too, of such tremendous and awful import, when taken into consideration of the national defence, that I have felt it to be my duty, for some 5 years past, to devote my attention to it, as I ever deemed it, in obedience to my official oath, to meet in battle my country's enemies. It is tremendous and awful, because it is destined soon to enable us, the people of the United States, with the aid of our state governments and our United States government, to wield with irresponsible effect all the vast elements of the military power and countless resources of the central and interior states and districts, to any threatened point of our national frontier, in time to crush the invader, strong as he may be, before he could possibly take any one of our first rate fortifications, if prepared for a vigorous defence; and without an expense of more than one-tenth of time or of money than the present and all former means of national defence required—with little or no expense on our part of health or of life. The subject is awful, because it places at the control of instructed man, a power hitherto, from the beginning of the world up to the present age, was believed to belong only to Him who created and who controls the elements of all power! It presents to us the means of wielding, without the usual animal power, from this spot to an Atlantic seaport, distance 600 miles, with 72 locomotive engines, an army of 100,000 men, and 600 tons of cannon or other arms, in 60 hours—in the short space of 60 hours! A cargo of men and arms that would, with our present roads, require 36,000 draught horses and 6,000 wagons, to convey the baggage and ordnance and stores of this army the same distance; whilst the 6,000 wagons and the 36,000 horses would cost $3,000,000

The cost of the 72 locomotives, at $5,500 each, would be but 396,000

Making a difference of $2,604,000

With rail roads, such as those which I have deemed it to be my duty to advocate, this disposable force may be thrown, in 4 days' time, from these central states to any section of the national frontier, in season to meet and beat an invading foe, before he could possibly take, by the best means of approach yet devised, any one of our strong fortifications. Whereas, without rail roads, this great disposable force would waste millions worth of health, and life, and treasure, in vain efforts to meet the invader, without being able to find any other trace of his footsteps than such as may be marked with his rifle and sword. He will have time to land and to measure his strength with the gallant bordermen that may happen to be near the point of attack; and when, whether repulsed or victorious, the enemy will have withdrawn from that point, and, by the aid of steam power applied to his fleet; he will have directed his attention to some other vulnerable point, where he may be least expected, and where he will have time to re-enact his tragedy of fire and desolation. And in this way, our whole Atlantic and Mexican border may, in a war of two or three years, be completely overcome, and sacked to an amount of property (to say nothing of national honor) more than sufficient for the construction of ten such rail roads as those which I have advocated; and these disasters may be effected by a force of less numerical strength.

DINNER TO THE HON. J. J. CRITTENDEN.

A number of the citizens of Frankfort and Franklin county, (Kentucky), according to previous arrangements, convened together at the spring at Bellefonte, (in the vicinity of the town), on Saturday week, for the purpose of extending to their distinguished fellow citizen, the hon. J. J. Crittenden, the compliment of a public dinner, as a testimonial of the high regard in which they hold his public and private character. At least five hundred persons were present to partake of the festivities of the day, and every one in that large assemblage felt and expressed the sentiment of a cordial "welcome home" to their "neighbor and friend." The following are a few of the regular toasts:

The senate of the United States—Glorious body! where the states shine like a constellation. Kentucky's blaze is not lost in the glare of that galaxy!

Our guest, the hon. J. J. Crittenden—We sent him abroad because he loves his country and its constitution; he has vindicated the true glory of an American statesman. He has won new honors for his state and himself in the senate—he deserves them, and he wears them well. His name is now woven in the web of his country's history—his fame is identified with its glory. We welcome him home, and hail our neighbor and friend.

Henry Clay—Virginia claims him, but she is selfish, though she boasts his birthplace; Kentucky claims him, but she is selfish, though he is a Kentuckian; America claims him, but America too is selfish, though he is an American; he belongs to the whole civilized world—to whatever climes appreciate human liberty; his name belongs to history—his fame to eternity.

His excellency governor Morehead—The genius of internal improvement has graven his name forever on the rocks and cliffs of our rivers—on every highway and road; this is glory enough for the Kentucky statesman; but Kentucky has other works of glory to accomplish on a broad theatre, worthy his expansive mind, and her voice proclaims, "thou art the man."

James Madison—The father and expounder of the constitution; the pure and lofty patriot; the chaste and incorruptible statesman; the ripe scholar, the profound philosopher, the unblemished citizen; his private life was as exemplary as his public one was useful and glorious. He has gone down to the tomb with the blessings of earth and heaven on his head.

THE CORAL FISHERY.

The time for the coral fishery in the Mediterranean is from the middle of April to the end of July. It is fished up in the following way. There are generally seven men to a boat, six of whom manage it while one is the fisher. The machinery employed for tearing the coral from the bottom of the sea consists first of all two beams crossed, and lightly fixed at right angles to each other, with a leaden weight to press them down; to these beams they fasten a great quantity of hemp loosely twisted, among which they mix strong nets. When the machine has been let down into the sea and the coral is thought sufficiently entangled in the hemp and nets, they draw it out by a rope which they unwind according to the depth, and which sometimes requires half a dozen boats to draw it. The operation is toilsome, and even attended with danger. * * * * Do not hypercritically chide me for dwelling so long on the subject of this substance. A bit of ornament and a bauble it is, I grant you; but remember that the coral insect, though a very little gentleman, is more important in one respect than Columbus himself. He is not a finder of islands and continents, but a founder of them. This thing, though but recently admitted to be a living creature, encroaches on the ocean itself; diminishes his dominion, increases the proportion of habitable land on our planets and contributes with the submarine volcano, to change the aspect of the world. The volcano, as an agent of nature, does his business with terrible despatch; he heaves up the bottom of the sea to a moderate distance from its surface and there leaves a submarine rocky bank; but in a thousand instances this bank would emerge from the ocean as an island, unless the little coral insect set to work in building his house upon every hard substance that he can find at the bottom of the sea. When the first generation of these animacules ceases to live, their structures adhere to each other by virtue either of the glutinous remains within them or of some property in salt water, and the interstices being gradually filled up by sand and shells, a mass of rock is at length formed. Future races of these animacules erect their habitations upon the rising bank, in their turn to increase but principally to elevate this monument of their wonderful labors. An able voyager (capt. Flinders) who had written on the formation of coral reefs, observes that "the care taken to work perpendicularly in the earlier stages marks a surprising instinct in these diminutive creatures; for when their wall of coral, which is erected for the most part in situations where the winds are constant, arrives at the surface it affords a shelter, to the leeward of which their infant colonies may be safely sent. To be constantly covered with water, seems to be necessary to the existence of the coral insects, and therefore their habitations are always under the sea's surface. But above their habitations matter accumulates till it overtops the waves at low water, and this matter being exposed to the action of the air, loses its adhesive property, salt plants take root upon it, and a soil begins to be formed. Ere long the bank is visited by the sea-bird; by and by the nut of the cocoa or the pandanus is thrown ashore, and the wearier land-bird, resting on his wings on the soil, deposit on it the seed of herbs and trees. Every tide and every gale adds something to the bank, and it gradually spreads into an island of luxuriant vegetation. Man comes at last to take possession of the new estate and he may well say that the architecture of an insect has laid the foundation of his property.

LOANS OF PUBLIC MONEY

TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AND PUBLIC OFFICERS.

House of representatives, July 2, 1836.

Mr. Hunt, from the select committee to which the subject had been referred, made the following report:

The select committee, appointed under the resolution of the 20th day of June, 1836, "to inquire whether any member or members of congress, head or heads of departments, or any other officer of government, have received any accommodation or facilities from any person or persons, bank or banks, in the employment of the government, or not, in obtaining the use of the public money for the purpose of speculating in the purchase of the public lands," report:

The committee, anxious to submit to the house the result of their investigations at as early a day as possible, addressed a letter to the secretary of the treasury on the 22d of June, asking the names of the deposit banks, where located, and the names of their respective presidents and cashiers. This information was furnished by the secretary, under date of the 23d of June. On the 24th of June, the committee directed the following letter to be sent to the Girard bank, Philadelphia, the Moynemensing bank, of the same city, the Union bank, Baltimore, and the bank of the Metropolis, Washington city, viz:

Committee room, June 24, 1836.

SIR: I am instructed by the select committee to carry into effect a resolution passed by the house of representatives of the 20th instant, to transmit to you a copy of said resolution, and also a list of the heads of the several departments, and a list of the members of congress, the better to enable you to give your statement on the subjects of inquiry.

The committee are not able to furnish you with a complete list of the others officers embraced in the resolution; the inquiry, however, is as comprehensive as the resolution, so that, if you are possessed of any information connecting any officer or officers of the general government of the United States with the subjects of inquiry, you will be pleased to set it forth in your statement.

The first branch of the inquiry relates to any accommodation or facility that any member or members of congress, head or heads of departments, or other officer or officers, may have obtained from any person or persons, bank or banks, in the employ of the general government.

The secretary of the treasury has informed the committee that the — bank is employed by the government as a bank of deposit, and that you are the president of said bank. You will be pleased to state whether any person embraced in the resolution has obtained any accommodation or facilities from said bank, either directly or indirectly, or from any person or persons having any general or special management or control of any of the business of said bank; and, if so, state the name of such member of congress, head of department or other officer, and the kind of accommodation or facility he or they so obtained out; and to what amount or extent.

The second branch of the resolution relates to the purpose for which the accommodation or facility was obtained.

If you answer in the first branch of the inquiry affirmatively, you will then state whether, according to the best of your knowledge and belief, such accommodation was obtained or used for the purpose of speculating in the purchase of the public lands, and the grounds of your knowledge or belief.

I am instructed to say that your answer to the foregoing inquiries will be strictly confidential, except so far as the answer may have a direct reference to the object of the resolution.

I am, &c. &c.

H. P. HUNT, chairman.

On the 25th of June, the same letter was sent by mail to the following deposite banks in the city of New York, to wit: the Manhattan company, the Mechanics' bank, and the bank of America.

To the circular addressed to the bank of the Metropolis, the following answers were received from the cashier and president, under dates of the 25th and 27th June:

Bank of the Metropolis, Washington, June 25, 1836.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving, by the hands of gen. Van Ness, your communication of yesterday's date, directed to the president or cashier of this institution, with a copy of the resolution under which your committee acts.

I can at once briefly give a general negative to the inquiry contained in the resolution, so far as relates to this bank. But permit me respectfully to add, as explanation, that we have, indeed, for many years past, been in the habit of making occasional loans to members of congress, heads of departments, and other officers of the government, among numerous borrowers; the number and amount of them, though still moderate, has increased of late years; since, our means have also been increased. But never have we loaned any money to them, either before or after we became a deposite bank, except such as we considered under our own exclusive control. We have, it is true, and long have had, both public and private depositories in our vault, which, when received, pass immediately into the general mass of stock of our means; but we loan, on the whole, without distinction or discrimination, according to our own discretion, unrestrained by any other consideration, as relates to depositors, than that we must always be ready to repay the amount of their respective depositories on demand. We consider the depositories by the government converted into private funds, at our sole disposition, for future active use, (having bound ourselves in ample security for their repayment), under no control of the secretary of the treasury, or any other authority, or individual. The secretary has no knowledge of, nor is he consulted about, our loans to individuals, either public or private; in fact, we consider them as loans of our private funds, although we have received a part of them, on general deposite, from the government.

Therefore, sir, I answer, that we have made no loans, nor given any accommodation or facilities, in obtaining the use of the "public money;" still less so for any known purpose of speculation in the purchase of the "public lands," to either or any of the descriptions of individuals mentioned in the resolution.

This is the way in which we have always considered the relation between the loans and depositories, and their reference to each other.

The president of this institution is preparing a communication to you, which you will soon receive. I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

GEO. THOMAS, cashier.

Hon. Hiram P. Hunt, chairman, &c.

Bank of the Metropolis, June 27, 1836.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your communication of the 24th instant, to which was appended a copy of the resolution of the house of representatives, passed the 20th, under which you act.

In the third paragraph of your communication, intended as explanatory of the resolution, and specifying the particular points of inquiry, you say, "you will be pleased to state whether any person embraced in the resolution has obtained any accommodation or facilities from said bank, [of the Metropolis], either directly or indirectly, or from any person or persons having any general or special management or control of any of the business of said bank; and if so, state the name of such member of congress, head of department, or other officer, and the kind of accommodation or facility he or they so obtained from said person or persons or bank, the time or times when obtained, its character, and to what amount."

In relation to this inquiry, sir, permit me respectfully to observe, that, by the 1st and 6th sections of the act of congress, entitled "an act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia," &c. (of which this bank is one), approved March 3d, 1817, "the president and directors of each bank have full powers to make, revise, alter and annul all such rules, orders, by-laws and regulations for the government of said corporation, and that of its officers, servants and affairs, as they shall, from time to time, think expedient, subject only to the restrictions herein [therein] contained."

By the 14th article of our by-laws, afterwards adopted in pursuance of the above provision, after having been reported by a committee of our board of directors, of which committee one of the most distinguished lawyers in the country, (Judge Duval, of the supreme court of the United States), then one of its directors, was chairman, it is provided "that every transaction at the board relative to paper offered, or the amount discounted, and the debts due by individuals to the bank, are to be considered confidential by the directors and officers of the bank."

And it is further ordered, that "the officers shall take an oath for the faithful discharge of the duties entrusted to them."

This 14th regulation has been strictly adhered to; and, in accordance with its principle, by the articles of agreement between the secretary of the treasury and the bank on the 9th of October, 1833, in relation to the reception and management of the public depositories, it is, among other things, stipulated that the secretary or his agent shall have a right, at any time, to examine into the books and affairs of the bank, "except the current accounts of individuals, or as far as is admissible without a violation of the bank charter."

Now, sir, without going into any argument or discussion on the subject, I respectfully submit to you and the committee the question whether, in the absence of any provision in the act of congress (charter) obliging or authorising us to expose the private and individual accounts or concerns of the customers and dealers of and with the bank, and with the prohibitory by-laws referred to, (of which your committee, I suppose, were not before apprized), before us, whether, under these circumstances, a compliance with the above requirement of the committee will be pressed upon us?

Far from wishing to avoid the most critical scrutiny, as relates to ourselves, into our affairs, or our administration of them, we are unwilling to treat those of our customers in a manner which may be considered as a breach of faith.

An application, understood to be similar in principle to that of your committee, as above stated, was some time ago made to us by another, and I then presented to that committee precisely the same case or difficulty which I now do; but was afterwards informed by them that they did not mean to interfere with the principle of the by-law referred to.

I presume, sir, that you would consider it useless for me, at present, to add any remark applicable to the second branch of the resolution as stated by you.

Begging you to be assured of my disposition to give you and your committee every useful and satisfactory information on this or any other subject, I have the honor to remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN P. VAN NESS, president.

Hon. Hiram P. Hunt, chairman, &c.

N. B. The cashier, I understand, has written to you, and I hope in a manner that may be considered correct and satisfactory.

On the 24th June, subpoenas were issued to three witnesses in the city of Washington, requiring their attendance before the committee on the 25th of June. These witnesses have been examined by the committee, under oath, and the following is the evidence given by Preston S. Loughborough, one of said witnesses:

Preston S. Loughborough, sworn as a witness by Samuel Burch, justice of the peace.

The witness states that he resides in Washington city, District of Columbia, and is the chief clerk in the post office department. He has understood that two or three joint stock companies have been formed, and have purchased public lands and Indian reservations, and that officers of the government and members of congress are connected with them.

Question by Mr. Hunt. Who are those officers of the government or members of congress?

[Mr. Loughborough wished for time, and promised to deliver his answer to this question in writing.]

Mr. Loughborough presented in writing the following answer to the question yesterday propounded to him by Mr. Hunt. The committee thereupon resolved that the answer was not satisfactory, and that the witness be required to state the names of the persons alluded to in the question, which he declined doing, for the reasons stated in his written answer.

Mr. Loughborough's answer.

In regard to some of the persons, my information is merely from hearsay, and therefore not evidence from me to the committee. As respects the others, their transactions have no connexion whatever, so far as I know, with the public money, or with any bank in which it is deposited. I do not conceive their names or affairs can be important or useful to the committee, in a public view, any more than any other private transaction of a friend made known to me, in which he has purchased a farm, sold a horse, or become a member of a company for commerce or manufacture. If the persons of whose interests I speak (and they are interests in which I have no concern) had acquired them by means of loans or accommodations of the public money, obtained for that purpose from deposit banks, I should not hesitate to state their names, and what I might know, if any thing, of their loans or accommodations. But I know of no case in which a loan of any money, public or private, has been obtained from a bank for the purpose of speculating in the public lands.

From the Union bank of Maryland an answer was received on the 26th June, under date of the previous day. From the Girard bank an answer was received on the 28th June; and from the Moyamensing bank, and those addressed in the city of New York, answers were received on the evening of the 29th June.

On the 29th June, the committee, finding themselves greatly embarrassed by their labors in the house, at the most critical period of the session, and viewing the shortness of the time left them, even if otherwise unengaged, to pursue the delicate and important inquiries committed to them, resolved to suspend further investigation, and to submit a history of their labors to the house.

After the committee had come to the above resolution, the following letter was received from the president of the bank of the Metropolis, under date of the 29th of June:

Bank of the Metropolis, June 29, 1836.

SIR: I have not had the honor of a reply to my communication to you of the 27th instant. After having stated to you, both personally and in writing, what were my difficulties and embarrassments, which I understood you in conversation to be sensible of, and thus done justice to the institution over which I preside, and to its customers, as well as to myself, I intended decidedly, as I presume you understood from my letter, to be governed in the case by the final decision of the committee. But to prevent any erroneous inference, or possible doubt, I have now the honor to add, that all the books and papers in the bank are completely open to you; and every facility will be given there by every officer of the bank to promote your inquiries, which we wish limited only by the discretion of the committee, and such regard for established usage as they shall think not interfering with the legitimate objects of their inquiry. Or, if the committee prefer to state any specific cases or inquiries they shall immediately be attended to.

The scope of the resolution and inquiry is so extensive and indefinite, as to embrace a great part of the operations of the bank; and overloaded as we all are by an extraordinary pressure of business at this time, our books also being constantly required at bank, I take the liberty of respectfully suggesting what is the most convenient mode for us, and what will probably be the most satisfactory to the committee of accomplishing their object. I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN P. VAN NESS, president.

The committee have not deemed it proper, in the present stage of their investigation, to present to the house the whole testimony taken by them, nor to report the answers received from the various banks, other than those from the bank of the Metropolis.

Should the house be of opinion that the inquiries embraced in the resolution ought to be prosecuted, the committee would then ask for an increase of their numbers to nine, and for liberty to sit during the recess of congress; and that the resolution be amended so as clearly to embrace any connexion between deposit banks or others, and the land offices, for the purposes of speculation.

And with that view the committee ask leave to submit with this their report the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed by this house on the 20th June, 1836, be increased to nine, and that said committee have power to sit during the recess of this house.

Resolved, That said committee embrace in their inquiries any connexion between deposit banks or others, and the land offices, for the purposes of speculation.

Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to whom for speculation in public lands, the deposit banks have issued certificates of deposit without an actual deposit in cash, and to what extent they have been received in payment for purchase of public lands at the several land offices.

Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to what extent, combinations in the purchase of the public lands have been formed or are forming, sufficiently strong, from interested motives, to control, to any extent, the legislative action of congress.

Remarks of Mr. Hunt on presenting the above report.

Mr. Speaker: From my connexion with the committee submitting the report just read at your table, I may be permitted, I trust, without wishing to provoke a protracted debate at this stage of the session, to submit a few remarks in reference to the labors of the committee, and the nature of their report.

Sir, this committee was raised on the 20th June, 1836, in pursuance of a resolution which I felt it my duty to submit. The committee met and organized for business on the 22d June. They felt deeply the embarrassments of their situation, called, as they were, to institute inquiries of the most important and delicate nature, at a period of the session requiring all their strength of body and mind, in the discharge of their duties in the house. The members of the committee, notwithstanding these embarrassments, proceeded at once to execute the high trust confided to them. A note was directed to the secretary of the treasury, asking for such information as would enable the committee to address inquiries to those deposit banks from which answers might reasonably be expected during the present session of congress. That call upon the secretary was promptly and fully met, and various banks were addressed by the circular set out in the report. From the deposit bank of this city no answer was received until Sunday night, the 26th of June. That answer was laid before the committee on Monday morning, the 27th June. From the same bank a further answer was received, and the committee, anxious to do no injustice to the bank, have considered it proper to place before the house those answers entire. The committee have submitted no comments of their own upon the logic or ingenueness of those answers, but have left it entirely to this house to say how far a course of special pleading on the part of a moneyed institution, in an inquiry of this kind, shall be tolerated by congress. Then, with regard to the witness, Loughborough, the committee, to avoid all imputation of injustice, have preferred to give his testimony entire in the words furnished by himself, after abundant time given for reflection, (if not consultation), and that, too, without any remarks of theirs as to the singular course taken by the witness, under such circumstances.

As regards the third and last communication received from the bank in this city, and set forth in the report, it is only necessary to say, that it came too late to enable the committee to profit by the facilities therein proffered. The bank now proffers an examination, and I stop not to inquire whether this is the result of better reflection, or of that kind of advice (equivalent to a command) proceeding from a high personage, who at least has never been obnoxious to the charge of evasion or duplicity.

Mr. Speaker, I have made these remarks in justice to the gentlemen associated with me on this committee, and trust the house will feel that the committee have lost no time in prosecuting the inquiries committed to them.

The question is now presented for the consideration of the house, whether this inquiry shall be prosecuted to a final result, or be ended, for the present, in an imperfect, unfinished state. In favor of prosecuting the inquiry you have the unanimous opinion of the committee, as expressed in the resolutions accompanying their report.

This question of investigation by a committee of this house was yesterday argued by gentlemen as though its only object was to aid the judicial tribunals of the country in detecting and punishing the guilty. Again, it was urged that no good had ever resulted from such investigations. Sir, I deny that the principal object of investigation is to aid your courts of justice, or to bring the guilty to punishment. That consequence may, indeed, and often does, flow from it; but the primary object is to correct your legislation in reference to the great interests of the country; you cannot point your legislation until you understand the nature and extent of the evils to be remedied. And how are you to ascertain those evils, and their extent, but through an investigating committee? Sir, talk not of referring for a redress of grievances to executive officers, some of whom stand charged; in the eyes of the community, with the very offences sought to be redressed; but rather trust this office to your own body—to gentlemen amenable to this house, and, more than that, amenable to their constituents, for the faithful discharge of their duties.

In your public lands you have a domain, if properly used, of incalculable value. But, sir, if the abuses charged in the land offices really exist, and we cannot, for want of information, correct them, better would it be for the morals of this country, and the stability of this government, to cede at once, nay, to sink this domain.

You have two Indian wars now raging in your country, at an immense cost of blood and treasure, and these wars openly charged to the mal-conduct of speculators and government officers, and yet you refuse all efficient inquiry. But for inquiries instituted by this house, the nation, in all human probability, would still have labored under the former abuses of the post office department. That inquiry, though conducted by a committee raised in high party times, and composed of the most opposite political elements, led to a radical reform of that department.

Why oppose free and full inquiry into alleged abuses? It is said these inquiries cost money. Be it so. Think you the people of this country value money, sordid pelf, when required in defence of their rights, or in reforming the abuses and corruptions of those in the high places of government? Inquiring committees should not, indeed, be raised upon slight grounds; but in cases of strong probable cause, I hold it be our duty to inquire. In the monarchy of England it has long been settled as the law of parliamentary proceeding that newspaper reports furnish a ground of inquiry, and Mr. Jefferson, in his manual, has given the sanction of his high authority to the English doctrine. In the present instance, the inquiry is asked, not upon rumors merely, but upon evidence and deliberate opinion of a committee, after having given much attention to the subject.

Will gentlemen suppress inquiry from considerations of party? Far gone, indeed, must that party be that can use its wiles to shield peculation, corruption and crime.

If the present inquiry is to be prosecuted, the committee ask for an increase of their numbers. This has appeared to them necessary in reference to the multifarious nature of their duties; but should the house be of opinion that the present number is sufficient, they can readily modify this or any and all of the resolutions reported from the committee. One word as to the resolution enlarging the shape of the original one. It has been submitted in order to avoid all cavil, and to reach alleged abuses most alarming in their nature and extent. Now, sir, as to the proposition of the committee to sit in the recess of this house. An affected sneer has been attempted as the readiest mode of evading this entire question from a quarter that, with my knowledge of the situation of gentlemen, I confess has not a little surprised me for its boldness and effrontery. Let me tell gentlemen that in this or any other matter I am not to be deterred from my duty; nor will an intelligent people, in matters of high importance to their interests, receive the sneers of the suspected as a satisfactory and exculpatory answer. Sir, it needs no argument from me to prove the utter impossibility of pursuing an inquiry of the kind proposed during the session of this house. During the session gentlemen have duties to their constituents, connected with your daily legislation, which may not be disregarded—duties the discharge of which requires their constant attendance in the house. Under such circumstances, gentlemen cannot bring to the inquiry that physical strength and undistracted mind absolutely necessary for its prosecution.

In conclusion, sir, permit me to say this case is now before the house with full power to give to it its proper shape and direction. Whatever may be that determination, the committee will feel that they have fearlessly and faithfully discharged their duty, having no private griefs to redress, and anxious only for the purity of their country's legislation and the stability of its government.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL COMPANY.

MEETING OF THE STOCKHOLDERS.

Thursday, July 28, 1836.

The stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company assembled this day in general meeting, according to the order of adjournment on the 18th instant; the mayor of Washington in the chair.

PRESENT—The state of Maryland, by Benjamin S. Forrest and James W. McCulloch, esquires.

The corporation of Washington, by the mayor, George Waterson, G. C. Grammar and Jonathan Seaver, esquires.

The corporation of Alexandria, by the mayor, Hugh Smith, A. C. Cazenove and R. H. Miller, esquires.

The corporation of Georgetown, by the mayor, Wm. S. Nicholls and James Dunlop, esquires.

Also, the proprietors and representatives of a considerable amount of stock held by individuals.

The chairman of the general committee returned to the board the special report of the president and directors of the company on the subject of agreements with the parties who claim the water power of the Little Falls of the Potomac, together with the papers in relation thereto, referred to the committee on the 18th instant, and asking that the committee may be discharged from the consideration thereof. It was, therefore, ordered, that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The president of the company laid before the meeting a copy of the following proceedings of the stockholders of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company; which, on being read, was ordered to lie upon the table:

At an adjourned meeting of the stockholders of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, held at Commerce street hall, on Saturday, 23d July, 1836, at 10 o'clock, A. M. hon. Nicholas Brice in the chair; John J. Donaldson, secretary. The committee appointed at the last meeting made the following report and resolutions:

Whereas, from the proceedings of a meeting of the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, held on the 18th July, 1836, it appears that, to obviate doubts and prevent future collision between that company and the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, the canal company before definitive action upon the act of the general assembly of Maryland, passed at its last session, entitled "an act for the promotion of internal improvement," is desirous of coming to an explicit agreement with the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, to the following effect:

First. That the permanent bridges across the canal of the canal company, authorised to be erected under the provisions of the third section of said act, shall not be built at an elevation of less than seventeen feet above the water line of the canal; and that where the rail road company shall desire bridges of a less elevation, they shall be pivot bridges, or be constructed on such other plan as may be agreed on between the two companies.

Second. That in the places where, under the first, second and third sections of the said act, a joint construction of the works of the two companies shall occur, the slopes of the river wall of the canal shall be of such inclination as has been adopted, for the necessary security of the canal at other places upon it.

And whereas it appears to this meeting that these propositions may be acceded to without disadvantage to the rail road company; and it is just that stipulations asked for with declared views to the peace of the two companies, and the harmonious prosecution of their works, and to prevent "protracted, expensive and uncertain litigation," and to seek only to secure the free and safe navigation of the canal, and upon the faith of the canal company proclaimed to be intended to assure only what "experience has induced them to believe essential to the stability of their work," should with a responsive spirit of conciliation, be acceded:

And whereas it appears that, upon these propositions, and others being submitted by the directors of the canal company to that of the rail road company, the latter declined acceding to them, under a persuasion that it was not, antecedently to the adoption of the act by both of the companies, authorised to enter into any arrangements modifying its provisions or regulating its operation; and whereas it is the desire of the stockholders of the rail road company that such authority should be conferred: therefore,

Be it resolved by the stockholders of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, in general meeting assembled, as the opinion of the said rail road company, that the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company (notwithstanding their acceptance of said act) should have and exercise the right and privilege of determining by their engineers, and to that determination conforming in the construction of their work, the proper slope or angle of the river wall of their canal; being such slope as that company has adopted at other points on their canal for its security, at all places where the canal and rail road may come in contact, in the course of the joint construction contemplated by said act, so, however, that said slope, as so determined, shall not prevent, retard or interfere with, the location of the rail road, as the same may be determined by the commissioners mentioned in the third section of the act aforesaid; and further, that wherever it may be necessary, as provided for by said third section, for the rail road to cross the canal, if the crossing be by permanent bridges, they should be erected at the elevation of at least seventeen feet above the water line of the canal, or of as great an elevation as that of the bridges now about to be constructed over the canal at Harper's Ferry; and that where the elevation of the rail road above the canal may not admit of such height for the bridges, they should be made to work upon a pivot, or with a draw, and so as to create no difficulty in navigating the canal. And the president and directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company are hereby authorised to stipulate and agree with the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, in conformity to the opinion of this meeting, now expressed. And the faith of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company is hereby pledged to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, that after the act aforesaid of the general assembly of Maryland shall have been accepted by said canal company, the said canal company shall have and enjoy the rights and privileges aforesaid in relation to the slope of their canal, and that the rules and terms aforesaid respecting said bridges shall be applied to the construction thereof.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, signed by the chairman and secretary of this meeting, be transmitted by the chairman to the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, to be submitted at the next meeting of the stockholders of said canal company, and that a similar copy be transmitted by the chairman to the president and directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company.

N. BRICE, chairman.

JNO. J. DONALDSON, secretary.

George Waterson, esq. offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That no payment shall be made from the funds of this company to any person or persons for attending before the congress of the United States, or the legislature of any of the states, to obtain the passage of any law, nor for any services rendered in promoting the passage of any law, except for the travelling and other necessary personal expenses of such persons as may be authorised by the president and directors to attend for that purpose.

On motion of Mr. D. Green, the resolution was laid on the table.

Charles F. Mayer, esq. laid before the meeting the following copy of certain proceedings of the governor and council of the state of Maryland; which, on being read, was laid on the table:

State of Maryland, in council, July 26, 1836.

Whereas, by the eighth section of an act of the general assembly of this state, passed at May session, 1836, entitled "an act for the promotion of internal improvement," it is provided that "as to the said subscription to the stock of the Maryland canal company, before the subscription shall be made, it shall, upon reports and estimates to be submitted to the governor and council, after an actual survey of the said routes, by engineers to be appointed as hereinafter prescribed, be, by their judgment, ascertained whether, and at what expense, the construction of the said company's canal, with due supply of water, be practicable, from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to the city of Baltimore, by the valleys of the Monocacy and Patapsco, or by a route diverging from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, at the mouth of Seneca river, exclusively within the limits of this state; and in order to said decision, the governor and council may act upon any report and estimates of any engineer or engineers of said company, and of the mayor and city council of Baltimore, and upon those of any that by the governor and council may for the purpose, at the expense of said company, be appointed, who are hereby authorized and directed to appoint an engineer for that purpose."

And whereas the governor and council appointed Charles B. Fisk, esq. engineer, on the part of the state, and the said Maryland canal company appointed George W. Hughes, esquire, engineer, on the part of said company, to make the necessary examinations, surveys and estimates, in pursuance of the aforesaid act: and whereas the said engineers have this day submitted to us the following report:

REPORT

To the governor and council of Maryland, as to the route of the Maryland canal.

Annapolis, July 26th, 1836.

The undersigned having been appointed to ascertain "whether and at what expense with due supply of water a canal be practicable from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to Baltimore, by the valley of the Monocacy and Patapsco, or by a route diverging from the said Chesapeake and Ohio canal, from the mouth of Seneca, exclusively within the limits of this state;" have the honor to report that, under their direction two parties of engineers have been engaged during much of the present month, making such surveys as might serve to form a correct opinion upon the question submitted to them for investigation.

The attention of the undersigned was first directed to the supply of water for the summit level on "Parr Spring Ridge;" and a personal examination have satisfied them that the natural flow of the streams which have their rise in the ridge, was entirely inadequate to the wants of a canal of even the minimum dimensions prescribed for the cross-cut canal, and that therefore it would be necessary to collect into reservoirs the surplus waters of the winter and of the wet season, in order to meet the deficiencies of the summer and dry season.

To ascertain whether in this way by reservoirs "a due supply of water" for a summit could be had, we directed lines of level and of survey to be traced out, embracing all the areas of country which drain from a level higher than, or may be made available to, the several summits respectively.

For the commencement of our operations we selected a route as favorable as any, if not the most favorable of all—the one connecting the head waters of the Linganore with those of the western branch of the Patapsco, with the lower summit proposed by Briggs in 1823.

The extent of drainage into the lower summit of the Linganore route from actual survey, conducted as above, is less than a surface of 20 square miles—an extent of country barely more than one-third of what we need, even if we could treasure up all the water of the winter and of the wet season.

The result of this minute and accurate survey is so decisive that in addition to a personal and careful examination of the country that can be commanded by a summit at any other point along Parr Spring Ridge, (having reference to the field notes of Briggs's survey of 1823, which may be fully relied on so far as accuracy of levelling is concerned), we feel called upon to express at once fully and decidedly our opinions and accordingly we do so—"a due supply of water" cannot be had on any line of canal crossing "Parr Spring Ridge."

This opinion is sustained in the strongest manner by the experience of the Union canal of Pennsylvania, on whose works it has been necessary to resort to artificial means to collect a sufficiency of water for the summit. A reference to the Union canal, is unhesitatingly made, inasmuch as the engineer on the part of the state has lately visited that work with the view of obtaining such information as might have a bearing on the subject under discussion—and we report that calculations of the supply of water furnished by a given extent of country, which can be made available through the natural flow of streams and the aid of reservoirs based upon the experience of the Union canal, sustain fully and unquestionably the opinion we have already expressed of the utter insufficiency of water to feed a canal of the assumed dimension and capacity of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal passing through Parr Spring Ridge, at any point within the limits of the state of Maryland.

Other routes than across the ridge have been suggested for a cross-cut canal, exclusively within the limits of Maryland.

It has been thought for instance that the waters of the Potomac might be brought down on a high level from the mouth of Monocacy, up the Seneca valley, thence nearly parallel to Parr's Ridge, along its south western base and around its termination at Vansville, by a route that would avoid a summit and admit a continuous descent to Baltimore. It has also been suggested in like manner to take the Potomac water from the Great Falls, from the Little Falls, or perhaps from some point higher up, and to pass along exclusively within the limits of Maryland, without a summit. All these plans we pronounce utterly impracticable, for we have proved them to be so by actual examination with the level.

A plan has been suggested for crossing Parr Spring Ridge, of which we have made no mention. It is to gather all the drainage of the western side of the ridge by running the canal up the Linganore, thence along the ridge and to pass through it at Westminster. This and all similar plans are more impracticable (if possible) than the direct route through the ridge.

Our examinations have brought us to the conclusion that the most northern practicable route from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to Baltimore; and in fact the most judicious line for such an extension of the canal, is on or near the location traced by Dr. Howard, in 1827, through the District of Columbia—and as far as we are enabled to form an opinion, the estimate of cost submitted by Dr. Howard, on his plan, was substantially correct.

We have spoken of the "due supply of water." We will now show what we consider to be that supply. Its amount depends on the leakage of the summit level and that portion dependant on it for its supply—on the leakage of the lock gates—on the length, breadth and lift of the locks, and to some extent on the trunk of the canal, and lastly on the amount of tonnage which it is calculated to accommodate. In estimating the leakage of the canal and lock gate, the minimum amount on a well constructed canal has been assumed or ascertained from actual observations on canals in our neighborhood.

As it regards the dimensions of the locks in length and breadth, and of the depth of the trunk of the canal, the same dimensions have been taken as those adopted on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, of which this should be considered as an extension. If otherwise. If the locks should be made shorter or narrower, or the trunk shallower, it would be as preposterous as to place an extension of a rail road with rails closer together or wider apart, so that the cars of the one could not pass on the other.

In regard to the width of the trunk and lift of the locks the undersigned have considered themselves at liberty to vary from the similar dimension on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal when called to do so by a scarcity of water—to continue the comparison, it is like increasing the grades on a rail road by which the useful power of a horse, or of a locomotive engine is diminished, or the capacity of the road lessened. In calculating the quantity of water required, the lift of the locks on those portions of the line dependant for their supply on the summit have been put at $\frac{1}{2}$ feet only. The effect this small lift may have as to loss of time in the transit of trade, and also the effect of narrowing (as we are compelled to) such parts of a canal as are deficient in water, come properly under the head of the capacity of such canals, when compared with other canals of larger expanse.

The probable amount of tonnage, or the number of locks full of water, that will be taken daily from the summit, is another very important element in estimating the requisite quantity of water.

Looking to the history of the inland navigation of the United States—to the Erie canal, with its 40 feet width and 4 feet depth, now in progress of enlargement to 70 feet width and 7 feet depth—originally with single locks, now in part with double locks, which will soon be the case along its whole line. Considering that this enlargement has been called for by the public in less than 12 years after its completion; and when we look further at the great increase of the western trade and its greater anticipated advancement, we do not feel justified in [taking as] the basis of our calculations less than a double set of locks in constant use.

With these elements of calculation 3,800,000 cubic feet will be daily required for a due supply of water.

In reference to the extent of country which will furnish this quantity of water we have already stated that the entire drainage of all the surface which can be commanded on any one of the summits is insufficient, and now add that it will furnish but little more than one-third of the water we deem necessary.

It may perhaps be said that in 1823, the commissioners appointed by the executive of Maryland to survey the same ground pronounced on the practicability of the route of the Linganore across to the head waters of the Patapsco, and that they speak with confidence of the supply of water. In answer to this we may reply, that about the same time these surveys were made, the Union canal was planned and commenced with reservoirs, then considered ample to supply the summit with water and to pass daily 100 boats. This canal has been finished and is now in use and with only 25 boats passing daily—with locks 75 feet long, $\frac{3}{4}$ feet width and $\frac{1}{2}$ feet lift, their reservoirs for the three summer months furnish less than 1-10 of the water required. The greater part of the remaining 9-10 being forced up with pumps, 95 feet into a feeder 3 miles long; a small portion acting as a regulator on the summit, is pumped up 32 feet. The undersigned believe that with scarcely an exception in Great Britain, disappointment has followed wherever reservoirs have been relied on to collect and retain a sufficiency of water for active trade. We will add one other remark before dismissing this subject. It appears from an inspection of the report of the U. S. engineer, in 1835, on the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, that more than five times the extent of country, and more than five times the quantity of water can be commanded on the summit of that canal through the Alleghany mountain than we collect on the summit through "Parr Spring Ridge."

Satisfied of the impracticability of the several routes exclusively within the territorial limits of the state of Maryland, submitted to our examination, from the entire insufficiency of water to feed the summit levels, we have not deemed it necessary to prepare detailed or even general estimates of their cost; but are satisfied that the entire cost of either of the proposed routes aforesaid, even if a sufficiency of water could be obtained, would not fall short of six millions of dollars, excluding the heavy damages to water rights and other property, inseparable from the construction of such a canal along the valleys of the Monocacy and Patapsco.

It is a matter of regret to the undersigned that they have not been able to avail themselves of the experience and talents of col. S. H. Long, the engineer appointed by the city of Baltimore, whose occupations have detained him elsewhere.

They hope in a short time to submit the details of their field operations to be placed on record to be referred to at any time hereafter by those who may choose to examine minutely into the data on which their opinion are based.

GEO. W. HUGHES, U. S. civil engineer,

CHARLES B. FISK, civil engineer, on part of the state.

Upon consideration whereof, it is hereby resolved by the governor and council that, in their judgment, the construction of the said Maryland canal, "with due supply of water," is not practicable, by the valleys of the Monocacy and Patapsco, or by a route diverging from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal at the mouth of Seneca river, exclusively within the limits of this state, and that "the most northern practicable route" for the said canal is on or near the location traced by Dr. Wm. Howard, United States civil engineer, in 1827, through the District of Columbia, a copy of the report whereof to the chief engineer of the U. States, was transmitted by the governor of Maryland to the general assembly, at December session, 1827.

Council chamber, Annapolis, July 26, 1836.

I, Thomas Culbreth, clerk of the executive council of the state of Maryland, do certify that the foregoing is truly copied from the proceedings of the governor and council this day.

THOS. CULBRETH.

Benjamin S. Forrest, esq. offered the following resolution:

Resolved by the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, in general meeting, That the act passed by the general assembly of Maryland, at its last session, entitled "an act for the promotion of internal improvement," be, and the same, with its provisions, is hereby approved, assented to, and agreed to by the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company; and the president of the company is directed to communicate, under his signature and the corporate seal of the said company, this approval, assent, and agreement to the governor of the state of Maryland, on or before the first day of August next.

Richard S. Cox, esq. offered the following preamble and resolutions, as a substitute for the resolution offered by Mr. Forrest, and which were accepted as such by him.

Whereas the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, at a general meeting of its stockholders, has authorised the president and directors of said company to enter into an arrangement with the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, in relation to the construction of bridges over the canal, when they may be required by the said rail road company, and also in relation to the slopes which, in the judgment of the canal company, may be required to give stability to their works;

And whereas, also, the reports made by the surveyors appointed for that purpose have established the fact that the most northern practicable route for the contemplated canal of the Maryland canal company is substantially the same as that surveyed and recommended by Dr. Wm. Howard in his report of June 25, 1827, extending through the city of Washington into Georgetown;

And whereas the said Maryland canal company has, by its solemn and deliberate act, authorised an agreement, binding itself to adopt said route for the projected work, and assurances have been given that their said company, by its president and directors, will, within a short period, give the certificate as required by the 8th section of the act of the general assembly of the state of Maryland, that a sufficient amount has been subscribed to the stock of said company to justify the commencement of the construction of their canal, and to insure its completion by the most northern practicable route; therefore,

Resolved, That the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, assembled in general meeting on this 28th day of July, 1836, does approve, assent and agree to the several provisions of an act of the general assembly of Maryland, passed on the 4th day of June, 1836, entitled "an act for the promotion of internal improvement," so far as the same are applicable to this corporation; and that the president of the said company be, and he is hereby, authorised and directed to communicate an attested copy of this resolution, under the corporate seal of this company, to the governor of the state of Maryland, on or before the 1st day of August next.

Resolved, That the president and directors be, and they are hereby, authorised and directed to enter into the agreement and stipulation required by the 7th section of said act of the general assembly of Maryland in the form, and binding this company to the terms therein prescribed in and by said section.

And whereas it is deemed by this corporation important to its interests that the Maryland canal company should agree to connect its canal with the canal of this company, at a suitable point in Georgetown, above the locks in said town, as a preliminary to the acceptance of the recent act of the general assembly of Maryland, entitled "an act for the promotion of internal improvement;" and whereas there is reason to believe that the said Maryland canal company is prepared to enter into a binding contract to that effect, it required so to do; therefore,

Be it resolved, That this company deem such agreement a necessary preliminary to the final acceptance of the aforesaid act of said general assembly, and that the president and directors of this corporation be, and they are hereby, authorised to obtain and enter into said agreement, and that, until the same shall be made, the acceptance by this corporation of the aforesaid act of said general assembly shall not be filed with the governor and council of said state.

And be it further resolved, That the president and directors of this company be further authorised and required, as a further preliminary to the filing of said acceptance of said act, to enter into an agreement with the said Maryland canal company, by which said Maryland canal company shall bind itself to give, within three months from this date, the certificate required by the 8th section of said law, that a sufficient amount has been subscribed to the stock of said company, to justify the commencement of the continuation of their canal, and to insure its completion by the route through the District of Columbia as the most northern practicable route.

Francis S. Key, esq. offered the following as an amendment to the substitute, to come in at the end of the first resolution:

Provided, That an arrangement shall be made with the president and directors of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, stipulating that it shall not, under any of the provisions of the act of the 4th June, 1836, proceed with the construction of its works in the valley of the Potomac river, above Harper's Ferry, until the loan to be contracted agreeably to the said act, for paying the subscription of three millions of dollars to the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company by the state of Maryland, shall have been actually negotiated.

And also resolved, That the acceptance of this law by this meeting is made upon the expectation that the subscription it contemplates shall be made available by the loan authorised by the said law, and it is hereby declared to be a condition of this acceptance that the said loan shall be accomplished within the time hereinafter stated; and this acceptance shall be binding on this company from this time until the first day of January next; and if the said loan shall have been then accomplished, it shall be forever binding on this company; but if the same shall not then have been accomplished, then this acceptance shall be no longer binding on this company.

On the question of agreeing to the amendment, it was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the substitute as offered by Mr. Cox, and it was agreed to by the following vote—ayes 4,101, noes 2,333.

On motion by Richard S. Cox, esq. the following preamble and resolution were adopted:

Whereas, by the acceptance by the several companies therein mentioned of the terms and provisions of the act of the general assembly of Maryland of June 4th, 1836, all doubts are removed as to the completion to Cumberland of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, within as short a period as the proper execution of the works will permit.

And whereas, the interests of the several stockholders in said company, and more particularly those of the state of Maryland and the cities of the District of Columbia, are indissolubly connected with the trade upon said canal, and require that that trade should be enlarged to the greatest practicable extent;

And whereas, it has been deemed expedient by those who have the management and direction of similar works of internal improvement, particularly those of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to invite to the use of those works by the most liberal tariff of tolls:

And whereas, to give full efficiency to the efforts which are now making to develop and bring into activity the inexhaustible and invaluable mineral and other productions in the vicinity of said canal, inducements should be held out to all who are or may be interested in these subjects by a liberal and permanent adjustment of the tariff of tolls, to augment the trade and business of the canal to the greatest possible extent, and at the earliest practicable period of time:

Be it resolved, That the president and directors of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal be, and they are hereby, requested, as early as may be convenient, to arrange and adjust with the proper authorities of the state of Maryland a full and complete tariff of tolls, as well upon the ascending as the descending trade; that these tolls be arranged upon the most liberal terms compatible with the interests of the company; that they be made uniform throughout the entire extent of the canal; that the faith of the company be pledged not to increase said tolls without imperious necessity; and that upon such commodities and productions as may bring the Chesapeake and Ohio canal into competition with other works of internal improvement, it be especially enjoined upon the president and directors to make said tariff as liberal and favorable as the competition of said other and rival works may demand.

After some other unimportant business the meeting adjourned.

General Jackson arrived at the "Hermitage" on the 4th inst. He was met by a large body of citizens from Nashville and its vicinity, about thirty miles from that city, and from thence was escorted to the Hermitage. He was addressed on behalf of the committee of citizens by the honorable G. W. Campbell, and by A. Ewing, esq. on behalf of the young men. The president replied to both addresses with much feeling.

The secretary of war returned to Washington on Thursday last from his visit to Michigan.

The letter of the president of the United States to the governor of Tennessee, (see page 412) is dignified and appropriate, and must disabuse the public mind as to the alleged sentiments and conduct of that functionary in the contest of the Texians with Mexico—For, from the letters, &c. of gen. Gaines, it was almost impossible to resist the conviction that he was not only acting with the sanction, but by the advice, of the president—especially in regard to the call for volunteers from Tennessee, &c. The responsibility of that act, and also the call upon the governors of Kentucky and Louisiana, rests with gen. Gaines alone, and was in direct violation of the president's directions.

The Mexican government has great right to complain of the remissness of our authorities in not restraining our citizens from active participation in the Texian contest; but in preventing individuals from joining the Texian standard, but in permitting the organization and equipment of troops within our borders, and the preparation of munitions of war, openly and avowedly destined for the scene of hostilities. As individuals we may disfranchise ourselves and form an alliance with any cause or country we please; but it is a direct violation of international law, and an infringement of solemn treaty obligations to suffer bodies of our citizens to organize within our territory to make war upon a nation with which the government of the United States is at peace. It is thus, in another respect, that we violate that "strict neutrality" of which the president speaks, and which it is our duty to observe if we wish to retain the respect of other nations and preserve inviolate their treaty obligations with us.

The "National Intelligencer," speaking of the president's letter, says—

"We consider the document to be of an importance scarcely inferior to that of the proclamation of neutrality of the first president of the United States in 1793, which prevented this then young nation from being engulfed in the wars of the French revolution."

ELECTIONS. We have before us various statements of the result of the general election in Louisiana—but none that can be relied on as correct. We have also partial returns from Kentucky, Indiana, Missouri, Illinois, Alabama and N. Carolina, in which states the general elections commenced on the 1st inst. The "Raleigh Register" of the 16th publishes the returns from thirty-six counties in the last named state, which have returned 50 whig and 45 Van Buren members to the legislature (senate and commons) and given 14,985 votes for Dudley the whig candidate for governor, and 12,682 for Speight the Van Buren candidate.

We will, of course, publish full and accurate returns as soon as they come to hand.

LOAN TO THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. The Paris Journal du Commerce of 7th ult. has this paragraph—showing that the bank of the U. States has negotiated a loan, in Paris, for about two millions and a half of dollars:

"There has been issued on the exchange the bonds of a new loan of 12,500,000 francs, made at Paris by Messrs. Hottinguer & Co. on account of the bank of the United States. This is the first American loan contracted directly at Paris."

GENERAL ORDER—NO. 54.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, Aug. 11, 1836.

The resignations of the following named officers have been accepted by the president of the United States, to take effect at the dates set opposite to each respectively, to wit:

Captain J. Rogers, 6th infantry, 31st July, 1836.
1st lieutenant F. L. Dancy, 2d artillery, 11th September, 1836.
2d lieutenant H. P. Van Cleave, 5th infantry, 11th September, 1836.
2d lieutenant W. H. Pettes, 1st artillery, 11th September, 1836.
2d lieutenant J. L. Davis, 4th artillery, 11th September, 1836.

By order of major general MACOMBE

R. JONES, adj. gen.

NEAH-EMATHLA. We copy the following sketch of this distinguished Indian chief, from a late number of the Mobile Advertiser:

His person is in stature rather beyond the ordinary sized Indian, naturally erect and commanding—now bent and broken down by the weight of eighty years. His face is strongly marked, his countenance peculiarly expressive, and indicative of the inner workings of his soul—his forehead rather high and well based—nose aquiline—lips compressed—his eye—ah! that speaks the warrior! it is certainly expressive of more fire than any I ever saw. Deeply sunken in their bony sockets, small, black and as keen as an eagle's when they shine from beneath their silkened lashes, all who behold, feel their searching glance.

His character has been that of the most dauntless and intrepid warrior. During the last war he signaled himself fighting against general Jackson in Florida and elsewhere. In conversing with him upon that, and other subjects, I was forcibly struck with the accuracy with which he related facts. From that period up to this, he has been the avowed and uncompromising enemy of the white man, and no doubt, the prime instigator of all the murders and depredations committed in the nation.

His capture was altogether the result of accident. No stratagem or snare was laid to decoy him from his camp, as has been stated. Being along, I know the fact. When apprehended, he was on his way to his camp from Echo-Hagoe's, where he had been, as he stated, sick for two moons, and merely happened to be passing near the road, as the army was marching on, and was discovered by the friendly Indians in advance, and recognized by them as Neah-Emathla, in despite of the disguises he had thrown around himself to elude detection. Upon this recognition, the Indian war hoop was yelled—they rushed upon him like maddened tigers. Much effort was required to prevent them from tearing the old man limbless.

TRADE OF RUSSIA. The following particulars relating to the foreign and domestic trade of Russia, are extracted from a late number of the Petersburg Gazette, in which it is admitted that one-half the exports of the empire are sent to England, although not more than a twentieth part of the exports for Russia are sent to Russia. In the year 1834 the total value of the exports amounted in roubles to 230,419,880, including 10,656 sent to Poland, and 2,440,995 to Finland. In the same year the imports from foreign countries amounted to 214,524,630 roubles, from Poland 2,798,804, and from Finland 969,919. The following is a comparative statement of some of the leading articles of raw produce imported into Russia in the years 1832, 1833 and 1834, respectively. The figures represent poods, a pood being equal to rather more than 36 lbs. avoirdupois.

Cotton wool	127,124	139,032	152,110
Cotton twist	544,255	517,693	525,296
Indigo	33,318	32,950	25,284
Madders	69,565	46,613	79,440
Oil	200,079	251,953	305,529
Raw sugar	1,557,723	1,537,673	1,574,137

Of manufactured articles the following is a statement showing the progress of importation during the same three years:

	1832.	1833.	1834.
Cottons	10,383,165	10,586,723	8,786,072
Linsens	946,694	779,284	905,634
Silks	10,317,676	8,289,817	9,442,567
Woolens	10,932,916	8,412,957	7,699,198
Lace, blonde, &c.	2,259,288	1,693,463	1,267,744

From the tables it is to be inferred that even in Russia manufactures are making considerable progress, from the increase in the amount of importations of raw produce coinciding with the decrease of manufactured articles. Three-fourths of the whole exports of Russian hemp, and more than three-fourths of the exports of tallow, are sent to England, without counting the shipments for Elsinore, which, in the end, have the same destination.

CHRONOMETERS. The British government allows a premium annually of £5,000 to the manufacturers of the best chronometers, on a trial of 12 months. This valuable instrument has attained the highest state of perfection.

At a recent award of premiums, several were found to have erred in their ratio only 65, 68 and 79 hundredths of a second in 12 months. The 1st, 2d and 3d premiums were awarded to these three. The great perfection this instrument has been brought to, convinces us that no vessel should be sent to sea without a good chronometer to aid in ascertaining the longitude.

Underwriters should insure at a less premium when good chronometers are on board the vessel to be insured. It is unusual for a British vessel to put to sea without a chronometer, and in many instances not less than three are carried, and in their ships of war always three and frequently four. We recollect seeing a British frigate with 14 on board, 9 of which were said to be sent out on trial by the manufacturers.

The French government give £130,000 per annum to the encouragement of literature. [Phila. U. S. Gaz.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Arrival extraordinary. A small steamboat from Erie, Pa. came down the river on Monday evening last to the old French landing, half a mile above the Falls. It brought down with it, in tow, two scows laden with lumber for Mr. Rathbun. The following morning, after disburdening itself, it proceeded up the river, on its return, with apparent ease. This is the first boat that has ever arrived within the limits of this village; but the complete success of this experiment, evinces the practicability of navigating the Niagara to this point, and must be followed by other and frequent arrivals of boats at the same place.

[Niagara Falls Journal.]

Mr. Carroll, U. S. consul at St. Helena, gives notice, that if vessels passing that Island will stand in within two miles of the anchorage, and display their telegraphic flags, they will be reported by a look out on shore. He repeats that all letters, &c. from or for owners and friends will be forwarded without charge.

The amount of sales of the Illinois and Michigan canal lands, which recently took place at Chicago, was $1,619,848. There still remain unsold lots estimated to be worth $300,000, making, with the interest that will accrue, about $2,000,000, which will be realized by the sale of the lots in the town of Chicago alone, towards completing the Illinois canal. With these prospects (says the Chicago Democrat) who will longer doubt the utility of at once commencing a ship canal?

Lead mines of Rossie. The vein opened in Rossie within a short time since, is said to be by competent judges the largest yet discovered in America, and the quality of the ore equal, if not superior to the Galena mines. Shares of sixteen, under the lease for ten years, of the one hundred and sixty rods now opened, are selling for twenty thousand dollars; which is supposed to be far short of the actual value. Other lead mines in the same region of country are also about being opened.

Among the passengers who sailed from New York on Monday the 8th inst. in the packet ship Independence, were Mr. Eaton, minister of the United States to Spain, with his wife and child; and Mr. Rush, (formerly secretary of the treasury) who goes out as agent of the United States, under the act of congress concerning the Smithsonian legacy.

Mr. Forrest, the tragedian, came passenger in the ship Poland, which arrived at New York a few days since.

Statistics of prisons. In Sing Sing prison, only 289 out of 842 could read and write tolerably, and but 52 had received a good English education; and 484 had been habitual drunkards, and many had committed their crimes while intoxicated. Of 670 prisoners at Auburn, 3 only had received a collegiate education; 503 had been intemperate, and 400 were committed for crimes perpetrated while under the influence of spirituous liquors. In the Connecticut prison 8 in 100 only, could read, write and cypher, when convicted, and 46 in 100 could read and write; 44 in 100 committed their crimes under the influence of alcohol. Instruction, temperance and industry are found to be the surest preventives of crime."

State of New York. The number of post offices in the state of New York is 1,719. Total amount of postage in the state for the year ending March, 1834, $430,436. There are in the state of New York 56 counties, 788 towns and 9 cities. There are published in the state 253 newspapers, besides magazines. The number of daily papers is 27, viz: In the city of New York 56 papers are published, exclusive of magazines; 15 daily, 10 semi-weekly, 2 tri-weekly, 26 weekly, 1 semi-monthly and 2 monthly. The average circulation of the ten large daily papers is about 1,700 to 17,000 numbers of sheets issued daily. The state owns 663 miles of canal navigation. The amount of canal money held on loan by the banks of this state is $2,356,284. The amount on deposit $791,501. The total canal debt is $3,322,013 dollars; the amount of canal funds in hand $3,406,809; leaving a balance to be reduced by the receipts of future years of $2,915,204. The total capital of rail road companies incorporated previous to the recent session of the legislature, is $3,405,600. (This capital has been immensely increased at the recent session.) The total value of real and personal estate in all the counties of this state is $530,653,524. The total amount of auction duties paid by auctioneers in New York city in 1835 was $270,996. There are 89 banks, with a capital of $31,781,461. (This does not include the banks incorporated at the present session.) In the New York city custom house, there are 81 clerks, 109 inspectors, 11 night watch and 8 boat hands. The total number of arrivals at the port of New York from foreign countries during the year 1835 was 2,044. The present number of whale ships owned by companies in this state is 45. Tonnage over 13,000 tons, employing a capital over $1,200,000, and crews of about 1,000 men. The total value of raw materials used and manufactured in the state during the year 1835, was $43,400,922. The total value of manufactured articles, $60,669,067. The total number of attorneys and counsellors in the state in 1836 is 2,127. [William's Register.]

Canova's statue of Washington. Mr. John Hogan, in a letter dated at Paris, has informed the president of New Orleans

Exchange company, that he has ordered a copy of Canova's statue of Washington to be executed in marble by Raccini, a distinguished artist, and that, when finished, it is to be shipped to New Orleans, to be presented to the company, and placed in the exchange room.

After 30 years' negotiation, a company has been formed at Paris to supply that city with water. The capital is 40 millions of francs.

The great manufacturing town of Manchester, during the last four years, has had an increase of 700 new streets, 7,000 houses and 42,000 inhabitants.

Egyptian enterprise. A Mogul merchant from Egypt has established a steam tow-boat on the Indus, which runs up to Hyderabad, and proves very profitable in towing up rafts laden with merchandise.

The new houses of parliament, it is computed, will cost £800,000.

Great steam enterprise in the Indian seas. The East India company are about to construct two steam ships, each of 200 horse power, to go regularly every month from Bengal to the cape.

A clean people. Over 137 millions of pounds of hard soap are annually made in England; in Scotland but 10 millions.

Telegraphs and steam do away with distance. The vote on the estimates for Algiers in the French chambers, was conveyed in 24 hours from Paris to Toulon by telegraph; and in two days more by steam to Algiers.

Earthquake in Calabria. The Journal des Deux Siciles, by last arrival, gives the details of a tremendous earthquake that in the night of the 24th of April, desolated the district of Rosano in Upper Calabria. The whole of that part of the country, more or less, sustained disasters; but it was felt most severely in the communes of Rossano and Crosia. In the former, the shock was instantaneously followed by the fall of most of the houses; in the latter, not one tenement remained; 192 individuals have perished, and 240 have been severely hurt. The inhabitants of whole communes hastened, with laudable alacrity, with their magistrates and medical men, to the assistance of the inhabitants, and the scene is represented as afflicting in the extreme. The populace and the authorities digging from under the ruins the dead bodies, or those nearly crushed to death, amid the groans of the sufferers—the anxieties—the lamentations—and the despair of those who had escaped, but were seeking for relations or friends, with sincerely a better hope than to receive their last breath. Public charity did all that it could to afford immediate succor to a people suddenly deprived of shelter, raiment and food. The Journal de Naples contains a statement which it thinks, however, may be exaggerated by the natural terrors of the imagination in such a catastrophe—that at the moment the shock was felt, an ignited meteor was seen along the shore of the Calopezzali, in the form of large flaming beams—that long and deep clefts tore up and destroyed the fields—that the sea retired 40 paces on one side, and advanced the same distance on the other—and that on the shore were found volcanic matter, and fish of a species unknown to the fishermen of the country. The same shock was felt at Ginoza, in the province of Otranto, and at Craco, in the province of Basilicata, where some houses were thrown down.

Coal. The Miners Journal says that the report published in a New York paper that the supply of Pennsylvania coal would fall short this year by two hundred thousand tons is incorrect. On the contrary the supply of this year will be an increase of at least one hundred thousand tons above that of the last.

Progress of the arts. The May bug is now becoming an entirely new article of commerce. A society formed for the purpose, at Guedlinbourg, has caught nearly 19,000,000 May bugs to make oil of them. They have already made the attempt in Hungary and obtained three measures of oil, from eight measures of the May bug. They put the insects into earthen pots covered with straw or a tissue of metallic threads, and turn them over upon a heated vessel, which is destined to receive the oil which flows out—this oil is particularly good for greasing wheels. FOREIGN NEWS.

From Liverpool papers to the 20th and London to the 19th July.
GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

The third reading of the established church bill was to come on in the house of commons on the night of the 18th ultimo, when two important amendments were to be moved, and it was thought the bill would pass.

A tremendous storm, attended with hail, thunder and lightning, passed over the eastern part of England on the 12th ultimo, doing immense damage to property.

FRANCE.

Alibeu, who attempted to assassinate Louis Philippe, was executed on the guillotine on the 11th of July. He bore his fate with much firmness. His last words are reported to have been as follows: "I die for the republic. I repeat that I had no accomplices. I am as pure as Brutus and Sancti, and, like them, wished for the liberty of my country."

Great preparations are making in Paris for the celebration of the "three days." The king has signified his determination to be present, notwithstanding the remonstrance of his ministers.

Much excitement was caused in Paris by the trial and conviction of the editor of the Gazette de France, who was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and a fine of 4,000 francs, for publishing an objectionable article, or, as the Gazette says, for defending a principle diametrically opposed to that for which, on the morning of the same day, Alibeu suffered death. The editor maintained that the celebration of the anniversary of the revolution of July was "an act of deep hypocrisy—an attack upon the good sense of the public, and a provocation to moral anarchy, which supports anarchy de facto."

King Louis Philippe had at length consented to advance King Leopold of Belgium the 40,000 pound sterling agreed upon as the marriage portion of the princess Louise of Orleans, now the consort of the king of the Belgians.

ENGLAND AND TURKEY.

The Sultan of Turkey, in consequence of the representations of the English ambassador, in the affair of Mr. Churchill (see page 418) has dismissed the reis effendi, and thus removed all apprehension of difficulty between Great Britain and Turkey.

SPAIN.

Advices from Spain show that the queen's troops have met with some reverses. On the 11th of July, general Evans, at the head of 8,000 troops, attacked Fontarabia, which was stoutly defended by the Carlists, who numbered about 4,000. After meeting with partial success, the British troops were compelled to retreat with considerable loss. Several women were seen, during the engagement, fighting bravely on the side of the Carlists. The accounts from the Asturias were, on the whole, unfavorable to the cause of the queen. Paris papers to the 16th state that the Carlist expedition into the Asturias was making unchecked progress.

Some further cruelties of the ruffian Carlos are mentioned in the Piarré de Bayonne; fifty persons seized by him, upon the slightest possible pretext, were lately drawn from their prisons at Mondragon, and marched on Oñate. Three of the prisoners were shot during the march, before the eyes of their unhappy comrades; one, a gentleman who had neglected to take the place of his son accused of desertion; another, a physician of 80 years of age, M. Manzanares, who was shot at his own door at Escoriaza, and his crime seems to have been, that his son had been the constitutional minister at Cadiz, in 1823.

DEPOSITES WITH STATES.

The forms adopted by the treasury department in respect to this subject, are published below for general information.

No. 1. Letter to the governor of each state.

Treasury department, June 1836.

SIR: The congress of the United States recently passed an act in relation to the public money, a copy of which is inclosed.

You will perceive what is provided by the 13th section of it, in respect to the course of this department and the several states in the union, concerning all the money in the treasury over five millions of dollars.

The object of this communication is to invite your official attention to the subject of that section, so far as it is connected with the power and interests of the state over which you preside. The time and manner of acting in the matter, belong of course to the consideration of yourself and the other proper state authorities; and this department would entirely forbear from any suggestions in relation to them, except the expression of an earnest desire, arising from public considerations of convenience to the fiscal operations of the treasury, that whenever the final action of your state shall be had on the subject, the result may be communicated to this department at as early a day as may be found practicable. With high respect, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the treasury.

INDIAN WAR.

The Tallahassee Floridian of the 30th ult. says that the Georgia volunteers had a sharp encounter with a body of four or five hundred hostile Indians who had crossed the Chattahoochee, near McCrary's ferry, on their way to Florida. There was some loss in killed and wounded on both sides—among the slain, it is reported, was capt. Jernigan who recently distinguished himself. The Georgia volunteers had been re-enforced and were in pursuit of the enemy at the last accounts. Two armed steam boats had been despatched up the river to prevent the return of the Indians.

Duncanville, August 2.

To his excellency, gov. Call:

Sir: Your letter, enclosing an express from G. H. Crossman, A. Q. M. U. S. army, was handed to me by Mr. Max Yandy, about 11 o'clock, A. M. on Saturday last. The express being indefinite as to the position of the Indians, and the force in pursuit of them, it was deemed best to gain farther information before we proceeded. Messrs. Fabian Adams and William Brinson very generously volunteered their services to go to Flint river, and obtain the latest and most direct information.

Upon their arrival there they met with maj. Hoxey, who gave them the following intelligence: The number of Indians was supposed to be about 150 warriors, and the like number of women and children. The whites had had four engagements with them, with the following results: On Sunday, nine Indians killed; on Monday two whites, the number of Indians not known; on Tuesday, two whites killed, the number of Indians not known; on Wednesday, 14 Indians killed, 20 horses taken, and the Indians completely routed. In the four engagements between fifty and sixty Indians are supposed to have been killed, and twelve white men. The battles were fought in Stuart and the upper part of Lee county. Major Hoxey had received no intelligence of them since Wednesday last, then major general Sanford was in pursuit of them. Major Hoxey has five companies stationed between Flint river and the Chickasahatchee, for the purpose of intercepting the Indians, and preventing their escape to Florida. He will stay there until that party are all destroyed. Should they evade him, and pass the river, upon information of the fact he will immediately pursue them. I will immediately communicate to your excellency all the intelligence I receive.

Yours, respectfully, THOMAS E. BLACKSHEAR.

"Tallahassee, (Fla.) Aug. 2.

"A small party of Indians, say 30 to 55, made their appearance on the Ocella, about 41 miles from this place, more or less, last week, killed two men, took off a boy about 12 or 14 years old, and burnt a house. It is also said they took off a female, the lady of the house. Capt. Fisher's company, stationed at Gamble's plantation, went in pursuit of them, and succeeded in rescuing the boy and recovering the spoils. They fled into a neighboring hammock."

It is stated that the government is endeavoring to make an arrangement with the friendly Indians on the Georgia frontier, to enter the service of the United States in the approaching campaign against the Seminoles.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT STATE PAPER.

From the Nashville Republican, Aug. 6.

General Gaines's requisition. We delay the publication of our paper to a later hour than usual, for the purpose of laying before the public the following documents, with which we have been furnished by the governor:

War department, May 4, 1836.

SIR: Major general Gaines, to whom the command of the western border of Louisiana has been assigned, has notified this department that he has called upon your excellency for a brigade of militia, the whole, or as many of them as practicable, to be mounted.

I am instructed by the president to request your excellency to call into the service of the United States the number of militia which have been or may be required by general Gaines, to serve not less than three months after their arrival at the places of rendezvous, unless sooner discharged. Very respectfully, your obt' servant, LEWIS CASS.

His excellency N. Cannon, governor of Tennessee, &c.

War department, July 25, 1836.

SIR: Major general Gaines has apprised this department that he has made a requisition upon your excellency for a regiment of mounted gun-men for the service of the United States.

Copies of the despatches received from general Gaines have been transmitted to the president of the United States, who will issue such orders upon them as he may think the circumstances require. Meantime I have the honor to inform you that, in order to prevent any inconvenience or delay, in the event of the confirmation of general Gaines's requisition by the president, a disbursing officer will be ordered to proceed to the state of Tennessee with the necessary funds. Very respectfully, your most obt' servant,

C. A. HARRIS, acting secretary of war.

His excellency N. Cannon, governor, &c.

The above letters from the war department having been inclosed to the president by the governor, the following was received in answer:

Hermitage, Aug 6, 1836.

SIR: I have received your letters of the 29th ult. and the 4th inst. accompanied by the copies of communications which were addressed to you on the 4th of May, and the 25th July, by the secretary of war, and also accompanied by your proclamation of the 20th, founded on the requisition made by general Gaines, bearing date the 20th of June last. The documents referred to in the communication to you of the 25th ult. from the war department, have not yet been received.

The obligations of our treaty with Mexico, as well as the general principles which govern our intercourse with foreign powers, require us to maintain a strict neutrality in the contest which now agitates a portion of that republic. So long as Mexico fulfils her duties to us as they are defined by the treaty, and violates none of the rights which are secured by it to our citizens, any act on the part of the government of the U. States, which would tend to foster a spirit of resistance to the government and laws, whatever may be their character or form, when administered within her own limits and jurisdiction, would be unauthorized and highly improper. A scrupulous sense of these obligations has prevented me thus far from doing any thing which can authorize the suspicion that our government is mindful of them, and I hope to be equally cautious and circumspect in all my future conduct. It is in reference to these obligations that the requisition of general Gaines in the present instance must be considered; and unless there is a strong necessity for it, it should not be sanctioned. Should this necessity not be manifest, when it is well known that the disposition to befriend the Texans is a common feeling with the citizens of the United States, it is obvious that that requisition may furnish a reason to Mexico for supposing that the government of the United States may be induced, by inadequate causes, to overstep the lines of the neutrality which it professes to maintain.

Before I left Washington, general Gaines intimated to the department of war that some indications of hostilities from the Indians on our western frontier had been made, and that, if it became necessary, he would make a call for the militia. He had also informed the department of his ill health, and asked for a furlough to enable him to visit the White Sulphur Springs. I directed the secretary of war to grant him the furlough, and to inform him of the apportionment which had been made of the 10,000 militia under the recent volunteer act; and if the emergency should arise which would make it necessary to increase the force under his command, that a thousand volunteers in Arkansas, and another in Missouri, raised agreeably to this act, would be enrolled and held ready for the service. This force, aided by the portions of the dragoon regiments that would be stationed in that quarter, and those of the regular army already there, were deemed amply sufficient for the protection of the frontier near to the Indians referred to. There are no reasons set forth in the requisition which the general has since made upon you, to justify the belief that the force above enumerated will be insufficient, and I cannot therefore sanction it at the present time. To sanction that requisition for the reasons which accompany it, would warrant the belief that it was done to aid Texas, and not from a desire to prevent an infringement of our territorial or national rights.

I deeply regret that the Tennessee volunteers, whose prowess and patriotism are displayed so promptly on all occasions that threaten the peace or safety of their beloved country, have been called out on this occasion without proper consideration. They can for the present only be mustered into the service and discharged. If there are funds appropriated out of which they can be paid, an order to this effect will be given.

The ten thousand volunteers authorised under the late act of congress are intended for one year's service, and must be employed to meet all necessary calls for the defence of our frontier borders. Should the occasion arise for a greater number on the western frontier, the call would be made on Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois. There is, however, no information to justify the apprehension of hostilities, to any serious extent, from the western Indians. Should a necessity arise, the volunteer brigade from East Tennessee will be ordered to the western frontier as soon as their service can be dispensed with where they now are employed.

I would barely add further, that the authority given you by the order of the 4th of May having been satisfied by yielding to the requisition of gen. Gaines, a new authority from the department of war was necessary to authorise you to comply with that of the 28th of June. The government of the United States having adopted, in regard to Mexico and Texas, the same rule of neutrality which had been observed in all similar cases before, it was not to have been expected that general Gaines should have based this requisition for additional military force on reasons plainly inconsistent with the obligation of that rule.

Should Mexico insult our national flag, or invade our territory, or interrupt our citizens in the lawful pursuits guaranteed to them by the treaty, then the government will promptly repel the insult, and take speedy reparation for the injury. But it does not seem that offences of this character have been committed by Mexico, or were believed to have been by general Gaines. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

His excellency N. Cannon, governor of Tennessee.

P. S. Before closing this letter, the documents referred to by the acting secretary of war as having been transmitted to me, have been received.

A. J.

KENTUCKY VOLUNTEERS.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Lexington, August 11, 1836.

It is my painful duty to announce to the volunteers of Kentucky, that the requisition made by gen. Gaines, has been annulled by the president of the United States, so far as relates to the troops from Tennessee; and, although I have not been officially informed of the fact, so far, also, I have no doubt, as relates to the troops from this state.

The rendezvous of the troops under my command is, therefore, suspended until further orders.

LESLIE COMBS, comd. K. V. M. G.

Louisville, Ky. 18th Aug. 1836.

COLONEL: I enclose you herewith a slip from the office of the Louisville Gazette, containing a letter from the president of the United States to the governor of Tennessee, disapproving the requisition of gen. Gaines for volunteers, at this time. The president's letter arrived here just in time to prevent my making engagements for transportation and supplies for the regiment, required from this state, to any great extent. It appears to me that it would subject the volunteers to additional expense to rendezvous at all after this letter. At all events, I would advise that it be delayed until an officer is sent on with funds to pay them off. I am, very respectfully, your obedt. servt.

J. B. DUSENBERRY, asst. Q. mast. U. S. A.

LATEST FROM TEXAS AND MEXICO.

From the Louisiana Advertiser, Aug. 2.

By the arrival of the schooner Indiana, captain Rantford, in five days from Tampico, we learn that 1,800 men were on the eve of marching from that place for Matamoras; 4,000 more were said to be on their march from San Luis, for the same destination. It appears that the main body of the army are about to rendezvous at Matamoras, previous to marching against Texas. Gen. Fernandez is to act second in command of the Mexican army under gen. Urrea. Captain R. contradicts the report that the Mexicans are indifferent about the prosecution of the war in Texas; on the contrary, he states that nothing can exceed the military enthusiasm that seems to pervade all classes, almost causing a general suspension of business, and naught else was talked of but war.

We are indebted to capt. Bridges, of the schooner Urchin, for the annexed:

Galveston Bay, July 21.

SIR: I arrived here on the 17th, after a passage of four days, and was conveyed down by the Independence, com. Hawkins, off the bar of Galveston. I saw the Texian schooner Brutus and brig Durango. I could not learn that the Mexicans had a single armed vessel at sea; the schooners Invincible, captain Brown, and Terrible, (formerly the Union), captain Allen, have gone on a cruise along the coast of Mexico. The Mexican army (about 3,000) are still at San Patricio, 125 miles from Victoria, where they concentrated after the battle of San Jacinto; they have made no movement since. It is reported that 500 troops are at Matamoras; but as they apprehend an attack on that place by the Texian army, they are somewhat certain to remain there. Our army (200 infantry and 500 cavalry) are at Victoria; the cavalry made an excursion a few days ago to the immediate vicinity of the Mexican encampment, and brought off a few prisoners. The cabinet is at Velasco, but expect to remove to Matagorda. Santa Ana and Almonte are yet at Columbia, with the army; and rumor has it that Santa Ana is to be tried. Gen. Coss and the other officers are at Galveston island. It is supposed that our army will, in three weeks, amount to 3,500 men. Col. Crockett's nephew has just arrived here; he left the colonel's son, with 200 men, a short distance from the army. As soon as the reinforcements now on their way arrive, it is expected they, with the troops here, will march to and attack Matamoras.

From the New Orleans Bee, Aug. 1.

FROM MEXICO. Our regular file of papers from the city of Mexico are to the 7th ultimo, but contain nothing of importance; they are silent upon political movements. By the arrival of the schooner Indiana, from Tampico, we are alike deficient of political information; it would appear as though the papers were wilfully ignorant of any thing going on in the country. These papers are the organs of government, and of course say nothing of the political movement.

From Matamoras, by the schooner Water Witch, capt. Watkins, we have received our regular file of papers. The papers contain nothing positive: all is vague and uncertain as to the situation of affairs in the country. Troops to the amount of 4,000 men are at Matamoras under general Urrea, awaiting information of the arrival of a small blockading squadron that has sailed for the purpose of blockading the port of Galveston, intending to take up his line of march for the interior of Texas as soon as the plan is matured. The troops are said to be in good spirits, and anxious to march to revenge the defeat of their brethren under Santa Ana. Five chiefs of the Cherokee Indians were at Matamoras, and had offered their services to the commandant of the Mexican forces, who, it is said, has accepted them; the warriors were to march immediately to join the army.

The schooner Halcyon, at Matamoras, was to sail in a few days for this port, with about $200,000 on board.

Both the Mexican and Tampico papers appear to have agreed to represent every thing as peaceable and quiet in the city of Mexico, as well as in the different states. A circular has been issued from the government calling for immediate aid, of money and reinforcements from all the states, to be sent against Texas. The "De Diario" of the 4th ult. contains a proclamation of the commandant of Oajaca, addressed to the troops of the garrison, recommending them to unite their force to repulse any edition that may arise. This proclamation is dated on the 23d June. At Guadalajara, the same step has been taken to arrest the plans of revolt that are constantly projected.

From the New Orleans Bee, Aug. 3.

MEXICO. The schooner Creole from Tampico, whence she sailed on the 26th ultimo, was towed up yesterday. Among the passengers on board is the American consul for the port of Tampico, who gave us the verbal information that, at the time of his departure, every thing was quiet at Tampico. A single point attracted the public attention; it was the expedition against Texas, talked of by the whole people. Our next number will probably contain some further news. The amount of specie on board the Creole is $30,000.

From the New Orleans Bee, July 30.

We think the following official documents relative to the treaty for a suspension of arms between Santa Ana's troops and the Texian army will appear interesting to most of our readers:

General government, war and navy department, central section—army of operations,

GENERAL: I transmit you the treaty I have concluded with his excellency David G. Barnett, president of the republic of Texas. It is my wish that you thoroughly acquaint yourself with its contents, and hasten to put it into execution. Any measure or remonstrance, the object of which would be to break it, is entirely useless. I trust your excellency will answer me by the return of the express. God and liberty. I have the honor to be, &c.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA.

To his excellency general Don Vicente Filasola.

Articles of the treaty concluded between his excellency Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, general-in-chief of the army of operations, president of the Mexican republic, on the one part, and his excellency Don David G. Burnet, president of the republic of Texas, on the other part.

Art. 1. General Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana agrees not to bear arms, nor engage any individual to take them against the people of Texas, in the present struggle for independence.

Art. 2. Hostilities, both at sea and on land, will immediately cease between the Mexican and Texian troops.

Art. 3. The Mexican forces will evacuate the Texian territory and recross the Rio Grande.

Art. 4. The Mexican army, in their retreat, will use no man's property without his consent, and a proper indemnity; the soldiers will take but the necessities of life when the owners will not be found on the premises; and a correct account, stating the value of the articles taken, the place and name of the owner, when known, will be handed to the general of the Texian army, or the commissioners, whose duty it shall be to settle and receive payment.

Art. 5. All personal property, including horned cattle, horses, negro slaves, or any other goods and chattels taken by the Mexican army, or by divisions, or which may have found a refuge with said army from the first invasion, will be restored and delivered to the commanding officer of the Texian forces, or to such person as may be appointed by the Texian government.

Art. 6. The troops of both armies are no more to come in contact with each other; the Texian general will, therefore, take care to keep between the encampments a distance not less than five leagues.

Art. 7. The Mexican army will not halt in their retreat, but to provide for their sick, for their equipments, &c. and to cross or ford rivers; any other halt not justified by any plausible motive of necessity shall be considered an infraction to the dispositions of the present treaty.

Art. 8. The present treaty shall be transmitted with all possible expedition by an extraordinary express to generals Don Vicente Filasola and T. J. Rusk, in order that they accomplish what is prescribed to them, and agree together on what must be done to execute the present stipulations in the shortest delay.

Art. 9. Every Texian prisoner now in the power of the Mexican army, or of any of the Mexican authorities, shall be immediately set at liberty, and furnished with passports to go back to their homes. The government of Texas shall, on their part, set at liberty an equal number of Mexicans, of the same rank and grade, and treat the remaining Mexican prisoners of war with the greatest humanity; the cost of their maintenance being supported by the Mexican government when any extra comforts will be allowed to them.

Art. 10. General Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana shall be sent to Vera Cruz as early as the Texian government may think proper.

And in order that each of the clauses herein specified may be fully executed, the present treaty has been in duplicates by the contracting parties, at the port of Velasco, May 4th, 1836.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA,
DAVID G. BURNET,
J. CALLENS,
LECCETAS OF HALS,
VACLUS HARDENAN,
JECY IRAXURURY,
P. H. GRAZCON,
MARTINES UNECAS.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: As I was ready to march forward at the head of the army I command, I received your communication, with the treaty concluded between your excellency and the general of the Texian forces. Had it not been for the arrival of these documents, I should have continued to execute the preceding orders I had officially received from your excellency. It becomes now my duty to take every necessary measure to carry your last instructions into execution. Any delay on my part will only be occasioned by the necessity of transporting those of my men who are sick; my field equipments and other stores, as is provided for in the treaty. This convention being duly drawn with all formalities, and bearing the signature and ratification of your excellency, as general-in-chief of the army of operations, which, jointly with your quality of president of the Mexican republic, leave me neither right nor faculty of resisting your orders, my duty is to obey, and promptly put them in execution. Such has hitherto been my conduct since the beginning of the campaign. I shall religiously observe all the clauses, such as the respect for private property, the exchange of prisoners, and the paying for every article of food or provisions delivered to the army.

In the second place, and in conformity with the stipulations of the treaty, I shall agree with the general commanding the Texian forces, as to our joint execution of the convention, and as to any necessary claims, under all circumstances. God and liberty.

VICENTE FILASOLA.

To his ex'cy Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, president of the republic of Mexico.

On the borders of the stream del Mugerero, on the 26th of May, appeared under the tent of his excellency Vicente Filasola, general-in-chief of the Mexican army of operations, col. Benjamin Smith and captain Henry Telz, of the Texian army, who handed to said general Filasola a document directed to him by his excellency Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, president of the republic; and said colonel Smith having exposed he came fully authorised, as appeared by his credentials, signed by general Thomas J. Rusk, in order to ratify in his name the treaty of a cessation of arms, concluded between general Santa Ana and the Texian government, on the 14th of May, and also to put in execution the stipulations of the aforesaid treaty.

In consequence, general Filasola, after perusing said documents, appointed to examine and verify them gen. Don Eugenio Folsa and col. Don Agustin Amat, of the Mexican army, who accomplished the object of their mission, and acquainted his excellency with the result; thereupon, general Filasola having made up his mind, under these circumstances, determined to act in conformity with every thing relating to the army of operations, in the 10th section of the treaty, and in the same manner as the general of the Texian forces would do.

The contracting parties agreed that, on the part of general Rusk, there should be appointed several commissioners, who should follow the Mexican army at such a distance that they could be perfectly acquainted with every occurrence, and every just claim foreseen by the several articles of the treaty, and therein mentioned; and for this object any thing they may want from the army of operations will be granted to them.

And to give full power to this understanding, the contracting parties agree to sign the present document by duplicates, with the commissioners from both armies.

Head quarters, stream del Mugerero, May 26, 1836.

EUGENIO FOLSA,
HENRY TELZ,
AGUSTIN AMAT,
BENJAMIN SMITH,
VICENTE NEUCES.

Rio de las Neuces, May 31, 1836.

Secretary of war and navy, centre section—first division.

GENERAL: I made known to his excellency the president per interim, your communication, dated Right Shore of Rio de las Neuces, 31st ultimo: in answer to which, I have to inform you, agreeably to the supreme orders I have received, that the whole of this communication has been looked upon with the greatest indignation.

Your excellency will have to answer for the serious offences you have committed, in not adhering to points which the supreme congress ordered you to maintain, cost what they might; from that moment a serious charge lies on you for having forgotten the dispositions of art. 2, title 3, chap. 7, of the military ordinance, which invested you with the command of the army; in no light whatever ought you to have considered that the general-in-chief was in full exercise of his functions while in captivity. And had he even been at the head of the executive power, no order emanating from him carried with it obedience, unless counter-signed by the secretary of the department from whence it would have emanated. The president per interim is greatly surprised that you could have accepted such conditions as common sense alone rejects, and which only could have been adopted through the grossest ignorance of the dispositions of our military laws, and particularly the circumstances under which the executive power is executed in a republic like ours.

Consequently the president per interim condemns all the stipulations of the convention signed at Velasco the 14th of May, 1836, because the general who signed it had neither the power nor the authority to do so; he more particularly condemns as a contempt of the rights of nations, all that part of the concordat which grants the title of republic to a portion of one of the revolted states of the Mexican confederation, and the title of president to the chief of those bandits.

The president per interim concludes by requesting you, if you have not already done so, to remit immediately the command of the army unto general Don Jose Urrea, and that you repair, without delay, to this capital, and there answer for your conduct before the tribunals of your country.

God and liberty. TORNEL.
To his ex'c. the general-in-chief of division, Don Vicente Filasola.

BATTLE OF WE-LI-KA POND.

From the Washington Globe.

We publish the official report of the battle of We-li-ka Pond near Micanopy, received yesterday at the adjutant general's office, being a copy of lieutenant Maitland's (3d artillery) report, forwarded by him to the governor of Florida.

Fort Defiance, Micanopy, 18th July, 1836.

SIR: In obedience to your instructions to evacuate the post of Fort Drane, if the commanding officer, in exercising a sound discretion, should deem it necessary, I have the honor to report that the commanding officer, captain Merchant of the 2d regiment of artillery, in consequence of the large and increasing sick report, determined to remove the troops to this place. The movement commenced this day at eight o'clock, consisting of twenty-two wagons, loaded with commissary and quartermaster's stores, with an escort of a detachment of twenty-six dragoons of the 2d regiment, under the command of captain Ashby, and thirty-six men detailed from the different artillery companies at the post; also a five and a half inch howitzer, under the charge of lieutenant Whitby, 2d artillery, making a force of 63 men. On our arrival at the We-li-ka Pond, within one mile of this place, the discharge of several rifles apprised us of the presence of the enemy. Capt. Ashby immediately went with his dragoons in the direction from which the fire was discovered, and scoured the neighboring hammocks, without finding the enemy. It is proper to state here, that in the first fire private Holmes of the dragoons, was dangerously wounded in the abdomen, (since dead). Proceeding on our route opposite a long hammock, within a quarter of a mile of Micanopy, we were attacked by a body of Indians estimated from what we saw of them, and from their firing, to be about 250 strong. The firing commenced near the front and on the right of the trail, and was continued through its whole length, a quarter of a mile. The men returned the fire with spirit and promptness. During the engagement, capt. Ashby, who I regret to say, was soon after the commencement of it, severely wounded, but refused to leave the field until loss of blood compelled him, finding the enemy in great strength, and pressing on us, despatched a dragoon to this place for a reinforcement. On his way he met two detachments under lieutenants Temple and Talcott, 31 strong, on their march to assist us.

They arrived at an important moment, and did us good service. Lieutenant Temple reached us, having scoured, on his approach, a point of hammock from which the enemy had very much annoyed us. As soon as lieutenant Temple and his command had taken their position in line, captain Ashby ordered a charge in the hammock, which was instantly executed, and the Indians driven beyond the reach of our fire. During this time lieut. Talcott was actively employed in removing the wagons in their direction to this place.

Of the good conduct and courage of the troops, it is sufficient to say that every man did his duty.

My gallant commander, captain Ashby, distinguished himself by his courage and activity, and did not leave the field, even after receiving a severe wound, until feebleness, from loss of blood, made it absolutely necessary.

First lieut. Temple, 3d artillery, rendered the most essential service, by his timely arrival from Fort Defiance, and the gallant manner in which he charged the hammock. Lieut. Whitney, who had charge of the howitzer, served it in the most efficient manner; and from the prominent position, was a mark for the enemy, which drew a sharp fire on him, and disabled several of his men.

We regret to say assistant surgeon Weightman received a severe wound in his left thigh.

Sergeants Smith Johnson, of company D, 2d dragoons; Smith, company F, 1st artillery; Hall, company I, 3d artillery; Paterson, company I, 3d artillery; Baydon, company H, 3d artillery; all distinguished themselves by their courage and good conduct in discharging the duties that devolved on them.

Report of the killed and wounded at the battle of We-li-ka, East Florida, 19th July, 1836.

Dangerously wounded.....	5 (two since dead).
Severely do.....	5
Slightly do.....	1

Total.....11

From our well directed fire we no doubt killed and disabled many of the enemy; but as is usual, they carry them off to the dense hammock to which they retreated.

We had three horses killed in the field, and several severely wounded.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. S. MAITLAND. 1st Lieutenant commanding.
General R. Jones, adj. gen. U. S. army, Washington.

FROM BARBADOES.

From the N. Y. Star.

We have received through a friend, files from Barbadoes to July 18th inclusive. Information received there from St. Kitts, states that the troops at that place are suffering much from fever, which has proved fatal to many of them, especially to the Europeans, as usual.

The previous accounts published of the successful working of the apprenticeship system at Demerara, appear to have been entirely erroneous.

At the southern estate of district E, there was lately a serious strike on the part of the slaves, who rebelled against the manager and the magistrate, and fled to the bush, where they built houses, but where finally captured, after a severe action, by the constabulary force. Nine out of the thirty-seven received corporal punishment as ring-leaders.

In consequence of certain legislative acts of St. Kitts, assuming a responsibility over the parliament at home, by fettering the abolition bill with compulsory transmigration, emigration of white laborers into Demerara has received a considerable check. By the Demerara Gazette of June 30th, we learn that in consequence of the above acts four vessels had left there for the purpose of conveying laborers thither from the poorer islands.

The steamboats Dee and Columbia, now perform their trips regularly between Barbadoes and Jamaica.

His majesty's brig Harpy, which arrived at Bridgetown, Barbadoes, from Trinidad, July 16th, with the loss of her foretopmast from a heavy sea, brought £13,000 in donblons for the commissariat.

The Bridgetown West Indian, speaking of the abstraction of white laborers for the supply of Demerara says:

"The number of laborers abstracted from St. Kitts by fair or foul play, we have not the means of ascertaining, but 395 have been brought here on their way to Demerara. This, it appears, as one of the "poorer" islands is now called on for its quota of laborers to till the "splendid" mud of Demerara. We can well afford to spare not 150 to 200, but 15,000 to 20,000, provided they are taken away in families. But we do hope the legislature will interfere and prevent any able bodied person from leaving this island until he gives security, that his family shall not become a burthen to the community. Our friends in the land of mud will not think us unreasonable in demanding this.

THE FATHER OF THE CONSTITUTION.

MR. MACFARLAND'S ORATION.

Richmond, July 26, 1836.

DEAR SIR: I am desired by the committee, who were "charged with making arrangements for the funeral solemnities of Mr. Madison," to request you to add to the favor already conferred, by furnishing at your convenience, a copy of the oration you delivered yesterday, for the purpose of having it printed. Very respectfully,

JOHN BROCKENBROUGH.

To William H. Macfarland, esq.

Richmond, August 1, 1836.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, on behalf of the committee, I submit to your disposal, a copy of the address, prepared at the request of a meeting of the citizens, on the occasion of the death of Mr. Madison. It was prepared on short notice, and under perpetual interruptions, and is, I am very sensible, imperfect—but the circumstances to which I refer will, I hope, be allowed as some excuse. Very respectfully,

WM. H. MACFARLAND.

Dr. John Brockenbrough.

FELLOW CITIZENS: When death removes some cherished friend, it is a pleasure to the survivors to dwell upon the memory of what he was, and the ties that bound them; to call to recollection the various graces of mind and person, which won esteem and admiration; and to speak the praises of the deceased to those who honored him for his virtues, and are sorrowing that they shall see his face no more. It is indeed a mournful pleasure, and serves to awaken a deeper and more afflicting sense of bereavement; but the heart of sensibility and devoted attachment is relieved by its own wailings, and finds solace in ingenious grief.

This, which is the sad privilege of the bereaved, when death invades the small circle of personal friendship, and removes some devoted object, becomes, in some degree, the nation, when the victim is the nation's ornament and benefactor. The solemn occasion deserves to be marked by every circumstance of affecting and impressive ceremony. When the father of his country dies, his country should be a mourner at his tomb—and tell the good he did, the evil he prevented—the multiplied blessing derived from a devoted and well spent life.

The desire to live in the memory of those who are to succeed us, is natural to the human soul; and stronger always with men of generous and elevated views. Urged by that feeling, and yielding obedience to the dictates of their own conscience, which with such men is above all other influence, they are as ready to oppose as to honor the impressions of the day, and fearlessly encounter the clamors of passion and prejudice, content to place their vindication on the issue and leave the award to posterity. Their vision is on the future—and whatever be the trials that await them, they expect a sweet return for all, in the thankfulness of those who reap the rich reward of their labor and privations.

It was the happy fortune of the illustrious man, whose services and virtues we this day commemorate, to hear the sentence of his country upon his public life, whilst he yet stood among the generations which he blessed. The voice of congratulation, which never failed of a cheerful audience, as oft and again his countrymen strove to do him homage, bore unerring testimony that the great results to which his life had been devoted, were accomplished, and found worthy the wisdom which designed them.

It is an occasion for devout thanksgiving to the Almighty Disposer of Events, that so many of the men of the revolution, and of the era not less eventful, which immediately succeeded it, lived to behold the full maturity of the new system. Who does not own the mercy of God, in thus sparing them, to witness the triumphant success of the bold innovation, which through years of perplexity and danger, they toiled to mature? More favored than the holy deliverer of captive Israel, they went to their rest in the land of their hopes and affections, leaving it united and prosperous without example. Nor can we fail to perceive other considerations for thanksgiving in the length of days which a kind Providence bestowed upon them. Spared until time, which tests the wisdom of all human contrivances, had placed its seal upon their great scheme for man's melioration, thenceforth the charge of defending and preserving it devolved upon the generation whose inheritance it was. And now or hereafter, to permit it to snuff violence or decay, would be sad folly and the worst ingratitude.

I could have wished that you had selected some one more familiar with the details of the public and private history of our venerable Madison, and endowed with eloquence worthy the occasion, to pronounce his eulogy. His fame is above all general and vague declamation. To do justice to his exalted character, and comprehend to the full extent his claims to the lasting and grateful remembrance of his country, the civil history through a long period must be attentively examined.

It is only by tracing the progress and attending to the formidable obstacles, which opposed the introduction of our wise system of government, that a correct idea can be had of the peculiar difficulties and embarrassments of its authors and early advocates, and the patience, resolution and address which the circumstances demanded. Not only were the subjects new, and the most important that could be submitted to man's judgment; but the position of those to whom they were referred, and who were called upon to institute a new system of civil polity, was without a parallel. And to add to the sources of perplexity and anxious solicitude, the public mind was inflamed and agitated by the questions which grew out of the novel and extraordinary condition of the country. But neither the extrinsic difficulties, nor the perplexity and embarrassments which belonged to the arduous undertaking of constructing anew the "solid edifice of social order and civil and religious freedom," disturbed the constancy or diminished the noble ardor of those to whom it was committed to embody, in enduring forms, the principles of the revolution. And we who are now assembled to pay the last honors to the patriot statesman, enjoy the consolation of knowing, that his name is identified with the rise and maturity of our institutions and civil polity.

The occasion does not admit of the minute historical review, which, as I have said, would alone suffice to do justice to the memory of Madison. Nor would I, if time had been afforded, presumptuously enter upon a task, for which eloquence and comprehension not unlike his own would alone be adequate. There is in truth now no need of such an effort. The solemn observances and the public assembly of the day eloquently express the vivid remembrance yet retained of his invaluable services and devoted life. It was fit it should be so.

The interval between 1783, when peace was declared, and 1788, when the federal constitution was finally ratified, was a period of fearful interest. During the war, the sense of common danger and a common object, made up in some degree for the want of energy and decision in the confederate government; but upon the restoration of peace, the imbecility of the system soon became apparent. The government had contracted large debts, and, to meet the just demands of the public creditors, had to rely upon the tardy and uncertain contributions of the states. The long continuance of the war had impoverished the country, and the people, who had looked forward to the cessation of hostilities as the commencement of unrivalled prosperity, were clamorous and impatient under the privations which they continued to experience. The government was reproached with disregarding the public faith, and the violation of solemn engagements. Among others who complained of injustice, were the officers and soldiers of the army, whose claims were as meritorious as the assurances upon which they relied had been repeated and explicit. It was indispensable to the preservation of the union and the national character, that congress should be invested with the authority to ordain commercial regulations, and effectually to represent the nation in its new relations with foreign countries. But the confederation was viewed with jealousy, and strong repugnance was avowed to the delegation of powers which might render it independent of the states. In fine, the government possessed neither authority to command obedience, nor was the object of such general favor and good will as might serve to conceal its impotency. The country appeared to be verging rapidly to a crisis, and in the full and undisputed enjoyment of independence, its condition seemed more discouraging and desperate than in the most gloomy and disastrous moments of the war.

The frightful ills to which it was exposed, impressed the leading men of that epoch with an anxious and fearful sense of the necessity for reforming the government in those particulars in which it was perceived to be fatally defective; and, as might have been expected by such men, with their impressions of the public exigencies, they sought the situations in which they could be most useful. Hence the congress of 1783, was of unusual ability.

Mr. Madison was a member of that congress. He had been a member of the two preceding; and though but a young man, had acquired an influence, which nothing but great abilities and the purest integrity could have conferred. No better evidence could be desired, of the high consideration in which he was held by the congress of '83, than the fact of his being placed at the head of the committee, of which the other members were Hamilton and Ellsworth, to prepare an address, recommending to the several states, to vest in congress permanent funds, adequate to the payment of the interest and final redemption of the public debt, and to consent to charge the mode for ascertaining the proportions in which they were to contribute.

The obvious policy—nay, justice of the measure proposed, was such that it is not easy at this day to imagine the reasons upon which it could be resisted; yet it gave rise to a protracted debate, and encountered strong and earnest opposition. That Madison was selected with two others so distinguished, to prepare an address invoking the acquiescence of the states in a measure to restore and support public credit, is evidence that the issue of the appeal was uncertain, and that great reliance was placed upon his weight of character. The address which, as chairman of the committee, he prepared and reported, was worthy the reputation of the distinguished body from which it emanated, and marked by that fervid public spirit which led the author to regard the good faith and honor of the government with the care with which he preserved his own.

In his "paternal and affectionate letter" of the 8th of June, '83, to the governors of the several states, George Washington, with special commendation, referred to the "dignity and energy" of the address, and, with an energy and dignity peculiarly his own, enforced the obligation of "faithful and pointed attention" to the several duties indicated by the crisis.

The occasion does not admit of an inquiry into the objections alleged against the plan recommended by congress, and which defeated an arrangement sustained by more than parental authority. That and other considerations of interest belonging to the era, and which it will be the pleasing duty of the biographer of Madison to notice, as illustrating the beneficent influence which he exerted over public measures, must be passed over as excluded by the limits to be observed in this address. It will suffice to say, that having applied himself to the maintenance of the credit of the government and of domestic tranquility, and having had the rare fortune to attract the special commendation of the father of his country, he was not to be diverted from his course by the variety and magnitude of the opposing obstacles.

Leaving congress, of which, by a provision in the confederation, he could not be a member for more than three years out of six, Mr. Madison, (who had belonged to the body at a still earlier period), was returned to the legislature as a member of the house of delegates. The theatre of his exertions was changed—but his was that capacious and Catholic public spirit, which is incapable of overlooking the welfare of the whole, whilst occupied in the cares and interests of a part. Careful that nothing should be omitted which belonged to the legislation of his own state, he was no less careful to seize—nay, to make the opportunity of efficient action in behalf of the union.

In January, 1788, the Virginia assembly passed a resolution respecting trade and commercial relations, and appointed commissioners to meet such as might be appointed by the other states, to take into consideration the important subject, and report an uniform system. Mr. Madison, to whom belongs the distinction of being the patron of the measure, was one of the commissioners of this commonwealth. And a resolution, (as the signal disclosed), which in its terms looked not beyond the commercial arrangements, was the harbinger of our now cherished national government, and may be regarded as its origin—so that Madison was connected with the earliest inception, as he was confederally with all the later stages in the great movement, which reached its consummation in that wisest and best of human productions, the American constitution.

The commissioners, consisting of a delegation from five states only, executed their responsible trust by adopting an address, recommending a radical revision of the federal system in general convention. The Virginia assembly was the first to approve the measure, so auspicious of peace, union and energy in the administration of the government—and the first, therefore, to repel the trans-Atlantic imputation, "leave them to themselves, and their government will soon dissolve." Mr. Madison hastened to announce the resolution providing for a general convention, and the unanimity with which it was adopted, to general Washington; and added, "it has been thought advisable to give this subject a very solemn dress, and all the weight which could be derived from a single state. This idea will also be pursued in the selection of characters to represent Virginia in the federal convention. You will infer our earnestness on this point from the liberty which will be used of placing your name at the head of them."

We are brought by our rapid retrospect—it could not be otherwise than rapid and general—to the meeting of the federal convention in Philadelphia, in '87. It was the last reliance of the friends of order and of the union, and if it failed, universal dismay would be the bitter portion of the nation. In the care which was every where taken to give weight and influence to the delegation, by the selection of the first men in the respective states, was seen the impressive sense which prevailed of the variety and magnitude of the interests that would be submitted to its solemn deliberation. The interests of a single community had been, in all past time, a task for the highest human wisdom and address. What human wisdom and address were competent to combine and reconcile the jarring interests of thirteen states mutually independent!!

I would claim nothing for Madison, to the prejudice of his compatriots, nor subtract from what his modest and gentle nature esteemed among the highest of his honors, the selection of himself as a fellow laborer with the venerable men with whom he was associated. Impartial history has assigned him a principal and leading agency, in procuring the convention to be called. And as a member, none carried with them a more thorough comprehension of the difficulty of the whole subject; none applied themselves with greater devotion until the end was accomplished—nor was there a character better formed to conciliate by the grace with which he could yield in matters that were unimportant, and the mild dignity with which he would insist in those of more moment. For his eulogy and that of his associates, through a period of laborious, painful and anxious deliberation, more expressive than any description, is a simple reference to the instrument which their wisdom devised. Unnumbered blessings have flowed, and blessings yet untold will flow from it.

When the convention adjourned, the work of reform was but in part accomplished. The constitution had yet to be ratified; and jealous and vigilant beyond any instance of popular criticism, was the scrutiny to which it was subjected. Here in our own state, where now all profess to hold it in sacred admiration, the question of its adoption was debated between two parties nearly equal in numbers, and each led by men of unquestioned ability and of no less unquestioned public spirit. At that critical juncture, when the cause of the constitution depended upon a judicious and forcible appeal to popular judgment and the love of union, the papers, which are yet preserved under the title of The Federalist, made their appearance. And such were the candor and moderation, the fullness and vigor of the exposition—so visible the marks of honest conviction, and patriotic solicitude for the result, that party was disabused of its fierceness, and for once submitted to be instructed. In a life less illustrious, and furnishing fewer examples of severe and active wisdom, the numbers which he contributed to the series would alone be a monument of the devotion to great national results of rare and splendid endowments. In the life of Madison they serve as an imposing memorial, that his efforts were unremitting until the constitution rested in safety.

Of all the deliberative bodies of which he was a member, perhaps that which made the greatest demand upon his "philosophical mind and the copious resources of his mature and disciplined wisdom," was the Virginia convention in 1788. We can never recur to that assembly without sentiments of mingled pride and veneration. The alarms, agitations and evils of the time, we only know as matters of history; but in the memorials which have descended of the unsurpassed ability and eloquence of the men of the convention, we feel a filial interest, as associated with the glory and renown of the commonwealth. Whatever reasons there were for regret, at the time, that Madison and Henry held opposite opinions, none now would have had it otherwise. It served for an occasion to display those pre-eminent endowments, not of the champions only, but of others, their colleagues, that shed an undying lustre upon their country. Of Marshall, among others, himself an early champion of his country, as he was in subsequent life one of her brightest ornaments—loved, revered for the unsurpassed excellencies of his character—who but recently hath gone to his reward, whilst yet his admiring country trusted that his honored days would be prolonged.

At the close of a toilsome session, the Virginia convention adopted the constitution and the small majority of ten, by which it was carried, is a perpetual memorial of the indefatigable zeal and power of oratory with which it was resisted, and of the almost superhuman vigor and devotion that sustained it. Madison might therefrom have reposed from his labors, secure of the respect and veneration of succeeding ages. He had become memorable whilst he was yet in the early vigor of manhood, and in the large agency which he had had in quieting the public mind, in diffusing sound opinions of government and sentiments of respect for its authority, in adapting the legislation to the novel condition of the country, and its high destiny, and in maturing the federal constitution and procuring the acceptance of the people, might have rested, as the evidence of a well spent life.

After the adoption of the federal constitution, he continued to serve his country for a period of nearly thirty years, in congress, in the legislature of the state, at the head of the department of state, and as chief magistrate of the union.

It would be no less interesting than calculated to deepen our impressions of his activity and influence, to notice the important agency which he had in the settlement of the numerous subjects which claimed the immediate attention of congress under the new government. Time, however, does not permit. But, as suggested by the previous narrative, and as illustrating his great anxiety to redeem the constitution from just objection, by guarding against the danger of perverting or abusing its powers, it should be mentioned that, at the first congress, he introduced and carried a proposition for its amendment, by the addition of several new articles. The proposition was ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, and thus made a part of the constitution. A later and yet more memorable instance of similar public service was the resolutions of '98, and the report of '99, known as Madison's resolutions and report. He had been long admired as an author and advocate of the constitution, but was then to appear in the new character of commentator, and impartially to unfold its meaning and define the limits of the authority of the government. It was at a period of excitement; questions of deep import distracted the public councils and agitated the people; and in the opposing divisions, on either side were many of those who had assisted in laying the foundations of our civil fabrics. At that critical juncture, the public mind of his own state in a condition of peculiar exacerbation, he was called once more to the legislature, to exert his benign influence in composing popular uneasiness, and to rescue the constitution from (as was believed) imminent peril.

The manner in which he met the occasion and disposed of the grave subject, marked a new era in the politics of the country. So conspicuous was the elevation of his character, and such the grace of his modest and unassuming deportment, that those who dissented from his conclusions, no less than those who followed in his lead, paid him the homage due to superior wisdom and virtue. No state paper has appeared, which has excited such a general and wide spread influence over public opinion, as the report of '98; and it is yet referred to as authority; by a number, which the course of public measures has perpetually enlarged. If as our state pride inclines us to believe, our cherished commonwealth has had, and we trust still has, a high character with her sister states for just comprehension of the constitution, and devotion to its principles, the enviable distinction is to be ascribed in no small degree to Madison and his celebrated report.

Mr. Madison was secretary of state at a period when the diplomatic relations of the government were especially critical and unsettled. And when he was advanced to that higher station, the highest to which his country could elevate him, as a pledge of her affection, and the proof of her reliance upon his wisdom, the administration of the government was signally arduous and responsible. For his administration it was reserved to commit the government to that last and severest of all trials, war—with a nation strong in her resources and proud in her military renown.

There were diversities of opinion and contentions among public men in respect to points in his administration, as there had been in respect to all those which had preceded him. The charities of this occasion forbid allusion to party triumphs. But though we may not allude to such topics, we may speak of facts that are notorious, and not less true, than they are the occasion of congratulation with all parties. None hesitate to bear their grateful testimony to the signal purity and simplicity of the chief magistrate. All admit that the war which it was his fortune to declare, and better fortune to terminate, elevated the government to a proud eminence in the view of the world, and invested the name of an American citizen with a new title to consideration and respect. All, as they look back upon the trials through which he conducted the government, not safely only, but with honor, feel an unwanted glow of devotion to their country and her institutions. As one of our chief magistrates, the memory of Madison will be honored, as long as the glory of the country is any part of its concern.

Looking back upon his long career of public service, as he passed from one high trust to another yet more responsible, what is there wanting to complete his title to be considered as the benefactor of his country? What to secure the fame to which a patriot may aspire, and is a patriot's reward? On what occasion was he unequal to the exigency, and what state exigency did he not encounter? When his career commenced, you were without a constitution—your government without authority—and the times were portentous of instant and fearful disclosures. Aided by his compatriots, he gave you a constitution, an efficient government and union—and with these he added what, in a peculiar and emphatic sense, was his own, the example of an upright and conscientious functionary. None ever imputed the existence of a selfish, or mercenary, or factitious motive—or complained that he was wilful and had disregarded the public interest—or impatient and had mistaken it. The scrupulous regard to the minutest propriety which was conspicuous in his private relations, was exhibited in all his official acts. Sensible that our institutions have no other foundation than the attachment and confidence of the people, he endeavored to confirm their confidence and attachment by the mild, impartial, conscientious and dignified manner in which he administered the powers with which he was invested.

The last public scene in which he appeared, passed in our immediate view. You well remember the venerable appearance of the venerable man. The spirit of earlier days glowing in his aged bosom, he came up to assist the men of another generation in revising and amending their constitution. What could be more lovely and impressive than the spectacle! The patriarch of the land—the object of universal affection and benediction, returned to the labors which distinguished him in the infancy of the republic! The interest of the occasion derived additional solemnity from the union with him and two others, alike the relics of a former age; memorable for the variety and extent of their public service, and venerable for every virtue and excellence. More than forty years had intervened since they last met in convention—again they met in convention, for the last time, mutually esteemed and honored by one another.

Thus closed the public life of the aged Madison—the end in perfect harmony with the beginning. He had occupied the highest stations to which a citizen may aspire, and possessed an influence, that the personal consideration in which he was held carried beyond the limits of official importance; but such was his unaffected modesty, he seemed unconscious of his honors, and concerned about nothing but his duties. The example of a high functionary is scarcely less important than his official acts—the errors and aberrations of a private citizen at most, but disturb the current of public sentiment, whilst those of leading men tend to corrupt the fountain. Madison was conspicuous for grace, propriety and dignity, no less than for clear and thorough comprehension of the complicated and arduous subjects of civil policy, and the ability and energy of his labors. On the various theatres that brought him in connection, and often in collision with the first men of the age, than which no age has been illustrated by a greater variety and splendor of endowment, moral and intellectual, he displayed a capacity for public business which always placed him in the first rank, and the admiration which his talents attracted mingled with respect and esteem for his virtues. It was the disinterested and chastened public spirit of which his daily life was the witness, that fitted him for the singular success which attended his efforts, and gave him power to prevail over minds pre-occupied with opposing opinions. It was impossible to see him without being struck by his modest and unpretending manner, which in a measure concealed his talents and virtues, nor to meet him in private without being cheered and enlightened by his presence. His fame is engraven on the polished pillars that support the noblest fabric which man has constructed—and as often as we admire its beauty, and glory in its being the strength and ornament of our land, we should think of the accomplished and devoted artist, and if we may not aspire to his mental eminence, emulate and practise his virtues.

Madison is no more! No more can we apply to him for counsel, or summon him to our aid! Full of years, time having ratified the beneficence of his plans for the welfare of his fellow men—he was gathered to his fathers. But he yet survives in the institutions, in the renown, and in the affections of his country. He sought in life no distinction but that which might attend the unremitted devotion of his time and powers to civil and religious freedom. He asked nothing in return, but a father's request, accompanied by a father's blessing, that his country would be faithful to her obligations.

THE LATE GROSS OUTRAGE UPON MR. CHURCHILL. Correspondence of the London Morning Chronicle.

Constantinople, May 21.

All Constantinople has been in an uproar about the affair of Mr. Churchill, whose case was mentioned in my last. As soon as the minister for foreign affairs refused to give him up at the demand of lord Ponsonby, the affair ceased to be personal, and assumed strictly the form of a national question. The Turkish minister had refused to conform to treaties. Our ambassador, therefore, broke off all communication with the porte, and demanded an audience with the sultan, with a view, it was conjectured, of asking his highness with what minister he is henceforward to transact business, as he cannot possibly continue to have intercourse with one who has carried his insolence so far as to set at defiance the existing engagements. The minister for foreign affairs has so completely committed himself, and lord Ponsonby has declared so openly to have signal satisfaction, that the minister and the ambassador will not be able both to keep their posts. Two men cannot well stand on the point of a dagger. It is not a little remarkable that the Turks should have selected Mr. Churchill as an object of their vengeance, when it is known to every one that he has for years past, as a public writer, been one of the warmest of their advocates—a man who had no small share in exciting public opinion in Europe in their favor. But then he has seen clearly the interests of his own country, and has been an uncompromising enemy to Russia, the progress of whose projects he has been active in pointing out. Now, as I have said a hundred times, it is not the Turks who rule here, but the Russians. The former would have made no difficulty about giving up Mr. C. but on Monday the 9th instant, a Russian drogoman and the reis effendi were closeted for two hours, and when the interview terminated our countryman was sent over to the bagnio with a regular firman of committal, just as if he were a common felon, a convicted thief, or a confessed murderer! The French ambassador got scent of this, and despatched to Mons. Boutenief, his secretary of embassy, to say that such a rumor had got afloat, and that he hoped the Russian minister would take the earliest opportunity of proving that it was a calumny. When, therefore, all the ambassadors sent in notes, to protest against this invasion of Frank privileges, the Russian was the first who got his note in.

On the 12th, just before sunset, as Mr. C. was beginning to read away his tedious evening, he heard a rush towards his cell, and in an instant its doors was thrown open, and he was summoned forth—whether to death or liberty was to appear afterwards, and he soon perceived that the Turks, finding him too hot to be held longer without burning their fingers still more seriously, were determined to get rid of him. Mr. C. asked if he was to be released by the hand of his ambassador or not? and on learning that he was not, he refused to leave the prison with his own consent. The officers, therefore, put him out without it; his irons were removed, and he was told to go about his business. He therefore got into a kaick and went home. No longer supported by the excitement of his peculiar situation, he had scarcely reached the bosom of his family, when he was seized with a fever. He has since been visited by medical men, (who were refused admittance into the bagnio when he most wanted them), and by leeching, bleeding, punctions, lotions, diet and repose, they have got him round a little, although he is not yet able to leave his room. One of the many blows he received whilst in the hands of an infuriated rabble and a lawless military, has left severe pains in the chest, which he may carry with him to his grave.

I have yet to learn what is the exact nature of the satisfaction lord Ponsonby will demand, but I suppose it will be the personal punishment of all who had a hand in exercising their cruelty on Mr. C. the dismissal of the minister for foreign affairs, some guarantee for the future good behavior of the Turks, and a compensation to Mr. Churchill adequate to the magnitude of the offence committed. Lord Ponsonby has a difficult part to play, for whilst he must insist upon complete satisfaction being given, he has our national interests to attend to, and these require, on the part of England, the greatest tenderness towards the Turks. To quarrel with them in the mass will never do; and, after all, the misconduct complained of has been committed only by a few individuals, whose services the state can do very well without. Suppose that in our rage against these few individuals, we wreak our vengeance on the whole nation, we should be acting in a most silly way. If we love not the Turks for their sakes, let us still love them for our own. Gold has been the ruin of many a man, and yet we should deem them mad were they, on that account, to throw into the sea all the gold that subsequently came into their hands. When our vital interests are concerned, we must divest ourselves of passion and prejudice. England must not, however, omit to punish severely the occasional misconduct of Turkey. Even a spoiled child now and then meets with chastisement, and if we do not make a stand on this occasion to secure our rights and liberties here, we shall lose them to all eternity! The porte has been anxious to establish that it should have the power to exercise its police, even when foreign subjects are concerned, without the interference of the ambassadors; but it has been proved now, as many a time before, that it is not to be trusted with that power. Mr. Churchill was nearly murdered, without being allowed the benefit of a single word he had to say in his defence, and when the reis effendi sent him from the turnuk to the bagnio, he never saw one countryman. He might say it was useless to see a Frank who could not understand his language, but that excuse would not hold good in Mr. C's case, as he happens to know Turkish for all common purposes, nearly, if not quite as well as any other language; and when at the kehaya beys at Scutari, he was asked his name, he wrote it himself in Turkish, as the kiathi had some difficulty in making it out, so that they could not pretend that he was punished because he was unable to explain himself. He told all the chiefs wherever he was, that he had for years spoken well of the Turkish empire. He had better have concealed this fact, for it only secured him worse treatment. There are few people in the world, who like to be told of their own weakness. One of Mr. C's intimate friends, a gentleman of high rank, inquiring after his state, said "he was ashamed to go near him because he was a Turk," a delicacy in a well regulated mind by no means incomprehensible. All the Frank world are on the tiptoe of expectation to see exactly how lord Ponsonby will act in this affair.

Ever since my last the fete of the circumcision has been going on, and it will not finish till to-morrow. It has proceeded more slowly than would otherwise have been the case on account of the extremely bad weather last week. On the 13th we had the severe cold of winter, and they write from Adrianople that a considerable fall of snow took place there on that day. Yesterday the foreign ambassadors went to the Sweet Waters, on an invitation to dinner with various ministers and grandees, some with one and some with another. I have heard that the reis effendi and lord Ponsonby met at the seraskier's tent, but have yet to learn what may have passed between them. The Turks have of their own accord dismissed the kehaya bey of Ahmed Pacha, and the kadi of the Mekemne of Scutari, which is an earnest of their desire to give every satisfaction to our ambassador.

We have a report in town, which if true, will excite great indignation almost throughout Europe. It is that the Russians have actually marched 12,000 men through Wallachia to Silistria, which is really violating the Turkish territory, for the purpose, it is alleged, of assisting in the evacuation and conveying guns, stores, &c. back to the Russian territory. Russia has so many arrives penises in all she does, that I must confess I do not like the look of this fresh manoeuvre of hers.

Sir Henry Bethune proceeds in two days for Persia, in the mercantile steamer the Essex, which will take him as far as Trebisonde. He takes with him lieutenant Wilbraham and eight sergeants of the rifle brigade, to teach the young Persian idea how to shoot.

Mr. Churchill addressed the following to lord Ponsonby:
(Copy.)

"My lord: Although confined to my bed, in consequence of the injuries I have received, I hasten to lay before your excellency a statement of my case. I should have done so whilst still in my bagnio, but was ever led to suppose that my liberation would take place immediately.

"On the afternoon of the eighth instant, being out with my gun and dogs, I fired at and shot a quail. In going to pick up the bird, I observed a small Turkish boy at a distance of about 90 to 100 yards, who was crying out that I had wounded him. As my charge was not heavy, and the shot was the very smallest to be found in the country, I could scarcely credit this, but ran up to satisfy myself that the child was not seriously hurt, with a view of offering all the consolation in my power. I was soon surrounded by such Turks as were in the immediate neighborhood, and was exposed to blows of many. One young ruffian in particular, whom I shall have no difficulty in identifying, was liberal in his practical abuse, and but for the cooling counsel of older heads, I verily believe he would have killed me on the spot. I confined myself to the defensive, and made no difficulty in giving up my gun, one barrel of which was still loaded, signifying at once my consent to await the arrival of the guard, which had been sent for, without making an attempt to escape. About a quarter of an hour may have elapsed before the guard came up, and the bystanders amused themselves in the mean time in heaping upon me a load of imprecations, the young ruffian named keeping me ever on the alert to evade off the blows it was his constant attempt to put in with his fists. The guard came, consisting of a mudasi or lieutenant, a ser-gent and a corporal, I believe, and three or four men. To the former I immediately explained who I was, how the accident occurred, and assured him I was ready that instant to accompany him to the superior authorities. I soon perceived that it was intended I should receive, then and there, a sample of Turkish justice, which first punishes and then inquires into the merits of a case. I therefore warned the lieutenant of the consequences of the step he contemplated taking, and resisted to my utmost the attempt of three or four men to throw me on the ground. One of these in particular had shown a ferocity which found vent only in deep curses and hard blows. I shall not fail to recognise him. The soldiers having succeeded finally in bringing me with my face to the earth, secured me in that position, and two men, with the regular police sticks used for torturing thieves, murderers and others, administered the chastisement that had been determined on. I cannot pretend to say what was the exact number of stripes (they may have been 40 or 50), but this I know, that every one has left a mark as long and as broad as the hand of a man. I have exhibited a specimen of these marks to captain Johnstone, of the Madras army, who was perfectly shocked at it. The stripes having been suspended, I was picked up from the ground and marched off to the office of the kehaya bey of Scutari, the slightly-wounded child being mounted on an ass, which I thought a very proper conveyance for such an expedition. Had he been seriously injured it would have been cruelly thus to parade him about. He was first carried with much triumph and exhibited to the kehaya bey, to whom I was then introduced. On my entrance he started up from his sora with a fury perfectly demonic, heaped curses on my head, refused to hear a word I had to say in my defence, and seemed to deliver me over to the carassée to exercise their cruelty on me. Indignation boiled in my breast, and in one of these myrmidons of lawless power, who was particularly conspicuous for being more brutal than the rest of his fellow brutes, I said they might do what they pleased, but he should repent of his ferocity, a threat which only served to add fuel to the fire. This man consoled me for the unmerciful beating I had received by assuring me, with a solemn oath, that had I fallen into his hands, he would not have ceased his stripes until the last spark of life had been beaten out of my body! To him and two of his fellows I was intrusted, in order to be conveyed to the mekemme of Scutari. Scarcely able to walk, and with a violent pain in my chest, brought on, as I thought, by an extravasation of blood in the lungs, my speed was kept up by the knocks and pushes of the carasses in general, and of the brute par excellence in particular. Having reached the mekemme, and the child having first set a whining and then produced to conjure up the storm which was considered needful should attend me every where, I was dragged to the upper story. At the top of the stairs a tall young man in the garb of a gentleman received me, bearing in his hand a cane which he demolished with due heroic fury over my devoted head and face. I here expected further ill treatment; but a suspension took place.

"The chief of the office, whoever he was, declared that as a Frank was in question, he would have no hand in further tormenting me, as it was a matter which concerned the oumouri kharidje naziri. This was consolation of the right sort, and hope began to dawn upon me for the first time. I had fully expected a second bastinadoing, and felt I might not have survived it. A Turkish surgeon was sent for. He examined the wounds of the child and pronounced them to be slight, and I was afterwards called in to hear a note of the injuries read over. I was not allowed to say a word of course—a statement of the whole affair had been already drawn up at the dictation of my accusers; and on my remonstrating against such a proceeding, I was told this was a keshf (estimate of damages) and not a mirafis (trial). All having been settled at the mekemme I was made over to a carass of the kehaya beys, and when alone he showed himself to be more humane than when herded with the others. He allowed me to enter a Jew's shop, and write a note to let Mr. Pisani know how I was situated, and I have no complaints whatever to make against him. I then understood that I was to pass the night in the pirelike (prison—literally place of fleas) at the kehaya beys, but that was not the case; a katil drew up a note of the affair for the oumouri kharidje naziri, after having ascertained from myself who and what I was. Whilst this was being copied, my faithful pointers, which had never quitted me an instant, were taken care of. I had a pleasure in seeing that a sympathy was extended to them which had been denied to their master. Turks appear to have a fellow feeling for dogs which they cannot entertain for men, whom they resemble not.

"From the kehaya beys I was sent under charge of the humane carass, who had orders to deliver me over to the oumouri kharidje naziri, with a note of the accusation against me. It being already sunset ere we reached Constantinople, I was thrust into the tunruk to await the excellency's orders, and there I passed the night, the dirty boards my bed, a filthy rag borrowed from a fellow prisoner my only covering. A high fever, however, kept me warm, and my sufferings were such that I required all my philosophy to bear up under them with any thing like complacency. The rest your lordship must know, when I was honored with the ponderous chains of the bagnio, and when I was driven forth from thence without being told why I was released. The bagnio, black as it is, is comparatively a bright page in the history of my sufferings. Captain Kelly and Mr. Rhodes took good charge of me there, and every comfort I could require or enjoy in such a place was supplied, without any objection being made by the goalers. They are particularly civil, and can bear testimony that it is a well-regulated establishment.

"I cannot refrain from stating to your lordship that during the time of my confinement a galley slave (a Cephaloniot, Demetrius Calighia by name) acted as my servant, to my entire satisfaction. This man was put into the bagnio seven years ago, in consequence, it would appear, of having been caught in a tavern brawl, in which a Turk had been stabbed by one of Demetrius' companions. The companion, though equally a Cephaloniot, was beheaded as a rascal, and Demetrius remains in bondage to this day, probably without the means of making his case known to your excellency. I inquired into the man's conduct since he has been a captive, and have pleasure in stating that I was told it has been exemplary.

"Your lordship will perceive that there have been various individuals who made themselves conspicuous as my tormentors, viz:—

1. A young man of Kadikuoy.
2. A chaoush or onbashi of the guard.
3. The mulazim (or his superior, if he was acting under orders).

4. The kehaya bey of Ahmed Pacha. (This ferocious fanatic old fool, perhaps, flies too high to be easily brought down; but your lordship must be aware that he is notorious for his zeal in the persecution of Franks on every possible occasion. I am much mistaken, or, like some of the blood-thirsty tyrants of old, he would wish to see the whole Frank world standing before him with one neck, that he might have the supreme gratification of severing it at a single blow.)

5. One of his carasses.
 6. The gentleman of the mekemme of Scutari.
- "If the state of my health permitted it, I should have done myself the honor of waiting upon your excellency, in order to give verbally any further details or explanations that may appear necessary. I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) W. N. CHURCHILL.

"To his excellency the right hon. lord Ponsonby, &c.

"P. S. to the above. Between three and four years ago a young rayah accidentally shot me near Meideven Kuoy. The entire charge of his gun entered my forehead and scalp, and laid my skull bare to a considerable extent. Although this occurred in an open plain, and at a distance of ten yards, so far from seeking to have the young man punished, I lost no time, after being myself taken care of, in sending a surgeon to bleed him, as I was fearful that his excessive grief and agitation might be injurious to him; and as a further proof that I bore him no ill-will, I placed in his hands a few days afterwards, a present of 150 piastres in money. For myself I labored under the effects of the accident for six months, and to the day of my death a portion of my cranium will remain visible; but I have never uttered the slightest reproach against the innocent cause of my sufferings. It was perhaps needful to make known this affair, as it presents a striking contrast between the conduct of a civilized being, and that of vindictive barbarians, under circumstances precisely similar in their origin and result."

N. B. A second letter was addressed to lord Ponsonby, detailing the exact mode in which the bastinado was applied, giving particulars of the precise treatment experienced in the bagnio, and of the mode in which Mr. C. was sent away from that prison, with various other explanations, calculated to make his lordship perfect master of the subject.

THE LAST OF MAJOR DADE'S COMMAND.

From the Charleston Courier.

We have had some conversation with Ransom Clarke, the sole survivor of the detachment under major Dade, massacred by the Indians after a gallant contest, last December. The circumstances attending the escape of Clarke are truly miraculous.

It appears that the surprise of the corps was complete. About 8 A. M. of December 28th, major Dade rode in front of the column of march, and told his men to "have a good heart; that their difficulties and dangers were now over; and as soon as they arrived at Fort King, they should have three days rest, and keep Christmas gaily." The words were scarcely out of his mouth, when a discharge took place, and the major and his horse both fell. This sudden attack naturally disconcerted the troops, but in three minutes they were all as steady as veterans, and the fighting commenced in earnest. It continued with varied success, until the six pounder came up, on the discharge of which the Indians retreated, advantage was taken of this, and a hastily constructed breastwork was thrown up, in expectation of another attack, which took place in about an hour, when the enemy came on like devils, yelling and whooping in such a manner, that the reports of the rifles were scarcely perceptible. The action lasted from 8 A. M. to 4 in the afternoon—the United States troops amounted to 117, and the Indians are supposed to have been 800 strong with 100 negroes, who were more savage than the Seminoles. The enemy fired principally from a distance, and only made one charge with tomahawks and clubs but were repulsed. So long as a man stood, the resistance continued; and the six pounder was fired quickly and regularly as long as men remained to load it. At the end of the action, the inclosure within the breastwork was a foot deep in blood. With respect to the officers, as long as life remained they cheered and encouraged their men, and fell sword in hand. Captain Fraser, second in command, and Lieut. Mudge fell at the first fire, when the major was killed. Clarke was at the extreme right flank, and when he heard the crack of the rifles he looked at the major for the word of command, but a volley from 800 rifles swept the advance guard entirely, and not a man remained standing. Lieut. Henderson had his left arm shattered, and Lieut. Keys had both arms broken. The latter got one of the men to tie both arms with a handkerchief, and was placed against a tree, where he was tomahawked by the negroes. The troops then took each to his tree, and an irregular firing commenced, till the arrival of the six pounder and the temporary retreat of the Indians as above mentioned.

At the second attack nothing could equal the coolness and deliberation of the troops; and as Clarke observes, "they were as cool as if they were in the woods shooting game." The weather was very warm, and about 1 o'clock the action began to slacken, upwards of 60 or 70 having fallen, and two officers only then surviving, capt. Gardiner and Lieut. Bassinger. While a man could load a musket, the firing was continued. Capt. Gardiner received 5 or 6 shots before he fell; the mortal wound was in the breast. When he fell, Bassinger said, "now, my boys, let us do the best we can—I am the only officer left;" and the firing recommenced. About half past 2, he was brought down by a rifle shot in the thigh, and he was afterwards cruelly massacred by a negro. Clarke received his first wound in the thigh, about one o'clock, outside the breast work, which brought him to the ground. He soon recovered himself, and crawled and limped in. He placed himself along it and commenced firing in that position, but in the act of elevating the musket, received a wound between the elbow and right shoulder. He still continued to fire and load, but again received two wounds, one in the head from buck shot, and a small rifle ball in the back. He still kept on till about 4 o'clock, when he received a ball on the right scapula from a negro; who, when he fired, cried out "There damn you!" This disabled him, and he fell on his face, and continued motionless. The enemy immediately rushed into the breast work, and took possession of the arms and ammunition, provisions and baggage, which they carried out of the fortification. About 50 or 60 negroes then came up on horseback, and began stripping the dead, and cutting and mutilating all who showed any signs of life. They seemed to be in a hurry, and after finishing their work of slaughter, they hurried off. All this time Clarke was lying by the side of Bassinger, and they stripped his jacket off, one observing, that "he had a wound in the head, and was not dead." Another said "let him lie; he will suffer more than if he were killed outright." One of them remarked, that "he had a good pair of boots on, and they would fit him—whereupon he pulled them off, and they departed precipitately. This was about four o'clock, and Clarke remained as the negroes left him, till about nine, when he got up, and looking around in the moonlight, he crawled over the bodies, and feeling one warm, found that it was a private, named De Courcy, who was wounded in the side and left arm, but slightly. Clarke told him that he was thinking of trying to get back to Fort Brook, on Tampa Bay, about sixty-five miles distant. He agreed to accompany him, and Clarke crawled along on his left hand and knees part of the way, and part of the way he was led by De Courcy. Next day, about noon, they came upon an Indian on horseback, who was loading his rifle. They agreed to separate, in the hope of easier escaping him, and Clarke darted into a hammock of palmettos and brush. The Indian pursued De Courcy, and fired, but missed. He then crossed a road, and ran over a hill, which was the last Clarke saw of his hapless comrade. After hearing the report, Clarke, from his retreat, saw the Indian return on horseback, and rode about the hammock, searching all around. At one time he came within ten feet of him, but at length gave up the pursuit and rode away. Clarke then resumed his painful journey, and on the fourth day after the massacre got into Fort Brooke, where he found private Thomas, one of the detachment who had also escaped; and next morning, another, named Sprague, came in, but they are since dead, and Clarke is the only survivor of this gallant and devoted band.

The foregoing particulars are taken from the lips of this brave man, and they are here given with a view of showing what men suffer in the defence of their country, and to urge his claims upon the sympathy and benevolence of his fellow citizens. He is a fine looking young man, in the prime of life, with his right arm irreparably injured; willing to labor for his subsistence, but the hostile shot has crippled him; and it is to his country he must look for support, in the condition he has been reduced in that country's service. We hope that the appeal may not be in vain, and that those who regard patriotism and bravery, valor in the field, and heroism in the utter extremity of human misery, will open their hearts and purses to this brave soldier.

In order to give as much efficiency as possible to the plain and simple narrative here recorded, we subjoin an official document, which discloses the present condition and the future prospects of this disabled soldier.

Washington, June 23, 1836.

Ransom Clarke, late a private in major Belton's co. 3d U. S. artillery, one of the three individuals who escaped from the massacre of major Dade's command, on the 28th December, has just made a tedious and painful journey from New Orleans to this city, to obtain the pension allowed him by law. The pension commences 3d May, eight dollars per month; the first payment is due 4th September. Clarke received five wounds in battle—one on the right shoulder, depriving him forever of the use of his right arm; one in his right thigh; one in his right temple; one in his arm, and one in his back. The wound in his shoulder is yet open, and an exfoliation of the bones occur almost daily.

What adds, if possible, to the interest of Clarke's situation, is the fact that he is the only survivor of a boat's crew in Mobile bay, in January, 1835, when Lieut. Chandler and five men were drowned by the capsizing of a boat belonging to Fort Morgan. Clarke has expended his pittance of pay in his journey here, is without funds, and can receive no portion of his small pension until September.

This brief statement is made with a view of procuring donations for his immediate relief. The appeal is made without Clarke's having solicited it, by those who know the truth of his story. His honorable discharge, and surgeon's certificate of disability, are on file, and duplicates in his possession.

J. H. HOOK, major U. S. A.

REVOLUTIONARY INCIDENTS.

From the Fredericksburg (Va.) Arena.

COLONEL LAURENS.

The late major William Jackson, of Philadelphia, was a member of general Washington's military family, during the war of the revolution, and was subsequently secretary of the convention which framed the federal constitution. He was in the habit of keeping a journal, and we are indebted to the kindness of a friend for the following very interesting extract, copied by major Jackson himself:

Colonel Laurens was one of the most gallant and accomplished men of that revolution, of which he was the latest victim, and had his life been spared, there is no doubt he would have taken an active part in the subsequent affairs of the country, and probably have risen to its highest honors.

Major Jackson's journal has never yet been published. We understand that in consequence of a promise made to Mr. Madison, he laid an injunction on his executors not to let it see the light during the life of that gentleman. It will form an important addition to our stock of information relative to the formation of the constitution, and we hope to see it forthwith.

EXTRACT.

In the sixth year of the war of independence, the events of the campaign had been very adverse to the American arms, and at the close of 1780, the resources of the United States were in extreme depression. General Lincoln, who commanded in the southern department, after a brave and protracted defence of Charleston, against the army and fleet under sir Henry Clinton and admiral Arbutnot, was compelled to capitulate and to surrender his gallant garrison prisoners of war.

By this success, and the subsequent defeat of general Gates, at Camden, the British forces gained a control in the south, which threatened the most extensive and disastrous consequences. The main army, under general Washington, reduced by detachments to the southern states, was badly clothed, irregularly provisioned, and without pay; the magazines were empty, the treasury exhausted, and the public credit of no avail.

In this alarming crisis of the national affairs, gen. Washington convened a council of his most confidential officers—a faithful and minute representation was submitted to congress—and it was respectfully suggested, as the most immediate means of relief, that a special minister should be sent to France, to solicit a loan of money, and supplies of clothing and military stores, with a request that a naval superiority might rendezvous on the American coast, at an appointed time, to enable the commander-in-chief to undertake offensive operations against the dispersed posts of the enemy.

Congress acceded to the opinions of this interesting communication, and referred the nomination of the minister to general Washington, whose selection of the "all accomplished Laurens," justified the confidence of government, and secured the successful completion of this important trust. As aid-de-camp to general Washington, colonel Laurens was fully informed on every subject that could give furtherance to the negotiation, and being perfectly master of the French language, he possessed in an eminent degree, the power of illustrating all its objects. By the partiality of his gallant friend, the writer of this memoir was appointed secretary of the mission.

On the 9th of February, 1781, we sailed from Boston in the frigate Alliance, captain Barry, and arrived at L'Orient in twenty days. Pursuing, without delay, his route to Paris, col. Laurens met the marchal de Castries, minister of marine, then on a visit to the seaports, at Hennebond, and having announced himself to the marchal, he very politely directed relays of horses to expedite our journey.

On his arrival at Paris, colonel Laurens entered on the objects of his mission, and repaired to Versailles, was introduced under every advantage that distinction of character, ardent zeal of disposition, and consummate ability to demonstrate the reciprocal interests of America and France, could confer. Having delivered his credentials, and been graciously received at court, memorials, explanatory of all the views and objects of his appointment, were immediately presented to the count de Vergennes, minister of foreign relations, and they were repeated and enforced by personal intercourse, from the 6th of March to the 2d of May, when colonel Laurens conceived from the protracted state of the negotiation, that it was the policy of the cabinet of France, by delaying the aid which he solicited, to exhaust the power and resources of Great Britain and America, and to render both subservient to her views. Under this impression, and a belief that it was rather the policy of the ministers than the king, colonel Laurens decided to make a representation, which should condense all the essential points that had been heretofore stated—and this paper he determined to place in the king's own hand.

A memorial, embracing a luminous statement of facts, with clear deductions from them, was accordingly prepared, and, on the morning of the levee day, when it was to be presented, we went to the cabinet of the count de Vergennes, where we found Dr. Franklin and the count. Colonel Laurens, introducing the subject of his mission, was urging with his usual animation, the necessity of a compliance with his solicitation, when the count de Vergennes, in a manner at once smiling and sarcastic, observed—"Colonel Laurens, you are so recently from the head quarters of the American army, that you forget you are no longer delivering the orders of the commander-in-chief, but addressing the minister of a monarch, who has every disposition to favor your country." Colonel Laurens rising from his chair with some emotion, stepped to the opposite side of the room, and turning to the count, addressed him in nearly the following words—"Favor, sir, the respect which I owe my country will not admit the term—say that the aid is mutual, and I cheerfully subscribe to the obligation. But as the last argument I shall offer to your excellency—the sword which I now wear in defence of France as well as of my own country, unless the succour I solicit is immediately accorded, I may be compelled, within a short time, to draw against France as a British subject."

The force of this brief but appropriate remonstrance was keenly felt by the first diplomatist of Europe, and some time elapsed before the count was sufficiently collected to say, "Mais voila le bon Monsieur Franklin, qui est content de nous." "No one," replied colonel Laurens, "respects that venerable gentleman more than I do—but, to repeat your excellency's observation, I am so recently from the head quarters of the American army, that many circumstances of the highest interest are familiar to me that are yet unknown to that worthy man. I must now inform your excellency, that my next memorial will be presented to his majesty in person. I have the honor respectfully to salute you"—and left the room. On reaching the door colonel Laurens remarked on what had passed and said we must go to court, where the act will finish.

The special minister of the United States was announced, and we entered the audience apartment, where the king was standing in the centre of a semi-circle, having the old count Maurepas on his right, and the count de Vergennes on his left. Having bowed to his majesty, colonel Laurens instead of passing among the foreign ministers, advanced towards the king and saluted him a second time, and approaching nearer to him, presented the memorial, which was received under some embarrassment—for although, as being an accredited minister, it was not refused, the innovation on the forms of the court, was altogether unexpected—and the king gave the paper to the marquis de Segur, the minister of war. The looks of all present marked their surprise.

When the ceremonial of the levee was over, we went to the inn, where we dined—and on our return to Paris, in going by Dr. Franklin's house at Passy, I asked colonel Laurens if he would not stop and see the doctor; he said he would see no one till he knew the result of that day's proceeding. The next morning, while at breakfast, he received a note from Mr. Neckar, requesting an interview at 12 o'clock. On entering the drawing room we found Mr. and Mrs. Neckar, and the late Madam de Stael, at that time a young lady about 13 years of age. The ladies having retired, Mr. Neckar said to col. Laurens: "I have the honor to inform you, by instructions of his majesty, that the loan which you solicit in your memorial of yesterday is accorded. The fifteen hundred thousand livres which you request, may be sent to major Jackson at Amsterdam, for the purchase of clothing and military stores, will be forwarded from Brussels—and any other accommodation connected with my department will be cheerfully granted."

On the next day colonel Laurens was asked to an interview with the marshall de Castries, who said, I am directed by his majesty to say, that the count de Grasse, who is now at Brest, with twenty-five ships of the line, bound to the West Indies, will, conformably to the request in your memorial of yesterday, repair to the American coast at the time general Washington shall point out. The howitzers, which you want, cannot be furnished from the marine arsenal, as we have none of that calibre; but major Jackson will be able to procure them in Holland. The frigate Resolve will carry you to America, with such part of the money as you may wish to take with you. Any other facility within the department of marine will be accorded.

This was this important negotiation, which, as leading to the capture of Cornwallis' army, and supplying the wants of the treasury and the troops, was certainly the hinge on which the success of the revolution then turned, brought to a happy close, by the talents and decision of a youth, who had not yet attained his 28th year—but whose matured mind and heroic spirit admitted no other rule of official conduct, than the honor and interest of his beloved country.

BI CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Friday the 5th inst. was celebrated by the citizens of Providence, R. I. in commemoration of the second centennial return of that city and state. The ceremonies were commenced in the Baptist meeting house by an address to the throne of grace—an ode, written for the occasion, was then sung. Immediately succeeding the ode, an oration was delivered by the hon. judge Pitman, which abounded with interesting historical facts, and eloquent expositions of the motives which impelled the struggles of the first colonists. After the oration a hymn was sung, &c. and at 5 o'clock the subscribers with a number of invited guests, sat down to a sumptuous dinner. Previous to this, however, the gentlemen assembled, partook of an Indian banquet, provided under the direction of the committee of arrangements, and designed so far as practicable to be in imitation of that usually served up by the sachems on great occasions.

Tradition says, that at the interview had by Williams with Miantonony, this chief sachem invited him to a regal repast near what is now styled Williams' spring; and the dainties then placed before them, were such as were now offered to the company, which, together with their disposition, were as follows, viz: an Indian mat, being spread out, a large wooden platter well filled with boiled bass, graced the centre, and was supported, on the one side, by a wooden dish of parched corn, and on the other, by a similar one of succotash; beyond the whole, an enormous bowl of wood, flowing to the very brim with pure water, supplied by the self same crystal spring, which of old furnished to the red man his invigorating draught, invitingly presented itself to the thirsty lookers on, who by means of the antique cup appended to its edge, were furnished with convincing proof that the beverage quaffed by the Indian in his native state, cheered but did not inebriate.

After the regular toasts, thirteen in number, had been drunk, a number of letters were read from distinguished individuals, who were unable to attend. Next succeeded the volunteer toasts, when John Howland, esq. offered the following:

"The members of the Rhode Island delegation in congress."

The hon. Asher Robbins then arose and addressed the president as follows:

Mr. President: Connections formed here at an interesting period of my life, and while I was one of your fellow citizens, (though many years have since gone by), makes Providence still appear to me as another home, and has a corresponding hold on my affections. Notwithstanding the astonishing changes in her growth and appearance since I first knew the place, (what I then knew as pasture grounds, and meadow grounds, and corn fields, I now see studded with houses; and crowded with population), yet the striking features of her topography, which cannot be changed, make her always appear to me, on every return here, though different, still the same; and these never fail to recall the many pleasing images of the long past. And while I look around on these astonishing changes, this rapid growth, and to the causes which have produced them, and the inexhaustible nature of those causes, my imagination is no less pleased to indulge visions as to the distant future, and to contrast what she now is, with what she will then be.

As I have on another occasion made our beautiful bay, on a smaller scale, another Aegean sea, with islands as beautiful, though not as celebrated—so in my anticipations of the future, I have made Providence, now in embryo, another Constantinople standing at its head. And in my waking moments, I see nothing in the nature of things to arrest her progress to this splendid destination. Nothing, if no revolution intervenes—no fatal policy is interposed to enfeeble her growth and blast her prospects. The reign of order and of liberty—the reign of the constitution and wise laws to preserve both, and to develop the resources of the country, will and must insure this result.

There is something in the growth of places, and in the laws which govern that growth, that seem not to be well understood, and perhaps are not easy to be explained. Physical advantages of local situation, though important, are not alone sufficient to account for that growth. The other causes, whatever they may be, are still more important; for we see that they are able to overcome even the want of those advantages—not the entire, but the want to some extent. What is there in the local advantages of Nantucket, for instance, to make her what she is? A little barren island in the ocean, with an inconvenient harbor—with not a tye of the advantages of hundreds of ports on the coast—she took the lead of most of them. Though she has imparted growth from her growth to other places—has thereby made New Bedford what she is—has been sending off her swarms from time to time to settle down elsewhere, and to display, wherever that is, the prolific energy of their parent stock—yet with all these drains upon her, she still goes ahead, and takes the leads of the rivals she has made for herself. At the time when Penn first landed on the banks of the Delaware—when that angle formed by the Schuylkill with the Delaware (the present site of Philadelphia) was a wilderness; at the same time, what is now the site of Perth Amboy, was also a wilderness. Both had great physical local advantages for commerce, and so equally great that the most intelligent men were divided in opinion, as to which was due the preference—some giving it to one, some to the other. Philadelphia now is a great city, the second in the union, with boundless prospects of indefinite future increase; but Perth Amboy remains an obscure village to this day, scarcely known in the commercial world to exist.

It is evident, therefore, that the sole cause of this growth is not to be found, as many suppose, in the physical local advantages of the site. There is, and there must be, a still more powerful one. Many events appear to be fortuitous, which nevertheless are the effects of laws fixed in the nature of things, and whose operations are uniform. There is something apparently accidental in the growth of places, but doubtless it is so only in appearance, and that it is the effect of some uniform cause. I think I see that cause in the peculiar character of some of the men who happen to settle in the place. Men who give it its first impulse, and thus shape its after fortunes—men of ardent enterprise and bold adventure—men who conquer all difficulties, because they believe them conquerable, and act upon that belief—men who infuse their own spirit into others, till it is diffused over the whole community in which they live, and make it become the character of that community—a character that propagates itself from generation to generation. It is remarkable that a character once impressed upon a community, how steadily it maintains itself and descends with it to all after times; and its effect too, is remarkable upon the growth of that place—always progressive more or less rapidly—unlimited, and, as it would seem, imitable. London was a city in the time of Julius Cæsar, (such a city as barbarians could have)—it has been steadily growing ever since—and vast as it now is, it is said to be now growing more rapidly than ever. The original impulse is not yet spent, and never will be, till that character is destroyed by which that impulse is continued.

Rome, from a little village on the banks of the Tiber, went on steadily increasing for seven hundred years, under the republic, and then onward under the empire, till its population accumulated to six millions; and then nothing stopped its increase but the transfer of the seat of empire, and of Rome itself as it were, to the shores of the Bosphorus, and that inundation of barbarians, which soon afterwards obliterated every trace of that character on which its increase depended.

Providence, from the beginning, has had to boast, some men—the number more or less from time to time—of this peculiar, this Thémistoclean character. Men who might say, as Thémistocles said, "True I do not understand the art of music, and cannot play upon the flute; but I understand the art of raising a small village into a great city." He might point to Athens and say—behold the work of my hands—Athens, the pride of Greece, and the glory of the ancient world. I gave her that commerce which gave that fleet which conquered the Persians and made her the mistress of the seas and the empire state of Greece for so many years. So these men might point to Providence and say—behold the work of our hands, not yet an Athens, but which the impulse we have given to it may make her another Athens in every thing but political power.

It might be invidious to refer to names prominent in your history and signal in their influence upon the fortunes of your town. For in doing justice to some, I might do injustice to others, whose merits ought not to be forgotten nor passed over in silence. But I cannot forbear to refer you to your distinguished fellow citizen, now no more, who opened to his country our commerce beyond the cape of Good Hope, and led the way. He was the very soul of ardent enterprise and bold adventure, and no less ardent in every public cause, than in his own pursuits. His every movement in life was marked by nobleness of sentiment—nobleness of sentiment was indeed the distinguishing trait of his character. Perhaps no man ever lived whose beneficent influence was ever more felt in the growth of any one place.

Nor can I forbear to refer you to those of your fellow citizens who first opened to our country that inexhaustible source of wealth, the cotton manufacture. And here you will excuse me also for referring to him whose signature stands to the declaration of our national independence; because he was such an ornament both to your town and to our country. I knew him well. His tall and venerable figure—his silver locks—his striking features, full of intellectual character, are still fresh before me. He was my friend and patron at that early period of my life. How often have I sat with him, evening after evening, to listen to his instructive discourse—and never have I known a man more capable of imparting instruction. For I have never known a man of more universal reading; nor one whose memory was so faithful. Then his experience in the varied scenes of his political life, which spread over a great part of the early history of this state, then a colony—embracing her connection with the mother country, and occasionally with the other colonies, made his conversation a treasure of interesting anecdote; and would have made his memoirs, if he had written them for posthumous publication, a most interesting legacy to his country.

I attended him in his last moments; and it was impossible not to be struck with the magnanimity they displayed—magnanimity indeed was the distinguished trait of his character. No holy martyr of religion, no heroic sage and philosopher, ever submitted to the stroke of death and paid the debt of nature with a more cheerful resignation.

In conclusion, I will beg leave to propose as a sentiment, The memory of Stephen Hopkins—The true model of the sage, the statesman and the patriot.

DINNER TO MR. WISE.

A large number of the citizens of the county of Accomack, as a manifestation of their respect for the honorable HENRY A. WISE, of their admiration of the zeal, ability and manly independence with which, during the last session of congress, he exposed the abuses of the general government, gave him a public dinner at Dire's hotel, in Drummond Town, on the 14th day of July.

After the cloth was removed toasts were drank, among which were the following:

The American states—The only barriers between the general government and unlimited despotism: Every patriot should protect and defend them in the exercise of all their constitutional rights.

The legislature of Tennessee, by unanimously re-electing judge White to the senate of the United States, has given ample proof to the president that "his interference with the freedom of elections" was duly appreciated.

State rights and the United States senate—To pretend attachment to the one, and to endeavor to diminish the constitutional power of the other, is the grossest political hypocrisy.

Our guest, the hon. HENRY A. WISE—A faithful sentinel, whom no power can intimidate nor bribe seduce; The minions of power and corruption will never forgive him, and while faithful as he is, his constituents will never forsake him.

[When this toast was drank and the cheering had subsided, Mr. WISE addressed the company at considerable length, with his accustomed eloquence, in support of his course during the late session of congress. After the conclusion of the speech, Mr. WISE gave the following toast:

"The Eastern Shore of Virginia—sound to the core: it is in part relied on to redeem the state of Virginia from disgrace, and the government of the United States from the foulest pollution and the basest despotism: The country expects every man to do his duty in November."

BENJAMIN WATKINS LEIGH—

"Justum et tenacem propositi virum,
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instantis tyranni,
Mente quait solida."

"The man who is just and firm to his purpose will not be shaken from his fixed resolution either by the misdirected ardor of his fellow citizens or by the threats of an imperious tyrant."

JOHN TYLER and WILLIAM C. RIVES—

"More true joy Marcellus exiled feels,
Than Cæsar with a senate at his heels."

Letters were received from Messrs. John Tyler, John Robertson and Balie Peyton, in answer to letters of invitation addressed to them. Copies of these letters are subjoined.

Letter from the hon. B. Peyton.

Philadelphia, July 11, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of invitation "to attend a public dinner to be given on the 14th inst. by the citizens of Accomack county, Virginia, as a manifestation of their respect for the hon. Henry A. Wise, &c."

I regret that it is not in my power to be present on that occasion, for there lives not the man in honor of whom I would with more pleasure break bread and take wine, than Henry A. Wise, I have known him long and intimately: I have seen him at the bar and in the house of representatives—tested in every way; and he has been the same, bold, frank, honest, talented patriot and friend in every situation of life.

Gentlemen, I fully concur with you in the belief that the national administration of our government is most infamously corrupt in many of its departments, but I must say I entertain the same opinion of the president of the United States now that I have always entertained, and believe him to be a pure man, and an incorruptible patriot. John Randolph, whose loss at this time Virginia and all America has cause to lament, said of gen. Jackson, that "his very weakness leaned to virtue's side." This is emphatically true, and to these amiable weaknesses may be attributed all that is wrong which is done in his name. Search the world over in all its history, and you cannot find a man more devoted to his friends—more incredulous to their foibles—more immovable in his confidence in all they say and do. However excellent these qualities are in a friend, however inestimable they are in a wife, yet they cannot do otherwise than subject a public officer to error and imposition. Unfortunately for the president and the country, those disciplined politicians and cunning jesuits, who have joined hands around him to the exclusion of all the patriotic and disinterested, are the apostates from the ranks of his enemies, who care as little for his reputation as they do for the maintenance of sound principles, or the permanent prosperity of the country. He is surrounded by a mercenary corps, who, to advance their own selfish views, hesitate not to influence and exasperate his feelings by foul calumnies against his most sincere and disinterested friends. Not only so, but they write and publish in the Globe, as having his sanction, arguments and doctrines directly at war with the most valued and cherished principles, as set forth by himself in his own messages. And yet these now claim to be his friends, and the guardians of his fame and consistency as a statesman. There is not one of the ancient principles of the president—those principles upon which he came into power, so sacred that they will not, and are not daily in the habit of bartering away or trampling in the dust, and that, too, in the name, and, as they would have the world believe, by the sanction of the president. He is not, he cannot be aware of this. They have his ear, they have his confidence; they are going for his office, and use his influence, caring nothing for his fame or his consistency.

A recent occurrence will satisfy every one of the extent of the president's confidence, and how little are to be trusted the feelings of even so honest and just a man as Andrew Jackson, when he has to rely on such sources of information. He was induced to denounce the course of one of his old friends, who now differs with him in nothing but Van Burenism, about the close of the last session of congress, for having used, as he said, every effort to defeat the appropriation to carry into effect the Cherokee treaty. A colleague of the member who was present, suggested to the president that he was mistaken; but the seeds were sown, had taken root, and it was impossible to eradicate them; he continued to indulge in the most excited denunciation against the member for his opposition to that measure, notwithstanding the Globe newspaper has recorded him as voting, on the engrossment and final passage of the bill, in its favor, and also stated correctly, that he spoke at considerable length in its support. If they wish to throw the weight of the president's influence upon any individual, they craftily whisper into his ear that which will certainly arouse his feelings: denunciation and excommunication follow, and the unfortunate man is convicted, sentenced and executed, without knowing his grounds of his accusation.

You have been pleased to allude, in terms of approbation, to my course as a representative from Tennessee in the last session of congress. If there is any thing worthy the approbation and encouraging applause of freemen to be found in any course, it is mainly to be attributed to the deep and abiding interest felt by the people of my district, and my state generally, in the present state of our national affairs. I have been but a cold and feeble representative of their wishes and feelings. I have great cause to be proud of my native state; she has stood firm, unsubdued and unsubduable, while one state after another has been seduced, forced to make war upon honest men and popular favorites; yes, even upon the records of the government and constitution of the country. Tennessee, the Sparta of the republic, is still erect in the defence of the ballot box, the constitution and liberties of the people. I hope and trust that Virginia will not appear to the world in a contrasted light with Tennessee, with herself, in a cause so worthy of her fame, her sires, her sons: that she has not "lost the breed of noble bloods"—that her revolutionary stock has not degenerated, has been manifested to the world by her thorough-bred Virginia representative from Accomack. It is time for Virginia to show her blood in these days of venality, hypocrisy and corruption; she owes it to herself, to her sister of the south and west, who are struggling to maintain her ancient doctrines; she owes it to the whole country, and its dearest interests. Pennsylvania has broken the manacles which were prepared for her giant limbs. Will Virginia wear them? If you break the wand in Virginia, the "Magician's occupation's gone."

I beg leave, gentlemen, to offer through you a sentiment, which I inclose, and give assurances of my very high regard.

Respectfully, your obedient servant, BAILE PEYTON.

Messrs. Thos. R. Joy nes, and others, committee.

[N. B. The toast referred to in Mr. Peyton's letter was, by mistake, no doubt, omitted to be inclosed in his letter.

Letter from the hon. John Tyler.

Gloucester, July 3, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 28th June, inviting me to a public dinner to be given by a large number of the citizens of Accomack to Mr. Wise, at Drummond Town, on the 14th inst. was received on yesterday, and it is with no little regret that I find myself compelled to forego the pleasure of being with you on that occasion. No one would more cordially unite in the proposed manifestation of respect than myself. I was an eye-witness, for a part of the late session of congress, to the bold, fearless and independent course of our mutual representative, which attracted to him the attention of the whole country, and placed him in the foremost rank with the advocates of truth and justice. It is no light affair for a man to assail the ranks of a dominant party, or to bear a popular administration and expose its errors; this, however, was the work of Mr. Wise; and as a voter of a free electoral district, he has my most unqualified support.

In substitution for my personal presence, I beg leave to tender the subjoined sentiment, which I hope will prove acceptable to yourselves and those you represent. I am, gentlemen, truly and faithfully, yours, &c. JOHN TYLER.

Messrs. Thos. R. Joy nes, and others, committee.

"The faithful representative of a free people, clothed in the armor of truth; he battles for violated rights, and, regardless of self-aggrandizement, sustains with his whole strength the institutions of his country."

Letter from the hon. John Robertson.

Richmond, July 7, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have deferred until now replying to your polite invitation, received the day previous to the adjournment of congress, hoping that, on my arrival at home, I might find it in my power to accept it. Urgent duties, however, of a professional nature, to say nothing of domestic concerns long neglected, demand my attention, and compel me to relinquish the gratification of meeting you at the dinner to be given to your faithful representative and my respected colleague, to which you have tendered me so cordial a welcome. I will not affect to be insensible of the honor done me by associating me in thought with one so distinguished for the zeal, ability and manly independence with which he has exposed official corruption and abuse. Conscious as I am that you greatly over-rated my humble efforts in aid of the same cause, I trust I may say, without the imputation of vanity, that none can more earnestly or honestly desire to see the administration of the general government brought back to the paths of justice and honor which it has deserted, and to witness the restoration of those pure and primitive doctrines which it professed, in order to obtain power, and which it has abused that power to subvert and destroy.

Be pleased to offer on my behalf, to the citizens of Accomack, whom you represent, the subjoined toast, as expressive of my sentiments, and I hope not ungenial with their own; and to say to them, that I shall ever cherish a proud recollection of the approbation they have been kind enough to express of my political course.

Accept for yourselves, gentlemen, individually, my grateful thanks for the friendly manner in which you have addressed me on this occasion, and believe me, very truly and respectfully, your friend and fellow citizen,

JOHN ROBERTSON.

IMPORTANT DECISION.

From the Pennsylvania Advocate.

District court United States, Pittsburgh—before the honorable T. Irwin, esq. judge.

Thomas G. Baylor and Anna Maria Baylor, by their guardian, John Yates, esq. citizens of Virginia, against Elija Heath, James M. Steedman and Arod Pearsoll, citizens of Pennsylvania.

Stephen Dalgarn, a citizen of Virginia, against the same, defendants.

The foregoing cases were severally tried in the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, at the late term of said court, holden at Pittsburgh, on the first Monday of May last. They occupied the time of the court for above a week; and as the principles involved in them are deeply interesting to our southern fellow citizens, the following brief report of the facts disclosed on the trials, together with the charge of the court in the first mentioned case, has been obtained for publication. The verdicts and judgments rendered in both cases, evinced the determination of Pennsylvania juries and of our courts to protect the constitutional rights of citizens of the slaveholding states, in their negro property; and, it is hoped, they will operate as a warning to all who may be disposed to indulge mistaken notions of philanthropy, in acts of lawless outrage, like those which, in this instance, have met so stern a rebuke.

The plaintiffs reside in Jefferson county, Virginia, and were the owners of two negro slaves, who absconded some time in July, 1834, and came to Pennsylvania. They were pursued by their owners—were, with much difficulty, traced from place to place—and were finally apprehended in Venango county in this state. There, a laborious and prolonged investigation of the rights of the owners took place before Judge Shippen and the associate judges of that county, which resulted in the granting of warrants for the removal of the slaves to the place whence they absconded. The plaintiffs, on their way home with their slaves, had to pass through Brookville, the county town of Jefferson, in this state: at which place they arrived on the evening of Sunday 14th of September, 1834, and, with the assent of the high sheriff, they placed the negroes in the county jail, for safe keeping over night. The sheriff refusing to be accountable for their secure custody, they were lightly ironed by their owners.

While the negroes were being placed in the jail, a large crowd collected around it and in its entry; and amongst the crowd were the defendants, Elija Heath, then an associate judge, and James M. Steedman, (connected with him by marriage), a justice of the peace. It was proved that these persons used much language to excite the multitude, and to induce them, by violence, or otherwise, to release the negroes from the custody of their masters. Heath in particular, who was proved to be a leading and influential man, was heard to declare that "it was a Christian duty to release the negroes from bondage"—that "they were flesh and blood like ourselves"—that "it was a sin and a shame in a free country to see them in bondage"—that "those clauses of the constitution which authorised slavery should be nullified"—and that "every effort should be made to procure the release of the two negroes, then in jail, before morning." It was proved that the excitement produced by these declarations, amongst several young, ardent and imprudent men and lads, who were present, was very great, and various means of effecting the object recommended by Heath, were discussed. Amongst others it was proposed that, in order to prevent an immediate pursuit after the negroes, when let loose, complaint should be lodged against their owners before the defendant, Steedman, as a justice of the peace, for travelling on the Sabbath; that a lawyer of the name of Brady should conduct the prosecution, and make a long and elaborate speech, and that another lawyer of the name of Prime, should tender his services to the Virginia owners of the slaves, and be equally tedious in the defence! It was supposed that, in this way, the greater part of the day would be consumed, and the negroes would get beyond the reach of their masters.

It was proved that files and other instruments were procured, and were given to a man of the name of Butler B. Amos, then confined in jail, under sentence for larceny, by whom the negroes were loosened from the chains which bound them, and between 11 and 12 o'clock at night they made their escape from jail. Two witnesses swore that the defendants Heath and Pearsons were conversing with Butler A. Amos at the jail window, a few minutes before the release of the negroes. The slaves, though pursued by their owners for several days, were never retaken.

An attempt was made, upon the part of the defendants, to contradict a portion of the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs; and one witness, whose deposition was read by the defendants, swore that Heath and Steedman did not leave their residence between the hours of 9 and 11 o'clock.

The defence was conducted with great zeal by Messrs. A. W. Foster, sr. and A. W. Foster, jr. For the plaintiffs were Messrs. R. Burke, O. Metcalf and A. Burke.

The jury who tried the first mentioned case gave a verdict for the plaintiffs of $600 damages; and the jury in the second case gave a verdict for $840 damages.

Motions were made in both cases, by the defendants' counsel, for new trials, which after elaborate argument by Mr. A. W. Foster, sr. and Mr. R. Burke, were refused by the court.

The following is the charge given by Judge Irwin to the jury in the first mentioned case:

CHARGE.

It is proved by indisputable evidence, that Charles Brown was a Virginia slave, and that he absconded in the month of July, 1834; that he was pursued, taken and lodged in the jail of Venango county, Penn. and that, upon proof made by the claimant to several judges of the court of common pleas of that county, that he owed service to the plaintiff in Virginia, they granted a certificate to that effect, with authority to remove the slave out of the state. The claimant, on his way home with Charles and another absconding slave named Robinson, reached Brookville, Jefferson county, Penn. on the evening of Sunday the 14th of September, 1834, and for safe keeping, with the assent of the sheriff of the county, the slaves were placed in jail, from whence on the same night, they escaped and have not since been retaken. The action is brought to recover damages for the loss of Charles, and for the outrage by which his escape was effected. Before I proceed to notice the evidence in support of the claim, it may be material to refer you to the constitution and laws of the United States, which secure to the owner of the fugitive slaves the right to reclaim them wherever they may be found. By the 4th art. 2d sec. of the constitution of the United States, it is thus provided: "No person held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any laws or regulation therein, be discharged from service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." To carry into effect this constitutional provision, an act of congress was passed on the 12th of February, 1793. It empowers a person to whom a fugitive from labor or service belongs, his agent or attorney, to seize or arrest such fugitive, and to take him or her before any judge of the circuit court of the United States, residing within the state, or before any magistrate of a county, city, &c. wherein such seizure is made, and on proof of owing service to the claimant, either by affidavit or other evidence taken before a judge or magistrate of the state from which the fugitive escaped, the judge or magistrate of the state in which he or she is arrested, shall give a certificate thereof to the claimant, his agent or attorney, which shall be a sufficient warrant for removing such fugitive. It will be perceived, that no warrant or other civil process, is required to be issued to enable the claimant to seize and arrest the fugitive, so important was the interest and so sacred the right that the simplest enactments and means for the speediest decisions were deemed essential to their full enjoyment. But the exercise of this right was often attended with hazard, in reclaiming and removing fugitives; disputes, violence, bloodshed, and rescues, often ensued, until an act of assembly of Penn. of March, 1836, was passed, by which the owners of fugitive slaves are empowered, upon application and proof of ownership, to obtain a warrant from any magistrate for their seizure and arrest, and for bringing them before a judge of the state court, who, if satisfied with such proof, is required to issue his warrant to the owner for removal of the fugitive out of the state. This act in no way impairs the right which the owner of a fugitive slave possessed under the constitution and laws of the United States for his reclamation; it was intended only to be subsidiary to them, so that he may have his election either to make the arrest in person, or by his agent or attorney, or by a peace officer under a warrant from a magistrate. It is not our province to inquire why this summary proceeding was adopted in favor of the owners of fugitive slaves. It is enough for us to know that they exist, and that we are under the most solemn obligations not to suffer them to be invaded with impunity. It may not, however, be amiss to remark, particularly as the occasion has been sought to refer to all the exciting topics connected with the existence of slavery in the south, that a belief is entertained that no jury in Pennsylvania, will be found to give encouragement to the fanatical spirit which has given such just inquietude to our southern brethren; that they will not suffer their minds to be affected by undisputed propositions of the natural equality of men; of the miseries and degradation of slavery, and of its incompatibility with the principles of our government. The union would not have been formed without a recognition of the right to hold slaves, as they were held before its formation; and if we regard its duration, and the many blessings which have flowed from it, we must not weaken the attachment which any portion of our people have to it, by putting in hazard their dearest rights. However they may be questioned by false philanthropy through the ordinary channels, let us hope they will not be disregarded in the administration of justice.

The plaintiff having proved his ownership of Charles, and that he had done all that the laws required for his reclamation, it is clear that his loss is owing to the highly illegal and criminal conduct of some of those who assisted in his escape on the night of the 14th of September. How far are the defendants chargeable with this illegal and criminal conduct? You must satisfy yourselves of this by a careful review of the testimony of which I will endeavor to give you a summary. (Here followed the testimony.)

Against such of the defendants as you may find to have aided in the escape, no matter in what way, whether by breaking into the prison, releasing the negro from his irons, or opening the doors, or by counselling, commanding, encouraging or exciting others to do so, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict. In outrages such as here charged, the most worthless men are commonly employed as the active agents, while those who employ them, and who have means to repair the injury, too often elude detection; yet though their guilt is equal, we feel less disposed to excuse the man who excites to crime, and whose education and situation in life apprise him of its enormity, than he who, by brute force, is made the mere instrument of it.

The aspect of the case, as shown by the testimony on the part of the plaintiff, presents matters in an extraordinary, and it is to be hoped, unprecedented point of view. It has been made to appear, that on the evening on which the negroes reached Brookville, a number of people assembled at the jail, probably most of them from curiosity, the defendants among the number, they being then public officers, &c. two of them of a high and responsible character, that instead of showing an example of obedience to the laws and a disposition to enforce them, they were the most prominent in encouraging their violation, and in openly setting them at defiance. Examples of lawless violence may have become but too familiar in society to create surprise, even at this instance of misguided zeal in redressing imaginary human suffering, and many may be found to justify the act from an alleged praiseworthy motive. But every thing valuable to us: our lives, property and reputation are based upon the sanctity of the laws; and where men are taught openly to disregard their obligations on one important subject, they have but little more to learn to free themselves entirely from their control. It is but a single step further, and government and law are at an end. But it is rarely that the ministers of the law in any nation, much less in ours, are found ministering to these evil passions—and if the testimony, on this occasion, has established an instance of it, their conduct cannot be too much reprobated; for though the policy of laws may be questioned, while they exist every good citizen should desire their fulfilment, and superadded to this moral obligation, the magistrate's oath and official duty solemnly bind him to maintain them; if these strong ties are disregarded, the will of the strongest becomes the law, and the watchmen, instead of keeping the city, wake among the rest, but to plunder and destroy.

It is true, that in Pennsylvania, where slavery does not exist, it is no offence to write, print or speak on the subject of slavery. But this right may be abused, if carried into practice, to the injury of the southern slaveholder; if, as is alleged in the case before us, inflammatory speeches were made in a crowd to effect the liberation of slaves, indicating a determination to aid in any attempt for that purpose, followed by their actual escape, an action for damages would lie. It must, then, be always an important part of such an investigation as this, to ascertain what were the intentions of the accused. Did he carry his rights beyond their proper limits? Did he himself liberate the slaves or did he procure, engage, direct, counsel or command others to do it—for in either case he would be equally guilty.

Although the testimony on the part of the plaintiff may leave little doubt on your minds as to the agency which the defendants had in procuring the escape of Charles, yet it must not be overlooked, that it is materially contradicted by several of the witnesses for the defendants. The character, however, of one at least of these witnesses has been called into question. If, after reviewing the whole testimony, you are able to satisfy yourselves that all or either of the defendants, aided to effect the escape of negro Charles, the plaintiff will be entitled to your verdict. If there is room to doubt whether the defendants, or either of them, aided directly or indirectly, in the escape of Charles, such doubt should lead to his acquittal. If the testimony of respectable witnesses is so evenly balanced, that innocence would be as probable as guilt, the humane precepts of the law always inclined the scale in favor of innocence. The reputation and property of men must not be taken away by doubtful testimony, but after carefully sifting it, and rejecting all such as is unworthy of belief, and accounting for such as is actually or seemingly contradictory, enough remains to satisfy you that the plaintiff has made out his charge against one or more of the defendants, it will be your duty to say so.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

EDITED, PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY H. NILES, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

MR. MADISON. The memory of this distinguished patriot was commemorated by a funeral procession in this city on Thursday last. It was a large and imposing spectacle, comprising nearly all the mechanical associations of the city, with the society of Odd-Fellows and the order of Red Men, who were respectively clad in full costume. A funeral car, with suitable inscriptions, drawn by six white horses covered with black housings, and led by grooms dressed in white, was a striking and prominent object in the line and added much to the effect of the scene. After passing through some of the principal streets, the procession proceeded to Howard's Park, where, after an invocation to the Throne of Grace, by the rev. Mr. Heushaw, a chaste and appropriate oration was delivered by Joseph Willey, esq.—at the conclusion of which a prayer was offered up by the rev. Mr. Stockton, when the procession returned to the city and was dismissed in Gay street.

The whole affair was got up with much taste, and the people entered into it with a spirit that evinced a just regard for the memory of the illustrious man it was designed to honor. The grand marshal of the day was Mr. A. I. W. Jackson, to whom and his assistants, the citizens are much indebted for the very satisfactory manner in which their views were carried into effect.

NEAPOLITAN INDEMNITY. We understand, and we feel happy in communicating the fact, that the third instalment of the Neapolitan indemnity was punctually paid at Naples when due; and that a part of it has already arrived in this country in gold, and the remainder is expected by the next packets. Soon as it reaches here, and the nett proceeds are ascertained, public notice will, we presume, be given, and payments be made by the treasury department. [Globe.]

FRENCH INDEMNITY. Treasury department, August 24, 1836. Notice is hereby given, that a further payment on the amounts awarded under the French treaty of indemnity, will be made on the first Wednesday of September next, on application at the bank of America in New York; or, if more convenient to any of the parties, they can receive their proportion at the Maine bank, Portland; Merchant's bank, Boston; Girard bank, Philadelphia; Union bank of Maryland, Baltimore; or bank of the Metropolis, Washington; acting in behalf of the bank of America.

The above payment will include the remuneration made here for the sums deducted in France, and with the twenty per cent. paid in May last, will constitute the supposed nett proceeds of the whole of the four first instalments. If any error be hereafter discovered in the account, due notice will be given, and a correction made when the fifth instalment shall be received and paid.

LEVI WOODBURY, secretary of treasury.

OFFICIAL. From the Globe. Baron Krudener, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the emperor of Russia, having left this country for some months, on leave of absence, Mr. Krehmer, the secretary of legation, has been designated, by order of the emperor, to discharge the functions of charge d'affaires.

[Baron Krudener sailed from New York, last week, for Liverpool.]

MAJOR GATES. We have published in a subsequent page the proceedings of the citizens of Barnwell, S. C. convened to consider the dismissal of major Gates from the army of the United States; from which it will be seen that the conduct of that officer during the attack on Fort Barnwell is highly commended by them, and that much regret is expressed at the decision of the president, &c. The chief object desired by the meeting, an opportunity for major Gates to vindicate himself before a court martial, will, however, soon be accomplished, for the Globe of Tuesday last says—

We understand that the president has, at the request of major Gates, ordered a court martial to re-examine and pronounce on the circumstances of the affair at Fort Barnwell. A material fact, which has made a strong impression against major Gates, although not relied on by the court of inquiry, is rendered more than doubtful by an examination of the written testimony. The groaning which was supposed to proceed from the men who were shot outside the fort, and which excited a strong disposition for a sortie, there is much likelihood was a stratagem of the Indians to draw out a portion of the garrison. We are assured also, that major Gates went out alone and approached within sixty yards of the men, and saw that they were scalped, and, to all appearance, lifeless.

EMIGRATING INDIANS. The New Orleans Bulletin of the 22d ult. says that the emigrating party of Indians left that city on the previous day in the steamboats Lamp-lighter, Majestic and Revenue, and that of the whole number only four were disabled by disease at the time of their embarkation. They will disembark at Fort Gibson, if the waters will permit the boats to proceed so far, and from thence depart to their place of final destination.

On Tuesday morning last the ferry-boat which plies between the navy yard at Brooklyn and Walnut street, N. York, came into contact with the steamboat Boston, and in less than three minutes every vestige of the ferry boat had disappeared. The ferry boat had on board about twenty-five persons, fourteen of whom were milk men and boys, two women and several other passengers, with the deck hands of the boat. There were also on board, attached to the milk carts, fourteen horses which were drowned. The passengers and crew made every effort to get on board of the Boston, but six or seven did not succeed and were also drowned.

The grand jury of the city of New York have found a bill of indictment for manslaughter against the captain and pilot of the steamboat. A few such indictments against captains and pilots of steamboats on board of which "accidents" occur, zealously prosecuted, would accomplish much good and save many valuable lives; and confinement in the penitentiary would be light punishment compared to the enormity of the offences committed by such persons, from sheer carelessness or in a reckless and wanton spirit of opposition. Such is the perfection of steam machinery, that "accidents" cannot occur if ordinary care and prudence are observed.

MORTALITY IN NEW YORK. During the year ending on the 1st of July last there were 3,401 deaths in the city of New York. Of these, 23 deaths were occasioned by burns or scalds, 56 by casualties, 737 by consumption—more than one-fifth of the whole number!—299 by convulsions, 106 by croup, 119 by dropsy in the head, 65 by scarlet fever, 481 by inflammation of various organs, 204 by measles, and 66 by whooping cough. The number of deaths the past week has been much greater than in any previous week the present year, amounting to 277. Of this number, 140 were of children under five years of age. By consumption there were 38 deaths, cholera infantum 39, convulsions 18, dysentery 11, cholera morbus 4, measles 15, teething 16. Notwithstanding the great number of deaths, the general health is as good as usual at this season of the year.

MR. MADISON'S WORKS. The following is the title which has been used to the works of Mr. Madison now about to be published:—"Debates in the congress of the confederation in the years 1782, '3 and '4, by James M.

dison, then a member, with letters and extracts of letters from him during the period of his service in that congress; to which are prefixed the debates, in 1776, on the Declaration of Independence, and on a few of the articles of the confederation, preserved by Th. Jefferson; and, also, debates in the federal convention of 1787, by James Madison a member." How anxiously will the public look for these volumes, and how rich in political wisdom and instruction they must be! Mr. Madison could not have left a more precious legacy to his countrymen than he has in the papers which he collected and preserved, in reference to the history of the constitution.

RUSSIA TRADE. The trade of America with Russia, especially in sugar, is much greater than would be generally supposed. The average quantity of sugar imported into St. Petersburg, (chiefly in American vessels), during the years 1832, '33, '34 and '35, was 25,000 tons per year, besides which considerable quantities of the same article were carried to other Russian ports, for instance, Riga, Archangel, &c. In 1834 the importations amounted to 217,092,352 rubles and the exports to 230,419,880 rubles. The exports therefore being considerably larger than the imports. Manufactures increase in Russia rapidly, and at no distant day that territory will be far less dependant on the luxury or convenience of other countries than she now is.

[It may perhaps be worth mentioning, says the Boston Gazette, that more than one-half of all the American vessels that trade to Russia belong to Boston. The greatest number belonging to any other port in the United States, engaged in that trade, belong to Salem.]

THE AFRICAN COLONY. The following letter is from a very intelligent colonist, who emigrated from Norfolk, Virginia, a few years ago, and lately returned to Liberia, from a visit to the United States. We copy the letter from the July number of the African Repository.

Monrovia, Liberia, April 26, 1836.

Dear sir: I am happy to inform you that we had a passage of 35 days, and were very well treated by the captain; also enjoyed good health. I am happy to say to you that I am more in favor of the colony of Liberia than when I left; on my return home, finding the colony in a more beautiful way of improvement than ever it has been. When I was in the United States, I said many things in favor of the colony; but I find that I said not half enough. No, sir, for there is no place like this for the colored race of man to be found in their reach, where they can enjoy the same privileges as here.

To fly to the north or south is all folly; to go to Canada or Hayti is nonsense, for in either there are prejudices as high as mountains, against which but few are able to contend. Here is our home. The colony is in good health. Farming is going on well and all is quiet at this time. Many of the farmers from Mississippi are doing well, and think they will be able to ship produce from here to the United States in less than two years; they are much encouraged in their present crop. There is no doubt but we shall do well here. For my own part, I have never been so perfectly contented with my situation in all my life; I am now at home! There is but one thing that now troubles me, and that is my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, who will not listen to the truth, and embrace an opportunity of getting and doing good. However, this darkness will shortly be removed from their eyes, and then they will see that Africa is the only home for the colored man.

Dear sir, be encouraged! I know that your labor is hard, and that you have much opposition to contend with, the most of which I consider the project of unthinking men; they must give way, they cannot stand. I hope that the confidence of the friends of the good cause will be encouraged by the present state of the colony. I would say more did the time permit. I conclude with my best respects to you and your family, sir, and feel myself under great obligation to you for your attention to me whilst I was with you in the north; not only to you, but to the gentlemen in every place I visited. This undeserved respect will never be forgotten by me; no, not as long as I live. I know not language to express my gratitude. I can only desire and pray for their and your prosperity in time and eternity. I remain your humble servant,

BEVERLY R. WILSON.

DEAF AND DUMB AND BLIND IN GLASGOW. We have received an interesting account of the late examinations of the deaf and dumb and blind schools in Glasgow. It is a coincidence worth noting, that a few pupils of both institutions, were brought together and an experiment made for the purpose of testing the practicability of enabling them to communicate intelligibly with each other, in the same manner as was attempted with so much success by Mr. Peet and doctor Howe, in this city, in May last. The experiment was equally successful. We quote the following from the account before us of the exhibition of the deaf and dumb:

An interesting orphan girl, to whom the attention and sympathy of the meeting were afterwards strongly directed, expressed in a striking manner her ideas of the devotional exercise with which Dr. Brown had opened the proceedings, adding some remarks on the impression she had formed of the rev. doctor's ministerial character, and on the privilege of assembling in the house of God, which she had enjoyed at an early period, before she became deaf and dumb. A little volatile boy struck a lively note in describing a trip on the railway, with which Dr. Black had kindly indulged the children last summer, and concluded with a very palpable hint to the rev. doctor touching the agreeableness of "going it" again.

Another described, with surprising minuteness and accuracy, the cause of the recent eclipse,—a subject prescribed, if we mistake not, by the chairman, and certainly one which neither the teacher nor the children had any intention of producing, but which nevertheless afforded a gratifying proof of the admirable system of education pursued in the institution, and the excellent capacity of the inmates. The young astronomer, rising into animation with his subject, closed his simple but intelligent description with the remark of the Psalmist—"The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth forth his handy work." An arch little fellow wrote a short account of the kindred institution for the blind, stating, among other things, that it was frequently visited by the public, but adding, that "some ladies and gentlemen like the asylum for the deaf and dumb better than the blind,"—a dash of esprit du corps which seemed to be relished very much by the worthy treasurer of the latter institution, as well as by the meeting generally. The children were afterward examined on a great variety of useful subjects, such as the doctrines of religion, natural history, grammar, geography, &c. in all of which they displayed an accuracy and extent of knowledge far above their years.

Among the specimens of composition by the pupils, was the following prayer, written by the orphan girl above referred to, and enclosed by letter to her brother; the letter is said to have been written in the same fine spirit:—

"A PRAYER.

"Heavenly Father, I bless and praise thy holy name, that thou hast pleased to call thyself the father of the fatherless, and the helper of those who have none to guide them. Behold, O Lord, I am destitute and afflicted; for it pleased thee to remove from me the guides of my youth, and thou hast taken away them who sought for my happiness, and I am cast upon this world as one that is forsaken, and it is in thee alone that my help can be found. But for ever blessed be thy holy name, that thou hast been pleased to reveal thyself as a being who taketh care of those who are neglected, and thou overrulest all things to promote the good of those who put their trust in thee. O Lord, give me grace to love, serve, fear and obey thee, and to believe in thy son Jesus Christ, who died for my salvation, as well as for all mankind. As I deserve nothing of myself, I beseech thee, O Lord, to hear and answer my prayer, for my great Redeemer's sake—Amen."

CONSERVATIVE AMUSEMENTS. Do our readers wish to know how the Tories contrive to while away their time, at the very moment that the people of England are preparing to pull their houses down about their ears?

The following extract from an English paper will inform them:

"A private muster of the men most celebrated in the annals of pugilism was got up the other day, in the school of arms, St. James' street, for the entertainment of the prince of Orange, his sons, and a select party of the nobility. Their royal highnesses were attended by their suite. Among the company were prince George, the prince of Sams, the dukes of Grafton and Beaufort, lords Anglesea, Douglass, Douro, Graham, Falmouth, Errol, Euston, Willoughby, d'Eresby, Redesdale, Frederick and Adolphus Fitzclarence, Grimstone, Dudlow, Hereford, F. Gordon, Loftus (two) count Blucher, sirs C. Rowley, Trowbridge, F. A. Rowe; colonels Peel, Lowther, etc. The sports commenced by a bout with the gloves between William Stocks and John Adams, who went through two rounds. Next followed those two veterans of the ring, Thomas Cribb and Thomas Oliver, who were received with much applause. They also had two rounds, during which Cribb had decidedly the best. Thomas Spring and Peter Crawley next entered the arena, and during three rounds exhibited a splendid specimen of the noble art, Spring having the advantage throughout. Next appeared Richard Curtis and Owen Swift, who peppered each other in good round style through two rounds, during which Curtis had the best of it. After these, young Dutch Sam and Jem Burns contested. Sam exhibited, during three rounds, his accustomed caution and calmness, and had throughout the advantage, having, in the first round, uncorked Jem's claret. Last appeared Harry Holt and Frank Redmond, who closed the sports with the gloves. Winterbottom and Pitfield, belonging to the 1st life guards, next exhibited a specimen of fencing with foils. Then followed a bout with the same weapons between a Creole gentleman, named Lyons, stated to be eighty-four, and M. Anfield, jr., which strikingly exhibited the contrast between the old and new school, and finished the sports. The veteran Jackson officiated as master of the ceremonies."

JUDGE STORY TO CHANCELLOR KENT. We copy the following tribute of admiration and respect from one of the most distinguished jurists of the day, to the chief living ornament of the profession, from Judge Story's late "commentaries on the conflict of laws." Such well conceived compliments are alike honorable to both parties:

To the hon. James Kent, LL. D.

It affords me very sincere satisfaction to have the opportunity of dedicating this work to you. It belongs to a branch of international jurisprudence, which has been long familiar to your studies, and in which you have the honor of having been the guide and instructor of the American youth. I can trace back to your early labors in expounding the civil and the foreign law, the motive and encouragement of my own far more limited researches. I wish the present work to be considered as a tribute of respect to a distinguished master from his faithful pupil.

It is now about thirty-six years since you began your judicial career on the bench of the supreme court of the state of New York. In the intervening period between that time and the present, you have successively occupied the office of chief justice and of chancellor of the same state. I speak but the common voice of the profession and the public when I say, that in each of these stations you have brought to its duties a maturity of judgment, a depth of learning, a fidelity of purpose, and an enthusiasm for justice, which have laid the solid foundation of an imperishable fame. In the full vigor of your intellectual powers, you left the bench only to engage in a new task, which of itself seemed to demand, by its extent and magnitude, a whole life of strenuous diligence. That task has been accomplished. The "commentaries on American law," have already acquired the reputation of a juridical classic, and have placed their author in the first rank of the benefactors of the profession. You have done for America, what Mr. Justice Blackstone, in his invaluable commentaries, has done for England. You have embodied the principles of our law in pages, as attractive by the persuasive elegance of their style, as they are instructive by the fulness and accuracy of their learning. You have earned the fairest title to the repose which you now seek, and which at last seems within your reach. It is, in the noblest sense, otium cum dignitate. May you live many years to enjoy it! The consciousness of a life, like yours, in which have been blended, at every step, public spirit and private virtue, the affections which cheer, and the taste which adorns the domestic circle, cannot but make the recollections of the past sweet, and the hopes of the future animating. I am, with the highest respect, your obliged friend,

JOSEPH STORY.

Cambridge, (Mass.) Jan. 1st.

ATTEMPT AT RESCUE. The citizens of Wheeling have lately been obliged to take energetic means to enforce the law, in the case of Thomas Wintringer, sentenced to death, for the murder of Jesse Christman, in April last. The friends of the culprit, and his depraved associates down the river, even as far as Cincinnati, had entered into a solemn league to rescue him from his impending fate. The number of these desperadoes amounted, according to credible calculation, from three to five hundred. They had prepared themselves with fire-arms, and were resolved to effect their purpose at almost any hazard. Fortunately, however, for the preservation of the peace of the city, and the supremacy of the laws, the determination and vigilance of the numerous volunteer companies, who paraded the city by day and night during a whole week preceding the day fixed for the execution, overawed the criminal's associates. The town presented the appearance of being under martial law; and as the fatal day approached, it was crowded with strangers. Groups of armed men were seen from time to time in the neighboring woods, and from two taken up, particulars were learned respecting a nest of armed ruffians who were about two miles distant from Wheeling, at the house of Long; and accordingly they were captured. This Long was convicted with Wintringer, for the same crime, but afterwards was temporarily replevied. The preference in his favor was the main cause for the contemplated deliverance of his fellow prisoner. The execution of Wintringer took place, without disturbance, on the 15th instant. ARTIFICIAL WATER WORKS. A correspondent of the Boston Times, in a letter from Haddon Hall, England, gives the following account of the water works at the residence of the duke of Devonshire:

"The water works are beautiful. There is one pond with a jet in the centre, throwing water to the height of ninety feet, and another of sixty feet. The water tree is quite a curiosity, and I understand the duke takes great pleasure in soaking his friends under it. It is a tall tree, the trunk, branches, and leaves of which are made entirely of copper, and painted to imitate nature. 'His grace' then invites a party of ladies, for instance, to examine this singular plant, and as soon as they are close to it, at a given signal, every leaf becomes a water spout, and at the same instant numberless streams issue from the ground and hedges around, and, before persons can escape, they are completely drenched. Of course the victims must appear pleased with this ungracious act of his grace. The gardener attempted to catch your humble servant in this way, but I smelt the rat, and told him I could 'see as well a little farther off.' The most beautiful part of the work is the great cascade. By opening a valve, a vast quantity of water rushes violently from the roof of a beautiful temple, and from the mouths of lions, dolphins, sea nymphs, &c.—its ornaments; and falling into a basin in front of it, from which also several fountains issue, it is thence discharged over a series of stone steps down a distance of 250 yards, and having reached the bottom sinks into the ground immediately at your feet, and disappears as if by magic. These works are supplied by a reservoir which is said to cover fourteen acres of ground."

INDIAN HOSTILITIES. We copied a paragraph some days ago, from a western paper, stating that two white men had been murdered by Indians near Grand river, in Missouri, and that there were strong reasons for believing these murders to be only a commencement of Indian hostilities and cruelties. The truth of the story is disclosed in the following extract from the Missouri Republican, and turns out, as in many other cases of alleged Indian outrage, to be very much in parallel with the fable in the spelling book. It is your bull that has gored my ox, as the farmer said to the lawyer. N. Y. Com.

THE GRAND RIVER MURDERS. On hearing of the murders lately committed upon Grand river, in this state, col. Kearney, of the dragoons, despatched capt. Duncan to inquire into the particulars of the affair. His account has been communicated to the executive of the state and is as follows:

"The party of Pottawatamies were emigrating from Skunk river, on the Mississippi, where they spent the last winter with their families, to join those of their nation now on the opposite side of the Mississippi river, and that the five engaged in the affair were out as a hunting party, for the purpose of killing provisions for the use of their families; that on the preceding evening, they were visited by five white men, who came to their camp with whiskey for sale, but that they refused either to purchase or be treated with it. About daylight, in the morning on which the transaction took place, they discovered that 8 of their horses were missing, and saw by the signs that they had been stolen, and presumed that they had been taken by the Sacs and Foxes, and took the trail immediately in pursuit of them. After travelling six or eight miles, they saw a smoke in the thicket, where they found their horses in possession of the white men who had been with them the previous evening, when a Sac, who had a Pottawatamie wife, and who was living with the nation, stepped up to the white men, and claimed the horses; this he had scarcely done before he was shot by one of the white men, when he raised his gun and shot also. Another white man then shot a Pottawatamie through the folds of a silk handkerchief he had around his head so as to cut the skin, by which he was so stunned as to fall, when one of his companions, supposing he had been killed also, shot the man who had killed him, when the remaining three ran off and left the Indians in possession of the horses they had taken from them, the ropes and bridles with which they were confined, and a gun belonging to one of the men who had been killed. The ropes and gun they have given up to major Davis, their agent."

COTTON. The Savannah Georgian states that the specimens of the new crop, which have come in, are of fine quality, and that fifty pounds per hand have been picked on one plantation in Beaufort district, S. C. Three bales sold in that city, a few days since, at twenty and one-eighth cents per pound.

FROST. There was considerable white frost in Pleasant Valley, New Jersey, on Sunday morning last, but no fears were entertained by the farmers there that it would injure the corn or fruit.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE. The Barnstable Journal says that a child six years old, who was in the habit of playing about the house, situated in the woods of West Harwich, was heard to utter some distressing wailings and cries, which gradually ceased until they became almost extinct. On going to the child it was found that a black snake, two and a half feet in length, had wound itself around the child's neck, and nearly suffocated it. Removing the snake, it was found so closely entwined that the skin was also removed. The child, however, recovered.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Discovery of the early history of Maryland. David Ridgely, esq. state librarian of Maryland, has, in pursuance of a resolution of the legislature, made a thorough search of the archives of the state, and been rewarded for his exertions by the discovery of several highly interesting documents illustrative of the early history of the revolutionary struggle. The Frederick Herald says:

Among the papers discovered are, the manuscript proceedings of a meeting of delegates appointed by the several counties of the province of Maryland, in that city, on the 2d day of July, 1775, and continued in session till 14th August ensuing. Of this document, the librarian says:

"The rescue of this document alone from loss and decay is worth all the labor and expense that have been bestowed throughout the whole of the research. It is the corner stone of the republican history of Maryland, and upon which the superstructure of our present form of government has been so successfully and happily reared.

"This assembly created and appointed the council of safety for the province, and took such other decisive measures as were virtually a declaration of independence."

Mr. McMahon, in his historical view of Maryland, says: "In closing the history of the conventional government of Maryland, we shall surprise the reader by the fact, that the state has not in her archives, unless very recently obtained, a single memorial of its existence or operations."

Also, they have discovered the proceedings of the convention of 1775 and '76; of the councils of safety from '75 to '77; of the lower house of the province from 1714 to 1722; original letters from such distinguished men as Patrick Henry, John Hancock, Edmund Pendleton, Benjamin Franklin, Robert Morris, Lafayette, Washington, Chase, Stone, Paca, &c. &c. upon subjects connected with the common cause of the colonies; lists of officers of the Maryland line; treaties of Indians; muster rolls, &c.

Maryland colony. We learn from the Maryland Colonization Journal that the African head-man Sinteh Balla, who was deputed by king Freeman, of Cape Palmas, to visit the United States, and who came over a short time ago with Dr. Hall, the governor of the colony, was present at two meetings of the board of managers of the Colonization society in this city. The message with which he was charged was delivered to the board in the following words:

I be Balla, head-man for king Freeman of Cape Palmas. Him send me this country. I come for peak his word. Pose him sava book, I no come; he make book and send him; but cause he no sava make book, I come for look country and peak him words.

Long time past, slave man come we country. He do we bad too much, he make slave, he tief plenty man for sell. By and by all slave man knock off. This time we no sell slave, no man come for tief him. All man glad this palaver done sit. Beside that we have plenty trouble. All man have to go for ship for get him ting, iron, cloth, tobacco, guns, powder and plenty, plenty little ting. Some time canoe capsize, man lose all him money. Some time he die, plenty water kill him; he cant come up. This hurt we too much, and make we heart sorry. By and by one white man come we country. He bring plenty black America man. Him buy we country, we give him land for sit down. Him say he come for do country good. Him build house—put all him money shore—make farm—make road—made all country fine. This time all good ting live shore—no more go ship. Every man can buy that ting him want. No money lose—no man lose. This make all men heart glad—make king's heart glad. King tell me, "Bally, go that country; see how this ting be. Tell them people all we heart say. Thank him for that good ting them do for we country. Beg him for send more man, for make house, make farm—for bring money, and for make all little childs sava read book, all same America men." I done.

Sinteh Balla has since embarked for Cape Palmas, in the schooner Financier. [Nat. Int.]

Lynn. The prosperity of this flourishing town, its success in business, its freedom from sickness, and its numerous enjoyments, should be sources of gratitude. The principal business of the town was never better. About 3,300,000 pairs of ladies' shoes are manufactured annually, worth about $2,150,000. An India rubber factory employs about twenty hands in the manufacture of India rubber shoes. A silk printing and dyeing establishment does business to the amount of many thousand dollars. About an hundred tons of chocolate are annually manufactured. Five whale ships and about twenty other vessels are employed in fishing and trade. A rope walk has recently been built, and a ship yard opened. Within three years 237 dwelling houses have been erected, and more than that number of other buildings. There are two banks, two newspapers, twelve religious societies, nine public schools, and an academy. According to the census recently taken the population is 9,847—showing an increase of 150 per cent. in 10 years. In 1820, it was 4,515; in 1830, 6,138; in 1835, 8,419; in May last, it was 9,847; and at the rate of progress for the past year, it now will exceed 10,000. [Lynn Star.]

Russian serfs. Prince Sheremetoff, who is said to have 120,000 slaves on his estates, has generally in his retinue, when in Moscow, nearly 1,000, comprising servants, musicians, comedians, carpenters, builders, tailors, mechanics and artists of all kinds. Most of the slaves migrate with the nobles in summer to their country seats.

Remarkable longevity. The two following cases of singular longevity, come to us in the same paper. One hundred and five and one hundred and eleven, is seldom attained in these days of degeneracy.

Died, in the neighborhood of Jonesborough, Tennessee, on the 10th ult. Mr. William Murray, aged 111 years and 6 months. Mr. Murray was a native of Maryland, but has for a number of years been a resident of that state.

Of cancer, in Garrard county, Kentucky, on the 21st ult. Mr. Joseph Leasure, in the 105th year of his age. He was born March 21st, 1732, only forty days after the illustrious Washington. He walked seven miles the same day of his death.

Wool. The clip of wool for this season in this town is all sold at prices varying from 56 to 65 cents. The larger and finer lots sold from 60 to 65 cents. Are not farmers satisfied with these prices? If they are not, they will not be satisfied with any thing like the man's wife who had tried to be contented for twenty years, but had never succeeded.

Farmers are now in the midst of haying, which is at least two weeks later than usual. The crop of grass is abundant—certainly one-third more than the last year, but it is bulky and light—which must be the case, as it has grown mostly in the shade.

[Greenfield Mercury.]

Winchester rail road. The transportation on the road, between the 14th March and the 31st of July, consisted of the following commodities: from Winchester to Harper's Ferry—15,770 bbls. of flour; 11,457 bushels of grain; 2,379 bushels of meal; 98 tons of iron; 61 tons of lead; and 258 tons of other merchandise; and from Harper's Ferry to Winchester—262 tons of plaster; 2,923 bbls. fish; 2,675 bushels of salt; and 1,340 tons of other merchandise—yielding $9,560.

The number of passengers in the same period was 5,337—yielding $7,096.

Pennsylvania canals. We learn from the Pennsylvania Telegraph, that the tolls on the public works, received at the treasurer's office for the month of July amount to $113,609 65. The total amount of tolls on these works since the first of April, is stated at $376,058 03.

On the 17th inst. a vessel arrived at Portland, Me. having on board eight hogheads of sea-duck eggs, from Labrador. They are large and beautiful and of fine flavour, and were retailed at 25 cents per dozen. A brig was loading with them at Labrador for some southern port.

Verd Antique. A quarry of marble, of the purest species of Verd Antique, has recently been opened in New Haven, Conn. about two miles from the public square. The editors of the American Historical Magazine say, that the specimens that have been shown to them, surpass any that they have seen in the cabinets of science or museums in this country; and that in beauty and variety of color, (being marked with golden or yellow streakings interwoven) it cannot be surpassed.

High prices. From the Pontotoc Register it appears that Cincinnati flour is worth in that place $15 per bbl. lard 20 cents per pound, salt $10 per sack, and Molasses $3 per gallon.

[Natchez (Miss.) paper.]

Whale ships. Four whale ships belonging to Hudson, N. Y. have returned with 5,100 barrels of oil. The cargoes of two of the ships are worth $100,000. The New England, at Poughkeepsie, has a cargo of 2,000 barrels whale and 800 do. sperm oil, which is valued at about $60,000.

The Salem (Mass.) "Landmark," states that fifteen vessels belonging to that town, (eight of which are ships) measuring 3,500 tons, and involving a capital of $320,000 are engaged in the whaling business. The business has been a good one, and further investments are proposed.

Cotton crop of Mississippi. The Vicksburg (Miss.) Register estimates the present cotton crop of that state at one hundred millions of pounds, and its value at from fifteen to eighteen millions of dollars. The advance of the Mississippi in wealth and population, during the last five years, is almost unparalleled. According to the Grand Gulf Advertiser, the last has doubled, while the first has more than quadrupled, during this period. The population of the state is now said to number 328,000 persons.

The Vermont Chronicle says: While this paper is going to press, there stands a load of medium quality wool before our office for market, weight 4,000 lbs. raised in Barnard, probably at a cost not exceeding thirty cents, (when hay is plenty at 25 cents), and for which has been paid on an average 55 cents, by the wool merchants.

INDIAN WAR.

From the Washington Globe.

Head quarters, army of the south, Tuskegee, Aug. 10, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for the information of the major-in-chief and the secretary of war, a copy of a report of general general Sanford, of an affair which took place on the 26th, and another on the 27th ultimo, near Lumpkin, Georgia, between a party of Indians and a detachment of Georgia volunteers under captain Jerigan, which resulted in the defeat and dispersion of the Indians on the latter day. Captain Jerigan behaved on these occasions with the same gallantry and good conduct which has distinguished him throughout this campaign.

The Indians who had crossed the Chattahoochee are a part of those that fled from the camp in this neighborhood early in July, as several of the friendly chiefs have informed me.

I have seven companies of mounted Tennesseans employed in scouring the country below Fort Mitchell, and up the Cowagee and Hatchachubbee creeks.

I do believe they will find many Indians. I am, sir, respectfully your ob't servant,

TH. S. JESUP,

Maj. gen. com. army of the south.

Brig. gen. R. Jones, adjutant gen. Washington city.

Head quarters, first army corps, camp Jesup August 1, 1836.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inform you, that after having performed a march of sixty miles, I arrived the day after I left you at Woolfolk's, in the neighborhood of the party of Indians who were reported to have crossed the Chattahoochee on the 21th ultimo. The result of the engagement which took place on the same day between that party and a detachment of Georgia volunteers, has already been made known to you by the official despatch of captain Calhoun. Whilst on its march the day following, it was overtaken a few miles south of Lumpkin by captain Jerigan's corps of mounted men, and a sharp skirmish ensued, in which that brave and meritorious officer, after maintaining for some time an unequal conflict, was compelled to retire, with a loss of three of his troops killed, and seven wounded. Not discouraged by his want of success, that energetic officer determined to renew the fight; and accordingly, having strengthened himself by a number of volunteer citizens, he made the attack on the morning of the 27th ultimo between 10 and 11 o'clock, and in his turn compelled the enemy to give way, abandoning the whole of his plunder, and leaving 15 of his warriors slain upon the field. This decisive advantage would have been followed up by an immediate pursuit, but a deep morass through which the enemy passed, situated in a heavy cane brake, precluded the hope of being able to overtake them, in the exhausted and debilitated condition of our troops. Every exertion, however, has since been used, and is now being made to come up with them; but so great have been the obstacles that we have encountered, in brakes, bogs and swamps, that we have as yet been foiled in that design. Nevertheless, we shall not relax in our vigilance and our industry, until hope itself has been desperate by their flight and dispersion. So rapid was the flight of the enemy, that he left his dead unburied; and their little children fell into the hands of the troops.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant, (Signed) J. W. A. SANFORD, major general.

Major gen. T. S. Jesup, com. army of the south, head quarters, Fort Mitchell.

The Columbus Inquirer of the 12th contains the following letter:

Camp Hozey, 6th August, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: After a forced march I joined my battalion in Randolph, determined, if God would, to have revenge for the events of the fatal Sunday when my men fought without their commander. I found upon my arrival that general Sandford was in pursuit of the Indians with great energy, and after exhausting himself with personal fatigue, took but a single day to rest, sending me in the swamp with my battalion and captain Bostwick's company of Pulaski county to drive for the Indians.

We had a few of the Baker county boys, under captain House; among them are some men that can trail equal to blood hounds. We had not proceeded far before the sign became certain. About 2 o'clock on yesterday, we came upon their camp; they were entrenched behind some large pine logs, and received us with a brisk fire. I was struck with the second ball that was fired; a large dirk knife saved me from a dangerous if not a fatal wound; the ball struck the knife in my pantaloons pocket, and thus was prevented from penetrating deeply into my thigh; the bruise is considerable, but will soon be well.

Finding that the enemy had the vantage ground, I determined at once to storm the camp; the order to charge, with loaded guns, was obeyed promptly, and thus commenced the most brilliant and impetuous charge; the enemy made a faint effort to rally, but a fire was opened on them as we went, which they could not bear. They fled, leaving all their plunder and a fine dinner behind them; the traces of blood were considerable, but they left no dead or wounded behind them.

In the pursuit we found parts of litterers very bloody upon which they carried their dead or wounded. The swamp was a complete covert to them, and they made good their retreat. In pursuing them my men and officers would mire in the mud, and the march of their trail before the fight was so long and fatiguing, and we were so much exhausted, we were compelled to desist. The battalion unanimously voted me the present of a fine rifle, taken on the field loaded. We took up the line of march for camp, and just as night came on, made our escape from the most extensive and dismal swamp I ever saw. My officers and men fought with great and unflinching firmness, and all distinguished themselves, especially in the execution of the order to charge. The Indians raised the war whoop, but the sound was lost in the tremendous shouts of the charge.

We had no certain means of ascertaining the strength of the Indians; from the size of their camp and the amount of their victuals cooked for dinner, we could easily say they were a hundred strong, but I am of opinion that there was not quite that number from all I could see. Very respectfully,

JULIUS C. ALFORD.

THE ARMY.

GENERAL ORDER, NO. 55.

Adjutant general's office, Washington, August 18.

The following appointment made by the president under the provisions of an act of congress of the 4th of July last, is published for the information of the army:

"Major Trueman Cross, quartermaster, is hereby appointed acting quartermaster general of the army during the absence of general Jesup, the quartermaster general, from the seat of government. This appointment to take effect from the 23d day of July, 1836. ANDREW JACKSON."

By order of major general MACOMB:

MEXICO AND TEXAS.

A letter published in the New Orleans papers, dated Velasco, July 20, says—Our army is still at Victoria, upon the river Guadalupe. Lamar had arrived there, agreeably to the last accounts, and presented himself as commander-in-chief of the Texian forces; but, with all his popularity, was unable to obtain the concurrence of the army with the wishes of the cabinet. The question was put to vote, whether he should enjoy the chief command, or Rusk continue in his former capacity, until the arrival of general Houston. The matter was decided by an overwhelming majority in favor of the two latter gentlemen—so that Rusk remains brigadier general commanding, and the authority of major general Houston will be recognised as soon as he arrives in camp. Lamar is said to have behaved in his usual disinterested and patriotic manner.

The same letter adds—Santa Ana, the ill-fated and fallen despot is now at Columbia, and has the pleasing anticipation of being shortly escorted to the army, and there receiving his sentence—a detachment has been ordered in for the purpose. You may hear of a catastrophe before many weeks have elapsed. I anticipate it with positive certainty. Miserable indecision in not having inflicted upon him "death or worse punishment" immediately after his capture, when the act would have been upheld and justified by the whole civilized world.

The Texian army is said to be rapidly increasing, and that an invasion of Matamoras was talked of—which was only delayed for the present by the great scarcity of water, and the contagious maladies peculiar to the season, in those arid wastes over which the Texian army would have to march.

Grand Gulf, (Miss.) July 21.

We learn generally, that the Mexicans, to the number of 12 to 15 thousand, are on their way to Texas, by land and water. It is stated, on good authority, that the Mexican soldiery are sworn to exterminate all Americans, or never to return. The latter we think it most probable they will do. But this oath speaks very little regard for Santa Ana and his officers, in the power of the Texans. We perceive that governor Fulton, of Arkansas, has called out a thousand militia, for an object of which we are not yet informed, but, perhaps, contingently connected with Texian troubles.

We are informed by a gentleman who left Nachitoches last Saturday, July 16th, that the tide of emigration towards Texas is immense; the whole country is swarming with men. General Houston has not yet joined the army; and major general Lamar remains commander-in-chief. The tug of war is yet to come, and we anxiously await the result.

FROM MEXICO.

From the New Orleans Bee of the 6th inst.

By the arrival of the schooner Halcyon, capt. Dickerson, from Matamoras, we have been put in possession of our regular file of papers from that city to the 29th ult. Whatever of interest they contain will be found below.

By a letter received from the American consul at Matamoras, we learn that the Mexican government have opened their ports to all kinds of provisions, during the war with Texas, paying an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent.

The blockade of the port of Matamoras, by the Texian cruisers, does not appear to be very efficient; both Mexican and American vessels are permitted to pass without molestation. All was quiet in the city when the Halcyon left, and but few troops there. The speech of J. Q. Adams on the admission of Texas into the union, was published in an extra at Matamoras and greatly admired.

The Matamoras Mercury of the 29th ult. says, that from the want of authentic information from the interior, it can give no particulars of the troubles said to exist there. We sometime since expressed our opinion that all was not right as regards the internal affairs of Mexico; we are the more convinced of the fact by the above. Where the revolution will first break out, or when it will end, is still in the womb of futurity.

ARMY OF OPERATIONS.

The general-in-chief of the army of operations has received by express, the following decree from the war department.

1st. During the war to be carried on against the insurgents in Texas, it will be lawful to import foreign provisions, in the port of Matamoras.

2d. The duties on said imports will be paid in provisions and stores, which will be taken at the sale prices and exclusively destined to the support of the army sent in Texas.

3d. The provisions which will come from the interior, destined to said army of operations, shall be free of duty, and the mules and wagons by which they are transported, shall not be liable to a requisition from the government.

ANGEL GARCIA QUINTANAR, president.

ANTONOGENES CASTELLERO, secretary.

RAFAEL DE MONTALVO, do.

Countersigned, J. M. TORNEL.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Jose Gomez de la Cortina, colonel of the brigade del Comercio governor of the district, proclaims the following decree, transmitted from the financial department.

His excellency the president ad interim of the Mexican republic has sanctioned the following decree, adopted by the general congress.

1st. The Mexican government is authorised to levy a forced loan, on the whole extent of the republic not exceeding a sum of two millions of dollars, in order to make up for the deficit left in the treasury.

2d. The maximum of any share shall be a thousand dollars.

3d. The certificates delivered as evidence of payment, shall be received by government, after the lapse of one year, for all contributions and taxes.

JOAQUIN PARRES, President.

JOSE R. MALO, Secretary.

RAFAEL DE MONTALVO.

It is decreed that the present decrees be printed, published and put in circulation, in order that it may fully execute.

Palace of the national government, Mexico, June, 1836.

JOSE JUSTO CORRO.

From the New Orleans Merchants' Exchange Bulletin.

Extract of a letter dated Matamoras, July 29, 1836.

The Camanche Indians, a few nights past, came into Matamoras, and stole about 700 horses belonging to the Mexican cavalry, and committed other depredations. The Mexican troops, between 3,000 and 4,000, have positively refused to march into Texas until they have been paid what was due them. The officers in command endeavor to pacify them by saying that the conducta is daily expected from the interior with $200,000. Gen. Filisola's defence was published in the Mexican papers, and reflects great discredit on the Mexican soldiers.

The Texian prisoners in this place are compelled daily (in chains) to sweep and cleanse the streets!

Since writing the foregoing, I have just heard from good authority that some of the principal officers of the Mexican army have declared that they will not go into Texas until a sufficient quantity of provisions has been sent before them, and they must be paid their arrearages, as they will no longer trust to the promises of the Mexican government.

THE KENTUCKY VOLUNTEERS DISBANDED.

Gen. Combs has handed us the following letter, addressed to the governor of Kentucky, a copy of which was sent to him by express from Frankfort.

[Observer.]

Hermitage, Aug. 7, 1836.

SIR: Arriving at this place on the evening of the 5th instant, I was made acquainted with the requisition of gen. Gaines on the governors of Tennessee, Kentucky, Mississippi and Louisiana, for 1,000 men from each state. The letter of gen. Gaines and the proclamation of governor Cannon, of Tennessee, made known the basis of this requisition. Regarding the reasons assigned by gen. Gaines as not consistent with the relations which we have maintained with Mexico, since the existence of the civil war in Texas, or with those which it is our duty and wish to cultivate with that government, as long as it observes good faith and friendship in its intercourse with the United States, I feel myself called on to inform you that that requisition has not received my approbation, and that I trust, if the men called for have been brought into the field, you will forthwith cause them to be mustered and discharged, and await for further orders from the general government in respect to any other requisition for the militia.

The 10,000 volunteers authorised by the late act of congress have been apportioned among the states and territories nearest to the theatre of actual or apprehended hostilities from the Indians. They are considered sufficient, combined with the regular troops, to maintain the peace of the frontier, and to terminate the war which now exists with the Creeks and Seminoles. All of them have not been brought into the field, but gen. Gaines was notified that 1,000 volunteers in Arkansas, and 1,000 in Missouri, had received orders to be organized and held in readiness for one year's service, should the emergency arise making their employment necessary on the frontier now commanded by him. This circumstance makes the present requisition of gen. Gaines still more unaccountable, particularly as it is believed that our western frontier is now tranquil. Under these circumstances, you will please cause the troops called for by the requisition in question, if they have been raised, to be discharged. They will be paid as soon as an appropriation by congress can be obtained for this purpose. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

To his excel. Mr. Morehead, gov. of the state of Kentucky.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Lexington, 13th August, 1836.

The president of the United States has ordered the governor of Kentucky to disband the troops, who so promptly volunteered to march to the south western frontier to defend it from savage depredations.

Neither the deadly climate to which they were ordered, nor the inevitable hardships and privations of a thousand miles march, at the most unfavorable season of the year, could damp the ardor of the gallant Hunters of Kentucky, when called to rally under "The Star Spangled Banner."

*These are the Indians whom the Mexicans are charged with having enlisted in their service.

Selected by the governor to lead them to the field, it is but due to myself to declare that I would have been the friend and father of the high spirited youths intrusted to my care, as well as their commander. It has been ordered otherwise, and we must submit. It now only remains for me to have your names enrolled on the records of the department of war, and to obtain for you such compensation for your loss of time and expenditures, as a sense of justice may induce congress to grant. This duty, you may rest assured, shall be discharged with pleasure and fidelity. Blank muster rolls will be furnished to the captain of each company by the adjutant general of Kentucky and his instructions must be strictly attended to.

THE WHALE FISHERY.

From the Newcastle (Eng.) Journal.

The importance of the whale fishery, not only to the merchant adventurers of mercantile shipping interests, but in a national view, as educating a race of hardy and enterprising seamen for the royal marines, has occasionally been talked about in this country, in parliament and out of it, but never in truth received the attention, or was regarded with the sympathy of which it is so eminently deserving. We allude more especially to the whale fishery of the South Seas and great Pacific. Our trans-Atlantic brethren are neither such short-sighted or lukewarm observers in matters of high public concern. Although their traffic in that vast expanse has already attained an extraordinary development, and might seem equal to satiate the aspirations the most soaring, yet with them success unparalleled serves but as a stimulant to exhaustless energies, and what has been accomplished, however extraordinary in extent, is viewed but as an earnest of what remains in store, and may be achieved. Over the globe industrial they march from one triumph to another; in the words of the poet they "conquer known worlds, and then imagine new." The American South Sea fishery has reached a growth of such gigantic proportions, and has become an object nationally of such high import, that the state has deemed it expedient to come in aid of the spirited trader, by devising means for his protection, so as to enable him to enlarge the sphere of his operations, in the perfect confidence of security. We learn by papers of the United States, that a committee on naval affairs has been sitting, in which the condition and prospects of the South Sea Pacific whale fishery have been carefully examined; and resolutions have passed for recommending to the senate various measures calculated to promote its extension and facilitate its operations. The report now lies before us, from which, for the present, we shall content ourselves with the following brief sketch of the actual situation of this mighty interest in the ports of the United States of America:—

Number of vessels engaged in the whale fishery to the South Seas, 460.

Which on an average of 376 tons each, makes 172,500 tons, or one-tenth of the whole tonnage of the United States.

The average cost of these vessels is $40,000, requiring therefore an active capital of $18,400,000.

Each time this whale fleet put to sea, there is required for victualling and outfit, 80,000 barrels flour, 79,000 barrels pork and beef, 261,000 gallons molasses, 551,600 pounds coffee, 256,800 pounds sugar, 172,500 pounds tea, 1,300 tierces rice, 45,460 pieces duck (sail cloth), 8,960 tons cordage, 4,600 tons iron hoops, 552,000 sheets copper, 10,000,000 staves, 460,000 dollars' value whaling gear, harpoons, &c. besides large quantities of beans, corn, peas, potatoes, &c.

The committee state that, directly and indirectly, from 50,000 to 70,000,000 of property are embarked in the fishery, and that it employs from 9,000 to 12,000 seamen; that "it is a nursery for seamen for which no substitute can be found, eminently fitted to form precisely such men as the nation requires for the times of trial and struggle."

The committee, after adverting to the "hundreds of islands, reefs and shoals, unmarked upon any chart, and unknown to common navigators," which exist in those seas, proceed to recommend the equipment of a fleet for "exploration" or discovery, to consist of two vessels of about 900 tons each, with a tender of 100 tons, and a store ship of competent dimensions, to be accompanied by a sloop war for protection, and to "secure peaceful and friendly relations with the inhabitants of the islands" in those seas. The meaning of this is, of course, to take possession of and establish a settlement on some island conveniently situated as a place of resort for refreshments or repairs by the whalers. The object is laudable, for, surely, if ever industry had fair claim to national guardianship and assistance, it is that which flourishes, not, as the committee ably remark, by a "mere exchange of commodities, but by the creation of wealth by labor from the ocean." The subject—encouragement of the South Sea whale fishery—is well worthy the special attention of our own government. With the advantages we possess by our settlements and colonies on the coasts of New Holland, it seems strange that our successful progress should fall short of that of our enterprising brethren of the west.

DEFERRED ARTICLES.

THE DEPOSITE BANKS.

Washington, May 25, 1836.

To the editors of the National Intelligencer:

GENTLEMEN: Will you do me the favor to publish the enclosed article from the St. Louis Republican, for the information of my constituents? I am compelled to make this request, as the house refused, this morning, to take up the resolution of Mr. Dromgoole, and my amendment, and as "order" forbade me announce the reason for the motion which I made to suspend the rules. I am your obedient servant,

HENRY A. WISE.

Messrs. Gales and Seaton.

From the Missouri Republican of May 14, 1836.

The public moneys. The Globe, in the month of September last, published the details of an arrangement made by the different deposit banks, by which the long promised "better currency," as that paper then styled it, was to be secured to the country. The details, as we have said, were given, but it did not appear that the arrangement was the fruit of Reuben M. Whitney's labors; nor has this fact, so far as we know, been alluded to at any time. Such, however, was the case. A new Van Buren paper has been recently started at Palmyra, in this state, called the "Marion Journal," the first No. of which contains a communication from Wm. Blakely, receiver of public moneys for that district, in which a "circular" embodying the whole arrangement with instructions from "R. M. Whitney," is inserted. The receiver commences with these remarkable words—"I am instructed to receive in payment for public lands the notes on the following banks;" and then copies the circular, dated "Washington, August 21, 1835."

The opening paragraph—which, as well as those parts inserted below, was suppressed by the Globe—reads thus:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that, since my circular to you of the 25th June last, I have received communications from the greater part of the deposit banks, upon the subject of redeeming such of their notes in New York and Philadelphia, as may be received on deposit from receivers of proceeds of public lands, as well as receiving from such receivers the notes of such of the deposit and others banks as redeem the same, either in New York or Philadelphia; and I am now enabled to communicate to you the arrangements made with the following banks."

Then follow the "arrangements" announced, and which we have already published. Mr. Whitney closes his circular by saying—

"These arrangements have been entered into with the understanding and full reliance that each bank will act towards the other in fairness, and with the most sacred fidelity; that no one will call upon any other to redeem their notes which have not been received from the public receivers, or in payment of public dues, in cases where the banks have extended the limitation that far."

"I have forwarded a copy of this to each of the public receivers, and I have no doubt but they will all act with such fairness, that no injustice will be done to any of the deposit banks. Should it ever be otherwise, and any of the banks have cause to feel aggrieved, I am authorised by the secretary of the treasury, to say that he will take the most prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint."

"It is expected by all the banks which have come into the arrangement, that when one forwards for redemption, at the places named, the notes of any bank, it will, at the same time, inform such bank of the amount which it has thus sent forward."

"I would suggest, that in case any one of the deposit banks which have not entered into this arrangement shall hereafter do so, they communicate the terms, &c. to me, that the same may be communicated to the others, as well as to the public receivers."

"As it will greatly increase the security against counterfeits, I would suggest that each deposit bank which has or may enter into this arrangement, forward to each of the public receivers, the signatures of their respective presidents and cashiers. For this purpose, I forward with this a list of the public receivers, with the places of their residence."

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"R. M. WHITNEY."

In the course of the investigations, newspaper and otherwise, which have taken place in the last few months, it has been boldly denied that R. M. Whitney had any connexion with the treasury department. In his letter to the publishers of the Globe, of the 5th of March last, he represents himself as the agent "of a number of the most respectable deposit banks," employed to reside at Washington, to act as their corresponding agent, and to look after their interests generally. The Globe denied that he had any official connexion with the treasury; and an inquiry was objected to in congress because he was a private citizen. The circular before us, however, unveils his true character. He has, beyond a doubt, the control of all the funds received into the treasury from the sale of the public lands; he not only acts under authority from the secretary of the treasury, and threatens all erring banks with "prompt measures to remove any just cause of complaint;" he is recognized as a treasury officer by the receiver who published the circular, for Mr. B. expressly says, "I am instructed," &c. and goes on to quote the letter of instructions. Either this must be the case—either he is an accredited officer of the treasury department, or he must be a private citizen, the agent of a number of respectable banks; if you choose, but still having the exclusive regulation of the currency, and the control of eleven (fourteen) millions or more of money received for pub-lie lands annually. When before has the spectacle been presented to us of a private citizen giving peremptory instructions to government officers, and wielding many millions of public money for the benefit of banks paying him a high price for his services?

A CARD.

"A certain" Henry A. Wise having requested the publication of "an article from the St. Louis Republican for the information of my (his) constituents," in which reference is made to a "communication from Wm. Blakey, receiver of public moneys for that district, in which a 'circular,' embodying the whole arrangement, WITH INSTRUCTIONS FROM R. M. WHITNEY, is inserted," and continues, "the receiver commences with these remarkable words: 'I am instructed to receive in payment for public lands the notes of the following banks,'"—the statement made by the conductors of the Republican, for the purpose of conveying the idea that I gave the instructions, which the receiver states he had received, in relation to what bank notes he was to receive in payment of public lands, is a piece of downright chicanery, on their part. The "circular," which is referred to and printed by them, contains not one word to justify the assertion, which is FALSE in every particular. If that receiver had instructions, I presume it was from the bank with which he makes his deposits, as I know that bank issued a circular to the receivers, informing them what bank notes he would receive from them on deposit.

I have already proved H. A. Wise guilty of uttering a base falsehood, in the house of representatives, against me; and in appending his name to the article from the Missouri Republican, he has endorsed another BASE FALSEHOOD, which I publish "for the information of my (his) constituents."

R. M. WHITNEY.

Saturday, May 23,

LETTER FROM THE HON. JOHN C. CALHOUN.

Mr. Calhoun addressed the following letter to a committee of the citizens of Athens, Georgia, who tendered him a public dinner when on a visit to that place.

Athens, 5th August, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: If I could be induced to depart from a rule which I adopted several years since, on the approach of a memorable crisis of our affairs, to decline all public demonstrations in approbation of my political course, I would with great pleasure accept the very kind and pressing invitation to a public dinner, which you have tendered me, in the name of the citizens of Athens and its vicinity. But the reasons which induced me originally to adopt the rule have not yet ceased to operate. Foreseeing, that the course, which a sense of duty impelled me to take on the occasion to which I have referred, would give the ignorant and artful an opportunity to impute to me base and unworthy motives, I determined to forego, (in order to repel, as far as possible such imputations), all public honors, and to seek my reward in the difficult path which I proposed to tread, in the approbation of my conscience, and the approval of after times.

That my conduct in the difficult scenes through which I have passed, has met the approbation of yourselves and those you represent, is to me a source of much gratification. The two subjects, abolition and the regulation of the public deposits, in reference to which, you have in particular approved my conduct, are of primary importance, and you could have selected none on which your approbation would have been more acceptable.

Of all questions which have been agitated under our government, abolition is that in which we of the south have the deepest concern. It strikes directly and fatally, not only at our prosperity, but our existence as a people. Should it succeed, our fate would be worse than the aborigines whom we have driven out, or the slaves whom we command. It is a question that admits of neither concession nor compromise. The door must be closed against all interference on the part of the general government in any form, whether in the District of Columbia, or in the states or territories. The highest grounds are the safest.

There is one point, in connexion with this important subject, on which the south ought to be fully informed. From all that I saw and heard during the session, I am perfectly satisfied that we must look to ourselves and ourselves only for safety. It is perfectly idle to look to the non-slaveholding states to arrest the attacks of the fanatics. I readily admit that the great body of enlightened citizens of all parties in these states are opposed to their wicked and dangerous schemes, but so intent are the two parties which divide and distract all the non-slaveholding states on getting or retaining power that neither will directly oppose the abolitionists on our account, from the fear that by incurring their displeasure they might lose the ascendancy in their respective states, or defeat their prospects of rising to power. As strong as may be their sympathy for us, their regard for their party at home is still stronger. Of this we may be perfectly assured. Nor would it be less vain to look to congress. The same cause that prevents the non-slaveholding states from interference in our favor at home, will equally prevent congress. We must not forget that a majority of congress in both houses are the representatives of those states, and of course actuated by all the feelings and calculations which govern their respective states. But, if true to ourselves, we need neither their sympathy nor aid. The constitution has placed in our power ample means, short of secession, or disunion, to protect ourselves. All we want are harmony and concert among ourselves to call them into effectual action when the necessity comes.

As to the act of regulating the public deposits, I consider it by far the most fortunate measure of the session. And here let me say, which is due to truth and justice, that for the success of this great and beneficent measure, the country is greatly indebted to the steady and firm co-operation of a majority of the friends of the administration in both houses, who prove by their acts that they preferred their country and its institutions to party attachment.

If I mistake not, the passage of the measure is the commencement of a new political era. It will be regarded in history as making the termination of that long vibration of our system towards consolidation, which lately threatened the overthrow of our institutions and the loss of our liberty, and the commencement of its return to its true confederative character, as it came from the hands of its framers.

There is one view of this important subject highly interesting to the southern Atlantic states, and especially to this, which deserves notice. It will afford the means, if properly applied, of opening our connexion with the vast and fertile regions of the west, to the incalculable advantage of both them and us. We are far in the rear of the other sections in reference to internal improvement. Nature seemed to place an inseparable barrier between the southern Atlantic ports and the west; but a better knowledge of the geography of the country, and the great advance of the means of communication between distant parts, by rail roads, have, in the last year or two, opened new views of prosperity for our section. Instead of being cut off from the vast commerce of the west, as had been supposed, we find to our surprise that it is in our power with proper exertions to turn its copious stream to our own ports. Just at this important moment, when this new and brilliant prospect is unfolding to our view, the deposit bill is about to place under the control of the states interested ample means of accomplishing, on the most extended and durable scale, a system of rail road communication that, if effected, must change the social, political and commercial relations of the whole country, vastly to our benefit, but without injuring other sections. No state has a deeper interest in seeing the system executed than Georgia. Her position gives her great and commanding advantages in reference to rail roads; more so, in my opinion, than any other state in the union, and all that she wants to raise her prosperity to the highest point and place it on the most durable foundation is a wise and judicious application of her means. Though possessed of less advantages, I feel confident I speak the sentiments of Carolina in saying, that she feels no envy at the superior advantages of Georgia, and that she will rejoice to see them developed to the fullest extent. That there may be a general rivalry and a hearty disposition between them to co-operate to the full extent, where their joint efforts may be of mutual advantage, is my ardent desire. Let us both bear in mind, that though each still may have its separate interest to a certain extent, yet as it regards other sections, they both have a common interest, and that interest is to unite the southern Atlantic by the nearest, cheapest and best routes with the great bosom of the Mississippi and its vast tributaries. With great respect, I am, &c. &c.

COLONEL CROCKETT.

From the Jackson (Tenn.) Truth Teller.

Lost Prairie, Ark's, 1836.

MRS. DAVID CROCKETT:

Dear madam: Permit me to introduce myself to you as one of the acquaintances of your much respected husband, col. Crockett. With his fate in the fortress San Antonio, Texas, you are doubtless long since advised. With sincere feelings of sympathy, I regret his untimely loss to your family and self. For if amongst strangers, he constituted the most agreeable companion, he, doubtless, to his beloved wife and children, must have been a favorite peculiarly prized. In his loss, freedom has been deprived of one of her bravest sons, in whose bosom universal philanthropy glowed with as genial warmth as ever animated the heart of an American citizen. When he fell, a soldier died. To bemoan his fate, is to pay a tribute of grateful respect to nature—he seemed to be her son.

The object of this letter, is to beg that you will accept the watch which accompanies it. You will doubtless know it when you see it. And as it has his name engraved on its surface, it will no doubt be the more acceptable to you.

As it will probably be gratifying to you to learn in what way I became possessed of it, permit me to state, that, last winter (the precise date not recollected by me), col. Crockett, in company with several other gentlemen, passed through Lost Prairie, on Red River, (where I live). The company, excepting the colonel, who was a little behind, rode up to my house and asked accommodations for the night. My family being so situated, from the indisposition of my wife, that I could not accommodate them, they got quarters at one of my neighbors' houses. The colonel visited me the next day and spent the day with me. He observed, whilst here, that his funds were getting short and as a means of recruiting them, he must sell something. He proposed to me to exchange Watches—he priced his at $30 more than mine, which sum I paid him, and we accordingly exchanged.

With his open frankness, his natural honesty of expression, his perfect want of concealment, I could not but be very much pleased. And with a hope that it might be an accommodation to him, I was gratified at the exchange, as it gave me a keep-sake which would often remind me of an honest man, a good citizen and a pioneer in the cause of liberty, amongst his suffering brethren in Texas.

His military career was short. But though I deeply lament his death, I cannot restrain my American smile at the recollection of the fact that he died as a United States soldier should die, covered with his slain enemy, and, even in death presenting to them in his clenched hands, the weapons of their destruction.

We hope that the day is not far distant when his adopted country will be freed from a savage enemy, and afford to yourself and children, a home, rendered in every way comfortable, by the liberal donations of her government.

Accept, dear inamor, for yourself and family, the most sincere wishes for your future happiness, of

Your most obedient servant and friend,

ISAAC N. JONES.

MR. MADISON AND THE CONSTITUTION From the Boston Atlas.

The decease of Mr. Madison, the survivor of the members of the convention of Philadelphia, necessarily draws the attention of the public mind to that assembly of statesmen, and to the great work there accomplished. It has already been remarked that the profound secrecy with which their debates were conducted, and the scrupulous adherence of the members to the injunction not to disclose any part of the proceedings, leave us without the ordinary means of information as to the progress of their labors. Facts have since transpired calculated rather to awaken than to satisfy curiosity. Some of them have already been noticed in our former remarks.

In the library of the historical society in this city, are copies of two printed drafts of the constitution, in the condition in which it stood before the convention, at different periods of the session. They are curious documents for the student of constitutional history. It is understood that only sixty copies were printed for the use of the members, under the inspection of a committee, and probably no other copies are now in existence, than those above mentioned.

The two drafts are, in many respects, essentially different. It may, perhaps, be difficult to designate their relative character, except only that the powers of the government are less distinctly marked in the first than the second, and that these powers, whenever conferred, or by whatever branch to be exercised, are less trammelled by limitations than in our existing constitution.

In the first draft the executive department was to be in a president, chosen for seven years, by congress, and afterwards ineligible, to be styled his excellency—to appoint, by his own authority, all officers not otherwise provided for, and to be commander-in-chief of the army, navy and militia of the U. States. The clause by which this latter power is now limited in our constitution, and which limitation gave so much trouble during the late war, is not therein inserted.

On the other hand, the power "to make treaties, appoint ambassadors and judges of the supreme court," is taken from the president, and vested altogether in the senate of the U. States.

This first printed draft of the constitution was ordered after the very troublesome question of representation in the house and senate, which at one time had nearly dissolved the convention, and had been adjusted by the grand committee, of which Mr. Gerry was chairman, as we have already mentioned, so that it may be thought that the scheme then presented had a very fair chance of ultimate success.

Now, there is a private history in this matter, which, if Mr. Madison has not revealed, will be forever lost to posterity.

Up to this period, governor Randolph and governor Gerry, the leading representatives of two distinct classes of political men, heartily united in putting their shoulders to the wheel, and endeavoring, by every exertion they could make, to press the convention to a successful issue. There is abundant evidence that, up to this time, both those gentlemen, and the members with whom they acted, were exceedingly conciliatory in their views, yielding up favorite projects, and submitting to changes in detail, in the hopes of accomplishing their objects; and it is certain that, at almost any time previous, if they had voted in opposition, the convention would have been dissolved. Yet, after the alterations made in the first draft by the second, both these members became so hostile to the instrument that they refused their signatures; and it is believed that several who would have declined signing the first, concurred in, or at least accepted the second.

We cannot learn the cause of this refusal by the one party, or concurrence by the other, from an inspection of the printed copies, especially as governor Randolph, governor Gerry and Mr. Luther Martin, the then attorney general of Maryland, (considered the best red lawyer in the convention), who also refused his signature, had no very strong bond of political sympathy. We rather conjecture that the result was brought about by the want of some provisions which these gentlemen, or at least the two first named, desired to add to the draft before it left the convention.

Governor Gerry's objections, as communicated by him to the legislature of Massachusetts, would apply as well to the first as the second. Governor Randolph's, if we may judge by his subsequent conduct, would more strongly apply to the first; and the attorney general of Maryland's statement went equally against both.

In some way or other, state rights were at the bottom of the difficulty. Massachusetts and Virginia probably felt that their former superiority in the union would not be retained, and that little Maryland did not find that her former insignificance would afterwards cease. But what we suspect is, that the jealous republicans of the convention felt afraid that too much was to be trusted to the administration of the government in settling the condition of the country.

It was a favorite, if not a popular maxim, that, as to government, and to this doctrine these men could not submit.

"That which is best administered is best."

On this topic, about which we have a stronger interest than mere curiosity, we hope to be enlightened by the forthcoming work of Mr. Madison.

State of Maryland, city of Baltimore, &c.

On this sixth day of August, 1836, before me, the subscriber, a justice of the peace of the state of Maryland, residing in the city of Baltimore, personally appeared Richard Lemmon, Robert Barry and James Cheston, and made oath that the foregoing return, signed by them, is just and true to the best of their knowledge and belief. THE PUBLIC LAND FRAUDS, &c.

In perusing a very interesting circular letter from the honorable RICE GARLAND, one of the representatives in congress from Louisiana, we were so much interested in the subjoined passage, that we have thought we could not do better than lay it before our readers. It gives, in a condensed form, from responsible authority, an account of what passed in the house of representatives on the subject of the alleged land frauds, at the late session of congress. [Nat. Intelligencer.

Extract from Mr. Garland's circular.

The war that has been for months past waged with the Seminole Indians in Florida, still continues. That which has more recently commenced with a portion of the Creek nation is likely to be brought to a more speedy termination. These wars will cost the country from five to six millions of dollars, in all probability, and a loss of life that cannot be appreciated. If the truth shall ever be known in relation to the causes of these wars, I hazard very little in saying that they have arisen more from the oppressions and frauds practised with impunity on the Indians by the citizens of one or two states, than from any other cause. It is the duty of the government to protect and defend our citizens, be the causes of war whatever they may, and I have voted for every appropriation for that purpose; yet I cannot refrain from saying that, if the tomahawk and scalping knife were, or could be made to fall only on the heads of the heartless speculators, their fate would not excite either my sympathy or regret.

Within a few days of the close of the session, a petition from about eight hundred residents of the states of Georgia and Alabama was presented to the house of representatives. It stated that shameful and outrageous frauds had been practised on the Creek Indians, which they had no doubt had brought on the war. They intimated, in terms that could be understood, that some of those who had been engaged in practising frauds upon the Indians had been instrumental in exciting them to hostilities, the better, it is supposed, to conceal their share in them. They asked congress to adopt some course calculated to ascertain the frauds, and bring to justice the perpetrators of them. A proposal was made to refer the petition to a committee of the house, to be invested with full power to send for witnesses and documents, and, if necessary, to proceed to the Indian country, to examine into the alleged frauds, and recommend the adoption of such measures as might be deemed necessary to expose the fraudulent transactions, do justice to the Indians, and punish the guilty. A proposition so fair and reasonable was resisted by the great body of the friends of the administration, and voted down by them; and the petition of a large number of citizens, addressed to congress, asking that body to provide a remedy for alleged wrongs and gross frauds, was sent to the president to make inquiries, and take such measures as he might deem proper to correct the evils of which the petitioners complained.

This is but one instance, among several others, in which the friends of the administration, during the late session, have resisted or evaded inquiries by committees into the manner in which the public business has been transacted. The committee on Indian affairs, at an early period of the session, asked for authority to send for documents and papers, and to examine witnesses, stating it was necessary an investigation should be made into the manner our Indian affairs were administered. The authority was given, and I have understood the committee were diligently employed afterwards in their examinations. They were necessarily extensive, and required much time. A few days previous to the adjournment, a short report or statement was made to the house by the chairman, acting, as he said, under the unanimous direction of the committee, in which he stated, in substance, that the committee had not been able to get through the investigation with which they had been charged; that they had ascertained enough to satisfy them it ought to be continued; and asked further authority to sit during the recess of congress, for the purpose of proceeding with the taking of testimony. This committee was composed of supporters and opponents of the administration. They were unanimously of opinion, as I understood, that they ought to be permitted to continue in session; but it was refused by the casting vote of the speaker.

Attempts were made at other periods of the session to investigate the transactions of other departments of the government. The connexion between the treasury department, the deposit banks and their agent or agents, was the subject of one resolution. It was proposed to examine into the administration of the affairs of the general land office, and the operations of the land system generally; and a gentleman from Virginia offered various resolutions to raise committees to examine each department of the government, and to lay its proceedings before the people; but his resolutions were not adopted.

On the 20th of June last, a resolution to raise a committee to inquire into the alleged combinations and connexions between members of congress, different officers of the general government, and the deposit banks, for the purpose of speculating in the public lands with the public money, was adopted, and the committee appointed; a majority of whom were decided friends and supporters of the administration. They made some progress in the examination with which they were charged; but not being able to complete the investigation, from the advanced period of the session, they made a report in part, which concluded with certain resolutions, which I copy as they are printed by the printers to the house.

"Mr. Hunt, from the select committee appointed to inquire, whether members of congress or others had procured public moneys of the deposit banks, for the purpose of speculating in the public lands, made a report, accompanied by the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the select committee appointed by this house, on the 20th June, 1836, be increased to nine, and that said committee have power to sit during the recess of this house.

"Resolved, That said committee embrace in their inquiries any connexion between deposit banks or others, and the land offices for the purposes of speculation.

"Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to whom, for speculation in public lands, the deposit banks have issued certificates of deposit without an actual deposit in cash, and to what extent they have been received in payment for purchases of public lands at the several land offices.

"Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to what extent, combinations in the purchase of the public lands have been formed, or are forming, sufficiently strong, from interested motives, to control to any extent the legislative action of congress."

Very grave matter is involved in these resolutions, certainly deserving investigation; and it came before us in a very imposing manner, being the report of a committee specially appointed. Yet the house of representatives refused to adopt the resolutions and continue the committee. I know nothing personally of the transactions alluded to; but rumors and reports affirming the facts, were in circulation here, in which the name of a very high public functionary was mentioned.

I have felt it my duty to lay these circumstances before you, that you may draw your own inferences from them. The impression made on my mind is, that investigation and examination into the manner in which our affairs have been and are conducted, so far from being invited, as it would have been if every thing was right and proper, has openly resisted, or evaded by the operation of parliamentary rules.

A PACKET SHIP.

In nothing has our country made more rapid progress than in the science of naval architecture—especially in the construction of ships of war and packet ships. The following description of the Oxford, from the New York "Express," will afford our readers some idea of the strength and beauty of the latter, which are not surpassed by any ships of their kind in the world.

We have heretofore adverted to the splendid ship Oxford, lately launched, and belonging to the old line of Liverpool packets; and we cannot but recur to the subject again, for the purpose of noticing the beauty of her model, elegance of arrangement, and perfectness of thing on board of her throughout.

The Oxford is nearly 850 tons measurement, and will probably carry a larger cargo than any other merchant vessel belonging to the United States. For strength, she is certainly unsurpassed by any ship now afloat; among other improvements we noticed that every stanchion in her hold was strengthened by braces secured to the deck beams. The Oxford has many conveniences facilitating the reception and discharge of her cargo; among others may be observed a port hole on each side, cased with iron, between decks, for taking in and delivering iron, lead, rail road bars and other small, but heavy articles, and which will save an immense amount of hard hoisting. On entering the gangway may be observed on the forward part the arms of Great Britain, on the after side the American eagle; under each are two hands firmly clasped—emblematical of the present happy union which exists between the mother and daughter. The carving on the stern and about the head, is quite classical, and very appropriate to the name of the ship, representing a student reclining among books, maps, globes and other articles pertaining to a collegiate life. The arms of the city of Oxford would have been rather uncouth, being simply an Ox crossing a ford. On the main deck are the state rooms of the commander and first officer. The location chosen by these important personages, proves that they intend to be constantly on hand—and that they mean to keep the deck, in their watch below. There is also on deck a convenience and comfort for passengers, which does not exist on board of but two other packet ships out of the port—we mean the bathing house. This is a most excellent arrangement, which we hope to see followed up by all the packets to be built hereafter.

Now let us walk below, which we can do by a staircase on either side. The cabin is about 60 feet in length, finished with rose wood, satin wood, maple and mahogany, richly intermingled, and with a mirror-like surface; the deck and the state rooms covered with the softest Turkey carpeting, furnished with luxurious sofas, a well arranged library, and all other "appliances and means to boot," so as to furnish the greatest possible degree of comfort for those who make this palace of the waters their temporary home. The accommodations are for about 50 cabin passengers, and we are pleased to see that most of the state rooms are already engaged for her first passage on the 15th inst. The steward's pantry is a perfect bijou, well filled with numberless good things. We had almost forgotten to notice the elegance, and many conveniences of the ladies' cabin, which is finished and furnished in the most sumptuous and comfortable style. In fact there is nothing which experience could suggest, or which wealth can procure, that has not been supplied in the most lavish manner, for this beautiful specimen of American naval architecture.

The Oxford is 148 feet on deck, 34 feet beam, and 21½ feet hold. She is manned by 35 persons, including officers, and from her peculiarly elegant model, we doubt not she will prove one of the fastest ships which skims the ocean. It is but proper to remark that the finishing of the cabin was by those very clever young artists, Johnston & Smith, and the upholstery by Phyle & Brown, whose names are a guarantee for the manner in which their labors have been performed. Webb & Allen, builders, will long consider the Oxford as their pet.

Yesterday afternoon, in company with a multitude of friends, of both sexes, we accepted a polite invitation from the proprietors, to visit the new ship. Every nook and corner was crowded to overflowing. A neat and splendid entertainment, such as the epicure might envy, was served up tastefully and in great abundance. A brilliant audience of ladies and gentlemen graced the festive board, and with no single exception, we believe, all were highly delighted with every thing around them. The Oxford sails in a few days. May the breezes of heaven give her a safe and speedy voyage.

THE FRIGATE INDEPENDENCE.

This fine frigate was taken out of the dry dock, at Charlestown navy yard, and hauled round to the adjacent wharf to receive her masts, yesterday. The operation of floating her out of the dock was very interesting, and attracted the fixed attention of more than a thousand spectators, of both sexes. Governor Everett and family, and several other gentlemen and ladies were on board, as was also com. Downes, who assumed the immediate direction of the exciting and critical operation. Many spectators, stationed about in the receiving ship Columbus, had a favorable position for observation, and the remainder, entirely surrounding the margin of the dock formed a continuous, yet ever mutable and picturesque border, as seen from the decks of the Independence. About half past eleven two small vents were opened in the dock-gates, and two others near the bottom of the dock, and suddenly the waters leaped in, at each aperture, like bounding animals, each counter current gashing against the others, till the whole body of water was lashed into a milk-white foam.

As witnessed from the stern ports, this furious conflict of the currents, boiling, dashing, and then dying away forward—was an exceedingly animating spectacle. Gradually the water rose above the inlets, and the turmoil subsided, and at 12 o'clock the "shores" which had hitherto supported the frigate began to drop one by one from their positions and glide along side. She floated in 18 feet of water. As soon as the waters within and without were in equilibrio—20 feet deep—the bridges on the gates were cleared of spectators, the gates thrown open, and the frigate thrown open without perceptible motion. Nothing could exceed the ease, regularity, and simplicity of the manœuvres by which this result was effected. Every thing was in time and place.

Notwithstanding the large number of persons present—some of whom collected on the steps descending into the dock, and were within imprudent proximity to the frigate—not the slightest accident or incident occurred to mar the gratification derived from the spectacle.

The Independence was hauled up about a year since. She was then a 74, but has been razed and almost entirely rebuilt and is now only a double banked frigate, but mounts sixty thirty-two pounders. She is considered to be superior in every respect to the old fashioned seventy-fours—being deeper between decks, yet presenting less surface to the fire of an enemy.

CASE OF MAJOR GATES.

Expression of public opinion. At a meeting of the Barnwell volunteers, held at the court house, on Monday, the 1st August, 1836, in pursuance of public notice, to take into consideration the dismissal of major Gates, of the U. States army, capt. Joseph D. Allen was called to the chair, and lieut. J. J. Ryan appointed secretary.

On motion of William H. Allen, the following gentlemen were appointed a committee to draft a preamble and resolutions: James Patterson, Samuel Overstreet and John S. Brown.

The committee retired for a few moments, and returned, and reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

It is with feelings of sincere regret that we have learned the dismissal of major Gates from the army of the United States, for an alleged breach of duty while commanding at Fort Barnwell, Volusia; and as a company left at, and for the protection of that post, under the command of major Gates, we deem it a duty we owe to the country at large, and to the character of a brave and gallant officer, to lay before the public such facts as are not generally known, and which we consider calculated to remove all censure from the conduct of major Gates.

Fort Barnwell, situated on the St. John's river, was established for the protection of provisions brought up from Picolata, and was considered to be the rendezvous of the left wing of the army in Florida, from whence the left wing, composed of regulars and volunteers from South Carolina, under the command of general Eustis, were regularly to draw their provisions and ammunition stores, while acting against the enemy on the Wythlacoochee.

The location of this fort is peculiarly unfavorable; situated in an old field, skirted above and below with an impenetrable river swamp, at the distance of from one hundred and fifty yards to two hundred, together with a thick hammock, at the distance of two hundred and fifty yards, directly in front, and a high hill between the hammock and the fort; the fort itself was rudely constructed, built of imperfect materials, thrown up in great haste, and under many disadvantages.

For the protection of this fort two hundred and ninety odd men were left; more than one-half of whom were detached from different companies, in consequence of sickness, being afflicted with various diseases which are so well known to have prevailed throughout the army, and were unable to proceed further on the march. Captains Allen and Quantlebum's companies consisted, together, of about one hundred and thirty men. When Quantlebum arrived at the fort, he had not more than fifteen men considered fit for duty. Allen's company was at first in good health, but soon at least one-half became affected with the maladies of camp, and we were compelled to procure men out of the number of those not yet recovered of the measles and other diseases, to perform guard duty. During our stay at Fort Barnwell nearly every man of us was some time prostrated with sickness, and at no time were there more than from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and forty men capable of performing duty.

On the morning of the 14th April, while a small party from the fort were engaged in digging a grave beyond the hill, near the hammock, they were fired upon by the Indians, and two of their number killed; the others succeeded in reaching the fort; in a few minutes we were fired upon on every side, by a foe, whose numbers were unknown, as but few of the savages were seen, in comparison to the number of rifles fired. The attack lasted for some time, when the enemy finally appeared to collect on the south east side, behind the hill before mentioned, and, in the swamp and hammock on that side, continued to fire upon us. We fought them from our pickets. Major Gates himself personally superintended the firing of the howitzer—sergeant Holliday, who was acquainted with the management of the howitzer, and who had been detailed for that duty, having been one of the two who were killed while digging the grave. The major acted with the utmost firmness and intrepidity. He did not make a sortie; for this he was censured by the commanding general of the left wing. At the major's own request a court of inquiry was held—the result is known.

It is not our purpose to censure the conduct of any; our only desire is, that justice may be done to a gallant officer, who has devoted nearly thirty years of his life to the service of his country, and who, in every situation, in peace and in war, has honorably sustained the character of an American soldier. We say, then, from every circumstance connected with the attack on Fort Barnwell, that major Gates acted perfectly right in not making a sortie. He acted as an officer should have acted. The fort, at best, was a temporary affair. A few days previous to the attack, one side had been taken down for the purpose of enlarging it, and was on that occasion not finished, having the picketing hastily stuck up. The provisions, both for man and horse, were on the outside, together with the ammunition and medical stores, which might have been easily destroyed. If major Gates had then made a sortie, there were not more than one hundred and thirty men sufficiently well to have accompanied him. Of the one hundred and sixty odd men who would have been left in the fort, one-half were recovering from sickness, and the other half too sick to do any thing whatever.

Major Gates would have been compelled to attack the enemy from the open field, unprotected, while he was concealed behind the hill, in the hammock and swamp. If he had succeeded in routing the Indians, they would have fled through a hammock and swamp so impenetrable, that none but the furious blood-hound could have followed them. If they had succeeded in routing him, they might have then rushed into the fort, and massacred a garrison worn out with sickness and fatigue. What might have been the consequences attending the loss of this fort to the army of general Eustis? That general had lost major Gates, when he left Fort Barnwell, that in eight or ten days he would send back for provisions. Suppose, then, by some precipitate or ill-judged movement, major Gates had lost the fort—suppose general Eustis had taken a different route from the one he did take, and, according to his own word, had sent back to the fort for provisions for his army, and his baggage train had found the fort and provisions destroyed—is it not clear that the lives of thirteen or fourteen hundred men would have been jeopardized?

From every circumstance, then, connected with the attack on Fort Barnwell, we feel fully justified in saying that, had major Gates made a sortie, it must have been one in which he could at best have gained nothing, and in which he might probably have lost every thing; for we did not know, neither do we now know, the real force by which we were assailed. Therefore,

Resolved, That the conduct of major Gates, during the attack on Fort Barnwell, merits our highest approbation; and we sincerely regret that circumstances have been so represented as to induce the president to strike his name from the roll of the army.

Resolved, That the conduct of major Gates, not only during the attack on Fort Barnwell, but towards the officers and soldiers under his command, on every occasion, entitles him to our warmest thanks and esteem; that we are gratified to learn his intention of placing his case more fully before the president, and that we shall hail with pleasure his restoration to the service of his country.

Resolved, That, should the president not deem it compatible, upon the representations which have been made to him in relation to major Gates, to restore him to the service, he would be acting in conformity with the wishes of many of his fellow citizens, by giving him a court martial.

Resolved, That copies of this preamble and resolutions be signed by the chairman and secretary, and forwarded to major Gates and the president of the United States.

Resolved, That the papers in Washington city, Charleston, Augusta, Georgia, New Orleans, Boston and New York, will confer a favor by publishing the above preamble and resolutions.

JOSEPH D. ALLEN, chairman.

INDIAN TRIBES.

From the Nashville Banner.

Nashville, Aug. 1st, 1836.

MR. EDITOR: As the public mind has been and still is somewhat excited with regard to the situation of our western frontier, and the state being now under a requisition of general Gaines for a regiment of mounted gunmen to maintain its defence, I have thought it would not be uninteresting to the public to know the names and numbers of the Indian tribes on that frontier. The statement is taken from an estimate accompanying a map of survey, shewing the geographical and relative position of the different tribes which was prepared at the topographical bureau during the present year, which I have not yet seen published.

Those stated as western tribes extend along the whole western frontier. And taking as true the opinion of the department, that the average number of an Indian family is four, it may be seen what number of warriors, by possibility, might be brought into the field, and what number on the other hand might be required to keep them in check.

By publishing the foregoing statement you will oblige your humble servant,

MR. VAN BUREN AND THE ANTI-MASONS.

From the Pittsburgh Gazette.
Pittsburgh, August 8, 1836.

To the editors of the Gazette:

GENTLEMEN: Inclosed you will find a copy of the letter addressed by the honorable Martin Van Buren to the committee appointed by the late national anti-masonic convention. I will thank you to publish it in your paper. Very respectfully,
W. W. IRWIN.

Washington, May 19, 1836.

GENTLEMEN: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, communicating to me a resolution adopted by the "national anti-masonic convention," recently assembled at Philadelphia, instructing you to ask me whether, if elected president of the United States, I would appoint adhering masons to office, and have the honor to state, in reply, that I should not, in the event alluded to, feel it to be my duty to inquire whether applicants for office were either adhering masons or opponents of the masonic institution. Whilst the fact of any such applicant being an adhering mason would certainly not be regarded by me as constituting a ground of preference, I could not at the same time, look upon either circumstance as creating a disqualification for office, if the applicant should prove to be in all other respects, well entitled thereto. I am, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. VAN BUREN.

ICE ISLANDS IN THE PACIFIC.

We have been favored, says the New York Express, through our attentive correspondent at New London, with an interesting account of large bodies of ice, fallen in with ship Mentor, which arrived at New London on Sunday. We give the description in capt. Rice's own language.

"May 19th. Fresh gales from N. N. W. and hazy, at 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ P. M. heading E. by N. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. saw three large icebergs direct in our course; at 5 P. M. (dark) considering it unsafe to run, took in sail and hove too, head to E. N. E.—at 10 P. M. set the fore-sail, and stood leisurely along—saw many icebergs, and were under the necessity of veering each way to keep the ship clear of them; saw 17 large islands, and many smaller ones in the course of the night. At 4 A. M. finding as far as we could see a clear space, free from ice, wore ship westward, and concluded to lay by until daylight; at 8 A. M. (daylight) thick and raining; at 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ brightened up a little, discovered that we were completely embayed in the ice on all sides, and none of it farther from us than a mile, could not see any place of egress—the ice forming a complete circle around us, made sail and commenced beating to windward—could not see more than a ship's length. At 11 A. M. discovered the passage by which we entered—at 12 were out of our ice lagoon—the 'chops' extending each side of the entrance two to three miles, and were compact; many small islands in the 'entrance.' The chops presented two square sides 300 feet high—the surface smooth as a mirror, and apparently 4 to 5 miles square. At this time in lat. 56 00 S. lon. 108 00 W.

"20th. Fresh gale from northward, and raining, at 1 P. M. lighting up, saw many icebergs, very large, in all directions, from the size of a boat to islands 500 feet high, and 4 to 6 miles circumference; at 5 P. M. heading N. could see none in our way, having all in sight astern, and being dark, hove too, latter part calm, foggy, drizzling rain—could see nothing but 'long faces.' No observation.

"From the 25th May to 4th June generally thick, with strong breezes from W. S. W. to S. E. On latter date were in lat. 50 39, lon. 79, W. Saw many islands of ice during the whole time—some of them very large.

"The first ice we saw was in the afternoon of the 18th May—very foggy—studding sails all set, going at the rate of 7 knots—discovered it immediately ahead, and only a mile off, and in two minutes or so could not see it at all, on account of the density of the atmosphere. It had the appearance of land, and by some on board was so pronounced. We, however, soon corrected the error—on the night of the 19th we became embayed as before stated, and were amidst ice until June 4th, a period of 17 days—which is a strong argument to do away the old established idea of 'no ice to the westward of Cape Horn,' we saw none, nor the least indication of it to eastward of longitude 79 west, and it was in greater abundance in 56 lat. S. than to southward or northward of that parallel."

AN ESSAY ON CALCAREOUS MANURES.

BY EDMUND RUFFIN, OF VIRGINIA. SMALL 8vo. pp. 242. From London's (London) Gardener's Magazine.

The object of this essay, Mr. Ruffin informs us, is to investigate the peculiar features and qualities of the soils of tide-water districts of Lower Virginia; "to show the causes of their general unproductiveness; and to point out means, as yet but little used, for their effectual and profitable improvement." The sterility of these soils Mr. Ruffin has ascertained to arise from their being destitute of calcareous earth, and from their being injured by the presence of vegetable acid.

After two chapters on earths and soils generally, and on the soils and state of agriculture in the tide-water districts of Virginia, the author treats of the different capacities of soils for improvements, and discusses the following propositions:

1. "Soils naturally poor, and soils reduced to poverty by cultivation, are essentially different in their powers of retaining putrescent manures; and, under like circumstances, the fitness of any soil to be enriched by these manures, is in proportion to what was its natural fertility.

2. "The natural sterility of the soils of Lower Virginia is caused by such soils being destitute of calcareous earth, and their being injured by the presence and effects of vegetable acid.

3. "The fertilizing effects of calcareous earth are chiefly produced by its power of neutralizing acids, and of combining putrescent manures with soils, between which there would otherwise be but little, if any, chemical attraction.

4. "Poor and acid soils cannot be improved durably or profitably, by putrescent manures, without previously making them calcareous, and thereby correcting the defect in their constitution.

5. "Calcareous manures will give to our worst soils a power of retaining putrescent manures equal to that of the best; and will cause more productiveness, and yield more profit, than any other improvement practicable in Lower Virginia." (p. 30.)

These propositions contain the marrow of the essay, which is closely reasoned, and, in several particulars, original. Mr. Ruffin has the merit of first pointing out that there can be no such thing as a naturally fertile soil, without the presence of calcareous earth; but, where this earth is present, the soil, however exhausted it may have been by culture, will, when left to itself, after a time regain its original fertility: that soils which contain no calcareous earth are never found naturally fertile, except masses or beds of vegetable matter, which are not properly soils; and that all that art can do to them, exclusive of adding calcareous earth, is, to force crops by putrescent manures; but that, when these manures are withheld, the soil will speedily revert to its original sterility. Mr. Ruffin observes that no agricultural or chemical writer ever denied these facts; but he asserts, and we think with truth, that by not one of them have they ever been distinctly stated. We are not quite certain as to Grisenthwaite, but we are so as to Kirwan, Dundonald, Davy, Chaptal and other agricultural chemists of the continent. Mr. Ruffin allows that it might be inferred from the ingredients exhibited by the analysis of fertile soils, as given by these chemists, that calcareous earth was an ingredient essential to permanent fertility; but still none of them have ever distinctly said so. We shall probably examine the work more in detail hereafter: in the mean time, it is due to Mr. Ruffin to state it as our opinion that he has performed a very important service to the scientific agriculturalist in this country, as well as in America.

EXTRAORDINARY PERFORMANCE OF A LOCOMOTIVE.

We published some weeks ago a hasty paragraph respecting the ascent of the inclined plane near the Schuylkill of the Philadelphia and Columbia rail road, by a locomotive dragging passenger cars.

We now take from the Rail Road Journal of 30th July, a statement by the editor of that journal, who was a witness of what he relates, of a second performance, which seems to exceed greatly every expectation previously entertained of the capability of a locomotive to overcome elevations.

We take this opportunity to commend the number of the Rail Road Journal from which we make this extract—it is that of 30th ult.—to the particular attention of all who may chance to see it. Its contents are of the greatest interest to persons embarked in the cause of internal improvement, and should, we think, procure for the journal very extensive circulation and patronage.

Excursion to Philadelphia, and remarkable performance of the locomotive "George Washington."

In pursuance of our request, Mr. Norris made arrangements with the commissioners of the Columbia rail road for the use of his locomotive.

Tuesday, July the 19th, was the day appointed for the trial.

We left here on Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock, accompanied by Mr. George N. Miner of this city, Mr. Theo. Schwartz, of Paris, and Messrs. Elliot and Beas, of Alabama. Mr. S. who was to sail for Europe the next day, gladly made the trip, with a view to carry home his own testimony as an eye witness.

On Tuesday morning, two cars, drawn by horses, set out with a party of upwards of forty. We arrived at the foot of the inclined plane before 6 o'clock, while the rails were yet quite wet with dew.

On our arrival, it was found that, owing to accident or design, while fire was burning, the water had been blown out of the boiler so as to endanger the tubes. The result was a leakage of some consequence during the day.

The engine started at the foot of the plane and on the plane. After proceeding a few feet, the wheels were found to slip, and the engine returned. It was said that the rails were found to have been oiled at this place. A small quantity of sand was thrown over the spot and the engine again proceeded. She regularly and steadily gained speed as she advanced to the very top, passing over the plane in 2 min. 24 sec. The enthusiasm of feeling manifested cannot be described. So complete a triumph had never been obtained. The doubts that had been entertained by some, and the fears of others, were dispelled in an instant. The eager look that settled upon every one's face, gave way to that of confident success, while all present expressed their gratification in loud and repeated cheers.

The length of the plane is 2,800 feet.

The grade 369 feet to the mile, or 1 foot rise in 14.3, which is a much steeper grade than the planes on the Mohawk and Hudson rail road, those being 1 in 18.

Making an ascent of 196 feet in 2,800 feet.

Weight of engine with water, 14,930 lbs.

Load drawn up the plane, including weight of tender with water and coal, two passenger cars and 53 passengers, 31,270.

Pressure in the boiler, less than 80 lbs. to the square inch.

Time of running, 2 min. 24 sec.

It is to be remembered that the rails were wet with dew.

As to the oil, it was afterwards mentioned that bets were made with the workmen to a considerable amount, and those having been lost by the successful performance of the engine on a former day, were now quadrupled, and to save themselves it is not unlikely that this means was provided to accelerate the descent rather than the ascent of the engine.

The party again embarked after examining the workshops, and proceeded to Paoli to breakfast, and thence to Lancaster, the engine conveying in at the same time a number of freight cars.

The unfortunate location of this road is very evident, frequent and short curves are introduced so uniformly, that it would be supposed that such a location was to be preferred to a direct one. Having a desire to witness during the passage the surrounding country, which is most beautiful, we seated ourselves on the outside; but alas! we were obliged to recall our practice at ducking the head, acquired on the Erie canal. In transverse bridges this may be excused, but in viaducts for the rail road itself—if this must be covered—we see no reason for leaving not more than a foot clearance from the top of the cars. The locomotive bows its chimney head most respectfully to every one of the bridges: meanwhile, the smoke, unstained of its sparks, fills the small space left, and most effectually dreges the passenger. The practice of using but three rails for two tracks is most villainous, especially as the bridges are covered.

We arrived safely at Lancaster and partook of an excellent dinner.

After dinner, the company were presented to governor Ritner, who was then in town. He afterwards accompanied the party some few miles from Lancaster and back again, when he left us, much gratified with his rapid journey.

We returned in a large 8 wheel car, a form that we much admired.

The whole weight attached to the engine (tender, &c. included), must have been over 14 tons, if not 15. The time of running (exclusive of stoppage), from Lancaster to the head of the Schuylkill inclined plane, was 3 h. 11 m. being a distance of nearly 67 miles. This, it is to be remembered, was over a road having curvatures of less than 600 feet radius, up ascents of, sometimes, 45 feet per mile. On level and straight portions of the road, a velocity of 47 miles was attained.

As the trip had already been protracted, this engine was obliged to leave at the head of the plane, on her return to Lancaster the same evening, and we descended by the rope.

The bridge at this point, over the Schuylkill, is a very fine one, the masonry being of a very substantial character.

The following are the dimensions of the "George Washington" engine of Mr. William Norris:

Number of cylinders.....	10 1-4 inches
Length of stroke.....	17 5 8 "
Number of tubes.....	78 "
Outside diameter.....	2 "
Length.....	7 feet
Diameter of driving wheels.....	4 "
" " " " " " " " " " " "	30 inches

The engine is six wheeled, having two driving wheels.

Whole weight of engine.....14,930 lbs.

Actual weight on driving wheels.....3,700 "

It must be remembered that there is no contrivance, as in some engines, for increasing the adhesion by throwing the weight of the tender upon the engines—the axle being in front of the fire box, preventing any such arrangement.

This engine, we are informed, is making the regular trips; though a full load has not yet been obtained, on account of the scarcity of cars.

The greatest load, as yet, drawn by it over the road, was 119 tons, gross weight, in 22 cars. The engineer confidently expects to draw 150 tons, at 12 or 15 miles per hour. She now usually works with 70 lbs. pressure of steam. Mr. Norris considers that these fine effects are owing to an improvement in the adjustment of the valves—which he has attained after a long series of experiments.

MR. O'CONNELL'S ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND.

"Hereditary bondsmen, know ye not,

"Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow!"

London, July 4, 1836.

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN: I address Irishmen of every rank and profession, of every creed and station, from the peer to the peasant—from the wealthiest merchant to the poorest laborer—from the highest archbishop to the most humble of curates—Protestants, Catholics, Presbyterians, Dissenters—I address them all.

I do call on them—on each and on all—first, to understand the precise state of Irish affairs, to understand it thoroughly; and, secondly, to act as integrity and honor shall and do dictate.

This, then, is the state of Ireland. It can be portrayed in a few distinct propositions:—

First. Ireland is one of the most fertile countries in the world, and one of the most productive of all the necessities of life. She has the poorest population of any other country on the face of the globe.

Second. Abundance and starvation go hand in hand—provisions are exported in abundance, the people are perishing from starvation.

Third. In Ireland the church is established, and endowed by law with national wealth, is the richest in the world. It has the smallest number of votaries; the Protestants are comparatively the smallest number in any country called Protestant in the world.

Fourth. Again, the richest Protestant church in the world is surrounded by the poorest Catholic population.

Fifth. This poorest Catholic population in the world are compelled by law to support one church with which they hold no spiritual communion; and compelled by conscience to support another church with which they are in communion. Thus the poorest Catholic population in the world is burdened with two churches—its own and a strange one.

Sixth. The lands of Ireland produce in rent, it is calculated, £12,000,000 sterling annually. The precise amount is not material to our present purpose, it being certain that such rents amount to many millions. Yet there is an almost complete deficiency of capital for agricultural improvement. This almost unnoticed phenomenon is, perhaps, one of the most significant of general poverty and distress; but this, alas! is not matter of theory, for—

Seventh. Ireland pays to absentees a tribute amounting certainly to more than £6,000,000—probably exceeding £7,000,000 sterling annually; while out of the 8,000,000 of her inhabitants, the enormous and most appalling number of more, much more, than 3,000,000 are actual beggars, living for a considerable part, or for the entire, of the year, on alms and charity.

Eighth. The people who are thus immersed in poverty are the most ready and anxious for employment. They are among the best, if not the very best, laborers in the world; indeed, they traverse the globe to find employment. Besides the swarms they send out as permanent operatives in the factories and cities of Great Britain, scores of thousands of them travel on foot 1,000 miles and upwards, in coming and going, from the remotest part of Connaught to the extreme of Kent, and all intermediate places, to earn the wages of a few weeks in each harvest.

Ninth. The climate of Ireland is very salubrious—the soil of Ireland is exuberantly fertile—the mineral treasures of Ireland in coal, lead and copper ores, are known to be abundant. The impetuous streams of Ireland furnish a mill power cheap in its nature, and, at the same time, greater in efficient quantity than in any country of five times its extent in the world. Its navigable rivers intersect the fairer and richer parts of the island for hundreds of miles, and form at their mouths estuaries which furnish secure ports for the heaviest vessels for scores upon scores of leagues. The other harbors of Ireland are open at every hour of every tide, and secure from the violence of every wind that blows, while the position of Ireland, the westernmost land of Europe, the best eastern point for the trade of the myriads of new nations of America, entitles her to be the entrepot of the commerce of the universe.

Tenth. The people of Ireland are active; industrious, shrewd, intelligent, faithful, honest, moral, religious. In no country upon earth are there so few crimes committed in proportion to the population, against property or good morals—if you deduct, as you ought, the agrarian outrages which belong to a state of war, and partake altogether of the criminal nature of warfare. Again, the tenacity with which the Irish nation have adhered, through proscription, plunder and blood, to the faith they deemed best, entitles them to the admiration even of those who believe that faith erroneous.

Eleventh. With such a country—with such a people—the manufactures are few, the mines nearly unexplored, the commerce confined to the export of provisions, and the imports little more than for the consumption of the garrison, police, revenue and church establishment, while, it must be repeated, more than 3,000,000 of its inhabitants are living upon alms and charity.

Such is the state of Ireland—such are her capacities—such is her destitution. Understand this well; Ireland, the most capable of wealth and strength, and comfort and happiness, is involved in distress and dissension, destitution and faction, pitiless pelting, oppression and misery, in every shape and form, evils great and pressing for the present—miseries fearful and appalling in the prospect of the future.

Now this being understood, are there any facts—clear and undoubted facts—to explain these strange anomalies?

Yes, there are—clear and undoubted facts. Let us begin another series of numbers.

First. The Irish people have not for the last six centuries governed themselves. They have been ruled by English taskmasters, with one short and evanescent exception.

Second. The English government has unfortunately, under one pretext or another, refused to admit the Irish people into a community of equal rights and privileges.

Third. The Irish people have repeatedly—indeed almost continually—demanded, implored, beseeched, to be admitted into a community of laws and rights with England. They have been uniformly refused, except when they happened to be the strongest, and extorted a part of that which would otherwise have been withheld.

Fourth. Justice, justice to Ireland, required equal participation of rights with England. It was always refused upon one pretext or the other. The alienage in blood and in language was at first the pretext—the alienage in religion became the second.

Fifth. It is 500 years ago since this amalgamation of the two nations into one was pressed upon the paternal attention of Edward III. That monarch favored the plan; but history tells us that then, as now, justice to Ireland was refused by the "great lords," because, as they at that time candidly avowed, they had an interest in continuing the abuses; 500 years have not taught any wisdom to the "great lords" of the present day. There is nothing new under the sun.

Sixth. One beam of sunshine brightens the murky pages of Irish history. It is the glorious era of 1782, and a few succeeding years. The progress of Ireland in commerce, in comfort, in wealth, in literature, during that bright and transitory period, appears unequalled in any other story. But something like madness lies in its contemplation. I turn to other topics.

Seventh. The value of domestic government was known to Ireland only to embitter its loss. The union was determined on—and by treachery and blood—by corruption and military force, the union was effected. Let us not dwell on these things for the present, but they must be noticed.

Eighth. The pretext—the assigned cause—the justifying purpose of the union, was to do complete justice to Ireland—to amalgamate both nations into one—to give Ireland a full, an equal participation of all the rights, of all the liberties, of all the privileges of the English nation.

Ninth. By the union there were not to be two nations, but one nation—consensus was to be respected and free—the "paribus se legibus," the "invicte gentes," the "eterna in fœdera," were repeated until the repetition disgusted; they were proclaimed and praised, and sworn to by king, lords and commons.

Tenth. The principle of the union was justice to Ireland—equal justice—any other principle would have been a crime.

Eleventh. The compact at the union was justice to Ireland—equal justice. It was, to be sure, a forced compact on one part; but upon the part of England, which used that compulsion, the compact was only doubly binding on that account.

Twelfth. But this compact, like every other theretofore made by the English government with the Irish people, was violated so soon after it was made as it was perfectly safe to do so.

Thirteenth. Ireland was admitted into a full participation of all the burdens of England; she has been to this hour deprived of any equal or just participation of the liberties, rights and privileges of England.

Fourteenth. The first instalment of the debt due by England to the Irish people, by virtue of the union compact, was not conceded voluntarily, but was extorted by the concentrated energy of the Irish people, after a struggle of no less than 29 long and tedious years.

Fifteenth. Ireland continued, as before the union, to be governed by and for a faction. That faction was encouraged daily into greater insolence and more organization. Lord Anglesey—heaven help him!—rearmed the entire of the yeomanry of that faction.

Thus, until the last appointment of lord Melbourne's administration—until, indeed, lord Mulgrave became lord lieutenant, admirably choosing lord Morpeth for his secretary—until the government of lord Mulgrave, justice to Ireland was a name and a mockery; the faction were everything—the nation nothing. The bench, the crown lawyers, the officers of the revenue and customs, the magistracy, the grand jurors, and as often as possible the petit jurors, the sheriffs, the police—all, or nearly all, belonged to the faction; and rank and station, and honors and emoluments, were distributed in the exact proportion to the rancorous and successful exhibition of hate, malignity and peculating bigotry.

Such is the epitome of Irish history—such are the causes of Irish misery. The government has been upon a wrong basis; the people of Ireland have been governed with a wrong intention. Injustice, iniquity, partiality, the withholding of franchises and rights—in short, injustice has been the foul but continued basis of Irish government.

What man of common reflection, or gifted even with the slightest glimmering of common sense, but must see these two things—first, the prolific cause of the woes and destitution of Ireland—next, the obvious mode of changing her fate, and improving her fortunes?

Injustice has been the bane and curse of Ireland. Upon justice she builds her hope of melioration and improvement.

But a new era opened upon us—a new prospect brightened before us. The renewed administration of lord Melbourne felt the necessity as well as the propriety of doing justice to Ireland. Lord Mulgrave at once carried into practical effect all that the existing state of the law would allow him of fair play and impartiality; discountenancing every faction; looking to merit alone for the objects of his choice; banishing all considerations of sectarian preference or sectarian exclusion; despising with manly firmness, the threats and the calumnies of an infuriated and sanguinary party, and calmly doing equal justice to enemies as to friends. A young and a new hope sprung up for Ireland—ancient injuries and recent prosecutions and coercions were all, all forgotten or forgiven—and Ireland at length exulted in the expectation that her resources would be developed, her industry encouraged, her feuds healed, and her people combined in one bond of allegiance, interest, and freedom, with the hitherto more favored people of Britain.

But if the prospects of these blessings were to depend on the active virtues of individuals for their own support, they must in their nature be precarious and transitory—the brightness of a moment to make the permanent gloom more terrible. Accordingly, the kings government determined to give permanency to the measures of justice, and in effect to give to Ireland at length the benefits of the union.

Alas! how many topics of the deepest interest am I obliged to pass over in order to hurry to those practical measures which the exigencies of the present portentous crisis of Irish affairs absolutely demand!

The king's government, then, in the present session, contemplated three great measures:—

First—The amendment of the Irish reform act, by giving a more easy and honest mode of legislation—by diminishing the amount of the franchise to the more reasonable dimensions contemplated by the legislature, and preventing the fraudulent creation of votes, especially in towns and cities. There is not the least chance that the house of lords will pass that bill.

Second—To bring within a more reasonable compass the enormous revenues of a sinecure church, and to appropriate the surplus, after supplying the spiritual wants of the Irish Protestants, for the purpose of the moral and religious education of all the people. This bill is also doomed to meet its fate by being strangled in the house of lords.

Third—The municipal corporation bill—mark its history and blush for shame—I know you are men, and that the burning blush of shame is already on your cheeks. Mark its history; it passed the house of commons shorn of some of its utility. The selfish and base hostility of the tory slavish faction in the lords was known; and, therefore, to appease its virulence, the ministry made a concession which they ought not, in my opinion, ever to have made. They consented to deprive the reformed Irish corporations of the power to nominate persons for the office of sheriff, and they limited the power to nominate magistrates.

Yet, with these concessions, the lords contemptuously mutilated, disfigured, destroyed the bill. Not a single vote was obtained by these concessions—nay, they were used, and it was retributive justice that they should be so used, as an argument against the bill.

Well, the mutilated bill came down to the commons; the ministers again made concessions—more concessions than in my conscience I am now convinced ought to be made; I mention these things as part of history, and to protest to the people of Ireland that I, for one, will never again, directly or indirectly assent to any such concessions.

But this moderation—this disposition of conciliation, has had one good effect—it has placed the ministry and the commons more in the right—it has placed the haughty and arrogant lords more in the wrong.

The lords received these concessions contumeliously, and contemptuously restored the bill to all its original mischievous operation, as it came out of their hands.

Mark the consequences:—

Scotland enjoys reform and popular municipal corporations.

England enjoys reformed municipal corporations.

Ireland is refused any such reform.

To this injustice is superadded insult.

Is not the injury enough—is not the injustice sufficient? No—one thousand times, no. Misery has been borne by Ireland—injustice has been endured for centuries by Irishmen.

But insult—daring foul insult, has been superadded—insult from the ungenerous and heartless tyrant, Wellington—insult from the mean and creeping Vesey Fitzgerald—insult from the base of the base, whose foul name shall not pollute my page. Insult, Irishmen—insult.

The lion in the fable was dying when the ass dared to kick him. Ireland is not dying, neither sleeps she, nor shall the asses kick her with impunity.

"The nations have fallen, but thou still art young."

Yes, Ireland, my country—thou art young in the strength, the energy, the patriotism of thy sons. Yes, by the concentration of thy energies hast thou already burst the manacles of ages.

But let us at once commence the organization of the public mind—the combination of the virtuous and the good. We already succeeded in the strife when only some of the Irish were interested in that success; when our efforts bore, in spite of us, a sectarian character. Shall we not now succeed when all Ireland—when Irishmen of every creed, sect and persuasion are equally interested—when every Irishman that lives is involved in one common injustice, and is tarnished and tainted by one common insult?

Rally, then—let us rally round the king's government and the rights of Ireland. Justice to Ireland is our watchword, our motto, our daily cry, our only object, our great reward.

Justice to Ireland—speedy, equal, complete justice to Ireland.

Let us not consume one moment in reproach or in anger, in expostulation or in resentment. The injury—above all, the insult—is too deep, too degrading, to find any resource in complaints or words.

Let us be up and doing.

We are degraded below the level of human beings as long as the foul stain of this daring insult remains upon us.

I have been among those who have led you already to victory—the lowliest, but among the most zealous of them all. I offer myself to you again, to lead you to success more certain and complete.

England must do us justice, or we will do justice to ourselves.

But the course of this struggle must be like the last—without a breach of any law—without a violation of any duty—without a crime before man—without a sin before God—unstained with any injury to the property of any human being—entirely free from the pollution of one drop of blood.

Hasten, then, to another moral combination—hasten, then, to procure a remedy for the past, to prevent the more heinous mischiefs with which the future threatens us. If the Lyndhurst gang in the lords are allowed with impunity to rejoice over their insolent injury to Ireland, success will necessarily encourage them to farther darings. The sword of destruction was once before threatened by Wellington. I believe him to be now as willing, though less able to wield it. That sword may sweep over Ireland for destruction, unless every honest and good man arouses him now at my call and the call of Ireland—unless there be a vow unspoken but recognised in the heart's firm determination to exert every faculty of mind and body to wipe off the foul insult, and to procure justice for Ireland.

This, then, is my manifesto to the people of Ireland, to the reformers of Great Britain, and to the friends of rational liberty all over the world.

I proceed at once to the plan which I most respectfully and earnestly press on the consideration and for the adoption of the people of Ireland.

Let us first see what are our duties. They seem to me to be threefold—

1st. To rally all our exertions for the support of the king's government. The safety of Ireland—of the lives and properties of all classes in Ireland—its freedom from the horrors of anarchy and servile war—all depend on the stability of the present ministry. Let us, then, rally round the government of lord Melbourne, and give it all the aid we can in and out of parliament. Heart and hand let us aid lord Mulgrave in Ireland.

Our second duty is to exert all the influence we possess to preserve the internal peace of Ireland—to prevent or to suppress agrarian outrages of every description—to advise, control, protect the people—to protect them from their own natural resentments, as well as from the insidious equally with the open machinations of their enemies.

The third and chiefest duty, because the best instrument of the other two, is the immediate formation of an active society to regulate all legal and constitutional exertions in the paths of peace and with the fervor of freedom—a body free from any legal objection, or any moral reproach.

I propose that we immediately form an association, to be called "the general association of Ireland."

The name of national has been suggested, but I prefer that of general, simply because the present experiment must have completely failed—and this association, intended for other purposes, must stand dissolved before we form that other association, to be called the national, and which can be rendered necessary only when it is demonstrated that justice for Ireland cannot be obtained without a repeal of the union.

The general association of Ireland will require no profession of any principles, save those of obtaining justice for Ireland through the instrumentality of the united parliament.

The national association, should it hereafter become necessary, will be composed of repealers only.

I propose that the objects of the general association of Ireland should be confined to these two—

1st. To obtain peaceably, and by legal means, a settlement of the title question, in a mode perfectly satisfactory to the people of Ireland.

2d. To obtain municipal reform for Ireland upon the same principle, and to the same extent, with that obtained by the people of Scotland and of England.

The association to stand absolutely dissolved the moment these two objects are achieved.

Thus, temporary in its nature, and most useful in its ends, it will deserve, and I am confident obtain, the full confidence of the people of Ireland of all classes, creeds and stations.

This association must be unconnected with any other body, society or union. This seems to me, and I have some experience in these matters, to be essentially necessary to the freedom of its working and the permanent utility of its exertions.

The admission to be regulated precisely as in the Catholic association.

The rules of proceeding adopted by that association will be found to have had the benefit of a long experiment, and have already secured good order and perfect freedom of debate. I respectfully suggest the appointment of a committee to report such of those rules as should be adopted.

Of course nothing could be more abhorrent from the general association of Ireland than any exclusion on account of religious or political distinction. Whoever will now work for Ireland should be hailed with the delicacy and fervour shown by all good men to adversaries becoming proselytes to more liberal opinions.

But the chief staff and support of the new association will be the institution of an annual rent, upon the same basis with the late Catholic rent, and to be called "the rent for Ireland." The victims of illegal tithe exactions demand assistance, and the resistance to oppression will require, in one thousand ways, pecuniary aid. "The rent for Ireland" will, I trust, soon rival the Catholic rent in utility and efficacy to procure success.

Let every man who pays £1 be a member of the association, with power to speak and vote—let every man who contributes 1s. be "an associate," and be enrolled on our books, and entitled to all the protection we can give him.

This letter has necessarily grown into great length, but it does not contain one-tenth of the materials with which my mind is loaded on this most interesting subject. I see distinctly that the house of lords have taken their stand to efface a counter-revolution. They are determined to render useless, and in fact to annihilate, the reform bill; and it is quite plain that if they are not crushed in and by the attempt, they will succeed. The result of such success would be the imperative necessity for, and the inevitable accomplishment of, a violent and probably sanguinary revolution.

Those, therefore, who with me abhor violence and shudder at blood, will seek the paths of peaceable and constitutional agitation—will form those tranquil but energetic combinations which, looking to the franchise and registry—to the moral influence of public opinion—to the straightforward efforts of the disinterested lovers of human freedom and human liberty—will become, without turbulence or any crime, too powerful for any unjust or tyrannical resistance, and will secure constitutional liberty without the commission of any crime, or the liability to any reproach.

I propose to be in Dublin as soon as I can, to assist in the organization and arrangement of the general association of Ireland. I intend also, on Wednesday, to direct a letter to its secretary, with my contribution to the "rent for Ireland" for the year 1836.

We are involved in a crisis of great and most portentous magnitude. Firmness, patience, tranquility, perseverance, energy—these are the qualities now necessary—above all, unrelenting perseverance.

I never despair of Ireland. My mind is now full of great hope and high resolve. I have the honor to be, fellow countrymen, your ever faithful servant, DANIEL O'CONNELL.

THE ISTHMIUS OF PANAMA.

It appears that the project of a law granting to col. Charles Biddle the privilege of making a rail road and canal from Cruces to Panama, to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, has failed in so far, at least as was intended to be exclusively in favor of col. Biddle and his associates. A law, however, has been enacted, and has received the sanction of the executive, which granted the privilege to those who shall offer the greatest advantages to New Grenada, which means that the highest bidder shall take it, as we would say in this country. But the law as passed seems to have been a compromise among the applicants for a grant, and we suppose that col. Biddle is still interested and is associated with some of the natives, and perhaps Englishmen. The prospect for a serious and vigorous prosecution of the enterprise seems to be promising, and if we can learn that some of our capitalists, who understand rail road and canal making, are interested in it we shall entertain sanguine hopes of its completion or if English capitalists, engage in it, it may go on. But the natives, we apprehend, though abounding in zeal and public spirit, may be rather deficient in capital and skill. But whether the work be commenced under native or foreign auspices, we say success to it! The following are some of the principal provisions:

The privilege is made exclusive to those who offer the best terms.

The law is void, if baron Thierry, who has a prior grant, shall complete a canal, which he has undertaken to make across the isthmus.

The government agrees to sell to the grantees about seven hundred thousand acres of land, at about fifty cents the acre, in gold or silver, or in evidences of the consolidated domestic or foreign debt. Besides, it makes a donation of about 140,000, to be forfeited if the grantees fail to comply with the conditions of the grant.

All the expenses of surveying, and of perfecting titles, to be at the cost of the grantees.

Settlements of foreigners are to be formed, but no slave or freed man is to be admitted, and the colonists are to ask for letters of naturalization within six months. If they fail to do so, they will not be regarded as settlers.

The grantees shall fix the rates of goods and fares for persons but it shall be the same to all nations.

The grantees shall pay to the government at least two per centum on the clear profits, which shall be applied to the liquidation of the foreign debt.

At the end of forty-five years, the rail road and canal shall be ceded to the government, in good order, and that portion of the donation of land that may be necessary.

The transit of the subjects of any nation at war with New Grenada, is prohibited.

The grant cannot be leased or alienated to any foreign government.

All controversies are to be decided by the tribunals of the republic, and according to the laws of the country. [Globe.
